But the King of France taking advantage of these Seditions, though he had been in Treaty before of Peace with England, yet now he brake off the Treaty, proclaimed War, and denounced it by his Embassadour to the King: hereupon all Frenchmen in England, not Denizens, were taken prisoners, and all their Goods seized for the King; which the French King understanding, he sent a Fleet of Ships to surprize Garnsey and Jersey, but was repelled with the loss of a thousand men. After this, he levied an Army by land, and went himself in Person against Bulleign, defended by the valiant Sir Nicholas Arnold; but being weary of the Work, he left his Lieutenant Chailion to pursue the Siege, who having made many fierce Batteries, and at last assaulted, and not prevailing, he attempted to hinder the Town from supply of Victuals; and to this end, charged a Galley with gravel and stones, meaning to sink it in the Haven, but the English took the Galley before it was sunk, and made use of the stones for their own defence; after this, they made faggots of light matter, mixed with Pitch, Tar, Tallow, Rosin, Powder and Wild-fire, with intention to fire the Ships in the Haven, but that enterprise was defeated by the Bullwinkers, and the faggots taken from the French; and more than this there was little done in those parts at this time.

The Earl of Warwick comes to the Tower, and is put in the Tower.

But in England in the mean time, an unfortunate accident happened, which beginning upon a very light occasion, produced afterward very heavy effects; whereof, though there were many concurrent circumstances, yet the original cause was the pride of a Woman, upon a point indeed wherein the natures of Women are commonly most tender, Precedency of place: the Protector had married Anne Stanhope, a Woman of a haughty stomach, and the Lord Admiral his Brother the Queen Dowager, a Lady of great mildness: the neerness of the Husbands, gave occasions of the Ladies often meeting, where the Dutchess would inwardly murmur, why she being the Wife of the elder Brother, and the better man, should give place to her, who was the Wife of the younger Brother, and the meaner man; this envy of hers towards the Queen, bred a malice in her towards the Admiral, as thinking the mischief she did to the Husband, to be a part of revenge upon the Wife, and though the Queen shortly after died in Child-bed, yet the malice of the Dutchess towards the Admiral lived still (so hard a thing it is for malice, once fed in a Womans heart, to be removed); out of this malice, she puts divers turnings into her Husband the Protector's head, against his Brother the Admiral, as though he went about to procure his death, to the end, he might aspire to the place he held; but certainly, as misliking his Government being a Protestant, who was himself a Papist: In this case causes of jealousy against the Admiral were obvious enough, for it was known that in King Henries time, he had aimed at the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth King Henries second Daughter; and now his Wife the Queen Dowager being dead (and not without suspicion of poyson) he fell upon that marriage afresh, which could not be thought to tend but to some very high aspiring end: The Protector a plain man, and one that had not the deepest insight into practices, whether too importunately provoked by his Wife, or whether out of an honest minde, not willing to patronize faults though in a Brother, gave way to accusations brought against him, to as in a Parliament then holden, he was accused for attempting to get into his custody the Person of the King, and Government of the Realm, for endeavouring to marry the Lady Elizabeth the Kings Siller, for perſwading the King in his tender years to take upon him the rule and ordering of himself; upon which points (though perhaps proved, yet not sufficiently, against him, who was never called to his answer) he was by Act of Parliament condemned; and within few days after condemnation, a Warrant was sent, under the hand of his Brother the Protector, to cut off his Head; wherein (as after it proved) he did as much, as if he had laid his own Head down upon the block; for whilst these Brothers lived and held together, they were as a strong Fortress one to the other; the Admirals courage supporting the Protectors Authority, and the Protectors Authority maintaining the Admirals stoutness; but the Admiral once gone, the Protectors Authority, as wanting support, began to totter, and fell at last to utter ruine. Besides there was at this time, an orgel the Nobility, a kinde of faction; Protestants who favoured the Protector for his own sake, and other of Papal inclination, who favoured him for his Brothers sake; but his Brother being gone, both sides forsook him, even his own side, as thinking they could expect little assistance from him, who gave no more assistance to his own Brother; and perhaps more than all this, the Earl of Warwick, at this time, was the most powerful man both in Courage and Counsel amongst all the Nobility, and none so near to watch him as the Admiral, while he lived; but he being gone, there was none left that either was able and durst, or durst and was able to stand against him: however it was, not long after the Admirals death, the Protector was invaded with sundry accusations, wherein the Earl of Warwick made not always the greatest show, but yet had always the greatest hand; one thing the Protector had done, which though a private act, yet gave a publick distaste.

To make him a Mansion house in the Strand (the same which is now called Somerſet-house) he pulled down a Church, and two Bishops Houses by the Strand-Bridge; in digging the foundation whereof, the bones of many who had been there buried, were cast out and carried into the fields; and because the Stones of those Houses and the Church sufficed not for his works, the Steeple, and most part of the Church of Saint Johns of Jerusalem near Smithfield, was wrenched and overthrown with Powder, and the Stones applied to this spacious Building; and more than this, the Cloyster on Pauls on the North side of the Church, in a place called Pardon Church-yard, and the dance of Death very curiously wrought about the Cloyster, and a Chapel that stood in the midst of the Church-yard; also the Charnel House, that stood on the South side of Pauls (now a Carpenters Yard) with the Chapel, Timber and Monuments therein, were beaten down, the bones of the dead carried into Finsbury-fields, and the Stones converted into this Building. This Act of the Protectors did something alienate the peoples mindes from him; which the Earl of Warwick perceiving, thought it now a fit time to be falling upon him; and the eupon drew eighten of the Privy Council to joyn with him, who withdrawing themselves from the Court, held secret consultations together, and walked in the City with many Servants weaponed, and in new Liveries; whereof when the Lord Protector heard, he sent Secretary Peter to them, to know the causes of their Assembly, requiring them to resort to him peaceably, that they might commune together as friends; but in the mean time, he Armed five hundred men, and removed the

A King by night from Hampſton Court to Windſor: on the other side, the Lords at London having first taken possession of the Tower, sent for the Mayor and Aldermen of the City, to the Earl of Warwick Lodging at Ely-house in Holborn; to whom the Lord Richthen Lord Chancellor, made a long Oration, wherein he shewed the ill Government of the Lord Protector, and the many mischiefs that by it were come upon the Kingdome, and thereupon requiring them to joyn with the Lords there assembled to remove him; and presently that day, a Proclamation was made in divers parts of the City to that purpose, to which the Lords and Counsellors that subscribed their names were these: the Lord Rich Chancellor, the Lord Saint-John Lord great Master, the Marquess of Northampton, the Earl of Warwick Lord great Chamberlain, the Earl of Arundell Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Southampton, Sir Thomas Chichey Treasurer of the Household, Sir John Gage Constable of the Tower, Sir William Peter Secretary, Sir Edward North Knight, Sir Edward Montague chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Baker Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Edward Wotton, Sir Richard Southwell Knights, and Doctor Wootton Dean of Canterbury. In the afternoon of the same day, the Lord Mayor assembled a Common Council in the Guild-hall, where two Letters arrived almost in one instant, from the King and the Lord Protector, for a thousand men to be Armed for defence of the Kings Person; another from the Lords at London, for a thousand men to aid them in defence of the Kings Person also; both pretending alike, and therefore hard how to please them both. The Recorder set forth the complaint of the Lords against the Protector, in such sort, that he made many inclinable to favour that side, but one named George Staddon better advised, stepped up, and in a long Speech shewed what mischiefs had come to the City by opposing the King; and therefore gave his opinion, to suspend giving aid to the Lords, at least for a time. His advice was hearkened unto, and thereupon the Court resolved only to arm an hundred Horsemen, and four hundred Foot, in defence of the City; and to the Letters, returned submissive but dilatory Answers. After some other passages between the Protector and the Lords, Sir Ed. Winkfield Cap. of the Guard, was sent from the Lords to Windſor; who so well perſwaded the King of the Lords loyal affection towards him; and of their moderate intention towards the Protector, that the King was contented to have him presently removed from him, and suffered him within 2. dayes after to be carried to the Tower: In whose absence, 7. Lords of the Council, and four Knights, were appointed by turns to attend the Kings person; and for affairs of State, the Government of them was referred to the whole Body of the Council: soon after were sent to the Protector in the Tower, certain Lords of the Council, with Articles against him, requiring his present Answer, whether he would acknowledge them to be true, or else stand upon his justification. The chief Article was this, that he took upon him the Office of Protector, with express condition, that he should do nothing in the Kings affairs, but by assent of the late Kings Executors, or the greatest part of them; and that contrary to this condition, he had hindered Justice, and subverted Laws, of his own Authority, as well by Letters, as by other Command; and many other Articles, but all much to this purpose.

The Protector, whether thinking to speed better by submission than by contesting, or perhaps floding himself not altogether innocent, (for indeed in so great a place, who can bear himself with such sincerity, but he will commit errors with which he may be taxed?) subscribed an acknowledgement with his own hand; humbly submitting himself to the Kings mercy, and desiring their Lordships favour towards him. Upon this submission, three moneths after he had been imprisoned, he was released, entertained and feasted by the King, and sworn again to be a Privy Counsellour, but no more Protector: at which time, between him and the Lords, a shew at least of perfect amity was made; and to make it the more firm, the Dukes Daughter was afterward married to the Lord Lisle, Son and Heir to the Earl of Warwick; at which marriage the King himself was present; and perhaps to honour their reconciliation and this marriage, The Earl of Warwick was made Lord Admiral of England, Sir John Russell Lord Privy Seal was created Earl of Bedford, the Lord Saint-John was created Earl of Wiltshire, and soon after made Lord Treasurer, Sir William Paget Controllour of the Kings House, was made Lord Paget, Sir Anthony Winkfield Captain of the Guard, was made Controllour, and Sir Thomas Darcey was made Captain of the Guard. But of the other side the Earl of Arundell, the Earl of Southampton, were put off from the Council; of whom the Earl of Southampton died shortly after at Lincoln Place in Holborn, and was buried in Saint Andrews Church there.

About this time a Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies; another against unlawful assemblies: but for fear of new tumults, the Parliament was untimely dissolved, and Gentlemen were commanded to retire to their Countrey Habitations; and for the same cause also, Trinity Term did not hold.

About this time also, Pope Paul the third died; after whose death the Cardinals being divided about the Election of a new Pope, the Imperial part, which was the greatest, gave their Voices for Cardinal Poole; which being told him, he disabled himself, and wished them to choose one that might be most for the glory of God, and good of the Church: upon this stop, some that were no friends to Poole, and perhaps looked for the place themselves, if he were put off, laid many things to his charge; amongst other, that he was not without suspicion of Lutheranism, as having been very conversant with Immanuel Tremellius, and Antonius Flamininus, great great Lutherans; and not altogether without blemish of incontinency, there being a young Nun that was thought to be his Daughter. But of these Criminations, Poole so cleared himself, that he was afterward more importuned to take the place than he was before: and thereupon one night the Cardinals came unto him, being in bed, and sent him word they came to adore him (which is one special kind of electing the Pope); but he being awaked out of his sleep, and acquainted with it, made answer, That this was not a work of darkness, and therefore required them to forbear till the next day, and then to do as God should put into their minds. But the Italian Cardinals attributing this putting off, to a kind of Rudidity and sloth in Poole, looked no more after him, but the next day chose Cardinal Montanus Pope, who was afterward named Julius the Third.

A Peace between England and France upon payment of four hundred thousand Crowns.

And now the King of France, upon many just Considerations, was grown desirous to have a Peace with England; and thereupon sent one Guidotti a Florentine into England, to make some overture of his desire to the Lords of the Council; who addressing himself to the Earl of Warwick, whom he knew to be most prevalent, so prevailed, that it was concluded four Embassadors should be sent from the King of England into France, and four from the French King, to Treat with them. The Commissioners for the English were John Earl of Bedford, William Lord Paget; Sir William Mason, Secretaries of State. For the French were Monsieur Rochepot, Monsieur Chavillen, Guyllart de Martier, and Rochelle de Doffie. Much time was spent to agree about a place of Meeting; till at last the English to satisfy the French, were contented it should be before Bulloigne; where were many Meetings and many differences about Conditions: but in conclusion, a Peace was concluded upon certain Articles, the chief whereof was: that Bulloigne and the places adjacent should be delivered up to the French within six Weeks after the Peace proclaimed; and that the French should pay for the same two hundred thousand Crowns: within three days after delivery of the Town; and other two hundred thousand Crowns upon the fifth day of August following: Hostages were on both sides given for performance, and to those Articles the French King was sworn at Amiens, and the King of England in London: The Lord Clinton who had been Deputy of Bulloigne, was made Lord Amiral of England.

Preciently after this Agreement, the Duke of Brunswick sent to the King of England, to offer his Service in the Kings Wars, with Ten thousand men, and to intreat a Marriage with the Lady Mary, the Kings eldest Sister. To his offer of Aid, answer was made, That the Kings Wars were ended; And touching the Marriage with the Lady Mary, That the King was in speech for her Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal; which if it succeeded not, he should then be favourably heard. Upon this, the Emperours Embassadour demanded of the King, That the Lady Mary might have free exercise of the Masse; which the King not only constantly denied, but thereupon Sermons were exercised at the Court, and order taken, That no man should have any Benefice from the King, but first he should Preach before him: And shortly after, under pretence of preparing for Sea-matters, five thousand pounds were sent to relieve Protestants beyond the Seas. At this time also, an Embassadour came from Gustavus King of Sweden, to enter League with the King for entercourse of Merchants; and charge was then also given, that the Laws of England should be administered in Ireland.

About this time the Queen Dowager of Scotland, going from France to her Countrey, passed through England, having first obtained a safe Conduct, she arrived at Portsmouth, and was there met by divers of the English Nobility; conducted to London, she was lodged in the Bishop-Palace: After four days tarrying, having been Feasted by the King at White-Hall, she departed, being waited on by the Sheriffs of Countreies to the Borders of Scotland. And now was one Steward a Scot apprehended in England, and imprisoned in the Tower, for intending to poison the young Queen of Scots, whom the King delivered to the French King upon the frontiers of Cailli, to be by him Justiced at his pleasure.

At this time certain Ships were appointed by the Emperour, to Transport the Lady Mary either by violence or by stealth out of England to Antwerp; whereupon Sir John Gates was sent with Forces into Essex, where the Lady lay: and besides, the Duke of Somerset was sent with two hundred men, the Lord Privy Seal with other two hundred, and Master Sentleger with four hundred more, to severall Coasts upon the Sea; and the Lord Chancellor and Secretary Pear were sent to the Lady Mary, who after some Conference, brought her to the Lord Chancellor's House at Lye in Essex, and from thence to the King at Westminster. Here the Council declared unto her, how long the King had permitted her the use of the Masse, and considering her obstinacy, was resolved now no longer to permit, unless she would put him in hope of some conformity in short time. To which she answered, That her Soul was Gods: and touching her Faith, as she could not change, so she would not dissemble it. Reply was made, That the King intended not to constrain her Faith, but to restrain the outward profession of it, in regard of the danger the Example might draw. After some like interchange of speeches, the Lady was appointed to remain with the King, when there arrived an Embassadour from the Emperour, with a threatening Message of War, in case his Cousin the Lady Mary should be denied the free exercise of the Masse: Hereupon the King presently advised with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and with the Bishop of London and Rechefer, who gave their Opinion, That to give Licence to sin, was sin; but to connive at sin, might be allowed, so it were not too long, nor without hope of Reformation: Then Answer was given to the Embassadour, That the King would send send to the Emperour within a moneth or two, and give him such satisfaction as should be fit.

And now the King being uncertain of the faith, both of his Subjects and of his Confederates, intended by alliance to strengthen himself; and thereupon sent one Bartwick, to the King of Denmark, with private Instructions, to Treat of a Marriage between the Lady Elizabeth the King's youngest Sister, and the King of Denmark's eldest Son: but when it came to the point, this Lady could not be induced to entertain Marriage with any.

1551. The Lady Elizabeth cannot be induced to marry.

After this, the Marquess of Northampton was sent Embassadour to the French King, as well to present him with the Order of the Garter, as to Treat with him of other secret Affairs: With him were joyned in Commission the Bishop of Ely, Sir Philip Hobbie, Sir William Pickering, Sir John Mason, and Master Smith Secretary of State; also the Earl of Worcester, Rutland, and Ormond were appointed to accompany them; as likewise the Lords Listes, Fitzwater, Bray, Abergavenny and Evers, with other Knights and Gentlemen of Note, to the number of Six and twenty: And for avoiding of an immoderate Train, Order was given, That every Earl should have but four Attendants, every Baron but three, every Knight and Gentleman but two, only the Commissioners were not limited to any number. Being come to the Court of France, they were forthwith brought to the King, being then in his Bed-Chamber: To whom the Marquess presented the Order of the Garter, wherewith he was presently invested. Then the Bishop of Ely in a short Speech, declared, how the King of England, out of his love and desire of Amity, had sent this Order to his Majesty; desiring withall, That some persons might be authorized to Treat with them about some other matters of Importance; whereupon a Commission went forth to the Cardinal of Lorraine, Chastillon the Constable, the Duke of Guise, and others. At the first, the English demanded, That the young Queen of Scots might be sent into England for perfecting of Marriage between King Edward and her. But to this the French answered, That conclusion had been made long before for her Marriage with the Dauphin of France. Then the English proposed a Marriage between King Edward and the Lady Elizabeth the French King's eldest Daughter. To this the French did cheerfully incline; but when they came to talk of Portion, the English demanded at first Fifteen hundred thousand Crowns, then fell to fourteen, and at last to eight hundred thousand: The French offered at first, one hundred thousand Crowns, then rose to two hundred thousand, and higher they would not be drawn; saying, It was more than ever had been given with a Daughter of France. Shortly after, Monsieur the Marshall and other Commissioners were sent by the French King to deliver to the King of England the Order of Saint Michael; and then was further Treaty about the Marriage: and because the French could be forced no higher than two hundred thousand Crowns, it was at last accepted, and the Agreement was reduced into Writing, and delivered under Seal on both sides.

Embassadors are sent into France.

To Treat of a Marriage, between King Edward and the French Kings eldest Daughter, which is at last concluded.

And now King Edward supposing his state to be most safe, when indeed it was most unsure; in testimony both of his Joy and Love, advanced many to new Titles of Honour; The Lord Marquess Dorset, who had married the eldest Daughter of Charles Brandon, was created Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Warwick Duke of Northumberland, the Earl of Wiltshire was created Marquess of Winchester, Sir William Herbert Lord of Cardiffe and Master of the Horse, was created Earl of Pembroke: Also William Cecil the Kings Secretary, John Cheek one of his Schoolmasters, Henry Dudley, and Henry Nevill were made Knights; and (that which perhaps it had been happy, if it had never been) Sir Robert Dudley one of the Duke of Northumblands Sons, (the same who was afterward the great Earl of Leicester) was sworn one of the Six ordinary Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber: for after his coming into a place so near about him, the King enjoyed his health but a while.

Dukes and Earls made.

The Lord Robert Dudley is made one of the Kings Bed-Chamber.

The aspiring thoughts of the Duke of Northumberland, were now grown to be put in execution: He was advanced in title of Honour equal with the highest; in authority and power above the highest: he had placed his Politick Son near about the Kings Person. The next thing was to remove the Duke of Somerset out of the Way: And for this also, he had prepared Instruments; Sir Thomas Palmer, Crane, Hammon, Cecil, and others, who brought severall Accusations against the Duke; some trenching upon the King and Kingdome, but one specially against the Duke of Northumblands person; whose practices when the Duke of Somerset found, and had cause to fear, he went one day into the Duke of Northumblands Chamber, with a purpose to kill him; but finding him in his Bed, and being received with much kind Complement by him, his heart relented, and thereupon came away without any thing done. At his coming out, one of his Company asked him if he had done the deed? Who answered, No. Then, said he, You are your self undone. And indeed it so fell out; for when all other Accusations were refuted, this only stuck by him, and could not be denied; And so on the first of December he was arraigned at Westminster; where the Lord William Paulet Marquess of Winchester, and Lord Treasurer, sat as High Steward of England, and with him Peers to the number of seven and twenty: The Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, the Marquess of Northampton, the Earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bath, Suffex, Worcester, Pembroke, and Hereford: The Barons, Abergavenny, Audley, Wharton, Evers, Latimer, Borough, Zouch, Stafford, Westbury, Darby, Sturton, Winton, Grosvenor, Cobham, and Bray. The Lords being set, the Indictments were read; in number five, containing a Charge, for raising Men in the North parts of the Realm: And at his House, for assembling men to kill the Duke of Northumberland: For resisting resisting his Attachment, for raising London, for assaulting the Lords, and devising of their deaths. To all which he pleaded, Not guilty, and made a satisfactory Answer to every Point, though the Kings Learned Council pressed them hard against him. This done, the Lords went together, where Exception was taken by some, as a thing unfit, That the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquess of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke should be of the Jury: seeing the Prisoner was chiefly charged with practices against them: But to this the Lawyers made answer, That a Peer of the Realm might not be challenged. So after much variation of Opinions, the Prisoner was acquit of Treason, but by most Voyces found guilty of Felony; and that by a Statute lately by his own procurement made, That if any should attempt to kill a Privy Counsellor, although the Fact were not done, yet it should be Felony, and be punished with death. But upon his being acquit of Treason, the Axe of the Tower was presently laid down, which made people conceive he had been acquitted of all; who thereupon for Joy gave so great a Shout, that it was heard as far as Charing-Crosse: But the Duke was little the better for being acquitted of Treason, seeing he was found guilty of Felony; and had Judgment to die. It is thought by some, he might have saved his life, if he had demanded his Clergy: but it is rather thought, that in that Statute Clergy was denied. Two moneths after his Condemnation, (such against the Kings will) he was brought to the Tower-Hill to Execution; where being ascended the Scaffold, he entered into a Speech, wherein though he justified himself, for any matter rendering to the hurt of the King or Kingdom; yet he confessed, he was justly by the Law brought to his death; and thanked God, that had given him so large a time of repentance, specially that he had opened his eyes, to see clearly the light of the Gospel: And going on in his Speech, a sudden noise arose, of some crying, Away, away; which made some think a Pardon had been come, but was indeed the voice of some that had been warned to be at the Execution, and were come somewhat late: But the Tumult being appeased, the Duke went on with his Speech, and at last commending his Soul to God, with a countenance not shewing any sign of fear, or perturbation; only his cheeks a little redder than they used to be, he peaceably laid down his head upon the block, and in a moment, with one stroke of the Axe, had it stricken off. The Death of this Duke made the Duke of Northumberland more odious to the people than he was before; and there were some that dipped Handkerchiefs in his blood, and kept them to upbraid the Duke of Northumberland withall, when he came himself afterward to the like end. After execution of the Duke, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Miles Partridge were hanged at the Tower-Hill, Sir Michael Stanhope, and Sir Thomas Arundell were there beheaded.

After the Dukes condemnation, it was thought fit to have something done for averting the Kings mind from taking thought; and to that end, one George Ferrers, a Gentleman of Lincoln-Inne, was appointed, in the Christmas time, to be Lord of Mis-rule; who so carried himself, that he gave great delight to many, and some to the King, but not in proportion to his heaviness.

About this time was a call of seven Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Grays-Inne; of whom, Master Robert Brook Recorder of London, was the first; and the next Master Dyer, who was chosen Speaker the next Parliament.

About this time also, the Lord Paget was committed to the Tower, for what cause is not certain; and being a Knight of the Order, his Garter was taken from him by Garter King at Arms, upon this pretence, that he was said to be no Gentleman, either by Father or Mother; and the Garter was then bestowed on the Earl of Warwick, the Duke of Northumblands eldest Son; and the Lord Rich Lord Chancellour, was put off from his place, and the Seal then delivered to Doctor Thomas Goodrick, Bishop of Ely.

About this time also three great Ships were set forth at the Kings charge, for discovery of a Passage to the East-Indies by the North Seas; the chief Pilot and director in this Voyage, was one Sebastian Gabato an Englishman, born at Bristol, but the Son of a Genoway: these Ships at the last arrived in the Countrey of Moscovia, but not without loss of their Captain Sir Hugh Willoughby, who being tossed and driven by tempest, was afterward found in his Ship frozen to death, and all his people.

At this time also the Duke of Suffolks three Daughters, which he had by Frances, Daughter of Charles Brandon and Mary Queen of France, were married at Durham House: the eldest Jane, to the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth Son to the Duke of Northumberland: The second Katherine, to Henry Son and Heir to the Earl of Pembroke: The youngest, Mary, being somewhat deformed, to Martin Keyes the Kings Gentleman Porter. And then also Katherine the Duke of Northumblands youngest Daughter to the Lord Hastings, eldest Son of the Earl of Huntingdon. And now had the Duke of Northumberland gone a great way in his design; it remained to persuade King Edward to exclude his two Sisters from Succession in the Crown; for that done, his Daughter in law the Lady Jane, would come to have a right: for as for pretenders out of Scotland, or any other, he made no great matter. And now to work the King to this persuasion, (being in a languishing sickness, not far from death) he inculcates to him, how much it concerned him to have a care of Religion, that it might be preserved in purity, not only in his own life, but as well after his death; which would not be, if his sister the Lady Mary should succeed, and she could not be put by; unless her other Sister the Lady Elizabeth were put by also, seeing their rights depended one upon another; but if he pleased to appoint the Lady Jane, the Duke of Suffolks eldest Daughter, and his own next Kinswoman to his Sisters, to be his Successor, he might then be sure that, his true Religion should be

The Duke of Northumberland persuades King Edward to exclude his two Sisters, succession in the Crown; and by what reasons.

A be maintained, to Gods great glory, and be a worthy Act of his own religious Providence. This was to strike upon the right sitting of the young Kings affection, with whom nothing was so dear as preservation of Religion; and thereupon his last Will was appointed to be drawn (contrived chiefly by the Lord Chief Justice Mountague, and Secretary Cecil:) by which Will, as far as in him lay, he excluded his two Sisters from the Succession, and all other, but the Dukes of Suffolks Daughters; and then causing it to be read before his Council, he required them all to assent unto it, and to subscribe their hands; which they all, both Nobility, and Bishops and Judges did; only the Archbishop Cranmer refused at first, Sir James Hales a Judge of the Common-Pleas, to the last, and with them also Sir John Baker Chancellour of the Exchequer. And now remained nothing for the Duke of Northumblands purpose, but that the King should die: which soon after he did at Greenwich, the sixth of July, in the year 1553. One point of the Dukes policy must not be forgotten, that fearing what troubles the Lady Mary might raise after the Kings decease, if she should be at liberty; he therefore, seeing the King drawing on, used all means possible to get her within his power; to which end Letters are directed to her in the Kings name from the Council, willing her forthwith to repair to the King, as well to be a comfort to him in his sickness, as to see all matters well ordered about his person: Whereupon, the Lady suspecting nothing, addressed her self with all speed to the Journey; till being upon the Way, she was advertised of the Dukes design; and then she returned to her House at Hovefden, and so escaped the snare: by whose escape, the whole Design of the Duke of Northumberland was disappointed; as soon after will be seen.

His Will drawn to that purpose.

Of his Taxations.

IN no Kings Reign was ever more Parliaments for the time, nor fewer Subsidies; the greatest was in his last year, when yet there was but one Subsidie, with two Fifteens and Tenths, granted by the Temporality, and a Subsidie by the Clergy. And indeed to the how loath this King was to lay Impositions upon his people, this may be a sufficient argument; That though he were much in debt, yet he chose rather to deal with the Foulker in the Low-Countries for money upon loan, at the interest of fourteen pounds for a hundred, for a year. But his ways for raising of money, were by selling of Chantry Lands and Houses, given him by Parliament; and by inquiring after all Church Goods, either remaining in Cathedral and Parish-Churches, or embezzelled away, as Jewels, Gold and Silver Chalice, ready money, Copes, and other Vestments; reserving to every Church one Chalice, and one covering for the Communion Table, the rest to be applied to his benefit. He also raised money by enquiring after offences of Officers in great places; in which enquiry one Beaumont Master of the Rolls, being convinced of many Crimes, surrendered all his Offices, Lands and Goods into the Kings hands: Also one Whalley, Receiver of Yorkshire, being found a Delinquent, surrendered his Office, and paid a great Fine besides: Also the Lord Paget, Chancellour of the Duchie, convinced that he had sold the Kings Lands and Timber-Woods without Commission, and had applied the Kings Fines to his own use, for these and other offences, surrendered his Office, and was fined at four thousand pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time for raising of money; twenty thousand pounds weight of Bullion, was appointed to be made so much baser, that the King might gain thereby a hundred and forty thousand pounds.

Delinquent Officers fined.

Bullion made baser to raise money.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN his third year a Parliament was holden; wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies; another against unlawful Assemblies. In his fourth year a Parliament was holden, wherein Priests Children were made legitimate; and usury for the loan of money was forbidden. In his fifth year it was ordained, That the Laws of England should be admitted in Ireland; and a King at Arms named Ulster, was newly instituted for Ireland; whose Province was all Ireland; and he was the first fourth King of Arms, and first Herald appointed for Ireland. Also in his fifth year, base monies formerly coined, were cried down; so as the shilling went but for nine pence, and shortly after but for six pence, the groat but for three pence, and shortly after but for two pence.

Priests Children made legitimate. Usury forbidden. Ulster King at Arms ordained for Ireland. Base Monies cried down.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN the first year of this Kings Reign, Injunctions were set forth, for pulling down and removing all Images out of Churches; also certain Homilies were appointed to be made by Learned men, to be read in Churches, for the peoples instruction: And at Easter this year, it was ordered, That the Sacrament of the Lords Supper should be ministered to the Lay-people in both kinds. Also Marriage was allowed to Clergy men; Auricular Confession and Prayer for the dead were forbidden: And it is observable, That the very same day that Images were pulled down at London, the great overthrow was given to the Scots at Muskborough. Also at this time, by the Archbishop Cranmer.

The Book of Common-Prayer established.

Crammers means, divers learned Protestants came over into England, and had here entertainment, as Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, and Paulus Fagius; of whom Peter Martyr was sent to read a Divinity Lecture in Oxford; Bucer and Fagius in Cambridge. In this Kings fourth Year, all Altars in Churches were commanded to be taken down, and Tables placed in their rooms. In his fifth year, the Book of Common Prayer was established.

Casualties happening in his Time.

A Sweating Sickness, proper only to the English Nation.

IN his Second year, Saint Ames Church within Aldersgate was burnt. In his fifth year, a Sweating Sickness infested first Shrewsbury, and then the North parts, and after grew most excreant in London, so as the first Week there dyed eight hundred persons, and was so violent, that it took men away in four and twenty hours, sometimes in twelve, and sometimes in less: Amongst other of Account that dyed of this Sickness, were the two Sons of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, who died within an hour after one another, in such order that both of them died Dukes. This Disease was proper to the English Nation, for it followed the English wheresoever they were in Forrain Parts, but seized upon none of any other Country. In this Year one Master Arden of Kent, by procurement of his Wife, was murdered in his own house; being dead, his body was carried out and laid upon the ground, in a Close hard by: where this is Memorable, That for two years after, the ground where his body lay, bore no grafs, but represented still as it were a picture of his body, only in the space between his legs and arms there grew grafs; but where any part of his body touched, none at all. Yet this Miraculous Accident was not so much for the Murderer, as for the Curfes of a Widow Woman, out of whose hands the said Master Arden had uncharitably bought the said Close, to her undoing. And thus the Divine Justice, even in this World oftentimes, works Miracles upon offenders, for a merciful warning to men, if they would be so wise to take it. In his sixth Year, the third of August at Middleton-stony, eleven miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a child which had two perfect bodies from the navel upward, the leggs for both the bodies grew out at the midst where the bodies joyned, and had but one issue for the excrements of them both: they lived eighteen dayes, and were Women Children. This Year also were taken at Quinborow three Dolphins, and at Black-Wall six more, the least of which was bigger than any Horse.

A monstrous Birth.

Dolphins taken at Black-wall.

Works of Piety done by him or others in his Time.

Christ's Hospital, Saint Thomas Hospital, Saint Bartholomews and Bride-well given by this King to Charitable Uses.

THIS King gave three Houses to the Relief of the Poor: First for the fatherless and Beggar Children, he gave the late Gray-Fryers in London, which is now called Christ's Hospital. Then for lame and diseased persons, he gave the Hospital of Saint Thomas in Southwark, and Saint Bartholomews in West-Smithfield. Thirdly, for rigorous and idle persons, he gave his House of Bridewell, and for their Maintenance, he took six hundred pounds a year from the House of the Savoy, (which had been long abused) and bestowed it upon these Houses; to which he added four thousand Marks a year more. By his example, Sir William Chester Alderman of London, and John Calthroppe Draper, at their own Costs made the Brick-walls and way on the backside that leadeth to the Hospital of Saint Bartholomews, and also covered and vaulted the Town-Ditch, which before was very noysome. In the second year of this King, Sir John Gresham, then Mayor of London, founded a Free-School at Holt in Norfolk: Also at his decease he gave to every Ward in London ten pounds, to be distributed amongst the Poor, and to Maids marriages two hundred pounds. In his third year, Sir Rowland Hill, the then Lord Mayor of London, caused to be made a Cawsey commonly called Overlane Pavement, in the High-way from Stone to Nantwich, in length four miles, for the ease of Horse and Man. He caused also a Cawsey to be made from Dunchurch to Bransford in Warwick-shire, more than two miles in length; and gave twenty pounds towards the making of Roiton Bridge three miles from Coventry. He made likewise the High-way to Kilburne near to London. Also four Bridges, two of them of stone, containing eighteen Arches in them both; the one over the River of Severn called Acham Bridge, the other Terne Bridge; and two other of Timber at Stoke, where he built also a good part of the Church. A Free School likewise he builded at Drayton in Shropshire, with Matter and Usher, and gave sufficient Stipends to them both. Also he purchased a free Fair to the said Town, with a free Market weekly; and every fourteen dayes a free Market for Cattel. Besides all this, he gave to the Hospital of Christ-Church in London in his life-time five hundred pounds, and at his death, a hundred. In this Kings fourth year, Sir Andrew Jud Mayor of London, founded a notable Free School at Tunbridge in Kent; and gave three score pounds land a year to the Skinners of London, for which they be bound to pay twenty pounds to the School-Master, and eight pounds to the Usher of his Free School at Tunbridge yearly for ever. In his sixth year, Sir George Barnes, who was Mayor of London, gave a Wind-Mill in Finsbury-Field to the Haberdashers of London, the profits thereof to be distributed to the Poor of that Company: also to Saint Bartholomews the Little, certain Tenements to the like use.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

Concerning his Personage, it is said, he was in Body beautiful, of a sweet aspect, and specially in his Eyes, which seemed to have a Starry liveliness and lustre in them. Concerning his Conditions, in matter of Fact, there is not much to be said; but in matter of Disposition and Inclination very much, even to admiration. For though his Tree was not yet come to the maturity of bearing Fruit, yet it was come to the forwardness to bear plenty of Buds and Blossoms: For proof of his Merciful Disposition, this one Example may be sufficient; When one Joan Butcher King Edward's pitiful Disposition, was to be burned for Blasphemy and Heresie, all the Councell could not get him to sign the War-rant, till the Archbishop Crammer, with much importunity, perswaded him, and then he did it, but not without weeping. For his pregnancy of Wit, and Knowledge in all kinds of Learning, we shall need but to hear what Cardan (who coming into England, had often Conference with him) reporteth of him, That he was extraordinarily skillfull in Languages, and in the Politicks; well seen in Philosophy and in Divinity, and generally indeed a very Miracle of Art and Nature. He would answer Ambassadors sometimes upon the suddain, either in French or Latine: He knew the state of Forrain Princes perfectly, and his own more: He could call all Gentlemen of account through his Kingdome by their names. And all this when he had scarce yet attained to the age of fifteen years, and dyed before sixteen; that from hence we may gather, It is a sign of no long life, when the Faculties of the Mind are ripe so early.

Of his Death and Buriall.

IN the Sixth Year of his Reign, which was the year before he dyed, he fell sick of the Measels; and being well recovered of them, he fell soon after into the small Pox, and of them also was so well recovered, that the Summer following he rode a Progress, with a greater Magnificence than ever he had done before; having in his Train no fewer than four thousand Horse. In January following (whether procured by sinister practice, or growing upon him by naturall infirmity) he fell into an indisposition of body, which soon after grew to a Cough of the Lungs. Whereupon a rumour was spread abroad by some, That a Nofegay had been given him at New-Years-tide, which brought him into this slow but deadly Consumption: By others, That it was done by a poysoned Glyster. However it was, he was brought at last to so great extremity, that his Physicians despaird of his life; and when Physicians could do him no good, a Gentlewoman (thought to be prepared for the purpose) took him in hand, and did him hurt: for with her applications, his Leggs swelled, his Pulse failed, his skin changed colour, and many other symptoms of approaching death appeared. The hour before his death, he was overheard to pray thus by himself, O Lord God, deliver me out of this miserable and wretched life; O Lord thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee; yet for thy chosens sake, if it be thy Will, send me life and health, that I may truly serve thee: O Lord God, save thy chosen people of England, and defend this Realm from Papistry, and maintain thy true Religion, that I and my People may praise thy holy Name, for thy Son Jesus, Christs sake. So turning his face and seeing some by him, he said, I thought you had not been so nigh: Yes, said Doctor Onen, we heard you speak to your self. Then said the King, I was praying to God: O, I am faint, Lord have mercy upon me, and receive my spirit: and in so saying, gave up the ghost, the sixth day of July, in the year 1553. and in the Sixteenth year of his age, when he had Reigned six years, five moneths, and nine dayes. It is noted by some, that he dyed the same moneth, and the same day of the moneth, that his Father King Henry the Eighth had put Sir Thomas More to death. His Body was buried upon the ninth of August, in the Chappell of Saint Peters Church in Westminster, and laid near to the Body of King Henry the seventh his Grandfather. At his Funerall, which was on the tenth of August following, his Sister Queen Mary shewed this respect to him, that though Doctor Day a Popish Bishop Preached, yet all the Service with a Communion was in English.

His Piety at the time of his death.

Men of Note in his Time.

THIS Kings Reign being short, and having but small Wars, had not many Sword-men famous for any Acts they did: Gown-men there were some, as Edward Hall a Counsellour in the Law, who wrote a notable Chronicle of the Union of the Two Houses of York and Lancaster; William Hugh, a York-shire-man, who wrote a notable Treatise called, The Troubled Man's Medicine; Thomas Starnhold, born in Southampton, who turned into English Meeter seven and thirty of David's Psalms.

The Interregnum between the death of King Edward, and the Proclaiming at London of Queen Mary.

The Duke of Northumberland bears all the sway. He causes the Mayor and Aldermen to swear Allegiance to the Lady Jane. Who is proclaimed Queen. The Lady Mary rides Post into Norfolk.

Takes upon her the name of Queen, and is assisted by the Norfolk men, upon her promise not to alter Religion. She writes to the Lords, and claimeth the Crown. The Lords Answer.

Against whom the Duke of Northumberland is sent with an Army.

King Edward being dead, the Duke of Northumberland took upon him to sit at the Stern, and ordered all things at his pleasure: so two dayes after, he with others of the Councel, sent to the Lord Maior, that he with six Aldermen, and twelve principal Commons, should repair presently to the Court; to whom when they came, it was secretly signified that King Edward was dead; and that by his last Will, to which all the Nobility and Judges had given assent he had appointed the Lady Jane, Daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, to succeed him; his Letters Patents whereof were shewed them, and thereupon they were required to take their Oaths of Allegiance to the Lady Jane, and to secure the City in her behalf; which whether dissemblingly, or sincerely, whether for love, or fear, yet they did, and departed. The next day, the Lady Jane in great State was brought to the Tower of London, and there declared Queen; and by edict with the sound of Trumpet proclaimed so through London: at which time, for some words seeming to be spoken against it, one Gilbert Pot a Vintners Servant, was set in the Pillory, and lost both his ears. Before this time, the Lady Mary having heard of her Brothers death, and of the Duke of Northumblands designs, removed from Hoveston, to her Mannour of Kewinghall in Norfolk, and under pretence of fearing infection, (having lately lost one of her Household-Servants of the Plague) in one day she rode forty miles, and from thence afterward to her Castle of Framingham in Suffolk, where taking upon her the name of Queen, there resorted to her the most part of all the Gentlemen both of Norfolk and Suffolk, offering their Assistance; but upon condition, she would make no alteration in Religion, to which she consented; and thereupon, soon after came to her, the Earls of Oxford, Bath, and Suffex, the Lord Wentworth, Thomas Wharton, and John Mordant Barons eldest Sons; and of Knights, Cornwallis, Drury, Walgrave, Shelton, Buntingfield, Jerningham, Suliard, Preston, and many others. The Lady Mary being thus assisted, wrote her Letter signed the 9th of July, to the Lords of the Councel; wherein she claimed the Crown, as of right belonging to her; and required them to proclaim her Queen of England in the City of London, as they tendered her displeasure.

To this Letter of hers the Lords answered, that for what they did, they had good Warrant, not only by King Edwards last Will, but by the Laws of the Land, considering her Mothers divorce, and her own Illegitimacy; and therefore required her to submit her self to Queen Jane, being now her Sovereign. This Letter was written from the Tower of London, under the hands of these that follow, Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Ely Chancelour, William Marquess of Winchester, John Earl of Bedford, Henry Duke of Suffolk, Francis Earl of Shrewsbury, John Duke of Northumberland, William Earl of Pembroke, Thomas Lord Darcey Lord Chamberlain, Cobham, Rich, Huntington, Cheney, John Gates, William Peter, William Cecil, John Clerk, Mason, Edward North, and Robert Bowes. The quarrel on both sides being thus begun by Letters, is prosecuted by Arms; and the Lords for their Generall, make choyce of the Duke of Suffolk, as a man most likely to be firm and sure in the employment; but the Queen his Daughter cannot mis his preference, and besides, is not willing to hazard his person; and thereupon, she by intreaties, and the Lords by persuasions, prevail with the Duke of Northumberland to undertake the charge; who before his going, having conference with the Lords, let them know how sensible he was of the double danger he underwent in this enterprize, both in respect of the Lady against whom he went, and in respect of them whom he left behind him; for if they in his absence should by any accident be drawn to waver in their resolution, they might work their own safety with his destruction, and make themselves seem innocent in his guiltiness. To which one of the Lords replied and said, Your Grace makes a doubt of that which cannot be, for which of us all can wash his hands clean of this business? and therefore it behoves us to be as resolute as your self; and the Earl of Arundell, to rectifie his Resolution in the matter, said, he was sorry it was not his chance to go with him, at whose feet he could finde his heart to spend his blood. So the Duke, with the Marquess of Northampton, the Lord Gray, and divers other of account, on the fourteenth of July, set forward on the Journey with eight thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and passing through Shoreditch, the Duke said to the Lord Gray, See how the people press to see us, but not one of them saith, God speed you. The Duke had every dayes march how far he should go, appointed him by Commission; which being very slow, whether it were done of purpose by some that favoured the Lady Mariess side, was certainly a great help to her proceedings; for by this mean she had the longer time to make her preparations, and indeed in this time, two accidents happened, of great benefit to her; one, that Edward Hastings, the Earl of Huntingtons Brother, having an Army of four thousand Foot committed to him by the Earl of Northumberland, he now left his party, and went to the Lady Mary: the other, that six great Ships which lay before Tarmouth, to intercept the Lady Mary, if she should attempt to fly, now at the persuasion of Master Jerningham, came to her aid: Which two Revolts so terrified the Londoners, that though Doctor Ridley, Bishop of London, on the sixteenth of July, at Pauls Crosse, preached a Sermon, wherein he invited the people to stand firm to Queen Jane, whose cause he affirmed to be most just, yet few or none were perswaded by him; so as the Lords themselves fell off from

A from the side, who assembling at Baynards Castle, first the Earl of Arundell, then the Earl of Pembroke fell to invectives against the Earl of Northumberland; and then all the Lords joyning in Opinion with them, they called for the Mayor, and in London Proclaimed the Lady Mary Queen; as likewise the Lord Windsor, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drurie, and Sir Edward Hastings did in Buckinghamshire; Sir John Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlain in Oxfordshire, and Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton. All this came soon to the knowledge of the Duke of Northumberland, being then at Burie; who thereby seeing how the World went, thought it his best course to turn with the stream, and thereupon returning to Cambridge, he took the Mayor of the Town with him into the Market-place, and there himself for want of a Herald, Proclaimed the Lady Mary Queen, and in sign of joy threw up his Cap; which yet served not B his turn: for the next morning, Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundell, came into Cambridge from Queen Mary, who entering his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell on his knees; desiring him for Gods love to consider his case, that had done nothing but by the Warrant of him and the Councell: My Lord (saith the Earl) I am sent hither by the Queen to arrest you: And I (saith the Duke) obey your Arrest; yet I beseech your Lordship, to use mercy towards him whose acts have been no other then were enjoyed by Commission. Yet should have thought of that sooner (saith the Earl): and thereupon committed him to a Guard, and left him to the Queens mercy. Thus ended all this great Dukes designs in his own destruction, and brought him to fall on his knees to them, who had often before bowed their knees to him; and the Earl, who at the Dukes going out, could have been contented to spend his blood at his feet, was now contented to be C made an instrument of his fall: So sudden are the turns of mens affections, and so unstable is the building upon their asseverations; at least no man must look to have his case be of any weight against him, who hath his own case put in the Ballance. Together with the Duke his three Sons, John, Ambrose, and Henry, the Earl of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates, John and Henry, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sands were conveyed towards London, and brought to the Tower; and the next day the Marquess of Northampton, the Lord Robert Dudley, and Sir Robert Corbet. Before which time, the Duke of Suffolk entering his Daughters the Lady Janes Chamber, told her, She must now put off her Royall Robes, and be contented with a private life. To which she answered, She would much more willingly put them off, then she had put them on; and would never have done it, but in obedience to him and her Mother. And this was the end of the D Lady Janes Ten dayes Reign.

But soon after the Lords that sent him, fell off from the side: and proclaimed Queen Mary. Which the Duke of Northumberland hearing, he also at Cambridge proclaimed Queen Mary. Yet is arrested by the Earl of Arundell.

And with him divers more.

The Lady Jane hearing hereof, was nothing troubled with it. And thus ended her ten dayes Reign.

1553.

The Lady Mary having been Proclaimed Queen, comes to London, and so to the Tower. Where she sets divers Lords at Liberty.

And restores the Bishops who had been deprived.

The Lady Mary having been Proclaimed Queen in London and other parts of the Realm removed from her Castle of Framingham towards London; and being come to Wansted in Essex, on the thirtieth of July, the Lady Elizabeth her Sister, with a Train of Thousand Horse, rode from her Place in the Strand to meet her: On the third of August the Queen rode through London to the Tower, where at her Entrance were presented to her Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Edward Lord Courteney, Stephen Gardiner, late Bishop of Winchester, and the Duchesse of Somerset; who all kneeling down, she kissed them, and said, These be my Prisoners, and then caused them presently to be set at liberty: The next day she restored the Lord Courteney to the Marquisate of Exeter; and the same day also she not only restored Stephen Gardiner to his Bishoprick of Winchester, but a few dayes after made him Chancellor of England: Yet this was the Man that had subscribed to her Mothers Divorce, and had written Books against the lawfulness of her Marriage. The fifth of August, Edmund Bonner late Bishop of London, Prisoner in the Marshalsey, and Cuthbert Tunstall the old Bishop of Durham, prisoner in the Kings-Bench, had their Pardons, and were restored to their Sees. Shortly after, all the Bishops which had been deprived in the time of King Edward the Sixth, were restored to their Bishopricks, and the new removed, as Ridley was removed from London, and Bonner placed; Skory from Chichester, and Day placed; Miles Coverdale from Exeter, and Wise placed; John Hooper from Worcester, and Heath placed. Also all Beneficed men that were married, or would not renounce their Religion, were put out of their Livings, and other of a contrary opinion put in their rooms.

On the thirteenth of August, one Master Bourne a Canon of Pauls, Preaching at Pauls Crosse, not only prayed for the dead, but also declared, that Doctor Bonner Bishop of London, (late restored, and there in presence) for a Sermon by him made four years before, in the same place, and upon the same Text, had unjustly been cast into the vile Prison of the Marshalsey; which Speech so offended some of the Auditory, that they cried, Pull him down, Pull him down; and had certainly done him violence, (for a Dagger was thrown at him) if Master Bradford a Protestant Preacher, had not stepped into his place and appeased the Tumult, and Master Rogers another Protestant Minister (who were both afterward burnt for Religion) had not shifted away Bourne into Pauls School.

Hitherto Queen Maries Reign had been without blood, but now the Cataracts of severity will be opened, hat will make it rain blood: For now on the eighteenth of August, John Dudley Duke of Northumberland, William Parre Marquis of Northampton, and John Earl of Warwick, Son and Heir to the Duke, were arraigned at Westminster-Hall, before Thomas Duke of Norfolk as High-Steward of England; where the Duke of Northumberland, after his Indictment read, required the Opinion of the Court in two Points: First, Whether a man doing any Act by authority of the Princes Council, and by warrant of the Great Seal of England, might for any such Act be charged with Treason. Secondly, Whether any such persons as were equally culpable, and by whose Commandments, he was directed, might be his Judges and passe upon his Triall? Whereunto was answered, That concerning the first, the great Seal which he alleged for his warrant, was not the Seal of the lawful Queen of the Realm, but of an Usurper, and therefore could be no warrant for him: And as to the second, It was resolved, That if any were as deeply to be touched, in the Case as himself, yet so long as no Attainder were of record against them, they were persons able in Law to passe upon his Triall, and not to be challenged but at the Prince's pleasure. After which Answer, the Duke used few words, but confessed the Indictments, and accordingly had Judgment to die: By whose example, the other Prisoners arraigned with him, confessed the Indictments, and thereupon had Judgment. The nineteenth of August, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John, and Sir Henry Gates, Brethren, and Sir Thomas Palmer, Knights, were Arraigned at Westminster, who confessing their Indictments, had Judgment, which was pronounced by the Marquis of Winchester, Lord high Treasurer, sitting that day as Chief Justice. After these Condemnations, followed the Executions; for on the two and twentieth of August, John Duke of Northumberland was brought to the Tower-Hill, and there beheaded: being upon the Scaffold in a Gown of green coloured damask, he put it off, and then made a long Speech, wherein he asked the Queen forgiveness, whom he acknowledged to have grievously offended; and then making profession of his Faith, that he dyed a true Catholick (meaning a Papist) he said the Psalms of Miserere and De Profundis, the Pater noster, and six of the first verses of the Psalm In Domine speravi, ending with this verse, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit: And this said, he looked about him, as looking for a Pardon, but none coming, he laid his head down upon the Block, and at one blow had it stricken off: his body with the head was buried in the Tower, by the body of Edward late Duke of Somerset, (mortal enemies while they lived, but now lying together as good friends) so as there lieth before the high Altar in Saint Peters Church, two Dukes between two Queens, namely, the Duke of Somerset and the Duke of Northumberland, between Queen Anne and Queen Katherine, all four beheaded. Of what Religion this Duke was, may well be doubted, seeing at his death he professed himself a Papist, when lately before he had importuned King Edward to make the Lady Jane his Successour, lest the Papall Religion should be restored: It seems he was not greatly of either but for other ends; a Protestant then, when it was to make his Daughter in law Queen; now a Papist, when it was to save his life (for it was thought he had a Pardon promised, if he would recant.) At the same time and place were beheaded Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer, who were no such Temporizers, but persisted and died in the Protestant Religion, which they had always professed.

And beheaded;

After this, a sprinkling of Mercy came from the Queen; for on the third of September, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, the two Chief Justices, Sir Roger Cholmsley and Monnague, Sir John Cheek, and others were delivered out of the Tower, whither before they had been committed: but a shewre of severity followed soon after, for on the fifteenth of September, Master Latimer and Doctor Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, were sent to the Tower; and on the third of November following, the said Archbishop Cranmer, the Lady Jane (late Queen) and the Lord Guilford her Husband, with the Lords Ambrose and Henry, Sons to the late Duke of Northumberland, were all arraigned at the Guild-Hall, found guilty, and had Judgment to die.

Latimer and Cranmer sent to the Tower.

Cranmer and the late Queen Jane, with the Sons of the Duke of Northumberland, arraigned and condemned.

Queen Mary is Crowned, and in what order.

All this while Queen Mary had contented her self to be Queen by Proclamation; but now that things were somewhat settled, she proceeds to her Coronation: for on the last of September she rode in her Chariot through London towards Westminster in this order: First rode a number of Gentlemen and Knights, then Doctors, then Judges, then Bishops, then Lords, then the Councell, after whom followed the Knights of the Bath, thirteen in number in their Robes, then the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor, and the Marquis of Winchester Lord high Treasurer: Next came the Duke of Norfolk, and after him the Earl of Oxford who bore the Sword, then the Mayor of London in a Gown of Crimson Velvet, who bore the Scepter of Gold: After came the Queens Chariot, and then followed another Chariot wherein sat the Lady Elizabeth her Sister, and the Lady Anne of Cleves, and then came Ladies and Gentlewomen riding on Horses, trapped with red Velvet, &c. In this order they came through London to Westminster, where in many places by the way were Pageants and stately Shewes, and many rich Presents given to the Queen. The next day she went by Water to the old Palace, and remained there till eleven of the clock, and then went on foot upon blew cloth, being railed on either side to Saint Peters Church, where she was Crowned and Anointed by the Bishop of Winchester, (the two Archbishops being then in the Tower) With all Rites and Ceremonies of old accustomed.

After her Coronation, a generall Pardon was published in her name, but interlaced with so many exceptions of matters and persons, that very few took benefit by it; for after the Pardon published, there were Commissioners assigned, to compound with such persons as were excepted; from some of whom they took away their Fees and Offices, some they fined, and some they deprived of their Estates and Livings.

A Pardon granted but full of Exceptions.

About this time, Sir James Hales one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, who in the time of King Edward had refused to sign a Writing for dis-inheriting the Lady Mary, and the Lady Elizabeth; (a fact worthy at least of a kind of remembrance from the Lady Mary now Queen) yet now, for that at a Quarter Sessions in Kent, he gave charge upon the Statutes of King Henry the eighth, and King Edward the sixth, in derogation of the Primacy of the Church of Rome; he was first committed to the Kings-Bench, then to the Counter, and lastly to the Fleet; where he grew so troubled in mind, that he attempted with a Pen-knife to kill himself; and being afterward recovered of that hurt, and brought to the Queens preference, who gave him very comfortable words, yet could never come to be quiet in his mind; but in the end, drowned himself in a River not half a mile from his house, the River being so shallow, that he was faine to lie groveling before he could dispatch himself of life.

And now another sprinkling of Mercy came from the Queen; for the Marquess of Northampton, and Sir Henry Gates, lately before condemned to die, were now pardoned and set at liberty. The Lady Jane also was allowed the liberty of the Tower, not without hope of life and liberty altogether; if her Father the Duke of Suffolk had not the second time been cause of her destruction.

About this time also a Synod was assembled, for consulting about matters of Religion; and the point specially of the Reall presence in the Sacrament. The Prolocutor was Doctor Weston; and of the Protestant side, were John Aylmer and Richard Cheney, both Bishops afterward in Queen Elizabeths time, also John Philpot, afterward burnt, James Haddon and others. After long Disputation, where reasons were not so much weighed as voices numbred; the Papall side, as having most voices, carried it: and thereupon was that Religion again restored, and the Maffie commanded in all Churches to be celebrated, after the ancient manner.

It was now the Year 1553, when Queen Mary was come to the age of seven and thirty years, and therefore high time now to think of marriage, at least if she meant to have Issue of her body; but a hard matter it was to find a Husband in all points fitting for her: Yet three at this time (in common fame at least) were taken into consideration: One was the Lord Countrey Marquess of Exeter, a goodly Gentleman, and of Royall Blood; but there was an exception against him, because inclining (as was thought) to Lutheranism: Another was Cardinal Pole, of a dignity not much inferior to Kings, and by his Mother descended from Kings; but there was exception against him also, because four and fifty years old, (as old a Bachelor as Queen Mary was a Maid) and so the less hope of Issue between them: But the third (if he might be had) was without exception, and this was Philip Prince of Spain, the Emperour Charles his eldest Son, with whom being a Spaniard, she was the fitter matched, as being by the Mother a Spaniard herself. And now very opportunely came in the beginning of January Ambassadors into England about it; amongst others, the Count of Egmont Admirall of the Low-Countries, and John of Marmarancy Lord of Curyers; whose Message was so kindly entertained, that the Marriage in short time was absolutely concluded, though it seemed something strange to many, that she should now be the Wife to the Son, who thirty years before should have been Wife to the Father. But so it is, Queens are never old so long as they are within years of bearing Children. And indeed the Match was concluded with Conditions of far more advantage to Queen Mary, than they were to King Philip, as on the fourteenth of January, Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellour of England, openly in the Presence Chamber at Westminster, declared to all the Lords and Gentlemen there present: For it was agreed, That after the marriage, King Philip should have the Title of all the Queens Dominions, and be assumed into fellowship of the Government; but yet with reservation to the Queen, of all Priviledges and Customes of the Kingdome, and free disposition of all Offices and Honours: As likewise the Queen should be assumed into the fellowship of all the Kings Dominions, and surviving him, should have a Joynture of two hundred thousand pounds a year. Then for the Issue between them, if she had a Son, that he should inherit the Low-Countries and Burgundy; and King Philips Sonne Charles, which he had by a former Wife, should inherit all his Dominions in Italy and Spain; but if his Son Charles should fail without Issue, then the Son he should have by Queen Mary should inherit his Kingdome of Italy and Spain also. And the like good provision was also made for Daughters. But notwithstanding these great advantages of the Match, yet such was the precipitant rashness of some, that thinking themselves wiser than the Queen and the Councell, they sought by all means to oppose the Match; giving out, That it tended to bring England under the yoke of Spain, and to make the Countrey a slave to strangers. This was the general murmuring of people; but the first that shewed himself in Arms, was Sir Thomas Wyatt of Kent, who having communicated the matter with the Duke of Suffolk, the Lady Janes Father, with Peter Caroe a Knight of Devonshire, and divers others, intended only to make secret provision, but not to stir till Prince Philip should be come, that so their cause of taking Arms might have the better colour. On the fifteenth of January, Robert Dudley Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was arraigned at the Guild-Hall of high Treason, who confessed the Indictment, and had Judgment given by the Earl of Suffolk, to be drawn, hanged, bowelled and quartered.

But now in Counsels communicated to many, it is a hard matter to have counsel kept, and Sir Peter Caroe finding that their Plot was discovered, fled privily into France, where lurking for a time, he was afterward taken at Bryxells, and brought Captive into England; as likewise G the same time and place Sir John Cheek King Edwards School-Master was taken, who being drawn by terrours to embrace the Papall Religion, with very grief afterward of his error pined away and dyed; Sir Peter Caroe lived many years after and dyed in Ireland; though it be falsely recorded, they were both burnt for Religion, in June of this year. Wyatt hearing of Sir Peter Caroes flight, and that all their purpose was discovered, was driven before his time to enter into Arms, giving out for the Cause, that it was not to attempt any thing against the Queen, but only to remove ill Counsellours, and chiefly to repell Prince Philip, left by his Marriage the

A the Kingdome should come in subjection to the Spaniards. With Wyatt were joynted Sir Henry Ayley, Sir George Harper, Anthony and William Knivet, and divers other Gentlemen of the County: Against him were the Lord Abergavenny, Sir Thomas Cheney Lord Warden of the Ports, Sir Robert Southwell Sheriff of Kent, Sir William Sauteger, Sir Thomas Kemp, Sir Thomas Mayle, Sir Thomas Finch, with divers other; yet all these great Men had such doubt of the people, that they durst not proceed but very warily. The five and twentieth of January, news came to London of Wyatts rising; against whom was presently sent the Duke of Norfolk, with Sir Henry Teringham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir John Fogge, John Courty, Roger Appleton Esquires, and five hundred Souldiers out of London appointed to go after him, under the leading of Captain Bret. And now fee in times of Sedition, how uncertain a thing it is to trust to the people; for B before Bret could overtake the Duke, Sir George Harper was secretly got to him, who so persuaded him, that he and his five hundred Souldiers left the Duke, and went all to Wyatt; which made the Duke and those with him presently to flye, and put such boldness into Wyatt; that now he marched in great confidence towards London, with so great terrour to all sorts of people, that at Westminster-Hall, the Serjeants and other Lawyers, pleaded in harness.

In the mean time, the Duke of Suffolk was perceived in Warwickshire, to be raising of Forces in assistance of Wyatt; against whom was presently sent the Earl of Huntington, and the Duke finding himself unable to make resistance, having with all his industry gotten together but only fifty men; he betook himself to a Tenant of his, one Underwood, with whom he hoped and C promise to remain undiscovered, till he might have opportunity to escape, as some say; as others, to a Keeper of his Park called Nicholas Lawrence, who kept him in a hollow Oak, in the said Park for two or three dayes; but whether Underwood or Lawrence, either out of fear, or out of hope of reward, he betrayed him to the Earl, by whom he was taken, and under a strong Guard carried to the Tower. Upon this, Queen Mary herself came into London, where calling the Mayor and chief of the City together, she made an Oration, wherein she shewed the infoleny of Wyatt; who though he pretended but only the crossing of the Marriage, yet was now grown to such presumption, that he required to have the Custody of her Person; and to have Counsellours retained or removed at his pleasure. And as for her Marriage, she there affirmed she had done nothing in it, but by advice of her Council; and for herself, that she was D not so long for a Husband, but that if it were not more for the good of the Kingdome, than for her own Satisfaction, she would never once think of entertaining it. Having by her Speech confirmed the Minds of the Citizens; Forces were presently raised, and placed about the Bridge, and other fit places of the City. The third of February, Wyatt with an Army of Three or four thousand, came to London, hoping of present entrance, but finding the Bridge broken, and Souldiers placed to resist him, after two dayes stay in Southwark, he removed to Kingstons, where he found likewise the Bridge broken, yet with great industry suddenly repairing it, he passed over his Men, and meant with all speed to get to the Court, before the Queen should have notice of his coming; and had done so indeed, if a mischance, and an error upon that mischance had not hindered him. For being come within six miles of London, the Carriage of one of his E great Ordnance brake, in mending whereof so much time was spent (and Wyatt by no persuasions would go forward without it) that the time was past, in which his Friends at London expected his coming: which disappointment made many in those parts to fall off, and being perceived by those about him, many of them also; so as one half of his Army was suddenly gone and left him; amongst other, Sir George Harper, the most intimate of all his Council, went to the Queen and discovered all his purposes: whereupon the Earl of Pembroke with a Company levied upon the sudden, was sent against him; which made Wyatt slack his pace, so as it was Noon before he came to the Suburbs of the City: and then placing his Ordnance upon a Hill, and leaving there the greatest part of his Army, he only with five Ensigns marched towards Ludgate, and being encountered at Charing-Crosse by the Lord Chamberlain and Sir John Gage, F after a small fight put them to Flight in such sort, that word was carried to the Queen, how near Wyatt approached, and how wonderfully he prevailed all the Way he came: with which nothing dismayed, Well then (said she) I will go in Person against him myself; and was preparing to do so indeed (so much was her Fathers Valour running in her veins) but it needed not; for by this time Sir Henry Teringham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the Ordnance, and Sir Philip Paris, had given him Battail and slain many of his men: and that which was more, coming to Ludgate, he was denied entrance; and then thinking to retire, he heard the Earl of Pembroke with his Forces was behind at Charing-Crosse; so as neither able to go forward nor yet backward, he was at a stand and in amazement, and then leaning a while upon a Scall by the Bell-Savage, after a little musing, he returned towards Temple-gate; where Clarentius G the Herault meeting him, fell to persuade him, not to be a cause of more effusion of blood, nor by persisting in obstinacy to exclude all hopes of the Queens mercy. The Souldiers of Wyatt were earnest with him to have stood it out; but Wyatt as filly ending, as he had undividedly begun, yielded himself to Sir Maurice Barkley, and getting up upon his Horse behind him, in that manner rode to the Court, where he had not the entertainment he expected, for without more ado he was presently sent away to the Tower. The Captain taken, the rest made no resistance, few fled, and of the other many were taken and laid in prison; and this was done the sixth of February. And now consultation was held what Delinquents should be punished; where the first that was thought on was the Lady Jane, in whom was verified, The Fathers have eaten fow Grapes, and the Childrens teeth are set on edge: The innocent Lady must suffer for her Fathers fault; for if her Father the Duke of Suffolk had not this second time made shipwreck of his Loyalty, his Daughter perhaps had never tasted the salt-waters of the Queens displeasure: but now as a rock of offence, she is the first that must be removed; and thereupon is Doctor Fecknam sent to acquaint her, That she must prepare her self to die the next day: Which Message was to little unpleasing to her, that she seemed rather to rejoice at it, as whereby she should at last be set at liberty: And the Doctor being earnest with her to leave her new Religion, and to embrace the old, she answered, She had now no time to think of any thing, but of preparing her self to God by Prayer. Fecknam thinking she had spoken this, to the end she might have some longer time of life, obtained of the Queen three dayes longer, and then came and told so much to the Lady Jane: Whereat the smiling said, You are much deceived if you think I had any desire of longer life; for I assure you, since the time you went from me, my life hath been so tedious to me, that I long for nothing so much as death, and since it is the Queens pleasure, am most willing to undergo it. Before she was brought to Execution, her Husband the Lord Guilford, had made suit, and obtained to see her and have some conference with her; but she refused it, saying, There were rather augmenters of grief, than comforts of death; she made no doubt, but they should shortly meet in a better place, and in a better condition of society: So on the twelfth of February, her Husband the Lord Guilford first, and then she an hour or two after, was beheaded within the Tower; where she acknowledged her self to have deserved death, not for seeking the Crown, but for not refusing it, being offered: and after prayers to God, unclothing her self, and putting a Handkerchief before her eyes, she laid her head down upon the block, and patiently suffered death, more grievous to the beholders than to herself. This end had the Lady Jane Gray, a Lady of incomparable Piety, and (for her years) of incomparable Learning; for being not past seventeen years of age, she understood perfectly the Greek and Latine Tongues, and was so ready in Points of Divinity, as if she knew them by inspiration rather than by instruction; no less a Miracle in this kind than King Edward; and therefore no marvel if he appointed her to succeed him in the Kingdome, who in the endowments of Mind was so like unto him, that whilst he reigned, it might be thought he continued to reign himself, at least no more differing but only the Sex. It may not be forgotten, that Judge Morgan, who at her arraignment gave the Sentence against her, shortly after fell mad, and in his raving, cried continually to have the Lady Jane taken away from him, and so ended his life.

Two dayes after the execution of the Lady Jane, namely the fourteenth and fifteenth of February, twenty pair of Gallows were set up in divers places of the City, whereon were hanged fifty of Wyats Followers; on the eighteenth of February, Bret was hanged at Rychester in Chains, Sir Henry Isle, who had been taken in an old freeze Coat and an old pair of hose, with his Brother Thomas Isle, and Walter Mantell were hanged at Maidstone, Anthony Knevet and his Brother William, with another of the Mantells, were executed at Sevenok: but then on the twentieth of February, a sprinkling of mercy came, for four hundred of Wyats followers, being brought before the Queen with halters about their necks, were all pardoned and set at liberty. But then severity soon after began again, for on the three and twentieth of February, the Lord Henry Gray Duke of Suffolk, and Father to the Lady Jane, who the week before had been arraigned and condemned, (the Author of all this mischief) Wyat himself, whose quarters were set up in divers places of the City, his head upon the Gallows at Hay-hill, besides Hide-Park. This man, in hope of life, having before accused the Lord Courtney and the Lady Elizabeth the Queens Sister, to be privy to his Conspiracy, yet at his death he cleared them, and protested openly, that they were altogether innocent, and never had been acquainted with his proceedings. Yet was this matter urged against them by Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor, that both of them in March before had been committed to the Tower; though in May following they were both again released; but yet confined, the Lady Elizabeth to Woodstock, under the custody of Sir Henry Bedingfield of Oxenborough in the County of Norfolk; the Lord Courtney to Fordingham, under the custody of Sir Thomas Tresham, who after some time was set at liberty, and going into Italy there dyed. It is memorable, what malice this Bishop Gardiner bore to the Lady Elizabeth, by whose only procurement, not only she was kept in most hardurance, but a Warrant was at last framed under certain Counsellours hands, to put her to death; and had been done, but that Master Bridges Lieutenant of the Tower, pitying her case, went to the Queen to know her pleasure, who utterly denied that she knew any thing of it; by which means her life was preserved. Indeed the Bishop would sometimes say, how they cut off boughes and branches, but as long as they let the root remain, all was nothing: and it is not unworthy the remembering what trains were laid to ensnare her. The common Net at that time for catching of Protestants, was the Reall Presence, and this Net was used to catch her; for being asked one time, What the thought of the words of Christ, This is my Body; whether she thought it the true Body of Christ, that was in the Sacrament; It is said, that after some pawling, she thus answered:

Christ

Christ was the Word that spake it:
He took the Bread, and brake it:
And what the Word did make it,
That I believe, and take it.

Which though it may seem but a slight expression, yet hath it more solidness than at first sight appears; at least it served her turn at that time to escape the net, which by direct answer she could not have done.

On the seventeenth of February, Thomas Lord Gray the Duke of Suffolks Brother was beheaded the last, and indeed the least in Delinquency; that suffered for having any hand in Wyats Conspiracy. There remained yet a fagge end, and was indeed but a fagge end, and nothing worth; for on the same day Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, being accused to have been a party in Wyats Conspiracy, was at the Guild-Hall arraigned before Sir Thomas White Lord Mayor, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Derby, Sir Thomas Bromley Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir Nicholas Hare Master of the Rolls, Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, Sir Richard Southwell and Sir Edward Walgrave Privy Counsellours, Sir Roger Chomely, Sir William Pottman one of the Justices of the Kings Bench, Sir Edward Sanders one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, Master Stamford and Master Dyer Serjeants at Law, Master Edward Gryffin Attorney General, Master Sendall and Peter Tichborne Clerks of the Crown, where the said Sir Nicholas Throgmorton to fully and discreetly answered all Objections brought against him, that he was found by the Jury, Not guilty; and was clearly acquitted: But the Jury notwithstanding was afterward troubled for acquitting him, and sent prisoners, some of them to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and afterward filed to pay a thousand Marks apiece at least, and some two thousand pounds; though these Sums were afterward something mitigated.

More of Wyats Complices had been taken, arraigned and adjudged to die, but in Judgment the Queen remembered Mercy, and gave them their Pardons, of which Number were Master Russell of Kent, Sir James a Crofts, the Lord John Gray Brother to the Duke of Suffolk, and some others.

About this time, a little before and after, were advancements in honour, the Lord William Howard, Lord Admiral of England, was created Baron Howard of Effingham, Sir John Williams was created Baron of Tame, Sir Edward North was created Baron of Charlton, Sir John Bridges was created Baron Chandos of Sudeley, Gerard Fitz Garret Earl of Kildare and Baron of Ophelley, and not long after Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Horse, was created Viscount Montague.

It is scarce worth remembering, That in the end of this first year of the Queens Reign, one Elizabeth Croft, a Wench of eighteen years old, was by practice put into a Wall, and thereupon called, The Spirit in the Wall, who with a Whistle made for the purpose, whistled out many Seditious words against the Queen, the Prince of Spain, the Mast, Confession, and such other Points; for which she did Penance, standing upon a Scaffold at Pauls Crosse all the Sermon time, where she made open confession of her fault.

There had been good store of Lay-mens blood shed already, and now the time is coming to have Clergy-mens shed; and for a preparative to it, on the tenth of April, Crammer Archbishop of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley late Bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer late Bishop of Worcester, are conveyed from the Tower to Oxford, there to dispute with Oxford and Cambridge men in points of Religion, but specially of the Eucharist; the Oxford men were Cole, Chadsey, Pye, Harpsfield, Smith, and Doctor Weston Prolocutor: the Cambridge men, Young, Seaton, Watson, Atkinson, Fecknam and Sedgewick: The Disputation ended, which (we may well think as the matter was carried) went against the prisoners, on the twentieth of April they were brought again on the Stage; and then demanded, Whether they would persist in their Opinion, or else recant? And affirming they would persist, they were all three adjudged Hereticks; and condemned to the Fire; but their Execution we must not look for till a year or two hence; but in the mean time we have John Rogers the first Martyr of these Times, burnt at London the fourth of February; after whom the ninth of February, John Hooper late Bishop of Worcester, burnt at Gloucester; after him, Robert Ferrar Bishop of Man, burnt at Carmarthen; after him John Bradford, with many others; and then the two famous Men Ridley and Latimer, no less famous for their constant deaths, than their Religious lives, both burnt at Oxford the sixteenth of October.

This Rising of Wyat had been a Remora to the Queens Marriage, and now to avoid all such obstacles hereafter, the Queen in April called a Parliament; wherein were propounded two things; one for Confirmation of the Marriage; the other for restoration of the Pops Primacy. This latter was not assented to, but with great difficulty; for the six years Reign of King Edward had spread a plantation of the Protestant Religion in the hearts of many: but the Proposition for the Marriage was assented to readily, but yet with the adding of some conditions, which had not been thought of in the former Articles: First, That King Philip should admit of no Stranger in any Office, but only Natives. Secondly, That he should innovate nothing in the Lawes and Customs of the Kingdome. Thirdly, That he should not carry the Queen out of the Realm, without her consent, nor any of her Children without consent of the Council. Fourthly, That surviving the Queen, he should challenge no right in the Kingdome, but suffer it to descend to the next Heir. Fifthly, That he should carry none of the Jewels of the Realm out of the Kingdom, nor suffer any Ships or Ordnance to be removed out of the Realm: And lastly, That neither directly nor indirectly, he should cause the Realm of England to be intangled with the War between Spain and France.

The Queen is preached in Churches to be with child: and prayers made for her safe delivery; but proved no such matter.

All things being thus agreed on, the Earl of Bedford, Lord Privy Seal, the Lord Fitz-waters, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen, are sent into Spain to fetch away Prince Philip, who arrived at Southampton the twentieth of July, in the year 1554. and the three and twentieth came to Winchester, where the Queen met him, and the five and twentieth, the Marriage between them there was openly solemnized: (the disparity of years, as in Princes, not much regarded, though he were then but seven and twenty years of age, she eight and thirty) at which time the Emperor's Ambassador being present, openly declared, That in consideration of that Marriage, the Emperor had given to Prince Philip his Son, the Kingdoms of Naples and Hierusalem; and thereupon (the solemnity of marriage being ended) Garret King of Hierusalem openly in the Church, in the presence of the King, the Queen, and the Lords both of England and Spain, solemnly proclaimed the Title and Style of these two Princes, as followeth: Philip and Mary by the Grace of God King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Hierusalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith; Princes of Spain, and Sicily, Arch-Dukes of Austria, Dukes of Millain, Burgundy, and Brabant, Counts of Fflshpurg, Flanders and Tyrol. After this, the King and Queen by easie Journeys came to Windsor Castle; where the King was install'd Knight of the Garter, and the Earl of Suffolk with him: The eleventh of August they removed to Richmond, the seven and twentieth to Suffolk Place in Southwark, and the next day to London (where the lately Shews that were made, may we thought be conceived without relating) from hence after four days they removed again to Richmond, where all the Lords had leave to depart into their Countreys; and indeed so many departed, that there remained not an English Lord at the Court, but the Bishop of Winchester: From Richmond they removed to Hampton-Court, where the Hall door within the Court was continually kept shut, so as no man might enter unless his errand were first known, which might perhaps be the fashion of Spain, but to English men seemed very strange.

About this time Cardinal Pole, sent for by the King and Queen, came over into England; and had come sooner, but that the Emperor fearing he might prove a Contrivall with his Son Philip, had used means to stop his passage, but now that his Son's Marriage was past, he was content to let him passe, who though he came from Rome with the great authority of a Legate, yet he would not come privately into London, because his Attaindour was yet upon Record; an Act therefore was presently passed to take it off, and to restore him in blood; for passing of which Act the King and Queen in Person came to the Parliament House; where a few dayes after, the Cardinal came himself, which was then kept in the great Chamber of White Hall, because the Queen by reason of sickness, was not well able to go abroad: and here the King and Queen sitting under the Cloth of Estate, and the Cardinal on their right hand, all the Lords, Knights and Burgesses being present, the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor, made a short Speech unto them, signifying the presence of the Lord Cardinal, and that he was sent from the Pope as his Legate a Latere, to do a Work tending to the glory of God, and the benefit of them all; which (saith he) you may the better hear from his own mouth. Then the Cardinal rose up, and made a long solemn Oration, wherein he first thanked them for his restoring, by which he was enabled to be a Member of their Society: Then exhorting them to return into the bosome of the Church, for which end he was come; not to condemn, but to reconcile; not to compell, but to call and require: and for their first work of Reconcilement, requiring them to repeal and abrogate all such Lawes as had formerly been made in derogation of the Catholick Religion. After which Speech, the Parliament going together, drew up a Supplication, which within two dayes after they presented to the King and Queen; wherein they shewed themselves to be very penitent for their former Errors, and humbly desired their Majesties to intercede for them to the Lord Cardinal and the See Apostolick, that they might be Pardoned of all they had done amiss, and be received into the bosome of the Church, being themselves most ready to abrogate all Lawes prejudicial to the See of Rome. This Supplication being delivered to the Cardinal, he then gave them Absolution in these words: [We, by the Apostolick authority given unto Us, by the most Holy Lord Pope Julius the Third (Christ's Vicegerent on Earth) do absolve and deliver you and every of you, with the whole Realm and Dominions thereof, from all Herefie and Schisme, and from all Judgments, Censures, and Pains for that cause incurred; And also We do restore you again to the Unity of our Mother the holy Church.] The report hereof coming to Rome, was cause that a solemn Procession was made for joy of the Conversion of England to the Church of Rome. And now the Queen had a great desire to have King Philip Crowned, but to this the Parliament would by no means assent.

In October this second year of her Reign, a rumour was spread of the Queens being with child, and so forward, that she was quick; and thereupon were Letters sent from the Lords of the Council, to Bonner Bishop of London, that Prayers of Thanksgiving should be made in all Churches; and the Parliament it self was so credulous of it, that they entered into consecration of the Education of the Child; and made an Act, desiring the King (out of the confidence they had in him) that if the Queen should fall, he would be pleased to take upon him the Rule and Government of the Child: but after all this, in June following, it came to be known, that it was but a Tympany, or at least the Queen so miscarried, that there came no child, nor the Queen likely ever after after to have any. But howsoever, in hope of the joy that was expected, in January this year, divers of the Councell, as the Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Controllor of the Queens House, Secretary Bourne, and Sir Richard Southwell Master of the Ordnance, were sent to the Tower, to discharge and set at liberty a great part of the Prisoners in the Tower; as namely, the late Duke of Northumberland's Sons, Ambrose, Robert, and Henry, also Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir James Crofts, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir John Rogers, Sir Nicholas Arnold, Sir George Harper, Sir Edward Warner, Sir William Wentlow, Sir Gowen Carow, William Gybbs Esquire, Gilbert Vaughan, and some others.

About this time one William Fisherstone a Millers Son, of the age of eighteen years, named and bruted himself to be King Edward the sixth; for which being apprehended and examined, he answered as one lunatick; and thereupon was whipped at a Cartt rayl, and banished into the North: but the year after, spreading abroad again, that King Edward was alive, and that he had talked with him, he was arraigned and condemned of Treason, and at Tyburn hanged and quartered.

In the moneth of March, the Queen was taken with a fit of Devotion, and thereupon called unto her four of her Privy Councell, namely, William Marquess of Winchester Lord Treasurer, Sir Robert Rochefter Controllor, Sir William Peter Secretary, and Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, and signified unto them, That it went against her Conscience, to hold the Lands and Possessions as well of Monasteries and Abbeyes, as of other Churches, and therefore did freely relinquish them, and leave them to be disposed, as the Pope and the Lord Cardinal should think fit; and thereupon charged them to acquaint the Cardinal with this her purpose. And shortly after in performance hereof, John Feskyn late Dean of Pauls, was made Abbot of Westminster, and had possession delivered him, and with him fourteen Monks received the Habit at the same time: and on the twentieth of November, Sir Thomas was instituted Lord of Saint Johns of Hierusalem and was put in possession of the Lands belonging unto it. And when it was told her, That this would be a great diminution of the Revenues of her Crown; she answered, She more valued the salvation of her Soul, than a thousand Crowns, a most religious speech, and enough, if there were but this, to shew her to be a most Pious Prince.

The fourth of September this year, King Philip waited on with the Earl of Arundell Lord Steward, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Huntington, and others, went over to Callice, and from thence to Brussels in Brabant, to visit the Emperor his Father; who delivering him possession of the Low-Countreys, in March following he returned into England; but on the sixth of July following, by reason of Wars with France, he passed again over to Callice, and so into Flanders, from whence he returned not till eighteen monthes after; which made great muttering amongst the Common people, as though he took any little occasion to be absent, for the little love he bore to the Queen.

In the third year of the Queen, dyed Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, at his house in Southwark; of whose death it is memorable, That the same day in which Bishop Ridley and Master Latimer suffered at Oxford, he would not go to dinner till four a clock in the afternoon, though the old Duke of Norfolk was come to dine with him: the reason was, because he would first hear of their being burnt; and as soon as word of that was brought him, he presently said, Now let us go to Dinner; where sitting down, and eating merrily, upon a suddain he fell into such extremity, that he was faine to be taken from the Table and carried to his Bed, where he continued fifteen dayes, without voiding any thing either by Urine or otherwise, which caused his tongue to swell in his mouth, and so dyed; after whose death, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York was made Lord Chancellor.

And now comes the time of Archbishop Crammers Execution, who the year before had been condemned and degraded by Commission from the Pope; after which, being by the subtilty of some, put in hope of life, out of frailty he subscribed to a Recantation, which yet did him no good; for whether it were that Cardinal Pole would no longer be kept from being Archbishop, (which he would not be as long as he lived) or that the Queen could not be gotten to forger his being the chief Instrument of her Mothers Divorce; his Execution was resolved to be the fourteen of February, in the same place at Oxford where Ridley and Latimer five monthes before had been: Before the Execution, Doctor Cole preached, who to make use of Crammers Recantation, told the people, they should do well to hearken to this Learned mans Confession, who now at his death, and with his death would testify which was the true Religion; never thinking that Crammer would have denied his former Recantation: but Crammer being brought to the stake, (contrary to expectation) acknowledged, That through frailty he had subscribed it, praying God heartily to forgive it; and now for a punishment, that hand which had done it should first suffer, and therewithall thrusting his right hand into the fire, he there held it, till it first, and then his whole body was consumed; only (which was no small miracle) his heart remained whole and not once touched with the fire. The same year also, no fewer than eighty four of both Sexes were burnt for Religion: and it was a cruelty very far extended, that the bones of Bucer and Pagninus some time before dead and buried, were taken up and publicly burnt in Cambridge. No sooner was Crammer dead, but the very same day was Cardinal Pole made Archbishop of Canterbury.

In the fourth year of the Queen, exemplary Justice was done upon a great Person; for the Lord Simon, a man much in the Queens favour, as being an earnest Papist, was for a Murder com-committed by him, arraigned and condemned, and he with four of his Servants, carried to Salisbury, was there in the Market-place hanged, having this favour to be hanged in a silken halter, his Servants in places near adjoining to the place where the Murder was committed.

The four and twentieth of April, Thomas Stafford second Son to the Lord Stafford, with others to the number of two and thirty persons (set on by the French King) attempted to raise Sedition against the Queen, for marrying with King Philip, and coming out of France, arrived at Scarborough in York-shire, where they took the Castle, but within two days were driven out by the Earl of Westmerland, and then taken and arraigned: The eight and twentieth of May, Stafford was beheaded on the Tower-Hill, and the next day three of his Associates, Stralley, Bradford, and Prethor were drawn from the Tower to Tyburn, and there executed. The first of May, Thomas Percy was first made Knight, after Lord, and the next day was created Earl of Northumberland, to whom the Queen gave all the Lands that had been his Ancestours.

At this time the Queen intangled her self (contrary to her promise) in her Husbands Quarrell, sent a defiance to the French King, by Clarentius King at Arms; and after on the Munday in the Whitfunweek, by found of Trumpet, proclaimed open War against him in Chappside and other places of the City; and shortly after, caused an Army of a thousand Horse, and four thousand Foot, to be transported over, to the aid of her Husband King Philip, under the leading of the Earl of Pembroke Captain General, Sir Anthony Brown Viscount Montaigne, Lieutenant General, the Lord Gray of Wilton Lord Marshall, the Earl of Rutland General of the Horse, the Earl of Lincoln Colonel of the Foot, the Lord Robert Dudley Master of the Ordnance, the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord De la Ware, the Lord Bray, the Lord Chaudow, the Lord Ambrose Dudley, the Lord Henry Dudley, with divers Knights and Gentlemen; who joining with King Philip's Forces, they all set down before Saint Quintinus, a Town of the French Kings of great importance. To the rescue whereof, the French King sent an Army, under the leading of the Constable of France, which consisted of nine hundred Men at Arms, with as many light Horse, eight hundred Reylters, two and twenty Ensigns of Lances, and sixteen Ensigns of French Footmen: Their purpose was not to give battle, but to put more Succours into the Town; which the Philipians perceiving, encountered them, and in the fight slew John of Bourbon Duke of Angheim, the Viscount of Terrain, the Lord of Chaderier, with many Gentlemen of account: They took prisoners the Duke of Mortemancy Constable of France, the Duke of Montpensier, Duke Longueville, the Marshal of Saint Andrews, the Lord Lewis Brother to the Duke of Mantova, the Baron of Curton, the Rhinegravi Colonel of the Almaynes, Monsieur d'Obigny, Monsieur de Biron, and many others; and then pursuing the victory, under the government of the Earl of Pembroke, on the seven and twentieth of August they took the Town of St. Quintinus; in the assault whereof, the Lord Henry Dudley, youngest Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was with a piece of great Ordnance slain, and some other of account. The sackage of the Town King Philip gave to the English, as by whose valour chiefly it was won.

The joy was not so great for this winning of Saint Quintinus, but there will be greater sorrow presently for other losses. Many of the Garrison of Callice had been drawn from thence, for this service of Saint Quintinus, and no new supply sent; which being perceived by the French King, a Plot is laid how to surprize it, which yet was not so secretly carried, but that the Officers of Callice had intelligence thereof; who thereupon signified it to the Council of England, requiring speedy Succours, without which, against so great an Army as was raised against them, they should not be able to hold out. But whether they gave no credit to their relations, or whether they apprehended not the danger so eminent as indeed it was, they neglected to send Supplies till it was too late. For the Duke of Guise, with no less speed than Policy, took such a course, that at one and the same time, he set both upon Newhambridge, and also upon Ricebank, (the two main Skenus for defence of the Town,) and took them both, and then fell presently to batter the Walls of the Castle it self, and that with such violence of great Ordnance, that the noyse was heard to Antwerp, being a hundred miles off. But having made the Walls assailable, the English used this Stratagem, they laid trains of Powder to blow them up, when they should offer to enter; but this Stratagem succeeded not; for the French in passing the Ditch, had so wet their clothes, that dropping upon the train, the Powder would take no fire, (so all things seemed to concur against the English) and thereupon the Castle was taken also, and with it the Town also had been taken, but that Sir Anthony Ager, with the losse of his own life and his eldest Sons, valiantly defended it, and for that time repelled the French, but their Numbers increased so fast upon the Town, that the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, seeing no other way of safety, demanded Parlee, where a Composition was made, That the Town should presently be yielded to the French King, the lives of the Inhabitants only saved, and safe conduct to passe away, saving the Lord Deputy with fifty others, such as the Duke should name. And here to be quit with the English for their hard usage at Saint Quintinus, the Duke caused Proclamation to be made, That all and every person of the Town should bring their money, jewels, and plate, to the value of a groat, and lay it down upon the high Altar of the Church; by which means, an inestimable sum of Treasure was there offered, enough to enrich an Army, which had before enriched a Town, And now to make it appear how unable the Town was to hold out against so great an Army, it is said, there were in it but only five hundred Souldiers of ordinary, and scarce two hundred more of able fighting men; but of other people, men, women and children, four thousand and two hundred; all which were suffered to depart, saving the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlain Captain of the Castle, John Harrifone Captain of Ricebruke, Nicholas Alexander Captain of Newhambridge, Edward Grimston the Controllour John Rogers

A. Rogers the Surveyor, with others to the number of fifty, who were all carried prisoners into France. And thus Callice, which had been in possession of the English above two hundred years, was won from the English in eight dayes, which King Edward the third had not won from the French in less than a year. The Lord Wentworth was suspected, and in Queen Elizabeths time arraigned for betraying it, but was acquitted by his Peers. Callice thus won, the Duke with his Army marched to Guynes, five miles distant, whereof was Captain the Lord Gray of Wilton, who held out the siege and batteries five or six dayes with so great valour and resolution, that he appeared in nothing inferior to the Enemy but in multitude; yet at last overlaid with their numbers, and importuned by his Souldiers, much against his own will, he made composition, that the Town and Castle should be wholly rendred, himself and all Officers remain prisoners, all other to depart with their Armour and Baggage. The Lord Gray afterward ransomed for four and twenty thousand Crowns. And now the Duke of Guise considering that Guynes would be too costly a Castle to be kept, and too dangerous a neighbour to Callice, if it should be recovered, razed it with the Bulwarks and Fortifications to the ground. Guynes thus won, there remained nothing within the English Pale, but the little Castle of Hammes, whereof was Captain the Lord Edward Dudley, who considering that though it were naturally strongly situate, as being environed with Fens and Marshes, yet it had but little helps by Art of Fortifications, and being assured that the Duke of Guise would speedily come upon him, he secretly in the night with all his Garrison, departed into Flanders, to as the Castle was not won, but taken by the Duke of Guise; and with the losse of this Castle, the English lost all their footing in Terra Firma, and the Kings of England all the reality of their Title in France, having nothing left but nudum nomen.

C. Presently after this, the French King caused the Marriage between his eldest Son Francis the Dauphin, and Mary Steward sole heir of James the fifth King of Scotland to be solemnized: whereupon great Wars ensued soon after between England and Scotland.

Queen Mary being infinitely troubled in mind for the losse of Callice, sent presently forth her Admiral the Lord Clinton, with a Fleet of more than a hundred sayl, to recover at least reparacion in honour, by doing some exploit upon France; who not finding opportunity to set upon Brest, as he was appointed, fell upon the Town of Conquest, which he took and burnt, and also divers Villages thereabouts, and then returned. In which mean time, many great Conflicts having been between King Philip and the King of France; at last, by mediation of the Dutches of Lorraine, a Treaty of Peace is agreed on, where all things seemed to be well accorded, but only that King Philip by all means required restitution of Callice, to which by no means the French would assent. But whilst they stood upon these terms, it happened that first the Emperour Charles King Philips Father died, and shortly after Queen Mary, and the day after Cardinal Poles, and shortly after Sir John Baker of Sislingherst in Kent, who had been a Privy Counsellour to Henry the eighth, Edward the sixth, and Queen Mary. And so our Story hath no further relation to either War or Peace, between the two Kings of France and Spain.

Guynes also won by the French.

And so the English lost all their footing in France. The Dauphin of France marries Mary Steward heir of Scotland.

An Agreement of Peace between King Philip and the King of France; but only want of restitution of Callice. Queen Mary dies.

Of her Taxations.

B. SHE began with a rare Example; for in the first year of her Reign, was pardoned by Proclamation, the Subsidy of four shillings the pound of Land, and two shillings the pound of goods, granted in the last Parliament of King Edward the sixth. In her second year in a Parliament then holden, was granted to the King and Queen, a Subsidy of the Laity, from five pence to ten pence, of eight pence in the pound; from ten pence to twenty pence, of twelve pence in the pound, and from twenty pence upwards, sixteen pence in the pound; all Strangers double, and the Clergy six shillings in the pound. If this were all, then upon the matter, in all her time, there came no new charge upon her people; for one Subsidy remitted, and one received, made but even. In her last year she borrowed twenty thousand pounds of the City of London; and paid twelve pounds a year interest for every hundred pound.

Laws and Ordinances in her Time.

C. IN her first year, on the fourth of September, were proclaimed certain new coins of gold and silver, a Sovereign of gold of thirty shillings; the half Sovereign fifteen shillings; an Angel of ten shillings; the half Angel five shillings. Of silver the groat, the half groat and penny; all these Coyns to be currant as before. In her second year, Proclamation was made, forbidding the shooting in Hand-guns, and bearing of weapons. The year in which she was married to King Philip, a straight charge was to all Victuallers, Taverners, and Alehouse-keepers, that they should sell no meat nor drink, nor any kind of viuals, to any Serving-man whatsoever, unless he brought a testimonial to shew whose servant he was. Also in a Parliament holden this year, amongst other Acts, the Statute Ex Officio and other Laws made for the punishment of Heresies, were revived; but chiefly the Popes Bull of Dispensation of Abbey Land was there confirmed. In her second year, on Michaelmas Even, the Prisoners that lay in the Counter in Breadstreet, were removed to a new Counter made in Woodstreet, of the City purchase and building; the which removing was confirmed by the Common Council of the City.

New Coyns of Gold and Silver.

Meat & drink forbidden to be sold to any Serving-man, without a testimonial whom he served.

The Counter in Woodstreet first made a Prison.

Affairs

Affairs of the Church in her Time.

IN the first year of this Queens Reign, all Bishops which had been deprived in the time of King Edward the Sixth, were restored to their Bishopricks, and the new removed; also all beneficed men that were married, or would not forsake their Opinion, were put out of their Livings; and other of a contrary opinion put in their rooms. Also this year, on the seven and twentieth of August, the Service begun to be sung in Latine in Paul's Church. Also this year the Popes authority was by Act of Parliament restored in England, and the Masse commanded in all Churches to be used. In her second year, the Realm is Absolved, and reconciled to the Church of Rome, by Cardinal Poole: and first Fruits and Tithes are restored to the Clergy; but this was soon revoked, the Council finding the necessity of it for the Queens support. In her fourth year, Monasteries were begun to be re-edified; of which number were that of Westminster, that of Sheen and Sion, that of the Black-Friers, and the Friers of Greenwich. Of the number of those that died for Religion in her time, there are recorded five Bishops, one and twenty Divines, and of all sorts of Men and Women, two hundred threescore and seventeen.

The number of those that died for Religion in Queen Marys days.

Works of Piety done by her or others in her Time.

THIS Queen restored a great part of Abbey-lands that were in her possession, and if she had lived longer, very likely she would have restored more. In her first year, Sir Thomas White then Mayor, erected a Colledge in Oxford, now called Saint Johns Colledge, before, Bernard Colledge; he also erected Schools at Bristol and Reading, and gave two thousand pounds to the City of Bristol to purchase Lands, the profits whereof to be employed for the benefit of young Clothiers for ten years, and after that to be employed in like manner, to the benefit of two and twenty other Shires and Cities. In her third year died Sir John Gresham, late Mayor of London, who founded a Free School at Holt in Norfolk, and gave to every Ward in London ten pounds to be distributed to the Poor; also to Maids Marriages two hundred pounds. Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, erected a goodly Library in Cambridge, storing it with many excellent both Printed and Written Books: he also bestowed much upon building at Durham, at Alnwick, and at Tynbridge.

Saint Johns Colledge in Oxford founded.

Casualties happening in her Time.

IN her first year, on the seven and twentieth of August, the goodliest Ship in England, called The Great Harry, being of the burthen of a Thousand Tun, was burnt at Woolwich by negligence of the Marine-s. In her second year on the fifteenth of February, appeared in the Sky a Rainbow was reversed, the bow turned downward, and the two ends standing upward: Also two Suns shined at one time a good distance asunder, which were taken for ill signs. This year also in the month of August, at a place in Suffolk by the Sea side, all of hard stone and pebble, lying between the Towns of Oxford and Albrough, where never grasse grew, nor any earth was ever seen, there chanced suddenly to spring up without any tillage or sowing, so great abundance of Peason, that the Poor gathered above a hundred quarters, yet there remained some ripe, and some blossoming, as many as were before. In her fourth year, hot burning Agues, and other strange Diseases took away much people: so as between the twentieth of October, and the last of December, there died seven Aldermen, namely, Henry Heardson, Sir Richard Dobbs late Mayor, Sir William Laxton late Mayor, Sir Henry Hobbleson late Mayor, Sir John Champneys late Mayor, Sir John Aleph late Mayor, and Sir John Gresham late Mayor. In her fourth year, before Harvest, Wheat was sold for four Marks the Quarter, Malt at four and forty shillings the quarter, and Pease at six and forty shillings eight pence; where after Harvest, Wheat was sold for five shillings the quarter, Malt at six shillings eight pence, Rye at three shillings four pence the quarter. In the Countrey, Wheat was sold for four shillings the quarter, Malt at four shillings eight pence, and in some places a bushell of Rye for a pound of Candles, which was four pence. In her fifth year, within a mile of Norringham, so marvellous a Tempest of Thunder happened, that it beat down all the Houses and Churches in two Towns thereabouts, cast the Bells to the outside of the Church-yard, and some webs of Lead four hundred foot into the field, written as if it had been leather; the River of Trent running between the two Towns, the Water with the mud in the bottom was carried a quarter of a mile, and cast against Trees; with the violence whereof the Trees were pulled up by the Roots, and cut twelve score off; also a Child was taken forth of a mans hand and carried two Spears length high, and then let fall two hundred foot off, of which Fall it died; five or six men thereabouts were slain, and neither flesh nor skin perished; also there fell some Hail-stones that were fifteen inches about. This year also in Harvest time was a great Mortality, and especially of Priests; so as many Churches were unserved, and much corn was lost in the field for want of Workmen; whereupon ensued a great Pease growing plentifully where never sowed.

The price of Wheat and Malt in a dearth, and in a plenty.

A marvellous Tempest.

A great scarcity, so that Corn was sold for fourteen shillings a quarter, and Wood sold in London for thirteen shillings a thousand of Billets, and Coals ten pence a sack. Also this year on the last of September, fell so great store of rain, that Westminster-Hall was full of water, and Boats were rowed over Westminster Bridge into Kings-Surce.

Of her Personage and Conditions.

OF her Personage we can make no particular description; only we may say, she was none of the most amiable, but yet without deformity: but of her Conditions we may say, she was not without deformity, and yet was very amiable. If we account her Religion a deformity, yet her constancy and devotion in it, we must needs count a beauty: If it were a deformity to promise the Suffolk men, Not to alter the Religion which King Edward had established, yet it was certainly a pious dissembling, Cruicace enim Crutensibus; and equivocation (will some say) was there a virtue, where she deceived them into truth, and did them good against their wills. And as for her Sister Elizabeth, if she did not love her, it was but a quality hereditary in her; for their Mothers did not love one another before: and indeed not without some cause in both; for as those upbraided each others Marriage, so these, each others Birth. We shall not do her right, if we deny her to be of a merciful disposition, seeing oftentimes she pitied the perion, where she shed the blood: She could have found in her heart to have spared the Lady Janes life, if Ragion di Stato had not been against it; and she did spare her Father the Duke of Suffolks life, till his second offence gave her just provocation. The goodness of her nature might be seen in the badness of her fortune; who took nothing so much to heart, as unkindness of friends; the revolt of Callices and the absence of King Philip, being the two chief Causes that brought her to her end.

Of her Death and Buriall.

THE Conceit of her being with child, had kept Physicians from looking into the state of her body; so as her first distemper at first neglected, brought her by degrees into a Dropick, to which was added a burning Fever, brought upon her by a double grief, one for the long absence of King Philip (who had now been away a year and a half;) the other, and perhaps the greater, for the loss of Callice; as she forbore not to say to some about her, That if they looked into her Heart, being dead, they should find Callice there. She began to fall sick in September, and died at her Mannour of Saint James, the seventeenth of November, in the year 1558. when she had Reigned five years, four months and eleven days; Lived three and forty years. Her Body was interred in a Chappel in the Minster of Saint Peters Church at Westminster, without any Monument or other Remembrance.

Men of Note in her Time.

OF Men of Valour in her time, there were many, as may be seen in the story of her Reign; but to name some for example, there was Williams Herbert Earl of Pembroke, the chief assistant of King Philip in the winning of Saint Quintins; there was William Lord Gray of Wilton, Captain of Guyenes, who though he yielded the Town, yet more out of tenderness to his Souldiers, than out of fear of his Enemies, which he would never else have yielded up: and to speak of one of a meaner rank, there was Sir Anthony Agir, who in defence of the Town of Callice, lost his life, but not till he made the Enemy turn their backs and flye. Of Learned Men also there were many, as John Rogers born in Lancashire, who Translated the Bible into English with Notes. Richard Morison Knight born in Oxfordshire, who wrote divers Treatises. Robert Record, a Doctor of Physick, who wrote a Book of Arithmetick. Cuthbert Tunstall, of a Worshipful Family in Lancashire, though bare born, whose Ancestour came into England with the Conquerour, as his Barbour, and therefore hath three Combs his Arms; Bishop first of London, and after of Durham, who wrote divers learned Works. Richard Sampson, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, who wrote certain Treatises. Lucas Shephard, born at Colechester in Essex, an English Poet. Jane Dudley, Daughter to Henry Gray Duke of Suffolk, wrote divers excellent Treatises. William Thomas a Welshman, who wrote the History of Italy, and other things. James Brooks, and John Standish, both of them Writers in defence of the Popes Doctrine. William Peryn a black Fryer, who wrote in defence of the Mass, and also divers Sermons. Henry Lord Stafford, Son to Edward Duke of Buckingham, who amongst other things which he wrote, Translated a Book out of Latine into English, entitled, Utriusque Poetis Differentia; which Book (as some think) was first compiled by Edward Fox Bishop of Hersford. John Hopkins, who Translated divers of Dauids Psalms into English Meeter, which are to be found amongst those appointed to be sung in the Church.

Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, whose Ancestour was Barbour to the Conquerour.

John Hopkins Translated divers of Dauids Psalms into English Meeter.

THE REIGN OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

QUEEN Mary dying on Thursday the seventeenth of November, in the Year 1558. her Sister, the Lady Elizabeth, of the age of five and twenty years, the only surviving Child of King Henry the eighth, by undoubted Right, succeeded her in the Crown; which happening in a time of Parliament, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, and Lord Chancellor, sent to the Knights and Burgeses in the Lower House, to repair immediately to the Lords of the Upper House; to whom he signified, That Queen Mary was that Morning dead, and therefore required their Assents to joyn with the Lords in proclaiming Queen Elizabeth; which accordingly was done, by the sound of Trumpets, first at Westminster, and after in the City of London. The Queen was then at Hatfield; from whence on Wednesday the three and twentieth of November, she removed to the Lord Norths House in the Charter-House, where she stayed till Munday the eight and twentieth of November, and then rode in her Chariot thorow London to the Tower; where she continued till the fifth of December, and then removed to Somerset House in the Strand; from whence she went to her Palace at Westminster; and from thence, on the twelfth of January, to the Tower; and on the fourteenth of January, to her Coronation; where as she went she said this Prayer: O Lord Almighty and everlasting God, I give thee most hearty thanks, that thou hast spared me to this joyful day, and I acknowledge, that thou hast dealt as wonderfully and as mercifully with me, as thou dost with thy faithful Servant Daniel, whom thou deliverdest out of the Den, from the cruelty of the raging Lyons; which so was I overwhelmed and only by thee delivered: To thee therefore only be thanks, honour and praise for ever. And it is incredible, what Pageants and Shews were made in the City; as she passed: On Sunday the five and twentieth of January, she was Crowned in the Abbey Church. She is Crowned at Westminster by Doctor Oglethorpe, Bishop of Carlisle, with all Solemnities and Ceremonies in such case accustomed. At this time, to honour her Coronation, she conferred more Honours than in all her time after: William Parre degraded by Queen Mary, she made Marquess of Divers Lorde Northampton; Edward Seymour, whose Father had been Attainted, she made Earl of Hertford; Thomas Howard, second Son to the Duke of Norfolk, she made Viscount Bindon; Sir Henry Carey, her Cousin German, she made Baron of Hunsdon; and Sir Oliver Saint-John, she made Baron of Bleishe.

And now the Queen, though she were her self very wise, yet would not trust (and it was a great point of Wisdome that she would not trust) to her own wisdome; and therefore she chose Counsellours to assist her: In which number she took Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York; She makes of William Pawlar, Marquess of Winchester, Lord high Treasurer; Henry Pitts Allen Earl of her Privy Arundell; Francis Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury; Edward Stanley, Earl of Derby; William Herbert Earl of Pembroke; Edward Lord Clinton Lord Admirall; and William Lord Howard of Effingham; Sir Thomas Cheyney, Sir William Peter, Sir Richard Sackville, and Nicholas Wootton, Dean of Canterbury; All which had been Counsellours to Queen Mary, and were of her Religion: but then to make a counterpoise of Counsellours of her own Religion, she joyined with them William Parre, Marquess of Northampton; Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford; Sir Thomas Parrey, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Ambrose Cave, Sir Francis Knolles, and Sir William Cecil, late Secretary to King Edward the Sixth: and a little after, Sir Nicholas Bacon, whom she made Keeper of the Great Seal. And having thus provided for her State at home, she seeks correspondence with Princes abroad: To the Emperour Ferdinand, the sent in Embassy Sir Thomas Chaloner: To the King of Spain in the Low-Countries, the Lord Cokham: To the Princes of Germany, Sir Henry Killigrew; Sir Amygill Waad, to the Duke of Hulst; and another Ambassador to the King of Denmark. There were also Ambassadors sent to the Pope, to the State of Venice, and to the French King; with whom at this time there was a Treaty of Peace holden at Cambray, between the Kingdoms of France, England, and Spain; where for England, was employed the Earl of Arundell, Thursby Bishop of Ely, and Doctor Wootton, Dean of Canterbury; with whom William Lord Howard of Effingham was joyined by a new Commission.

As soon as King Philip heard of the death of his Wife Queen Mary, partly out of considerations of State, and partly out of affection of love, he solicited Queen Elizabeth by his Ambassador, the Earl of Feris, to joyin in Marriage with himself; which was no more for two Sisters to have successively one husband, than was done before, for two Brothers to have successively one wife; and for this he promised to procure a Dispensation from the Pope. To which Motion, the Queen, though she well knew, that to allow a Dispensation in this case to be sufficient, were to make her own Birth illegitimate; yet to so great a Prince, and who in her Sisters time had done her many favours, she would not return so blunt an Answer; but putting the Ambassador off for the present in modest terms: She conceived there would be no better way to take him off clean from further suit, than by bringing in an alteration of Religion; which yet she would not do all at once, and upon the sudden (as knowing the great danger of sudden changes), but by little and little, and by degrees: as at first she permitted only Epistles and Gospels, the Ten Commandments, the Lords Prayer, and the Creed, to be read to the People in the English Tongue; in all other matters they were to follow the Roman Rite and Customs, until order could be taken for establishing of Religion by Authority of Parliament; and a severe Proclamation was set forth prohibiting all Points of Controversie to be meddled with: By which means, she both put the Protestants in hope, and put not Papists out of hope. Yet privately she committed the correcting of the Book of Common Prayer, set forth in the English Tongue under King Edward the Sixth, to the care and diligence of Doctor Parker, Bills, May, Cox, Grindall, Whitchard, and Fulkington, Divines of great Learning; with whom she joyined Sir Thomas Smith, a learned Knight: by the matter carried so closely, that it was not communicated to any; but to the Marquess of Northampton, the Earl of Bedford, and Sir William Cecil. The two and twentieth of March, the use of the Lords Supper in both kinds was by Parliament allowed: The four and twentieth of June, the Sacrifice of the Masse was abolished; and the Liturgy in the English Tongue established, though as some say, but with the difference of six Voices. In July the Oath of Supremacy was propounded to the Bishops and others: And in August, Images were removed out of Churches, and broken or burnt. By these degrees Religion was changed; and yet the Change, to the wonder of the World, bred no disturbance; which if it had been done at once, and on the sudden, would hardly, at least not without dangerous opposition, have been admitted.

During this time, a Parliament had been Summoned to begin at Westminster, upon the twentieth of January; and now the Queen, for satisfaction of the people, appointed a Conference to be held, between the Prelates of the Realm, and Protestant Divines now newly returned, who had fled the Realm, in the time of Queen Mary: For the Prelates, were chosen John White, Bishop of Winchester; Ralph Bayne, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield; Thomas Watson, Bishop of Lincoln; Doctor Cole, Dean of Ravens; Doctor Langdell, Arch-deacon of Leam; Doctor Harsfield, Arch-deacon of Canterbury; and Doctor Chadsey, Arch-deacon of Middlesex. For the Protestants, were appointed Doctor Scory, Doctor Cox, Doctor Sands, Doctor Whitchard, Doctor Grindall, Master Horne, Master Gust, Master Elmer, and Master Trent. The place was prepared in Westminster Church; where, besides the Disputants, were present the Lords of the Queens Council, with other of the Nobility; as also many of the Lower House of Parliament. The Articles propounded against the Prelates, and their adherents, were these: First, That it is against the Word of God, and the Customs of the Ancient Church, to use a Tongue unknown to the People, in Common Prayer, and in the Administration of the Sacraments. Secondly, That every Church hath authority to appoint and change Ceremonies, and Ecclesiasticall Rites, so they be to edification. Thirdly, That it cannot be proved by the Word of God, that there is in the Masse a Sacrifice Propitiatory for the living and the dead. For the manner of their Conference, it was agreed, it should be performed in Writing; and that the Bishops should deliver their Reasons in writing, first. The last of March was the first day of their meeting; where contrary to the Order, the Bishops brought nothing in Writing; but said, they would deliver their minds only by Speech: This breaking of Order much displeased the Lords, yet they had it granted. Then rose up Doctor Cole, and made a large Declaration concerning the first Point: when he had ended, the Lords demanded if any of them had more to say? Who answered, No. Then the Protestant Party

A Party exhibited a written Book; which was distinctly read by Master Horn. This done, some of the Bishops began to affirm, they had much more to say in the first Article: this again much displeased the Lords: yet this also was granted them, to do at their next meeting on Monday next; but when Monday came, so many other differences arose between them, that the Conference broke off, and nothing was determined. But in the Parliament there was better agreement; for there it was Enacted, That Queen Elizabeth was the lawful and undoubted Queen of England; notwithstanding a Law made by her Father King Henry the eighth, that excluded both her and her Sister Mary from the Crown, seeing, though the Law be not repealed, yet it is a Principle in Law, That the Crown once gained, taketh away all defects. Also in this Parliament, First fruits and Tithes were restored to the Crown; and the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England was confirmed to the Queen, with so universal consent, that in the Upper House none opposed these Laws, but only the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Sir Anthony Brown, Viscount Montague; and in the Lower House, only some few of Papal inclination, murmured, saying, That the Parliament was packed; and that the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Arundell, and Sir William Cecil, for their own ends, had cunningly begged Voyces, to make up their Party.

The Supremacy thus confirmed to the Queen, the Oath was soon after tendered to the Bishops and others; of whom, as many as refused to take it, were presently deprived of their Livings. And that we may see, how inclining the Kingdom at this time was to receive the Protestant Religion; it is said, that in the whole Realm (wherein are reckoned above Nine thousand Spiritual Promotions) there were no more that refused to take the Oath, but only four-score Parsons, fifty C Prebendaries, fifteen Masters of Colleges, twelve Arch-deacons, twelve Deans, six Abbots, and fourteen Bishops, (indeed all that were at that time, except Antony Bishop of Landaff) as Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, Edmond Bonner Bishop of London, Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, Thomas Thursby Bishop of Ely, Guilbert Bourne Bishop of Bath and Wells, John Christopher Bishop of Chichester, John White Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Watson Bishop of Lincoln, Ralph Bayne Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, Owen Ogilshorp Bishop of Carlisle, James Turberville Bishop of Exeter, and David Poole Bishop of Peterborough; and with these, Dr. Peckham Abbot of Westminster: All which were at first committed to prison, but soon after delivered to the custody of private friends, excepting those two sawcy Prelates, Lincoln and Winchester, who threatened to excommunicate the Queen. Three only, namely, Cuthbert Scot Bishop of Chichester, Richard Pate Bishop of Worcester, and Thomas Goldwell Bishop of Saint Asaph, changed their Religion of their own accord; as also did certain Noble Personages, namely, Henry Lord Marley, Sir Francis Englefield, and Sir Robert Peckham, (who had been Privy Counsellors to Queen Mary) Sir Thomas Shalley, and Sir John Gage.

In the Sees of the Prelates removed, were placed Protestant Bishops, as Matthew Parker was made Archbishop of Canterbury, (who was consecrated by the Imposition of the hands of three that formerly had been Bishops; namely, William Barlow of Bath and Wells, John Scory of Chichester, and Miles Coverdale of Exeter) and being consecrated himself, he afterward consecrated Edmund Grindall Bishop of London, Richard Cox Bishop of Ely, Edwyn Sands Bishop of Worcester, Rogland Merick Bishop of Bangor, Thomas Toney Bishop of Saint Davids, Nicholas Bellingham Bishop of Lincoln, John Jewell Bishop of Salisbury, Richard Davis Bishop of Saint Asaph, Edward Gust Bishop of Rochester, Gilbert Barkely Bishop of Bath and Wells, Thomas Benham Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, William Alley Bishop of Exeter, John Paikhurst Bishop of Norwich, Robert Horn Bishop of Winchester, Richard Chyney Bishop of Gloicester, Edmund Scambler Bishop of Peterborough, William Barlow Bishop of Chichester, John Scory Bishop of Hereford, Tonyng Archbishop of York, James Pilkington Bishop of Durham, John Best Bishop of Carlisle, and William Downham Bishop of Chester.

Whilst these things were done in England, the Treaty of peace at Cambray continued still; wherein King Philip stood for the restitution of Callice to the English; as firmly as if it had been his own Inherit; and without it would agree to no Peace with France: But when by Messages he understood, that his Suit for marriage with Queen Elizabeth was rejected; and that the Protestant Religion was established in the Kingdom, he then left Queen Elizabeth, seeing he would not be his, to her self; and though he became not presently a Foe, yet he became presently less than a Friend, and forbore to do any more good Offices in that business. Queen Elizabeth thus left to herself, agreed with the French King, to conclude her own peace apart; and thereupon, Delegates on both sides were appointed to meet at Cambray: For the Queen of England were Thursby Bishop of Ely, the Lord Williams, the Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain to the Queen, and Doctor Wootton, Dean of Canterbury and York: For the King of France were, Charles Cardinal of Lorraine, the first Peer of France, Amas Duke of Nemours, James Alen Lord Privy Council. The Commissioners meeting, the chief point in difference, was the restitution of Callice; for which the English Commissioners, by the Queens appointment, offered to remit two Millions of Crowns, that by just account were due from France to England; but the Queen was not more desirous to recover Callice, than the French King was to hold it: And thereupon at last, it was concluded, that Callice should remain in possession of the French, for the term of eight years; and thoe expired, it should be delivered to the English, upon Forfeiture of five hundred

The Crown once gained, taketh away all defects. The Title of Supreme Head of the Church, is confirmed to the Queen.

The Oath of Supremacy readily taken by all, but only some few, and who they were.

Papal Bishops removed, and Protestants placed in their rooms.

King Philip stood for restitution of Callice, till he understood of the alteration of Religion in England. Queen Elizabeth left to her self, sends Embassadors about Peace with France.

Where it was concluded, that Callice should be restored after eight years, but yet came to nothing.

dred thousand Crowns, for which, hostages were given: But all this notwithstanding, though the Conditions were sealed and sworn to, and though hostages were assigned to remain in England, till one or other were performed; yet all was frustrate, and came to nothing.

Henry King of France unfortunately slain, running at tilt.

About this time, Henry King of France married his Daughter Isabel to Philip King of Spain, and his Sister Margaret to Emmanuel Phylibert, Duke of Savoy; at the Solemnity of which Marriages, he would needs be a Tilter himself; and thereupon commanded the Earl of Montgomery to run against him, who unfortunately breaking his Lance upon the Kings Cuyrass, a splinter thereof (his Beaver being somewhat open) struck him so deep in the Eye, that within few dayes he ended his life: After whose death, Francis his Son, at the age of sixteen years, succeeded him in the Crown, having by the Marriage of Queen Mary, the Title of Scotland, and upon ground thereof, laying claim to the Crown of England also, and giving the Arms of England, as properly belonging to him.

And now begins the game of Faction to be plaid, wherein the whole Estate of Queen Elizabeth lies at stake, a Game that will hold playing the most part of her Reign, and if not plaid well, will put her in jeopardy of losing all, seeing all about her was against her; Philip King of Spain hath a quarrel to her, for being rejected in his suit; the King of France hath a quarrel to her in right of his Wife, which is now his right; the Queen of Scots hath a quarrel to her for detaining her Inheritance; the Pope hath a quarrel to her, for excluding his Authority; the King of Sweden hath a quarrel to her for slighting his Son in the way of Marriage: And all these being against her, whom hath she on her side, but only her own Subjects, Papists yesterday, and to day Protestants, who being scarce settled in their Religion, how should they be settled in their Loyalty? And not being Loyal, where can she finde to cast Anchor for her safety? But it is a true saying, Nul lum nomen abest si sit prudentia; Wisdom is a supply for all defects: And indeed, the Queen being very wise in her self, and having a wife Council about her, she passed all these difficulties, though not without danger, yet with little or no hazard.

Knox in Scotland preaches against the Princes Authority.

It happened (if at least it happened, and were not rather plotted of purpose) that a Reformation of Religion was pretended in Scotland; but was indeed an incroachment upon the Princes Authority; for at the preaching of John Knox, and other headstrong Ministers, not onely Images and Altars were cast down and burnt, the Monasteries of Saint Andrews, of Stirling, and of Lynlithgow were overthrown; but it was further put into the heads of the Nobility, that it pertained to them, of their own Authority, to take away Idolatry, and by force reduce the Prince to the precept of Laws: Whereupon there was presently a bandying of the Lords of Scotland, against the Queen Dowager, Regent of the Countrey; and in this Cause each of them fought for aid; The Queen Dowager had aid out of France, the Lords of Scotland sent for aid to the Queen of England: But this was matter for consultation. It seemed a bad Example, for a Prince to give aid to the rebellious Subjects of another Prince: On the other side, it seemed no less then impiety, nor to give aid to the Protestants of the same Religion; but that of all it seemed plain madness, to suffer adversaries to be so near Neighbours, and let the French nestle in Scotland, who pretend Title to England: upon such considerations, it was resolved to send them aid: and thereupon, an Army of six thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, was sent under the Command of the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Gray of Winton his Lieutenant General, Sir James Crofts, Assistant to him; the Lord Scroop, Lord Marshal; Sir George Howard, General of the men at Arms; Sir Henry Percy, General of the Light Horse; Thomas Huggins Provost Marshall; Thomas Gower, Master of the Ordinance; Master William Pelham, Captain of the Pyoners; and Master Edward Randall, Sergeant Major, and divers others. These coming into Scotland, joynd with the Scottish Lords, and set down before Leith, where passed many small skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults: to whom, after some time, a new supply came of above two thousand Foot; whereof were Captains, Sir Andrew Corbet, Sir Rowland Stoddley, Sir Thomas Hesbith, Sir Arthur Manwaring, Sir Lawrence Smith, and others: yet with this new supply there was little more done then before; many light skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults, so long, till at last the young French King, finding these broyls of Scotland to be too furious for him to appease, he sent to the Queen of England, desiring that Commissioners might be sent to reconcile these differences: whereupon were dispatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecil, her principal Secretary, with Doctor Watson, Dean of Canterbury; who concluded a Peace between England and France, upon these Conditions, That neither the King of France, nor the Queen of Scotland, should thenceforth use the Arms or Titles of England or Ireland; And that both the English and the French should depart out of Scotland; And a general Pardon should be enacted by Parliament, for all such as had been actors in those Affairs. This Peace was concluded, when Francis the young King of France died, leaving the Crown to his younger Brother Charles, who was guided altogether by the Queen Mother, and molested with the Civil dissensions between the Princes of Guise and Conde; for whose reconciliation, the Queen sent Sir Henry Sidney Lord President of Wales; and shortly after an Army, under the leading of the Lord Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick; who arriving at Nismes, was received into the Town; which having kept eleven months, he was then constrained, by reason of a Pestilence, to surrender again upon Composition, and so returned.

The Queen sends an Army to assist the Lords of Scotland.

A Peace is concluded between the King of France, and the Queen, and upon what terms.

Francis King of France dies and leaves Mary Queen of Scots a Widow.

Newhaven taken by the English, but soon surrendered.

A About this time, when the Parliament was upon dissolving, it was agreed upon by the House of Commons, to move the Queen to marry, that she might have Issue to succeed her; to which purpose Thomas Gargrave, Speaker of the House, with some few other chosen men, had access to the Queen, who humbly made the motion to her, as a thing which the Kingdom infinitely desired; seeing they could never hope to have a better Prince, than out of her loyns: Whereunto the Queen answered in effect thus; That she was already married; namely, To the Kingdom of England: and behold (saith she) the Pledge of the Covenant with my Husband; and therewith she held out her finger, and shewed the Ring, wherewith, at the time of her Coronation, she gave her self in Wedlock to the Kingdom: and if (saith she) I keep my self to this Husband, and take no other; yet I doubt not but God will lend you as good Kings as if they were born of me; for as much as we see by daily experience, That the Issue of the best Princes do often degenerate: And for my self, it shall be sufficient that a Marble Stone declare, That a Queen having reigned such a time, lived and died a Virgin. Indeed before this time, many Marches had been offered her: First, King Philip; and when he was out of hope of matching with her himself, he then dealt with the Emperor Ferdinand his Uncle, to commend his younger Son Charles, Duke of Austria, to her for a Husband. And when this succeeded not, then John Duke of Finland, second Son to Gustavus King of Sweden, was sent by his Father, to solicit for his eldest Brother Ericus; who was honourably received, but the March rejected. Then Adolphus Duke of Holst, Uncle to Frederick King of Denmark, came into England, upon a great hope of speeding; but the Queen bestowed upon him the Honour of the Garter, and a yearly Pension, but not her self. Then James Earl of Arran, was commended to her by the Protestants of Scotland; but neither the man nor the motion was accepted. Of meaner Fortunes there were some at home that pleased themselves with hope of her Marriage: First, Sir William Pickering, a Gentleman of a good House, and a good Estate; but that which most commended him, was his studiousness of good Letters, and sweet demeanour. Then Henry Earl of Arundel, exceeding rich, but now in his declining age. Then Robert Dudley, youngest Son of the Duke of Northumberland, of an excellent feature of face, and now in the flower of his age; but these might please themselves with their own conceit, but were not considerable in her apprehension: they might receive from her good Testimonies of her Princely favour, but never pledges of Nuptial love.

The Parliament moves the Queen to marry.

And her Answer.

The many matches that had been offered to her.

About this time the Earl of Feria (who had married the Daughter of Sir William Dormer) being denied leave of the Queen for some of his Wives friends to live out of England, grew so incensed, that he made means to Pius the fourth, then Pope, to have her excommunicate as an Heretick and Usurper: but the Pope inclining rather to save than to destroy; and knowing that gentle courses prevail more with generous minds, than roughness and violence; in most loving manner wrote unto her, exhorting her to return to the Unity of the Catholic Church; and as it is said, made her great offers, if she would hearken to his Counsel; particularly, That he would recall the Sentence pronounced against her Mothers Marriage, confirm the Book of Common Prayer in English, and permit to her People the use of the Sacrament in both Kindes. But Queen Elizabeth neither terrified with the Earl of Feria's practices, nor allured with the Popes great offers, according to her Motto, Semper eadem, persisted constant in her Resolution, to maintain that Religion, which in her Conscience she was perswaded to be most agreeable to the Word of God, and most consonant to the Primitive Church.

Great offers made by the Pope to the Queen, if she would become a Papist.

But she persisted constant in her Religion.

Whilest these grounds of troubles are sowing in England, France, and Scotland, it is not likely that Ireland will lie fallow; though indeed it be a Countrey that will bring forth troubles of it self, without sowing; but howsoever, to make the more plentiful Harvest of troubles at this time, John O Neal (whose Father King Henry the Eighth made Earl of Tyrone) to prevent the punishment of a private Outrage upon a Brother, broke into open Rebellion against the Prince: and though his attempts were maturely made frustrate by timely opposition; yet this was he that in the beginning of the Queens Reign, sowed the Seeds of that trouble in Ireland, which afterward, took so deep root, that till the ending of her Reign, it could never thoroughly be rooted out: though this man a year or two after came into England, and casting himself at the Queens feet, acknowledged his fault, and obtained pardon.

John O Neal Earl of Tyrone begins to rebel.

The Treaty of Edinburgh should by promise have been confirmed by Francis the French King, while he lived; but he not having done it, Queen Elizabeth requires his Dowager, the Queen of Scots to confirm it: but she solicited often to it by Throgmorton the Queens Leiger in France, made always answer, She could not do it without the Counsel of her Nobility in Scotland. Whereupon Queen Elizabeth suspecting that this Answer was but to hold her in amazement, while some mischief was practising against her, sent Sir Thomas Randall into Scotland, to perswade the Lords there to enter into a League of mutual Amity with her, and other Protestant Princes; and further, by no means to permit their Queen, now a Widow, to marry again to any foreign Prince; for which the alledged many great Reasons. In the mean while, the Queen of Scots, purposing to return into Scotland, sent before-hand D' Oysel a French Lord, to intreat Queen Elizabeth, that with her leave, she her self might passe by Sea into Scotland, and D' Oysel might passe by Land. But Queen Elizabeth openly denied both the one and the other; unless she would confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh; saying, It was no reason she should do the Queen of Scots countess, if the Queen of Scots would not do her right.

Queen Elizabeth requires the Treaty of Edinburgh to be confirmed by the Queen Dowager. And her Answer.

The Queen of Scots pathetically into Scotland; though laid wait to be intercepted. She offered all observance to Queen Elizabeth, so she might be declared her Successor. Queen Elizabeth's Answer.

The Queen of Scots much troubled with this answer, exposulared the matter with her Leiger Throgmorton, and much complains of the unthankfulness: but in the mean time providing shipping, the loosed from Calice; and under covert of a mist, notwithstanding that Ships were laid to intercept her, she arrived safe in Scotland; where she intreated her Subjects in so loving a manner, that she gave great contentment to the whole Kingdom; as well to the Protestant party, as the other: and then sent Letters to Queen Elizabeth, professing all observance and readines to enter League with her; so she might by Authority of Parliament, be declared her Successor; which was but her Right. To this Queen Elizabeth answered, That though she would no way derogate from her Right: yet she should be loath to endanger her own security, and as it were to cover her own eyes with a Grave-cloth, while she was alive; but fell again to her old Admonition, requiring her to confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh: And now to shew the respect she bore her, when her Unkles the Dukes D' Anmale, D' Albenise, and other Lords of France that had brought her home, returned through England, she gave them most bountiful and loving entertainment.

These two Queens indeed were both of great Spirits, and both very wise; but there grew such Jealousies of State between them; (the Queen of Scots doubting lest Queen Elizabeth meant to frustrate her Succession; Queen Elizabeth doubting lest the Queen of Scots meant to prevent her Succession) that it kept them more asunder in love, then they were near in blood, and was cause of many unkinde passages between them: in all which, though the Queen of Scots were a very near match to the Queen of England, in the abilities of her minde; yet in the favours of Fortune she was much her inferiour.

But now for all the courties which Queen Elizabeth shewed to the Queen of Scots Unkles, at their returning through England, yet new practises were again set on foot against her at Rome; the Duke of Guise especially labouring to have her be Excommunicate; but Pope Pius still averred from such roughness, meant now to try the Queen another way; and thereupon sent the Abbot Martinengi, and when he might not be admitted to enter England, then caused the Bishop of Viterbo his Nuncio in France to deal earnestly with the Queens Leiger Throgmorton, that he (as other Princes had done) would send her Orators to the Council of Trent, which he before had called. But the Queen nothing tender in this point, made peremptory answer, That a Popish Assembly he did not acknowledge to be a General Council; nor did think the Pope to have any more Right or power to call it, then any other Bishop. This answer not onely exasperated the Pope, but so alienated also the King of Spain's minde from her, that he was never after so kinde a friend to her as he had been; and none of her Embassadors ever after had any great liking to be employed to him. And now at this time, as the Abbot Martinengi was the last Nuncio that ever was sent from the Pope into England, so Sir Edward Carne, now dying at Rome, was the last Leiger that was ever sent to the Pope from the Kings of England.

And now Queen Elizabeth knowing well that she had drawn many ill-willers against her State, she endeavoured to strengthen it by all the means she could devise: She caused many great Ordinance of Brass and Iron to be cast; She repaired Fortifications in the Borders of Scotland; She encreased the number of her Ships, so as England never had such a Navy before; She provided great store of Armour and Weapons out of Germany; she caused Mustres to be held, and youth to be trained in exercises of Artillery; and to please the people (whose love is the greatest strength of all) she gave leave to have Corn and Grain transported, and called in all base Coins and Brass Money.

It was now the fifth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign; when divers great persons were called in question: Margaret Countess of Lenox, Niece to King Henry the Eighth, by his eldest Sister, and her Husband the Earl of Lenox, for having had secret conference by Letters with the Queen of Scots, were delivered prisoners to Sir Richard Sackville, Master of the Rolls, and with him kept a while in custody. Also Arthur Poole and his Brother, whole great Grand-father, was George Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward the Fourth: Antony Fortescue, who had married their Sister, and others were arraigned, for conspiring to withdraw themselves to the Duke of Guise in France, and from thence to return with an Army into Wales, to declare the Queen of Scots, Queen of England; and Arthur Poole Duke of Clarence; which particulars they confessed at the Bar, and were thereupon condemned to die; but had their lives spared, in regard they were of the Blood-Royal. Also the Lady Katherine Gray, Daughter to Hen. Gray Duke of Suffolk, by the eldest Daughter of Charles Brandon, having formerly been married to the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son; and from him soon after lawfully divorced, was four years after found to be with Child by Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford, who being at that time in France, was presently sent for; and being examined before the Archbishop of Canterbury, and affirming they were lawfully married, but not being able within a limited time to produce witnesses of their marriage, they were both committed to the Tower; where the was brought to bed; and after by the connivance or corruption of their Keepers, being suffered on crimes to come together, she was with child by him again: which made the Queen more angry then before; so as Sir Edw. Warner Lieutenant of the Tower was put out of his place, and the Earl was fined in the Star-chamber five thousand pounds, and kept in Prison nine years after. Though in pleading of his Case, one John Hales argued, They were lawful Man and Wife, by virtue of their own bare consent, without any Ecclesiastical Ceremony. The Lady a few years after, falling through grief into a mortall sickness, her Child defied the Queens Pardon, for having married without her knowledge, and concerning her Children to her clemency, died in the Tower.

The Pope invites Queen Elizabeth to send her Orators to the Council of Trent. The Queens Answer.

All base money called in.

Divers great persons questioned and condemned, but had their lives spared.

A At this time (the King being under Age) dissensions amongst the Peers grew hot in France, of which there were two Factions; both pretending the cause of Religion: Of the One, the Duke of Guise, a Papist, was Head; of the other the Prince of Conde, a Protestant: But while Delirant Reges, plebuntur Achivi: while these Princes are at variance, the people suffer for it; and chiefly, as being under the weaker protection, the Protestant party: whereupon Queen Elizabeth, having well learned the Lesson: Tum tuas res agitur, paries cum proximus ardet; and fearing lest the flame of their dissension, might kindle a fire within her own Kingdom; sent over Sir Henry Sidney, Lord President of Wales, into France, to endeavour by all possible means their reconciliation; which when he could not effect, (and perhaps it was never meant he should effect it; but only to see what Invitations would be made to the Queen for her assistance) she thereupon, at the moan of the afflicted Protestants, sent over an Army of six thousand Souldiers, under the Conduct of the Earl of Warwick, in assistance of the Prince of Conde, and other Protestant Lords, who delivered to him the Town of Newhaven, to hold in the King of France his name, until such time as Calice were restored: But the Prince of Conde marching to joyne with the English Forces, was by the Duke of Guise intercepted and taken Prisoner; which had been a great disappointment to the English; but that the Duke of Colen joyned with him, besieged Cam in Normandy, and took it, together with Bayeux, Falaise, and Saint Lo. The French Hostages that were pledges for the payment of five hundred thousand Crowns, if Calice were not restored, were remaining still in England, who perceiving there was like to be War with France, prepared secretly to get away; but being ready to take shipping, were discovered and brought back again.

C In the mean while, the Prince of Conde drawn on with a hope, to marry the Queen of Scots, and to have the chief Government in France, during the Kings Minority, concluded a Peace with the King, and with the Guises; so as now, all French, as well Protestants as Papists, required to have Newhaven delivered up: But the Earl of Warwick, perceiving the fickleness of the French Protestants, first to make suit to draw him into France, and now upon so slight occasion to require him to Ships; the French on the other side make ready to let upon the Town, saying, They fought not now for Religion, but for their Countrey; wherefore it was meet that both Protestants and Papists should joyne their Forces, seeing they had already concluded a Peace betwixt themselves. And hereupon the Duke of Memory sent a Trumpeter to the Earl of Warwick, commanding him to yield the Town: who making answer by Sir Hugh Pawler, That he would never yield it without the Queens leave; he thereupon besieged the Town, and with great violence of Battery, sought to get it by force: Which Queen Elizabeth hearing, she sent a Commission to the Earl of Warwick to yield it up, if upon honourable Conditions; which soon after was accordingly done, after the English had held it eleven moneths; and then the Earl, without any dishonour for yielding up a Town, which the Pestilence made him no less unwilling than unable to hold, returned into England: but that which was more doleful than the loss of Newhaven, he brought the Pestilence with him into England. The recovery of this Town, not only made the French to triumph, but hereupon the Chancellour of France pronounced openly, That by this War, the English had lost all their Right to Calice, and were not to require it any more, seeing it was one of the Conditions, that neither of the Nations should make War upon the other; which was the Point stood upon by the King of France and his Mother, when Queen Elizabeth sent Sir Thomas Smith to demand Calice to be restored.

At this time there were such cross designs amongst the Princes of Christendom, that a very good Politician could hardly understand their aims. The Duke of Guise being slain in the Civil War, the Queen of Scots Dowry was not paid her in France, and the Scots were put off from being the Kings Guard: This exceedingly displeased the Queen of Scots: But then to please her again, and for fear lest hereupon she should apply her self to the friendship of the English, her Unkle the Cardinal of Lorraine solicited her self, to marry Charles Duke of Austria; offering her for her Dowry the County of Tyrol.

F The Queen of Scots, to make use of her Unkles fear, and perhaps to bring Queen Elizabeth into an opinion of depending upon her, acquaints her with this motion, and therein requires her advice. Queen Elizabeth not willing she should marry with any forrain Prince, persuades her to take a Husband out of England, and particularly commended to her the Lord Robert Dudley, (whose Wife a little before had with a fall broke her neck;) promising withall, that if she would marry him, she should then by Authority of Parliament be declared her Successor, in Case she died without Issue. But when her Unkles and the Queen-mother were informed of this motion, they so much disliked the Marriage with Dudley, that so she would refuse that Match, and persevere in the Friendship of the French, they offered to pay her the Dowry money, that was behinde, and to restore the Scots to all their former liberties in France. And as for the King of Spain, he had indeed a Leger Embassador here in England; but rather by way of Complement, and to watch advantages, than for any sincere love; which he began now to withdraw from the English, as suspecting them to intend a Trade to the West-Indies.

And now the French Protestants may see what they brought upon themselves, by leaving the English at Newhaven, and by trusting to their Countrey-men the French Papists, for their peace was but a snare, and the Marriage of Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Navarre, with Margaret of Valois, the French King's Sister, was but a bait to entrap them; for upon the confidence of this Marriage, being drawn together into Paris, they were the readier for the slaughter; and a few dayes after the Marriage, France.

Queen Elizabeth sends over an Army to assist the Protestants in France.

The Prince of Conde concludes a Peace with the King of France.

Newhaven delivered up to the French, with the Queens leave.

The Queen of Scots requires Queen Elizabeths advice about her Marriage. Who persuades her to marry the Lord Robert Dudley. But this motion was scorned by her French friends. At the marriage of the Prince of Navarre was the great massacre of the Protestants in France.

Marriage, which were all spent in Feasts and Masks, to make them the more secure, upon a Watch-word given, the bloody Faction fell upon the Protestants, and neither spared age, nor sex, nor condition, but without mercy, and sense of humanity, slaughtered as many as they could meet with, to the number of many thousands.

It was now the sixth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, a year fatal for the death of many great Personages: First dyed William Lord Gray of Wilton, Governour of Berwick, a man famous for his great Services in Warre: then William Lord Paget, a man of as great Services in Peace; who by his great deservings had wrought his advancement to sundry Dignities, and honourable places; and though zealous in the Roman Religion, yet held by Queen Elizabeth in great estimation to his dying day: Then Henry Manners Earl of Rutland, descended by his Mother from King Edward the fourth: And lastly, Francis the Dutchess of Suffolk, Daughter to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and Mother to Queen Jane.

And now Queen Elizabeth finding how fickle the French Protestants had carried themselves, towards her, intended to make a Peace; and to that end sent Sir Thomas Smith into France, joyning Throgmorton in Commission with him; and in conclusion, a Peace was agreed on; whereof, amongst other Articles, this was one, That the Hostages in England should be freed, upon the payment of six hundred thousand Crowns: and this Peace was ratified by the Oath both of the Queen of England, and the King of France.

About this time the English Merchants were hardly used both in Spain, and in the Netherlands, upon pretence of Civil differences, but indeed out of hatred to the Protestant Religion: whereupon the English removed the Seat of their Trading to Embden in Freeze-land: but Gysman the Spanish Leiger, newly come into England, finding the great damages that the Netherlands sustained by these differences, endeavoured by all means to compose them; and thereupon Viscount Montague, Nicholas Wootton, and Walter Haddon, Master of the Requests, were sent to Bruges in Flanders; who after many interruptions, brought the matter at last to some indifferent agreement.

It was now the seventh year of Queen Elizabeth, when making a Progress, she went to see Cambridge; where after she had viewed the Colleges, and been entertained with Comedies, and Scholasticall Disputations, she made her self a Latine Oration, to the great Encouragement of the Scholars, and then returned. Presently after her return, she made the Lord Robert Dudley Master of her Horse, first Baron of Denbigh (giving him Denbigh and all the Lands belonging to it) and then Earl of Leicester, to him, and the Heirs males of his Body lawfully begotten: which Honour was conferred upon him with the greatest State and Solemnity that ever was known: And now Leicester, to endear himself to the Queen of Scots, accused Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord Keeper, for being privy to the Libell of Hales, who affirmed the right of the Crown to belong to the Family of Suffolk, in case the Queen should die without Issue; and thereupon was Bacon cast into Prison; till after ward, upon his purgation, and the mediation of Sir William Cecil, he was set at liberty, and restored to his place.

And now for a while we must cast our eyes upon Scotland, for that was now the Stage where all great businesses of State were acted: Matthew Stewart, Earl of Lenox, who had married Margaret Douglas, King Henry the Eighth's Niece by his elder Sister, had been kept as an Exile in England, now twenty years; him the Queen of Scots invites to come into Scotland, under pretence of restoring to him his ancient Patrimony; but indeed to confer with him about a Marriage with his Son the Lord Darley, for being reputed Heir to the Crown of England, next after her self, she thought by matching with his Son, to strengthen her own Title, and to prevent the hope of any other. Queen Elizabeth, upon suit made by his Wife, gave the Earl leave to go; but soon after, suspecting what the Queen of Scots intent was in sending for him, she, to hinder the proceeding, sent Sir Thomas Randall to her, to let her know, That if she proceeded in this Match, she would exceedingly wrong her self; for that it was a Match so much disliked by all the English, that she was faine to prorogue the Parliament, left upon dislike thereof, there should something be enacted against her Right of Succession: But if she would marry the Earl of Leicester, she should then by Parliament be declared her next Heir. Hereupon in the Month of November, the Earl of Bedford and Sir Thomas Randall for Queen Elizabeth; the Earl of Murray and Lidington for the Queen of Scots at Barwick, entered into a Treaty concerning the Marriage with the Earl of Leicester. The English Commissioners urged the great benefits that by this Match would accrue both to the Queen of Scots her self, and to the whole Kingdom of Scotland: The Scottish on the other side, urged the great disparagement it would be to the Queen of Scots, if refusing the offers made her of divers great Princes, she should match her self with so mean a Person as the Earl of Leicester. This matter held long debate, partly for that the English Commissioners were to be appointed by Queen Elizabeth; and partly for that the Scottish Commissioners had a good minde to hinder her from marrying at all; and perhaps not the least, for that the Earl of Leicester, being verily perswaded he should at last obtain Queen Elizabeth her self, by secret Letters warned the Earl of Bedford not to urge the Marriage with the Queen of Scots too far; and was thought for this cause to favour Darley under hand. The matter being in this manner protracted for two whole years together, the Queen of Scots impatient of longer delay, and being resolved in her minde what she would do, used means that the Lord Darley got leave of Queen Elizabeth, to go into Scotland for three months onely, under colour to be put in possession of his Fathers Lands, (though it be strange, the Queen upon any terms would let him go, if she really intended to hinder the marriage: but such was the destiny, if there were not a plot in it: and so in February he came to Edinburgh; who being a young man, of not above nineteen years of age, of a comely countenance, and most Princely presence, the Queen of Scots as soon as she saw him, fell in love with him, yet in modesty dissembling it for the present; she thought to get a Dispensation from Rome, because of their nearness in Consanguinity. And now, her inclination being grown so apparent, that there was no concealing it, she sent Lyndington to Queen Elizabeth, desiring her consent. But she, through the suggestions of the Earl of Murray, being induced to believe that the Queen of Scots intention was, by this Marriage, to get the Crown of England, and to bring in Popery, entered into consultation with her Privy Council, what was fit to be done to hinder the Marriage; who all concluded, that these were the best wayes: First, To have a Company of Souldiers levied for terrour sake, about the Borders towards Scotland; then to commit to Prison the Countess of Lenox, the Lord Darleys Mother; and to recall from Scotland the Earl of Lenox, and his Son Darley, upon pain of the losse of all their goods in England; then that the Scots who were known to be averse from the Marriage, should be relieved and assisted: And lastly, That Katherine Gray, with the Earl of Hertford, should be received into some grace; about whom only (it was thought) the Queen of Scots was most sollicitous, as being her Rival to the English Crown. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was sent to the Queen of Scots, to counsel her in the Queens name, not to proceed in this Marriage; and to shew her the many inconveniences that would accrue unto her by it. But she returned answer, That the matter was too far passed to be recalled; and that Queen Elizabeth had no cause to be displeased with it; seeing herein she followed her advise, Nor to match with a stranger, but with an Englishman born.

Queen Elizabeth being informed of her answer, calleth home the Earl of Lenox, and the Lord Darley his Son, commanding them upon their Allegiance to return: The Father modestly by Letters excuseth himself; the Son humbly intreateth her not to be a hinderance to his preferment, which he vows to employ in her Majesties Service, to the uttermost of his power.

And now, to make him the fitter march for her, the Queen of Scots honoured him first with Knighthood; then with the Dignities of the Lord Armanack, Earl of Rasse, and Duke of Rathay, which Dukedom by Birth pertaineth to the eldest Sons of the Kings of Scotland. After this, when he had not been above five months in Scotland, she married him; and with the consent of most of the Peers, declared him King. At this, the Earl of Murray, and other whom he drew to his party, extremely fretted, and fell to moving of turbulent questions, Whether it were lawful to admit a Papist King? Whether the Queen of Scots might chuse a Husband at her own pleasure? and whether the Peers of the Kingdom might not out of their own Authority, impose one upon her? But howsoever they raised Arms, and had disturbed the Nuptials, but that the Queen levied an Army to encounter them; with which she pursued them so closely, that they were faine to flee into England for protection; where Queen Elizabeth made no scruple to receive them, seeing the Queen of Scots had received Darley, Standon, and Walsh, that were fled out of England; but the Earl of Murray especially, who had always been found addicted to the English, Queen Elizabeth perhaps was not much troubled at the Marriage; partly as knowing the middle disposition of the Lord Darley, and how little access of strength it brought to the Queen of Scots; but most of all, as plainly seeing there would troubles arise in Scotland upon it; and the troubles of Scotland would be the quietness of England; which as a good Mother of her Country, was the mark she aimed at: yet she made a shew of being offended with it; but rather to conceal her minde, than that she was offended with it indeed.

At this time the Emperour Maximilian, sent to Queen Elizabeth his Ambassador, Adam Smirnore, renewing the former Suit for his Brother Charles of Austria; for which Marriage the Earl of Sussex was very earnest; the Earl of Leicester as much against it; so as it grew to a quarrel between them, and the Court was divided into factions about it: but the Queen, who never liked the dissensions of her Peers (though it be a Rule with some, Divide and Reign) made them friends, at least in countenance.

We may now leave Scotland a while, and see the Honour done at this time to Queen Elizabeth, not much inferior to the Honour done to Solomon by the Queen of Sheba; for now Cicile the Sister of Erick King of Sweden, and Wife of Christopher Marquis of Badde, being great with Child, came from the farthest part of the North (a long Journey) thorough Germany, of purpose to see her, for the great fame she had heard of her Wildom: At her being hke, she was delivered of a Child, to whom, in requital of her kindness, Queen Elizabeth was God-mother, and named him Edwardus Tertius; giving to her and her Husband, besides Royal Entertainment, a yearly Pension. At this time also, for the great Fame of her Wildom, Donald Mac Carti More, a great Potentate of Ireland, came and delivered up into her hands all his most ample Territories; and then receiving them again from her, to hold them to him and his Heirs males lawfully begotten; and for want of such Issue, to remain to the Crown of England. The Queen in requital invested him with the honours of Earl of Glenkarne, and Baron of Valence; and besides many Presents given him, paid the charges of his Journey.

It was now the eighth Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Sir Nicholas Arnold, a Knight of Gloster-shire, governing Ireland under the Title of a Justice, was called home; and Sir Henry Sidney placed in his room. And here by the way it is to be noted, That the Governours of Ireland, after it came under the English, were at first called Justices of Ireland; afterwards, Lieutenants; and their Vice-gerents were called Deputies. Afterwards at the Princes pleasure, sometimes Deputies, sometimes Justices, and sometimes Lieutenants; which last Title, though it be of great honour, yet in power is in a manner but the same. Sir Henry Sidney at his coming into Ireland, found the Province of Munster in much disorder, by reason of strife between Gerald Earl of Desmond, and Thomas Earl of Ormond: whereupon, the Queen sending for the Earl of Desmond into England, ordained a new Government in that Province, appointed a President to administer Justice, together with an Assistant on the Bench; two Lawyers and a Notary: and the first President she made in this place, was Sir William Semler.

And now Queen Elizabeth in a Progress went to Oxford; where she took pleasure in viewing the Colleges, in hearing Orations, in seeing of Comedies, till the Comedy of Palamon and Arcite turned to a Tragedy; for by the fall of a wall, through the multitude of people that pressed in to see it, three men were slain. At her coming away, she made an Oration in Latin to the Scholars, a sufficient recompence for all the Orations they had made to her. And this year, was a call of seven new Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Grays Inn in Holborn.

Upon the Queens return from Oxford, the Parliament began, where they presently fell upon the matter of succession, and moving the Queen to marry; in which points some went so far, that they spared not to accuse the Queen, as one careless of Posterity; to defame Cecil with Libels and reproches, as if he were her Counsellor in this matter; but above all, to curse Doctor Huic her Physician, who was thought to disswade her from Marriage, by reason of I know not what womanish insufficiency. At last in the Upper House it was agreed, That Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, their Orator, should in all their names beseech the Queen to marry; and withal, to declare a Successor in the Crown, if she should happen to die without Issue; for which he gave many Reasons, declaring what mischiefs were likely to befall the Kingdom, if she should die before a Successor were designed. But in the Lower House there were some, amongst whom were Bell and Mansson, (two Lawyers of great account) Dutton, Sir Paul Wentworth, and others, who grew to far higher terms, disparaging the Queens Authority, and saying, That Princes were bound to design a Successor; and that in not doing it, the Queen should shew her self no better than a particide of her Country. The Queen was contented to bear with words spoken in Parliament; which spoken out of Parliament, she would never have endured: but not willing to expostulate the matter with the whole number, She commanded that thirty of the Higher House, and as many of the Lower, should appear before her, to whom She delivered her minde to this effect; That She knew what danger hangeth over a Princes Head, when a Successor is once declared; She knew that even Children themselves, out of a hally desire of bearing Rule, had taken up Arms against their own Fathers; and how could better Conditions be expected from Kindred? She had by reading observed, That Successors in a collateral Line, have seldom been declared; and that Lewis of Orleans, and Francis of Angoulême, were never declared Successors, and yet obtained the Crown without any noise.

Lastly, She said, Though I have been content to let you debate the matter of Succession, yet I advise you to beware, that you be not injurious to your Princes patience. With these and the like Reasons, she gave to good satisfaction, that they never after troubled her with making any more such motion. And though she contented not in plain terms to declare a Successor, yet soon after She gave some intimation of it; for one Thornton, a Reader of the Civil Law in London, who in his Lectures called the Queen of Scots Right in question, was clipped up in Prison for his labour.

In the beginning of her ninth year, Charles the 9th King of France, sent his Ambassador Raimboul into England to the Queen, with the Robes and Ornaments of the Order of Saint Michael, to bestow upon which two of her Nobility she pleased; and the making choice of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Leicester, they were by Raimboul invested with them; an Honour that had never been conferred upon any English but only King Henry the 8th, King Edward the 6th, and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, though afterward prostituted almost to any, without difference.

And now to return to the affairs of Scotland: The nineteenth of June last past, the Queen of Scots, in a happy hour, was at Edinbrough Castle delivered of a Son, that was afterward James the sixth of Scotland; and the first Monarch of Great Britain; whereof She presently sent word to Queen Elizabeth, by James Melvyn; who thereupon sent Sir Henry Killigrew to congratulate her safe deliverance, and her young Son, with all demonstration of love and amity. But now the love of the Queen of Scots to her Husband the Lord Darley, was not so hot at first, but it was now grown to be as cold; and she had not heaped honours on him so fast before, but now as fast she took them off: for where before in all publick Acts, she had used to place her Husbands name first, now she caused it to be placed last, and in the coyning of Money began to leave it quite out.

This unkindness between them, was fomented by one David Rizzio an Italian, whom the Queen had taken into her Service, first, as a Musician, and then taking a liking to him, made him her Secretary for the French Tongue; by means whereof, he had oftentimes secret conference with her, when the King her Husband might not be admit ed. This indignity the King himself, being given to his pleasures of Hunting and Hawking, resented not so much, as some Lords that were his friends; who told him plainly, that it stood not with his Honour to suffer this fellow to live. By whose instigation, the King drawn to plot his death; one day, taking with him the Earl of Rerwin, and others, he rushed into the Queens Chamber at her Supper time, where finding David Rizzio at a Cupboard, raising some meat that had been taken from the Table, he seized upon him, dragged him forth into an outer Chamber, and there murdered him, the Queen at that time being great with Child, and like by that affright to have miscarried: But the Fact being done, the King came in to her again, assuring her there was no hurt at all intended to her Person: The man that had animated the King to do this Fact, was especially the Earl of Murray, of whom it is necessary to say something, because his part will be the greatest of all the Scottish Actions of this time. He was the bafe Son of King James the Fifth, and so the bafe Brother of the Queen; made at first Prior of Saint Andrews: But not liking that Religious Title, he affected rather to be Temporal Honour; which when the Queen, being then in France, denied him, then in an angry mood he returned into Scotland, where, by the advice of Knox, whom he held for a great Patriarch, he brought the matter so to passe, that in an Assembly of the States, the Religion was altered, and the French were banished out of Scotland: Yet afterward, as soon as the Queen was a Widow, he posted into France, and so intimated with her, that she created him Earl of Murray, and promoted him to an Honourable Marriage. Being thus exalted, he returned into Scotland; where, for the growth of his ambitious designs, he sowed seeds of Sedition, affirming of en, what a misery it was to be under the Command of a Woman; and that Royalty was not to be tyed to any Stock or Kindred, but to Virtue only, whether the Parties were legitimate or no: By this course making way to the Kingdom for himself. To this end, he used all the means he could to keep the Queen from marrying again; which when he could not effect, he then sought wayes how to make discord between her and her Husband; for which cause he had caused the King to murther Rizzio. Of the felicity of which Fact, when the King after a while grew sensible, he meant to be revenged of Murray, who had counselled him to do it: Which Murray understanding, prevented it with causing the like to be done to him, as will presently be seen. For the Queen having been delivered of a Son, and the day appointed for the Christning being come; where the Godfathers were Charles King of France, and Philibert Duke of Savoy; Queen Elizabeth being requested to be God-mother, sent thither the Earl of Bedford as her Deputy, and a Font of Massie Gold for a Present, in value 1043 l. but gave him express Command, That he should not honour Darley with the Title of King. But before a month or two, after the Christning, were passed, the King in a stormy and tempestuous night, was strangled in his Bed, and then cast forth into the Garden, and the house immediately blown up with Gun-powder.

David

The rumour of this Murder being spread abroad, the common Fame laid it upon Murray and Morton, and their confederates: Murray and Morton upon the Queen: But we must not here give credit to that which Buchanan writes, who to curry favour with the Earl of Murray, lays most impudent scandals upon the Queen; whereof, before his death, he repented himself extremely. The King thus murdered, and the Queen left alone to her self, she is counselled to marry with some man might be able to assist her against all her opposites: James Hepburn Earl of Bothwell being thought greatly in her favour, and of great eminency for his valour; and though he were the man that had acted the murder, yet is he by Murray and his Confederates commended to the Queen: In which motion, as being desirous of friends, and not knowing whom to trust, she at last consents, upon these Conditions, That above all things, respect might be had to her young Son; and that Bothwell might be legally quitted, both from the bond of his former marriage; and shew of his Kings murder. Hereupon a course is placed by which, Bothwell is called to the Bar; and Morton being his Advocate, by the Sentence of the Judges he is clearly acquitted. Upon this he is created Duke of Orkney; and by consent of many of the Nobility, is married to the Queen; which bred a suspicion in many, that the Queen was conscious of the murder; which was the thing that by the marriage they intended: And the suspicion once raised, they seek by all means to increase, that they may have the better colour against her; and so, the very same man who had absolved Bothwell, and consented to the marriage, now takes Arms against her, as a Delinquent in both; force him to flee, and then seize upon the Queen, whom, clad in a very homely garment, they thrust into prison in Loch-lewyn, under the custody of Murray's Mother, who had been the Halor of King James the Fifth; but boasting her self to have been his lawful Wife, and her Son, in lawful Issue. Queen Elizabeth having at length notice hereof, sent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland, to expostulate with the Confederates, touching this insolent usage of the Queen; and to consult by what means she might be restored to her Liberty. But Throgmorton coming into Scotland, found the Confederates in more insolent terms than had been reported; being divided in Opinion, what to do with the Queen, some would have her banished perpetually, into England or France; some would have her questioned before the Judges, committed to perpetual custody, and her Son proclaimed King: Others, more inhuman, would have her at once deprived of Princely Authority, of life and all; and this, Knox and some other Ministers, thundred out of the Pulpits. Throgmorton on the other side, galloped many passages out of the holy Scriptures, touching Obedience to the higher Powers; maintaining, That the Queen was subject to no Tribunes, but that in Heaven; That to Judge upon Earth might call her in question: That there was no Office, nor Jurisdiction in Scotland, which was not derived from her Authority, and revocable at her pleasure. They again opposed the peculiar Right of the Kingdom of Scotland; and that in extraordinary cases, they were to proceed besides order: taking up Buchanans Arguments, who in those days, by instigation of Murray, wrote that damned Dialogue, De Jure Regni apud Scotos; wherein, against the verity of the Scottish History, he endeavours to prove, That the people have power, both to create, and to depose their King. After all their debating, all that

The death of the King is by common fame laid upon Murray and Morton, by them upon the Queen.

Who to strengthen her self, marries the Earl Bothwell.

Against whom Murray takes Arms, and seizes upon the Queen.

Q. Elizabeth hearing of it, sends an expostulation with the Confederates about it; and their Answer.

England have anciently challenged as superiour Lords of the Kingdom of Scotland. The day after, the Queen of Scots Delegates set forth at large the injurious dealing of Morton, Murray, Mar, Glencarn, Humis, and others, against the Queen; and how they had compelled her, for fear of death, to resign her Crown; which therefore (they said) was of no force. Murray and his Confederates make answer, That they had done nothing, but by consent of the Peers in Parliament; and that in prosecuting of Bothwell, the Author of the Kings murder, whom the Queen protected; and as for her resignation, that it was voluntarily and freely done. All this the Queen of Scots Delegates answered and confuted, affirming in particular, That where there are one hundred Bishops, Bishops and Barons, (more or lesse) that have voyces in the Parliament of Scotland, there were not in that tumultuous assembly, they speak of, above four Earls, one Bishop, an Abbot or two, and six Barons; wherefore their earnest Request was, that the Queen of England would be sensible of these indignities offered her; and take some course for a speedy redress.

After this, some new Commissioners from Queen Elizabeth were added to the former, of whom, the Queen of Scots took exception; unless the French and Spanish Embassadors might be taken in; and her self admitted into the presence of the Queen, and them; publicly to defend her own innocency; and that Murray might be detained and cited, whom she affirmed, she was able to prove to have been the chief Plotter of the murder of her Husband Darnley. This was held to be a just demand by the Duke of Norfolk; the Earls of Arundel, Suffex, Leicester, and the Lord Clinton. But Queen Elizabeth waxing somewhat angry, openly said, that the Queen of Scots should never want an Advocate as long as Norfolk lived. It was seen here, which is said, that the heart of the King is inflexible; for how Queen Elizabeth stood affected in this case of the Queen of Scots, no man could well discern; she detested the insolency of her Subjects; in deposing her, and yet gave no assistance to restore her.

After long agitation of this business, and nothing concluded, Murray a little before his return into Scotland, slyly propounded the marriage of the Queen of Scots to the Duke of Norfolk; which he with a modest answer rejected as a thing full of danger. But withall, Murray the more to alienate Queen Elizabeths minde from the Queen of Scots, gave out, that she had passed away to the Duke of Arundel her Right to the Crown of England, and that the transaction was confirmed at Rome; he shewed Letters also which the Queen of Scots had written to some friends whom she trusted; wherein she accused the Queen for not dealing with her according to promise, and boasting of succours she expected from some others. This last clause something troubled Queen Elizabeth, neither could she conjecture from whence any such succour should come. Seeing both France with the Civil Wars, and the King of Spain in the Low-Countries had enough to do at home. But at last it brake out, that one Robert Ridolph a Florentine, under the habit of a Merchant in London, was suborned by Pope Pius the fifth, to make a secret commotion of the Papists in England, against the Queen, which he performed indeed with a deal of secrecy; and much cunning; whereupon the Queen of Scots was removed from Bolton (a Castle of the Lord Scroope) where all the neighbouring people were Papists; to Tutbury, more toward the heart of the County, under the Custody of George Earl of Shrewsbury.

About this time the Guises in France, and the Duke D'Alva, in the Low-countries, began to endeavour the utter extirpation of the Protestant Religion. In France, the Ministers of the Gospel are commanded within a limited time to depart the Kingdom; when Queen Elizabeth forgetting the sickleness of the Protestants at Nowhaven, once again takes upon her their protection, supplies them with two hundred thousand Crowns in money, besides Munition in abundance, and with all humanity receives the French that fled into England; the rather, for that they made solemn protestation, they took not up Arms against their Prince, but onely stood upon their own defence. In the Low-countries likewise, the Duke D'Alva breathing nothing but slaughter and blood, made the Dutch come flocking into England, as into a Sanctuary, where with all courtesy they were received.

And here it will be fit to shew how the War in the Low-countries began first, which was thus. At which time the King of Spain brought in the Spanish Inquisition; a small number of the meaner sort of people, in tumultuous manner, cast the Images out of Churches, and brake them in pieces; and although that tumult was soon quieted, yet the King of Spain taking advantage at the rashness of a few, to charge the whole Nation with Rebellion, sent amongst them Ferdinand Alvarez, Duke D'Alva, a bloody and fierce man, who (contrary to the Ordinances and Customs of the Country) took away all authority from the ordinary Courts of Justice; erected new Consistories; condemned and put to death the Peers, without tryal by their lawful Judges; placed Garrisons of Spaniards throughout all their Cities and Villages, and by force exacted the twentieth part of the Fruits of the Earth, and the tenth of moveables upon every Alienation. At that time a mighty masse of money borrowed from the Genoways, and other Italian Merchants, was sent out of Spain into the Low-Countries, there to be employed to interest, which being brought by Shipping, was pursued by the French; and forced to fly for shelter into the Havens of England, whom the Queen commanded to be succoured; as conceiving the money to be the King of Spains, as it was given out; But at the same time, Cardinal Odet coming out of France into England, and giving notice to the Queen, that the money was not the King of Spains, but belonged to certain Merchants of Genovra, from whence the Duke D'Alva, had taken it against their will, with a purpose to employ it to the ruine of the

A the Protestants; and information also being given her by one that had a property in the money that it was so, she determined to put in security, and to borrow money of the Merchants her self, which is an usual thing with Princes, when Goods are taken in their Ports; and the King of Spain himself had lately done the like. The Duke D'Alva, being informed of this dealing of the Queens, by Gerard de Spese, the King of Spains Embassador in England, seizeth presently upon all the Goods of the English in the Low-Countries, and kept the men prisoners; The Queen did the like with the Dutch Merchants in England; Letters of Marc were granted on both sides, and this grew to such a quarrel between the Nations, that being nourished with other differences afterwards, it brought forth in Eighty Eight, that Spanish Invasion, which is, and will be memorable in all future Ages.

B Upon occasion of this Money detained, certain Peers of England, amongst whom were the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquess of Winchester, the Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Pembroke, Leicester, and others, accused Sir William Cecil, for sending away money into France, making this their colour, but done indeed out of envying his great favour with the Queen, and suspecting him to incline to the House of Suffolk, in the matter of succession. Hereupon they consult secretly how to get him imprison'd; and Throgmorton (who envied him as much as they) suggesting that if he were once clapp'd up, they might soon find out a way to crush him; But the Queen (by what means it is uncertain) coming to have notice hereof, gave a check to their purpose, and protected Cecil against their combined practices.

C The Earl Murray being returned into Scotland, makes the Lords believe that he desires a meeting at Edinburgh, to consult about restoring the Queen to her Liberty; but as Hamilton Duke of Chastan Herald (appointed Vicegerent of the Kingdom by the Queen) and the Lord Huns were coming thither, he circumvented them, and before any of the rest came, cast them into prison; and forthwith in an open War, oppresseth all her Favourers. It may be thought, the Earl Murray could have been content, the Queen should have been set at liberty; but that he knew, her liberty could not be without his servitude; and Queen Elizabeth perhaps would willingly have had her restored to her Kingdom, but that she doubted, her restoring would indanger her own security. And thus, while they regarded their own ends in the first place, and hers but in the second, she had the fortune to be pitted, but not the happiness to be relieved; and all she could do her self, was but to tie the knot of her bonds the faster; if she could have fate still, they would perhaps have loosed of themselves; but now, the more she stirred, the more she was intangled.

D And now the Destiny of the Duke of Norfolk began to work: It was in every ones mouth, that the Duke should marry the Queen of Scots; and it is true, there had been motions made; but the matter not so forward, as the Voice of the People, which commonly prefageth what will follow. It had been motioned to the Duke at York, by the Bishop of Ross; and afterward (in pretence at least) by Murray himself at Hampton-Court; but the Duke, before he would resolve in the matter, deliberated with the Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Westmorland, Suffex, Pembroke, Southampton, and Leicester himself, who all judged it fit, he should acquaint the Queen with it first, and then leave the matter to her liking. Within a few dayes, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton meeting the Duke in the Palace at Westminster, advised him, to move the Earl of Leicester himself to embrace the match, seeing he had formerly sued for it: but if he refused it, then at least to take him along with him, for that himself alone would hardly be able to procure the Queens consent. A day or two after, the Earl of Leicester propounded the matter to the Duke, and then communicated it to the Earls of Arundel, and Pembroke, who thereupon, together with Throgmorton, wrote Letters to the Queen of Scots, commending the Duke of Norfolk to her for a Husband; the Duke himself likewise writeth to her, tendering his singular love and respect unto her. Upon this, Articles are drawn, written with Leicesters own hand, and sent to the Queen of Scots; to which if she consented, they then promised to procure, that Queen Elizabeth should give her assent, and that forthwith she should be reinvested in her Kingdom, and the Succession of England should be confirmed upon her. We may easily believe, the Queen of Scots was not hardly drawn to give consent to her own desire; but in the mean time, the Duke had imparted to the Lord Lumley, the whole proceeding, and had much ado to get the Earl of Leicesters consent, that he might advise of it with some other of his Friends; yet a little after, he opened the matter to Cecil also.

E The rumour of this Marriage was soon come to the Queens Ears; which the Duke understanding, he dealt earnestly with the Earl of Leicester, to have the matters propounded to the Queen out of hand. Leicester makes delays, and pretends causes to put it off; which Cecil seeing, he adviseth the Duke to go and acquaint the Queen with it himself. This Counsel Leicester opposed, promising to open it to the Queen, as she went in Progress. At length, at Farnham, the Duke standing by as the Queen sat at Table, she gave him a tart Admonition, That he were best take heed, upon what Pillow he reited his Head. After this, at Tibfield, Leicester fell sick, or at least counterfeited; to whom the Queen coming, and bidding him be of good cheer; he with sighs and reares craved pardon for his fault, and unfolded to her the whole story from the very beginning. Whereupon, the Queen called the Duke into the Gallery, reproving him sharply, for going about the Marriage, without acquainting her; and commanding him, upon his Allegiance, to desist. The Duke made her a free and hearty promise of obedience, and spared not to say (as if he little regarded the Queen of Scots) that his

After this, Leonard Dacres raises an Army, but is defeated, and flyeth into the Low-Countries.

Revenues in England were not much lesse then hers in Scotland; and that when he was at his House in Norwich, he thought himself in a fort, not inferior to some Kings; but notwithstanding, finding the Queens anger by her countenance, and perceiving Leicester to be in a manner quite alienated, and most of the Nobility also, as scarcely saluting him when they met him, he grew extremely dejected, and prepared presently to leave the Court, meaning to stay at Norfolk, till by his friends intercession, and his own submissive Letters, the Queens heart might be mollified towards him: Mean while, the Court was suspiciously fearful, lest he should raise Rebellion, and (they say) it was concluded, that if he did so, the Queen of Scots should presently be made away. And now the Duke, who held secret commerce by Letters with the Bishop of Ross, Throgmorton and Leicester, (for they were sent to and fro in bottles) being examined touching the marriage of the Queen of Scots, and certain secret conferences with the Bishop of Ross, confessed most of the Objections, and was thereupon committed to the Tower, under the custody of Sir Henry Nevill; within two days after the Bishop of Ross, likewise is examined, and together with the Florentine Robert Ridolph is delivered to the custody of Sir Francis Walsingham, the Earl of Pembroke is confined to his house, and examined privately; but his confession was not committed to writing: It being his Request, because he could not write himself. At this time, the rumour of Insurrection in the North, begun in Autumn before, grew very strong, by reason of some frequent meetings of the Earls of Northumberland, Westmerland, and others, who thereupon being upon their Allegiance sent for to repair presently to the Queen, make delays (for they stayed waiting for supplies, both from the Scots, and from the Duke D'Alva) when the Earl of Northumberland, doubtful what to do, was frightened of purpose by his servants, telling him, that men in Arms were near at hand to apprehend him; Who thereupon in a tempestuous night, riseth out of his Bed, and in great fear gets into his Park at Topcliffe, and the night following to Braspen, to the Earl of Westmerlands House, where a great many were met that were acquainted with the Enterprize: Here they broke forth in an open Rebellion, being pressed forward, by one Nicholas Morton, a Romish Priest, sent by the Pope to pronounce Queen Elizabeth an Heretic: and thereto to have utterly lost all Right of Sovereignty: By and by they send forth a Writing, wherein they declare that they had taken Arms for no other end, but that the Religion of their fore-Fathers might be restored, wicked Counsellors removed from the Queen, the Duke of Norfolk, and others of the loyal Nobility relieved, who were now in disgrace; but towards the Queen, professing themselves most dutiful Subjects: withall they send Letters to the Papists all the Kingdom over, requiring them to come to their assistance; but they were so far from joyning with them, that many sent both the Letters and the bearers of them to the Queen, and afforded their aids and purses against them; no lesse then the best Protestants, even the Duke of Norfolk himself was not backward in it.

These Rebels go first to Durham, where they tear in pieces all the Bibles and Books of Common-Prayer they could finde in Churches of the English tongue: when they had been twelve days in Rebellion, they numbred their Army, and could not reckon above six hundred Horse, and four thousand Foot: whereupon being certainly informed, that the Earl of Sussex with seven thousand, and the Earl of Warwick with twelve, were setting out against them, they betook themselves to Rabie, the chief House of the Earl of Westmerland; going from thence, they besieged Barnard Castle, which for lack of Provision, was yielded to them. At which time being proclaimed Tyrants, and hearing a fresh of the great Forces that were coming against them, the two Earls with a small Company, get presently into Scotland, hard by where the Earl of Northumberland hid himself at Harlow, in a poor Cottage, amongst the Grahams (famous Robbers) who afterwards betrayed him to the Earl of Murray: Westmerland made a shift to get into the Low-Countries, where he had a slender Pension from the King of Spain, and there lived even to old age. Of the rest, for terror and examples sake, there were hanged at Durham, threescore and six of the chief; amongst whom, Plumtree a noted Priest. At York were executed, Simon Digby, John Fulthorp, Thomas Bishop, Robert Penman; and at London a few months after, Christopher and Thomas; and some other in other places. After this, the heads of the Rebels being convicted of High-Treason, were proscribed; namely, Charles Earl of Westmerland; Thomas Earl of Northumberland; Anne Countess of Northumberland; Edward Dacres of Morton; John Nevill of Leverage; John Swinburn, Thomas Markenfield, Egremont Ratcliffe, Brother to the Earl of Sussex; Christopher Nevill, Richard Norton, Christopher Marmaduke, Robert and Michael Tempest, George Stafford, and forty others of good account. Out of the ashes of this Rebellion, a new fire was kindled at Naworth in Cumberland, by Leonard Dacres, second Son to the Lord Dacres of Gylisland; He was a Party with the Earls in their Rebellion; but they breaking forth sooner then he expected, and he at that time being at the Court, and there admitted to kiss the Queens hand, rendered his service to go against them; and to that purpose, was sent home; but in his Journey (branding himself with a double disloyalty) he consulted with the Rebels, and encouraged them to go on; and by virtue of Letters of Credence from the Queen, he surprised the Castle of Greystock, and other Houses of the Dacres, and gathered together an Army of three thousand men: But being encountered by the Baron of Hunsdon, after a great fight, wherein, though he were crook-backed, he behaved himself valiantly, he was put to flight, and fled into Scotland, from whence soon after, he passed over the Low-Countries, and in great misery and poverty, died at Louwain.

Q. Elizabeth assisteth the Protestants in France.

A But though the Queen were thus intangled with Rebellions at home, yet she was not careless of the afflicted Protestants in France; for she stirred up the Protestant Princes to defend the common Cause; supplied them with money, taking in pawn the Queen of Navar's Jewels; and gave leave to Henry Chamberlain to lead into France a Troop of a hundred Horse, Gentlemen all, and Voluntaries; amongst whom were Philip Butted, Francis Barkley, and Walter Rawleigh, a very young man, who now begin to look into the world. But as the Queen of England assisted the French, so in revenge thereof, the King of France meant to assist the Scots, but that he was taken away by death.

There was at this time a Rebellion in Ireland also, raised by Edmund and Peter, Brothers to Boteler Earl of Ormond; but after many outrages by them committed, the Earl of Ormond first by persuasions, obtained of them to submit themselves; and when notwithstanding they were committed to prison, he then obtained of the Queen they should not be called to the Bar, being exceedingly grieved that any of his Blood should be attainted of Rebellion. The rest of the Rebels were pursued by Sir Humphrey Gilbert, and soon dispersed.

And now the Earl of Murray, Regent of Scotland, when he had brought all things to his hearts desire, and thought himself secure, at Lithgow, riding along the street, was shot into the belly with a Bullet, beneath the Navill, and there fell down dead. The actor was a Hamilton, who did it upon a private revenge, for that Murray had forced him to part with a piece of Land which he had by his Wife; who thereupon falling Lunatick, he in a great rage committed this slaughter.

C After Murray's death, the Country being without a Regent, was cause of many disorders, Th. Carre, and Walter Scot, two principal men amongst the Scottish Borders, and devoted to the Queen of Scots, made Inroads into England, waisting all places with Fire and Sword, till by Forces sent out of England, under the Command of the Earl of Sussex, and the Lord Hunsdon, they were defeated: In whose pursuit, three hundred Villages were fired, and above fifty Holds were overturned. For which service the Earl made many Knights, as Sir Williams Drury, Sir Thomas Manners, Sir George Carie, Sir Robert Constable and others, and then returned. And now to prevent further disorders, the Lords of Scotland being ready to assemble about the election of a new Regent, they asked Counsel of Queen Elizabeth in the matter; but she making answer she would not meddle in it, because she would not be thought to work any thing prejudicial to the Queen of Scots, whose cause was not yet tried; they created Matthew Earl of Lenox Regent; which Queen Elizabeth did the better like, as conceiving he could not choose out of natural affection, but have a special care of the young King, being his Grand-child.

But while Queen Elizabeth favoured the Kings party in Scotland, the Earl of Huntley, the Duke of Castle-Herald, and the Earl of Argyle, (the Queen of Scots Lieutenants) imploy the Lord Seton to the Duke D'Alva, requiring him for many great reasons, to vindicate the Queen of Scots liberty, alledging how acceptable a Work it would be to all Christian Princes, and to the whole Catholick Church: Whereunto the Duke made answer, They should find him ready to the uttermost of his power to satisfy their request. At which time also the French King dealt earnestly with Queen Elizabeth to the same purpose; and the Spanish Embassadour in his Masters name urged it no less extremely: but Queen Elizabeth assailed with all these Importunities, made answer, That as she would omit nothing that might serve for the Reconciling of the Queen of Scots and her Subjects, so she must have leave to provide for her own and her Subjects safety; a thing which Nature, Reason, and her own Honour required at her hands. And now when these Princes prevailed not with Queen Elizabeth to set the Queen of Scots at liberty, out comes Pope Pius Quintus with his Bull Declaratory, which he caused to be fastned in the night-time upon the Gate of the Bishop of London's Palace, wherein all her Subjects are absolved from their Oath of Allegiance, or any other duty; and all that obey her, accursed with Anathema. He that fastned up the Bull was one John Felton, who never fled for the matter, but as affecting Martyrdom, suffered himself to be apprehended, confessed and justified the Fact, and thereupon arraigned, was condemned and hanged near the place where he had fastned the Writing.

The same day that Felton was arraigned, the Duke of Norfolk seeming now extream penitent for his Fault, and utterly to abhor the Marriage, was delivered out of the Tower, and suffered to go to his own House, but yet to be in the custody of Sir Henry Nevill still. Indeed Cecil being a good Friend to the Duke, had told the Queen, That the Law of 25 of Edward the Third could not take hold upon him; and now being in a kind of liberty, Cecil deals earnestly with him to marry (pecuniarily some other, thereby to take away all suspicion in that behalf; yet some again thought that this liberty of the Dukes was granted him on purpose to bring him into greater danger.

At this time died William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, the grand-child of an Earl of Pembroke, yet the Son but of an Equire, and Grand-father to Philip Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery now living, who lieth buried in Pauls, under a fair Monument of Marble, with an Inscription testifying his great deservings while he lived.

Many Conspiracies were at this time to set the Queen of Scots at liberty; amongst others, there Conspired Thomas and Edward Stanley younger Sons of the Earl of Derby with others; but the matter discovered, they were soon suppressed, and some of them executed. And now the Lords of the Queen of Scots Party continuing to protect the English Rebels, the Earl of Sussex once again, accompanied with the Lord Scroop, entrench Scotland, burneth the Villages all along the Valley of Annandale; and compelleth the Duke of Castle-Herald, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, under under a Writing signed with their own Hands and Seals; to forsake the English Rebels. Whereupon the Earl of Stafford returned home, he made these Knights, Edw. Hastings, Francis Russell, Valentine Brown, William Hilton, Robert Stapleton, Henry Carwen, and Simon Mansgrave.

Queen Elizabeth's mind being now in great suspension, by reason of that Bull from Rome, and the late conspiracy in Norfolk, sent Sir William Cecil, and Sir Walter Mildmay, to the Queen of Scots, who was then at Chatsworth in Derbyshire, to consult with her by what means the breach in Scotland might best be made up, she re-invested in her former dignity and her Son, and Queen Elizabeth might be secured. The Queen of Scots did little deplore her own afflicted condition, putting her self wholly upon the Queens clemency: when the Commissioners made unto her certain Propositions of Agreement: First, That the Treaty of Edenborough should be confirmed: Then, that she should renounce her Right and Title to England, during Queen Elizabeth's life, or any Children of her Body lawfully begotten: Then, that she should send her Son for a Hostage into England, with other six Hostages: such as the Queen should nominate: Then, that the Castles of Hume and East-castle, should be held by the English for three years; with some other. To which Propositions the Queen of Scots for the present gave a provident answer; but referred the fuller Answer to the Bishop of Ross her Ambassador in England, and some other Delegates; who afterwards allowing some of the Propositions, and not allowing others; the Treaty came to nothing, but the matter rested in the state it was before.

At this time Philip King of Spain had contracted a Marriage with Anne of Austria, Daughter to the Emperour Maximilian, his own Niece by his Sister; who was now setting Sail from Zealand, towards Spain; when Queen Elizabeth, to testify her love and respect to the House of Austria, sent Sir Charles Howard with the Navy Royal, to conduct her through the British Sea.

The seven-teenth day of November began to be celebrated in honour of Queen Elizabeth's coming to the Crown.

The Earl of Thames intending a rebellion, is strangely discovered. A guilty Conscience betrays its self.

Sir William Cecil is made Baron of Burghley.

Queen Elizabeth requirith the Scottish Lords, to shew her what cause they had deposed their Queen; and what was done in it.

And now was the twelfth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign finished: which certain Wizards had made Papists believe should be her last: but contrary, as if it were but her first, a new Custom began, of celebrating the seventeenth day of November (the Anniversary day of her Reign) with ringing of Bells, Tiltings and Bonfires: which Custom, as it now began, so it was never given over as long as the lived, and is not yet forborn so long after her death.

At this time in Ireland, Connagher O'Brien, Earl of Thomond, not brooking the severe Government of Edward Fitton, President of Connaght, entered into consultation with some few, to raise a new Rebellion; which, being at the point ready to break forth, was strangely discovered: for the day before they meant to take up Arms, Fitton knowing not at all of the matter, sent the Earl word in friendly manner, that the next day he and a few friends with him, would be his Guests. The Earl convinced by his own Conscience, imagined that his Intentments were revealed: that Fitton would come as an enemy, rather than a Guest. Out of which fear, he presently set sail into France; where repenting him seriously of his fault, he confessed the whole business to Norris the Queens Ambassador in France; and by his intercession, was afterward pardoned and restored.

In January, the thirteenth year of her Reign, Queen Elizabeth in Royal pomp entering the City of London, went to see the Burse which Sir Thomas Gresham had lately built for the use of the Merchants; and with sound of Trumpets, and the voice of a Herald, solemnly named it the Royal Exchange. A few days after, for his many great Services, she made Sir William Cecil Baron Burghley.

There were now about the Scottish affairs, in the name of the King of Scots, the Earl Morton, Pernare Abbot of Dunfermlin, and James Mac-Gray; whom when Queen Elizabeth required to shew more clearly, for what causes they had deposed the Queen; they exhibited a long and tedious Commentary; wherein with a certain insolent liberty, they endeavoured to prove, by the ancient Right of the Kingdom of Scotland, that the people of Scotland were above the King: and urged Calvins Authority also, That Popular Magistrates are constituted for the moderation of the licentiousness of Princes: and that it is lawful for them, both to imprison Kings; and upon just causes, to depose them. This Writing the Queen could not read without indignation; but to the Delegates she gave this Answer; She saw no just cause yet, why they should handle the Queen in such manner; and therefore willed them to think upon some course out of hand, how to allay the dissensions in Scotland. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Bacon house, Keeper of the Great Seal, a Proposition was made to the Bishop of Ross, the Bishop of Galloway, and Baron Levingston, Delegates for the Queen of Scots, that for the security of the Kingdom, and the Queen of England; it were requisite, that before the Queen of Scots should be set at liberty, the Duke of Castle-Herald, the Earl of Huntley and Argyle, the Lord Humes, Heriot, and another of the Barons should be delivered for Hostages, and the Castle of Dunbarton and Hume, yielded up into the hands of the English, for three years. But they made answer, that to yield up great Personages, and such Fortifications as were demanded, were nothing else, but to leave the miserable Queen utterly destitute of faithful friends, and naked of all places, fit for guard and defence: yet they offered, to give two Earls and two Barons for Hostages till two years were expired: which not being accepted, they straightway gathered, and spoke it openly; That now they plainly perceived the English meant to keep the Queen of Scots perpetually prisoner, and likewise to break off the Treaty; seeing they rigorously demanded such security as Scotland was not able to make good. And now Queen Elizabeth seeing that nothing could be done, for her own, the King and Queen of Scots safety, unless both Factions in Scotland consented; she held it

As that the Lords of Scotland should themselves appoint some chosen persons to compound the matter.

While matters in England proceeded in this sort, the Queens party in Scotland was hardly used: Dunbarton Fry, the strongest Castle in Scotland was taken: and J. Hamilton Archbishop of Saint Andrews, the Duke of Castle-Herald Brother, as an accessory to the murder of Darley, was hanged without being arraigned according to Law. In England, the Queen of Scots had all her Servants taken from her, except ten onely, and a Priest to say Masse: with which indignities the Queen of Scots provoked, causeth a large Commentary of her Counsels, with certain love-letters to the Duke of Norfolk, to be carried to the Pope, and the King of Spain, by Ridolphus; which being brought first to the Duke, Higford (one that waited on the Duke in his Bed-chamber) had copied out: but being commanded to burn them, he hid them under a Mat in the Dukes Bed-chamber; and that (it should seem) purposely, Ridolphus to draw on the Duke to be Head of the discontented party in England, aggravated to him the wrongs he had suffered: how against all Law he had been kept a long time in prison, and now, to his great disgrace, was not summoned to the Parliament: he exhibited to him a Catalogue of such of the Nobility, who had vowed to assist him: he shewed how the Pope, (so the Catholick Religion might be promoted) would himself undergo all the charge of the War, and had already laid down an hundred thousand Crowns; whereof himself had distributed twelve thousand amongst the English that were fled: he promised, that the King of Spain would send four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot to his Assistance; to these Reasons the Bishop of Ross added; that it was an easie matter for him to surpise the Queen; whom, when he had in his hands, he might set the Queen of Scots at liberty, and might easily obtain of Queen Elizabeth, a toleration of Religion. The former Reasons took some-what with the Duke, but this point of surpising the Queen, he abhorred, as an impious Fact, and therefore rejected as pernicious and dangerous.

In France, a little before this, was the Marriage solemnized between Charles the ninth King of France, and Elizabeth of Austria, Daughter to the Emperour of Maximilian; in gratulation whereof, Queen Elizabeth sent into France, Thomas Lord Buckhurst, who with great magnificence was received, and perhaps the more, in regard of a motion now intended to be made: for the Lord Buckhurst having in his retinue, one Guydo Cavalcantius, a Nobleman of Florence, the Queen another of France, as being a Florentine her self, had often conference with him, when he would many times say, What a happiness it would be to both the Kingdoms, if a Match were made between the Queen of England, and her Son Henry Duke of Anjou; and at last desired him to commend the motion to the Queen of England, both from her, and from her Son the King of France, as things they both exceedingly desired. The Lord Buckhurst returned, having for a present from the King of France, a Chain weighing a thousand French Crowns; and Cavalcantius at his return, made the motion to the Queen, who seemed not unwilling to hearken to it; for by this Match, there should be added to the Kingdom of England, the wealthy Dukedoms of Anjou, Burbon, Averno, and in possibility, the Kingdom of France it self. Hereupon a Treaty was held, in which the French propounded three Articles, one concerning the Coronation of the Duke; another, concerning the Joynt Administration of the Kingdom; a third, concerning a Toleration of his Religion: to which it was answered, that the two first Articles might in some sort be composed; but the third, scarce possibly: for though a contrary Religion might be tolerated, between Subjects of the same Kingdom; yet between a Wife and her Husband, it seemed very incongruous and inconvenient: Yet the matter at last came to this conclusion, That if the Duke would afford his preference with the Queen at Divine Service, and not refuse to hear and learn the Doctrine of the Church of England; he should not be compelled to use the English Rites; but at his pleasure use the Roman; not being expressly against the Word of God. But upon these Pro-Eliot, they could not accord; and so the Treaty, after it had continued almost a year, brake utterly off. It was indeed generally thought, that the Match was never really intended on either side, but that they both pretended it, for only their own ends: for the Earl of Leicester (who knew more of the Queens mind than any man,) wrote at this time to Sir Francis Walsingham, the Queens Ambassador in France, that he found the Queens inclination to cold in the matter, that though the point of Religion were fully accorded; yet she would finde one point or other to break it off.

At this time the continuance of the Duke of Norfolk's affection towards the Queen of Scots, came to be discovered by a Packet of Letters, sent by Ridolphus to the Bishop of Ross, and by Bayliff's confession (who brought the Letters) being set upon the Rack: so as the Bishop of Ross was confined to the Isle of Ely; Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gervard, and Rolfson, were cast into the Tower; and Henry Howard, who had an aspiring mind to be Archbishop, was committed to the Archbishop of Canterbury's keeping. At the same time the Queen of Scots sent money to her confederates in Scotland; which being Higford delivered to one Brown to carry, and told it was Silver; when he found by the weight that it was Gold, he began to suspect something; and thereupon went and delivered both the money and Letters to the Lords of the Council. Upon this, Higford being examined, confessed the whole matter; and withall gave notice of that Commentary also of the Queen of Scots, which is mentioned before; two days after, the Duke himself being examined, and knowing nothing what his Servants had confessed, denied every particular; and thereupon, was brought again to the Tower, by Ralph Sadler, Thomas Smith, Henry Nevill, and Doctor Wilson: And after him Baunester, who was the Dukes Counsel at Law: The Eails of

The Civilians deliver their Opinions what may be done with an Ambassador, if he prove a traitor against the State.

Arundell and Southampton; the Lord Lumley, the Lord Cobham, Henry Percy, Lowder, Powell, Goodyer, and others, are committed to Prison; who upon hope of Pardon, confessed all they knew concerning the matter. When these things, and especially the Commentary, which the Duke thought had been burnt, were shewed him, he then cried out, I am betrayed by my own Servants; not having learned to be distrustful, which is the very snare of Wisdom. And then with all submission, he besought the Lords to mediate for him to the Queen; towards whom, he protested he never had the least thought of doing any hurt.

And now seeing it appeared that the Bishop of Ross had been the whole contriver of the business, it was deliberated what to do with him, because he was an Ambassador. Hereupon divers Civilians are called; as David Lewis, Val-nine Dale, William Drury, William Aubrey, and Henry Jones; of whom these questions were asked:

First, Whether an Ambassador who raises the Rebellion against that Prince to whom he is an Ambassador, may enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador, and is not liable to Punishment? They answered, That such an Ambassador hath forfeited the Privileges of an Ambassador, and is liable to punishment.

Secondly, Whether the Minister or Proctor of a Prince, who is deposed by publick Authority, and in whose room another is Inaugurated, may enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador? They answered, That if such a Prince be lawfully deposed, his Proctor cannot challenge the Privileges of an Ambassador, forasmuch as none but absolute Princes, and such as have Right of Majesty, can appoint Ambassadors.

Thirdly, Whether a Prince who is come into another Princes Countrey, and held in Custody, may have his Proctor; and if he shall be held an Ambassador? They answered, If such a Prince have not lost his Sovereignty, he may have his Proctor; but whether that Proctor shall be reputed as an Ambassador or no, this dependeth upon the Authority of his Delegation.

Fourthly, Whether if a Prince gave warning to such a Proctor, and to his Prince who is under custody, that this Proctor shall not from henceforth be accounted for an Ambassador; whether that Proctor may by Law challenge the Privilege of an Ambassador? They answered, A Prince may forbid an Ambassador to enter into his Kingdom, and may command him to depart the Kingdom, if he contain not himself within his due limits; yet in the mean while he is to enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador.

What the Bishop of Ross pleads for himself.

Upon these Answers, the Bishop of Ross is warned by the Lords of the Council, That he shall no longer be esteemed an Ambassador, but be punished as his fault shall deserve. The Bishop alleged for himself, That he had not violated the Right of an Ambassador Via Juris, but Via Facti, (to use his own words) and therefore adviseth them, not to use harder measure to him, than was used to the English Ambassadors, Throgmorton in France, Randall and Tammworth in Scotland; who had raised rebellions there, and were open Abettors of the same; and yet had no greater punishment, than to be gone at a time limited. When they began to urge him what the English had testified against him, he lovingly requested them to give no credit to it; forasmuch as by received custom, which hath the force of a Law, the Testimony of an English man against a Scot, or of a Scot against an English man, is not to be admitted: But after some altercations, the Bishops led away to the Tower, and kept close Prisoner.

Matthew Earl of Lenox, Regent of Scotland, is murdered. In his place is set the Earl of Mar, who dyed within thirteen months.

At this very season, Matthew Earl of Lenox, Regent of Scotland, the Kings Grand-father, was by the adverse party set upon at unawares; who having yielded himself to David Spense of Wormist, (that was then careful to defend him) together with him, was slain by Bell and Caulder; when with great industry he had governed the Kingdom for his Grand-child about fourteen months. In whose room, John Ereskin, Earl of Mar, by common consent of the Kings Faction, was chosen Regent of Scotland; who being a man of a quiet disposition, through extreme grief of the many troubles he sustained in the place, departed this life when he had governed thirteen months.

And now a Parliament was held at Westminster; wherein, besides a Law for preventing of the treacherous endeavours of seditious Subjects, another Law was made, That if any one during the Queens life, by Books written or printed, shall expressly affirm, That any is, or ought to be the Heir or Successor of the Queen, (besides the natural Offspring of her Body) or shall to that purpose publish, print, or dissease any Book or Schedules; he, and his favourers, shall for the first offence suffer a years imprisonment, and the loss of one half of his Goods: and if they offend again, they shall be in a Præmunire. A Law also was made, by which to be reconciled to the See of Rome, was made Treason; and it was pronounced against the Queen of Scots, That if she offended again against the Laws of England, it might be lawful to question her, as the Wife of a Peer of the Kingdom of England. But here the Queen interposed her Authority, and would not suffer it to be enacted. About this time, in May, a solemn Tilting was performed at Westminster; where the Challengers were Edward Earl of Oxford, Charles Howard, Sir Henry Lee, and Christopher Hatton Esquire; who all did very valiantly, but the Earl of Oxford best.

As soon as the Parliament was dissolved, a Consultation was held, Whether John Story, Doctor of the Laws, the Duke D'Alva's Searcher (who sometime before, was by a Wile brought into England) being an English man born; and having in Brabant consulted with a forain Prince, about the John Story Doctor of the Laws, executed for Treason, and why.

A the invading of England, were to be held guilty of high Treason? It was resolved affirmatively: whereupon he is called to the Bar, and indicted of Treason: That he had conspired with one Prishall a Conjuror, to make away the Queen: That he cursed her daily, when he said Grace at Table: That he shewed a way to the Secretary of Duke D'Alva, how to invade England, &c. Where he affirming, that the Judges had no power to meddle with him, for that he belonged not to the Queen of England, but was the King of Spains sworn Subject; is nevertheless condemned by the Form of Nihil dicit (forasmuch as no man can renounce the Country wherein he was born, nor abjure his Prince at his own pleasure) and finally executed after the manner of Traytors.

Ireland at this time was indifferent quiet; for Sir John Perce, President of Munster, had brought James Fitz Morris to submit himself, and crave pardon. Sidney the Lord Deputy returned into England, and Sir William Fitz William, who had married his Sister, succeeded in his room.

It was now the fifteenth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign; when Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, on the sixteenth day of January, was brought to his Tryal at Westminster-hall; where (as at Commissioners, George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury (made high Steward of England for that day) Rensel Gray, Earl of Kent; Thomas Ratcliff, Earl of Sussex; Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon; Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford; Henry Herbert, Earl of Pembroke; Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford; Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick; Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; Walter Devereux, Viscount of Hereford; Edward Lord Clinton, Admirall; William Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain; William Cecil, Lord Burley Secretary; Arthur, Lord Gray of Wilton; James Blunt, Lord Montjoy; William Lord Sands; Thomas Lord Wentworth; William Lord Borough; Lewis Lord Mordant; John Pawlet, Lord St. John of Basing; Robert Lord Rich; Roger Lord North; Edmund Bruges, Lord Chandos; Oliver Lord St. John of Bleisho; Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst; and William West, Lord de la Ware. After silence bidden, Sir Owen Hopton, Lieutenant of the Tower, is commanded to bring the Duke to the Bar; and then the Clerk of the Crown said, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, late of Keningale, in the County of Norfolk, Hold up thy hand; which done, the Clerk with a loud voyce readeth the crimes laid to his charge: That in the eleventh year of the Queens Reign, he had trayterously conspired to make her away, and to bring in forraign Forces for invading the Kingdom: Also, That he dealt with the Queen of Scots concerning Marriage, contrary to his promise made to the Queen under his hand-writing: Also, That he relieved with money, the Earls of Northumberland and Westmerland, that had stirred up Rebellion against the Queen: Also, That in the 13th year of the Queens Reign, he implored Auxiliary Forces of Pope Pius the fifth, the Queens professed Enemy, of the King of Spain, and the Duke D'Alva, for the freeing of the Queen of Scots, and restoring of the Popish Religion: And lastly, That he sent supply to the Lord Herle, and other the Queens enemies in Scotland.

These Indictments being read, the Clerk demanded of the Duke, if he were guilty of these crimes, or not? Here the Duke requested he might be allowed to have Counsel But Catiline, chief Justice, made answer, That it was not lawful. Yet (saith the Duke) I have heard that Humphrey Stafford, in the Reign of King Henry the seventh, in a Case of Treason, had one assigned to plead for him. To which Dyer, chief Justice of the Common Pleas, made answer, That Stafford had Counsel assigned him concerning the Right of Sanctuary, from whence he was taken by force; but in the Indictment of Treason, he pleaded his own cause. After this, the Duke yielding to be tried by the Peers; first Barham, Serjeant at Law, then Gerrard the Queens Attorney; and lastly, Bromley, the Queens Solicitor, enforced the crimes objected against him: to all which, the Duke made colourable answers; but most of them being proved by sufficient testimony, he asked upon occasion, Whether the Subjects of another Prince, who is confederate, and in league with the Queen, are to be accounted enemies? to which Catiline answered, They were; and that the Queen of England might wage War with any Duke of France, and yet hold firm peace with the French King. When it grew towards night, the Lord High Steward demanded of the Duke, if he had any more to say for himself: who answered, I rely upon the equity of the Laws. After this, the Lords withdrawing a while, and then returning, the Lord Steward beginning at the lowermost, asked them, My Lord de la Ware, is Thomas Duke of Norfolk, guilty of these crimes of High Treason, for which he is called in question? He rising up, and laying his hand upon his breast, answered, Guilty: in like manner they answered all. After this, the Lord Steward with tears in his eyes, pronounced sentence in form as is used. A few dayes after were Barnes and Mather executed, who conspired with one Herle, to make away certain of the Counsellors, and to free the Duke; but Herle revealed the business presently, to whom Barnes (when he saw his accuser brought forth) smitingly said, Herle, thou wert but one hour before me, else I had been in thy place for the accuser, and thou in my room to be hanged: At the same time with them was hanged also Henry Rolf, for counterfeiting the Queens hand. But though the Duke were now condemned, yet the Queen was so tender of his case, that it was four months after before he was executed at 11, on the second of June, at eight of the clock in the morning, he was brought to the Scaffold upon Tower-Hill, and there beheaded.

At this time, and upon this occasion, a Parliament was Assembled, wherein amongst other Laws, it was Enacted, That if any man shall go about to free any person imprisoned by the Queens express Commandment, for Treason or suspicion of Treason, and not yet Arraigned, he shall lose all his goods for his life-time; and be imprisoned during the Queens pleasure; if the said person person having been arraigned, the Rescuer shall forfeit his life; if condemned, he shall be guilty of Rebellion.

In the time of this Parliament, the Queen created Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, being before but Viscount Hersford; because he was defended by his Great-grand-mother, from the Bonrehiere, and made the 1st Lord Clinton (who had large Revenues in Lincolnshire) Earl of Lincoln; Also the called forth John Pawlet of Basing, the Marquess of Winchesters Son, Henry Compton, Hen. Cheyney, and Henry Norris, for Barons by Summons.

Within ten dayes after the Dukes death, William Lord De la Ware, Sir Ralph Sadler, Tho. Wilson, Doctor of the Laws, and Thomas Bromley the Queens Solicitor, were sent to the Queen of Scots, to expostulate with her, That she had usurped the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of England, and had not renounced the same, according to the agreement of the Treaty at Edinburgh; That she had endeavoured the marriage of the Duke of Norfolk, without acquainting the Queen, and had used all forcible means to free him out of prison; had raised the Rebellion in the North, had relieved the Rebels both in Scotland, and in the Low-Countries; had implored Aids from the Pope, the King of Spain and others; had conspired with certain of the English to free her out of Prison, and declare her Queen of England; Lastly, that she had procured the Popes Bull against the Queen, and suffered her self to be publicly named the Queen of England in Forraign Countries: All which accusations she either absolutely denied, or else fairly extenuated: and though (as she said) she were a free Queen, and not subject to any Creature; yet she was content, and requested, that she might make her personal answer at the next Parliament.

About this time, the King of Spain by his Ambassador here, complained to the Queen, that the Rebels of the Netherlands were harboured and entertained in England, contrary to the Articles of the League; whereupon the Queen set forth a severe Proclamation, That all the Dutch, who could any wayes be suspected of Rebellion, should presently depart the Realm, which yet turned little to D'Alvas, or the King of Spain's benefit: For hereupon, Comte Fander-Mark, and other Dutch going out of England surprised the Brill first, then Flushing, and afterwards drew other Towns to revolt, and in a short time excluded the Duke D'Alva in a manner from the Sea. And this error, to suffer the Protestant party to get possession of the Sea-Towns, hath been the cause they have been able to hold out, even all this long time, against the King of Spain. And now many Military men having little to do at home, got them into the Netherlands, some to Duke D'Alva, but the far greater number to the Prince of Orange: The first of whom was Thomas Morgan, who carried three hundred English to Flushing; then followed by his procurement nine Companies more under the conduct of Hamphrey Gilbert; and afterward it became the Nursery of all our English Souldiers.

At this time Charles the French King setting his mind wholly (at least seeming so) upon the Low-Country War, concluded a Peace, entered into a League with Queen Elizabeth; which was to remain firm, not only during their two lives, but between their Successors also, if the Successor signified to the Survivor within a year, that he accepteth it, otherwise to be at liberty. It was likewise agreed, what aid by Sea or Land, they should each of them afford to other upon occasion. And for ratification of this League, Edward Clinton Earl of Lincoln, and Admiral of England, was sent into France, with whom went the Lord Dacres, Rich. Talbot, Sandis, and others. The French King likewise sent the Duke of Memurancy, and Paul Foix into England, with a great Train; that the Queen in the presence of them, and the Ambassador in Ordinary, might wear to the League, which she did at Westminster, the seventeenth of May, in the year 1572. The day after, she made Memurancy Knight of the Garter.

Memurancy whilst he tarried in England, made intercession in his Kings name, that what favour could be without danger, might be shewed to the Queen of Scots; and then made much ado again about the marriage with the Duke of Anjou; but being hopeles to make conclusion thereof, by reason of the diversity of Religion, he returned into France; for now was great provision making ready for the marriage, between Henry King of Navarre, and the Lady Margaret the French Kings Sister; to which Solemnity, with notable dissimulation, the Queen of Navarre, and the chief of all the Protestants were assured, being born in hand, that there should be a renovation of love, and a perpetual Peace established. The Earl of Leicester likewise, and the Lord Burleigh, were invited out of England, and out of Germany, the Sons of the Prince Elector Palatine, under colour of honour, but indeed, that they might be intrapped, and they, and together with them the Protestant Religion, at one blow, if not clean cut off, yet receive a deadly wound: For the marriage being celebrated, there presently followed that cruel Massacre at Paris, and the terrible slaughter of the Protestants, throughout all the Cities of France; but to set a shew of equity upon the Faith, Edicts and Proclamations were presently set forth, that the Protestants had plotted a wicked conspiracy against the King, the Queen Mother, the Brethren, the King of Navarre, and the Princess of the Blood-Royal; and to keep the thing in memory, Coyn was presently stamped, upon the one side whereof was the Kings Picture with this Inscription Virtus in Rebelle, on the other side, Pietas excitavit justitiam; But the King of France, notwithstanding all the shew he made of Piety, escaped not the Divine revenge; for before the year came about, he fell sick of a bloody Flix, and afterwards with long and grievous torments ended his life.

A little before this Mota Fenell, Ambassador to the King of France, being in England, by virtue of an Order from the Queen Mother of France, propoundeth to Queen Elizabeth at Kew worth (two dayes before the Massacre in that Kingdom) the marriage of her youngest Son Francis Duke

A Duke of Alencon (for the Queen Mother had been told by some cunning men, that all her Sons should be Kings, and she knew no way for it but this.) But Queen Elizabeth, by reason of the disparity of ages, modestly excused her self, for he was scarce seventeen years old, and she was now past eight and thirty; yet she promised to consider of it, and Alencon did not leave to prosecute the suit.

At this time, Thomas Percy, Earl of Northumberland, who first rebelled, and afterwards fled into Scotland, was for a sum of money delivered by the Earl of Morton, to the Lord Hunsdon, Governor of Berwick; and a while after was beheaded at Tork. And now as these two great Personages, the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Northumberland were taken away by a violent death, to three other great Personages were at this time taken away by a natural death: First William Percy, who from a private man came by degrees to be Marquess of Winchester; lived to the age of within three years of a hundred, and could reckon a hundred and three of his Children, and his Childrens Issues, after he had held the place of Lord Treasurer of England, above twenty years; in whose room succeeded Sir William Cecil, Lord Burleigh; Then died Edmund Earl of Darby, famous as well for his Hospitality and good House-keeping, as for his skill in Surgery, and Bone-setting; Then died Sir William Pater, who being ascended from an honest stock at Exeter in Devonshire, was Privy Counsellor, and Secretary to King Henry the Eighth, King Edward the Sixth, Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, who planted himself in Essex, where he purchased great possessions; whose Son John was by King James made Baron of Writtle in that Country.

And now Queen Elizabeth having formerly borrowed money of her Subjects, she thankfully repaid in, which won her no less love, than if she had given it, and more love she gained also at this time by two Proclamations, by one of which she commanded Noble men to observe the Law of keeping retainers; by the other, she restrained Informers, who under colour of spying out Crown-land, concealed by private persons, surreptitiously seized upon the Lands of Parish-Churches, and Alms-houses, piously endowed by the Queens Ancestors. And more Love and Honour also she gained at this time by two Acts of Justice; the one, that she satisfied the English Merchants out of the goods which were detained belonging to the Dutch, and restored the rest to the Duke D'Alva, and made a full satisfaction with the Merchants of Genova, for the money intercepted; the other, that she freed England at this time, of the debts which her Father and her Brother had run into in forraign parts, and were increased by yearly interest, and caused the obligations of the City of London, which had lo often been renewed to be given in, to the great rejoicing of the Citizens.

The Spanish Affairs growing now very turbulent in the Netherlands, Flushing lost, the Towns of Willem revolted, and the Spanish Navy vanquished by the Zealanders, Duke D'Alva against his will, began to throw more hindrels towards the English, to assist in the month of January, the Trade which in Anno 1568. had been forbidden, was now allowed again between the Dutch and the English for two years; but those two years expired, the English removed their Trading to the confederate States.

The last year in the month of November, a Daughter was born to the French King, to whom he dedicated Queen Elizabeth to be God-mother, who thereupon sent William Somerset Earl of Worcester into France, with a Pont of massy Gold to stand as her Deputy at the Christning. Hereupon, she for that, the Queen promised to observe the League strictly, the French King and the Queen Mother began to affect her more and more, and the Duke D'Alencon wrote sundry Love-letters to her, and the French King and his Mother interceded for the marriage with all earnestness. It is true, the Queens conceived divers Reasons why it was fit for her to marry; but the Courtiers for their own ends dissuaded her as much from it; at last the Queen Mother of France was wonderful importunate, that her Son Alencon might have leave to come and see her; whereunto, being wearied with continual Letters and Messages, she gave her consent; but upon condition, that he should not take it for any disgrace to him, if he returned without obtaining his Suit: But as soon as Queen Elizabeth had notice, that his Brother Henry was elected King of Poland, and that the King of France was very sick, she gave intimation to Alencon by Edward Harley Governour of the Isle of Wight, that he should not make too much haste into England; but should first procure a Peace by some means or other in France, and declare by some notable Argument, his good will towards the Protestants, thereby to be the more welcome Guest into England. Hereupon a Peace was concluded in France, and in certain places the Protestants were allowed to exercise their Religion; and then again the French King and the Queen Mother used all their endeavour to have the marriage go forward (for they were very desirous that Alencon who was of a crooked and perverse disposition, and prone to raise tumults) might be removed out of France; and withall, they requested Queen Elizabeth, that if the Duke of Anjou took his Voyage into Poland by Sea; he might have publick caution to sail through the British Ocean. To this last Request, she not only consented with all alacrity, but also made offer of a Fleet to conduct him thither. In the mean while, Alencon fell sick of the Meazles, which his Mother signified to Queen Elizabeth by Count Rhuz, excusing him thereupon for not coming into England as he had determined. The Count found the Queen at Canterbury, where she gave him Royal entertainment; and Maitton Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, Royal entertainment to them both.

All this while, since the death of the Earl of Morre, there had been no Regent in Scotland, but now by the procurement of Queen Elizabeth chiefly, James Douglas, Earl of Morton, is made Regent; who, when his Authority in a Parliamentary Assembly was established Enacted many profitable fitable Laws for the defence of Religion against Papists and Hereticks, in the name of the King. But the protection and keeping of the Kings Person, he confirmed to Alexander Breshkin, Earl of Marre (to whom the custody of the Kings tender years, by special privilege belonged) though he were himself in his Minority: Upon these Conditions: That no Papist, nor factious persons should be admitted to his presence: An Earl should come with only two Servants attending him: A Baron, with only one: All other single and every one unnamed: The French King in the meantime, sent his Ambassador Adonfir Pyran, to corrupt the Earl of Albion, and Hansley with large promises, to oppose the Regent: Queen Elizabeth as much laboured to defend him: but through by the Ministry of Kilgrew, the Lord James Hamilton Duke of Chiffli Herald, and George Chardon Earl of Huntley, and the most eminent of that Faction, upon indifferent conditions, to acknowledge the Regent, yet William Kircaldy, Lord Granage, (who had when he was Regent, had made Covenant with Edinburgh Castle) the Lord Hume, Lydington, the Bishop of Dundee, and others, would by no means admit of the Regents Government, but held that Castle, and fortified it to the Queen of Scots name, having Lydington for their Counsellor here, and trusting to the natural strength of the place, and to the Duke D'Alva, and the Kings promises, to send them supplies both of men and money: Now when these persons could by no means be drawn to accept of Conditions of Peace, and to deliver up the Castle to the Regent, Queen Elizabeth (who could in no case induce the French in Scotland) suffered her length to be inured by the Regent, to send Forces, Guns and Ammunition, for assaulting the Castle, upon certain Conditions, whereof one was, that ten Hostages should be sent into England, to be security for returning the Men and Munition, which by the Condition hazard of War, they should chance to miscarry. The Conditions being agreed on: William Drury, Marshall of the Garrison at Burgh, with some great Ordinance, and fifteen hundred Soldiers (amongst whom were some Noble Volunteers, George Carle, Henry Carr, Thomas Ochiltree, Henry Le, William Kircaldy, Shuton, Caton, Kilgrew, William Kilgrew, and others, entered into Scotland, and besieged the Castle, which after three and thirty dayes siege, was delivered up to the Regent for the Kings use: All the persons that were in it: amongst whom, Kircaldy, Lord Granage, and James his Brother, Musman and Cock Goldsmiths (who had counterfeited Coins in the Castle) were hanged: though to redeem Granges life, a member of the Family of the Kirkcaldys, offered themselves in perpetual Servitude to the Regent, besides an annual Pension of three thousand Marks, and twenty thousand pounds of Scottish money in present, and to put to execution, that from henceforth he should continue in duty and homage to the King: but it would not be accepted. Hume and the rest were spared, through Queen Elizabeths merciful intercession: Lydington was sent to Leith, where he dyed, and was suspected to be poisoned: A man of the greatest understanding in the Scottish Nation, and of an excellent wit, but very variable: for which, George Buchanan called him the Chamelion.

And now from this time Scotland began to breathe after long Civil Wars, and to with the remains of both parties, as the Soldiers, betook themselves into Swedenland, France, and the Low Countries, where they valorously behaved themselves, and won great commendation. As for John Leslie, Bishop of Ross, he was now set at liberty, but commanded to depart presently out of Scotland, and being beyond the Sea, he continued still to solicit his Masters the Queen of Scots cause, with the Emperor, the Pope, the French King, and the German Princes of the Popish Religion, who all led him on with fair promises, but performed nothing: For indeed, he in whom he had greatest confidence, which was the Duke of D'Alva, was at that time called away, partly out of jealousy of State, as being thought to grow too great, and partly out of opinion, that by his cruelty he made the people to revolt: and therefore in his place was sent Ladovick Zuniga, a man of great Nobility in Spain, but of a more peaceable disposition than D'Alva: and now this man did all good Offices to win Queen Elizabeth to him, and minding his own affairs only, would not intermeddle with the Scottish or English matters.

About this time, a frantick opinion was held by one Peter Boucher, a Gentleman of the Middle Temple, that it was lawful to kill them that opposed the truth of the Gospel: and so far was he possessed with this opinion, that he assaulted the famous Seaman Captain Hawkins, and wounded him with a Dagger, taking him for Hutton, who at that time was in great favour with the Queen, and of her Privy Council, whom he had been informed to be a great Adversary to Innovations. The Queen grew to angry hereat, that she commanded Martial Law should be executed upon him presently, till her Councils advised her, that Martial Law was not to be used, but in the Field, and in turbulent times: but at home, and in time of Peace, there must be legal proceedings: Hereupon Boucher was sent to the Tower, where taking a brand out of the fire, he struck it into the brains of one of his Keepers, named Hugh Longworth, and killed him: for which fact, he was condemned of murder, had his right hand cut off, and nailed to the Gallows, and then himself hanged.

After the violent death of this Varlet, we may speak of the natural death of two great persons: First, William Lord Howard of Effingham, Son of that Warlike Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, by his second Wife Agnis Tilney. This William was made a Baron by Queen Mary, and Lord High Admiral of England, and by Queen Elizabeth Lord Chamberlain, till such time, that being taken with age, he yielded up that place to the Earl of Suffex, and was then made Keeper of the Privy Seal, which is the fourth degree of Honour in England. His Son Charles succeeded him in the Dignity of his Barony, who was after made Lord Chamberlain to the Queen.

A Queen, and then Lord High Admirall of England. A while after him dyed Reginald Gray Earl of Kent, whom the Queen a year before of a private man had made Earl of Kent, when as that Title, from the death of Richard Gray Earl of Kent, who had waisted his Parrimony, and was elder Brother to this mans Grand Father, had lien asleep for fifty years together.

At this time many particular Rebellions were in Ireland, The O'Connors and O'Moors took Arms, and committed many outrages: In Munster James Fitz-Morris, and Fitz-Edmund did the like; but by the industry of St. John Perrot, President of Munster, were suppressed. In Ulster, Bryan Mac Philym burnt Knockfergus, and many other joynd in Rebellion with him. Against these, Walter Devereux, (whom the Queen had lately created Earl of Essex) desired leave to go; which St. William Fitz-Williams Deputy of Ireland opposed, as fearing that the glory of so great an Earl would eclipse his light. But for this, the Queen finds a remedy, by appointing Essex, to take a Patent of the Deputy, whereby to be made Governour of Ulster. But this remedy for Fitz-Williams, might have made a fore in the minde of Essex (to receive his Authority from his inferior) but that the Noblesse of his minde, made him more to regard the Vertue, than the Glory. And so, in the end of August, he landed at Knockfergus, having with him the Lords Darcy and Rich, and St. Henry Knowles and his four Brothers, Michael and John Carves, Henry William, and John Norris: At his landing Bryan Mac Philym welcomed him, tendering unto him all manner of dutifullnesse and service; but presently after, falls from him, and joyns with Turlough Leynigh. After this revolt, the Earl of Essex finding many difficulties in the businesse, and himself not well provided of skilfull Souldiers, makes suite to the Company opposed; till after expence of a years time, and much treasure, he at last obtained leave, and returned home.

The next Year, being 1574, and the seventeenth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, the Duke of Alanson grew more importunate in his suit, than at any time before; so he obtained of the Queen, to come into England, any time before the twentieth of May; and this she the rather did, because she perceived him now to be really bent against the Guysses her sworn Enemies. But before this Answer was brought him, Valentine Dale Doctor of the Civill Law, the Queens Embassadour in France, gave intimation to the Queen, that Alanson and Navarre were in restraint, and committed to Keepers: For the Guysses had suggested, that Alanson had intimate friendship with Admirall Colen, the chief Leader of the Protestants in France; and indeed, Alanson being examined, freely confessed, that he had now for a good while desired the marriage of the Queen of England, and conceiving that good correspondence with Colen might be usefull to him to that end, he had thereupon had conference with him thereabout, and concerning the Low Country War. In the mean time Thomas Wilkes, Dales Secretary, got cunningly to Alanson, and in the Queens name, made promise both to him, and to Navarre, that she would omit no opportunity of procuring their enlargement. For which, the subtle Queen-Mother so complained of him to Queen Elizabeth, that he was faine to go into France, and there to crave pardon for his fault. But Navarre, not unmindfull of this kindnesse in Wilkes, when about five and twenty years after, being King of France, he saw him in Normandy, he knighted him. Hereupon the Queen sent Thomas Randall into France, to the Queen-Mother, that if it were possible, he might gain Reconciliation for Alanson her Son, and for the King of Navarre. But before he was landed in France, Charles the then French King dyed, whose Funerall Rites were solemnly performed in St. Pauls Church in London.

As soon as Henry the third, King of France, was come from Poland, Roger Lord North was sent into France, to congratulate his return, and his happy Inauguration into the Kingdom; who thereupon together with the Queen-Mother, did forthwith send their joynt Letters into England, strongly soliciting the businesse of Marriage, between Alanson and the Queen. In the mean time notwithstanding they used all possible devices, (and left no means unfought) to get the young King of Scotland to be sent into France, and to deprive Morton who was the Regent, of his Authority, whereof the Queen of Scots also was very desirous; she being perswaded, that if her Son were once gotten safely into France, she and the Catholics in England should be more mildly used. At which time, an aspersion was cast upon the Queen of Scots, as if she had made the match between Charles Uncle to the Queen of Scots (who had lately the Earldom of Lenox confirmed to him by Parliament) and Elizabeth Cavendish the Countesse of Shrewsburies Daughter by a former Husband, upon which ground, both their Mothers and some others also were kept in Prison for a time; and being doubted whereunto this marriage should tend, Henry Earl of Huntington, President of the Council in the North, is authorized with secret Instructions to examine it. It will be fit here to say something of this place of Government in the North, which from small beginnings, is now become so eminent as it is at this day, whereof this was the Original. When as in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, after that the Rebellion in the Northern parts, about the subversion of Abbeys was quieted, the Duke of Norfolkes tarried in those quarters, and many complaints of injuries, done were tendered unto him, whereof some he composed himself, and others he commended under his Seal to men of wisdom to determine: Hereof when King Henry heard, he sent down a peculiar Seal to be used in these cases, and calling home the Duke, committed the same to Tunfall Bishop of Durham, and constituted Assistent with Authority to hear and determine the complaints of the Poor, and he was the first Henry King of France prepares war against the Protestants.

It was now the year One thousand five hundred seventy five, and the eighteenth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Henry the third King of France being returned from Poland, and Crowned at Rheims, was careful to have the League of Blois confirmed; which in the year 1572, had been concluded between his Brother Charles and the most illustrious Queen Elizabeth. Now therefore he confirmed it with His own Subscription, and delivered it to Dale the Queens Legier, as the Queen likewise ratified it at St James near Westminster. But a little after he demanded by Letters, whether the mutual defence against all persons mentioned in the League, was intended to comprehend the case of Religion also? Whereunto the answering, that it did comprehend it; he thereupon hearing this from the Queen, began presently to prepare War against the Protestants, and Alanfon being drawn to the Adverle party, there was no speech of the marriage for a long time.

In the Netherlands at this time, Lodovick Zuvinga, who was successor unto Duke D' Alva, was wholly bent to recover the Command of the Seas, which D' Alva had neglected; but not being sufficiently provided of a Navy, he sent Boischoits into England, that with the Queens leave, he might take up Ships and Mariners to go against the Hollanders and Zealanders, but this she would not grant: Then he made suit that the Queen would please not to take it in evil part, if the banished persons of the English in the Low Countries served the King of Spain in a Sea-fight against the Hollanders; and that they might have free access to the Ports of England, to buy provision for ready money; but this she would not grant neither: Then he made request, that the Dutch, who were Rebels against the King of Spain, might be put out of England; but neither would she grant this, as being an Action void of Humanity, and against the Laws of Hospitality: yet because she would not be thought to violate the old Burgundian Law, she commanded by Proclamation, that the Ships of the Dutch which were made ready, should not go forth of the Haven; nor yet the Dutch, who had taken up Arms against the King of Spain, enter into the Ports of England, and by Name, the Prince of Orange, and Luty other the prime of that Faction, and this she did the more willingly, because Zuvinga at the intercession of Wilton the English Embassadour, had removed the Earl of Westmerland, and other English Fugitives out of the Dominions of the King of Spain, and had also dissolved the English Seminary at Dowry; though in stead thereof, the Guises through the procurement of Pope Gregory the thirteenth, let up another Seminary at Rheims.

The English Seminary at Dowry is dissolved, and another set up at Rheims.

The States of the Low-countries make choice of Q. Elizabeth to be their Protector, and why.

And at this time the Prince of Orange, perceiving his Forces but small, and thinking himself too weak for the King of Spain, and little hope of aid from England, he entered into Consultation with the Confederate States, to whose protection they were bent and in the next security to betake themselves: The Princes of Germany they knew were not all of one mind, parted from money very hardly, and did not every way, nor would not by any means possible second and concur with them in their Religion; and therefore they were not so fit. Then the French they saw, were intangled in a Civil Warre, and so had enough of their own to do; besides the old grudges and heart-burnings that were between the French and Dutch; and therefore neither were they so fit. There remained then the English, as fittest of any (if it might be obtained) seeing they were Neighbours, of the same Religion, and of a Language not much different, strong in shipping, and rich in Merchandize. Hereupon (considering the commendousness of the English Nation) they sent into England, Philip Marnix of Saint Aldegond, Janus Dowla, William Nywell, and Doctor Melsen; who in an honourable Ambassage, offered the Countries of Holland and Zealand to be possessed or protected by the Queen, so far as much as she was defended from the Princes of Holland, by Philippa Wife of Edward the third, Daughter of William of Bavaria, Count of Hanonia and Holland: by whose other Sister, the hereditary Right of those Provinces came to the King of Spain. To this offer, the Queen takes time to answer; and at last, having maturely advised of the matter, her Answer was this: That as yet she conceived not how with safety of her Honour, and an upright Conscience, she could receive those Provinces into her Protection, much less assame them into her possession; but promised, she would deal earnestly with the King of Spain, that a well conditioned Peace might be concluded. Presently upon this, Zuvinga, Governour of the Low-countries dyed; after whose death, the States of Brabant, Flanders, and the other Provinces, took upon them the ancient Administration, and Authority in the Common-wealth; which the King of Spain was faine to confirm to them, till such time as John of Austria were come, whom he determined to make Governour there. In the mean time, Queen Elizabeth in behalf of the King of Spain, sent William Drayson in Ambassie to those Princes, to exhort them to be peaceable and quiet, which yet, by reason the Spanish Souldiers were so outrageous, little prevailed.

In England all was calm and quiet for all this year, onely a difference fell out between Sr John Forster, Governour of Berwick, and John Carmichill, Keeper of Liddesdale in Scotland, in composing whereof, the Regent of Scotland, having given Queen Elizabeth some discontentment, was faine to come unarmed before the Earl of Huntington, appointed the Legate for England, at Bonderod, and so the matter was taken up, and the Regent ever after continued constant in observing the Queen, and to his great commendation.

Zuvinga dying John of Austria is sent Governour into the Netherlands.

A dation, restrained the Free-booters of the Borders, to the great good of both Kingdomes.

This year there dyed in Scotland, James Hamilton Duke of Castle-Herald and Earl of Arran, who was great Grand-child to James the second, King of Scots, by his Daughter, appointed Tutor to Mary, Queen of Scots, and designed Heir and Governour of the Kingdom, during her minority.

At this time the Earl of Essex is come into Ireland again, where having done good services, and being in the midst of Victory, he was on a suddain commanded to resign his Authority in Ulster: and as though he were an ordinary Commander, is set over three hundred Souldiers: which disgrace was wrought by his adversaries in Court, to the continuall perplexing of his milde spirit. And now is Sr Henry Sidney the third time sent Deputy into Ireland; who going into Ulster, there came to him and submitted themselves Mac Mahon, Mac Guyre, Torlogh Leynigh, the O'Conors and O'Moors, the Earl of Desmond, and the rebellious Sons of the Earl of Clanriccard, all whom he received into favour, and with great commendation administrated the Province.

At this time the Spaniards in the Low-Countries began to deal roughly with the people, and harried the Inhabitants with all manner of spoil and injury; Antwerp, the most famous Town of Traffick in all Europe, was miserably pillaged, the English Merchants houses rifled, insomuch that the States were enforced to take up Arms, and Messengers were sent to all neighbouring Princes; and to Queen Elizabeth was sent Monsieur Aubigny, both to shew her upon how necessary and just causes they had taken up Arms, and also to borrow of her a great sum of money, the better to enable them to resist the Spaniard. But she being certainly informed, That they first sued to the French King for help, denyeth the request, yet promiseth to intercede earnestly with the King of Spain for peace. And in that employment, she addressed into Spain, John Smith, coulen german (so King Edward the sixth, a man of Spanish behaviour, and well known to the King of Spain, who was liberally received by the King; and with such wisdom retorted the contumelious speech of Gaspar Quiroga Archbishop of Toledo and the Spanish Inquisitors, who would not admit in the Queens Title the Attribute of Defender of the Faith, that he had gained great thanks from the King of Spain himself, who requested him not to speak of it to the Queen, and gave severe command, that the Title should be admitted.

The Earl of Essex going into Ireland again, is disgraced with being made an ordinary Commander.

And now by this time was John of Austria come into the Low-Countries with a large Commission: for he was the Naturall Son of the Emperour Charles the sixth, to whom the Queen sent Edward Horley, Governour of the Isle of Wight, to congratulate his coming thither, and to offer help, if the States called the French into the Netherlands; yet at the same time, Swingingham being exceeding importunate on the States behalf, she sent them twenty thousand pounds of English money; (so well she could play her game of both hands) upon condition they should neither change their Prince nor their Religion, nor take the French into the Low-countries, nor refuse a Peace, if John of Austria should condescend to indifferent Conditions; but if he embraced a Peace, then the money should be paid back to the Spanish Souldiers, who were ready to mutiny for lack of pay. So careful she was to retain these declining Provinces in obedience to the King of Spain.

At this time a Voyage was undertaken, to try if there could be found any Sea upon the North part of America, leading to the wealthy coast of Cathaia, whereby in one commerce might be joyned the riches of both the East and West parts of the world, in which voyage was employed Martyn Forbisher, who set sail from Harwich the eighteenth of June, and the ninth of August, entered into that Bay, or Sea, but could passe no further for Snow and Ice. The like expedition was taken in hand, two years after, with no better success.

About this time dyed the Emperour Maximilian, a Prince that deserved well of Queen Elizabeth and the English, who thereupon sent Sr Philip Sidney to his Son Rodolphus King of the Romans, to condole his Fathers death, and congratulate his succession: as likewise to do the like, for the decease of the Count Electour Palatine, named Frederick the third, with his surviving Son.

And now Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, who out of Leicesters envy, had been recalled out of Ireland, was out of Leicesters fear, (as being threatened by him) sent back again into Ireland, but with the empty title of Earl Marshall of Ireland; with the grief whereof, he fell into a bloody Flux, and in most grievous torments ended his life: When he had first desired the standers by to admonish his Son (scarce ten years old at that time) to have always before his eyes, the six and thirtieth year of his age, as the utmost term of his life, which neither himself, nor his Father before him could out-go, and the Son indeed attained not to it, as shall hereafter be declared. He was suspected to be poysoned, but Sr Henry Sidney, Deputy of Ireland, after diligent search made, wrote to the Lords of the Council, That the Earl often said, It was familiar to him upon any great discontentment to fall into a Flux, and for his part, he had no suspicion of his being poysoned: yet was this suspicion increased; for that presently after his death, the Earl of Leicester with a great sum of money and large promises, putting away Douglas Sheffield, by whom he had a Son, openly married Essex his widow. For although it was given out, that he was privately married to her, yet Sr Francis Knolles her Father, who was well acquainted with Leicesters roving loves, would not believe it, unless he himself were present at the marriage, and had it testified by a publick Notary. At this time also dyed Sr Anthony Cook of Gyddy-Hall in Essex, who had been School-master to King Edward the sixth.

and was no lesse School-master to his own Daughters, whom he made skilfull in the Greek and Latin Tongues; married all to men of great Honour; one to St William Cecil, Lord Treasurer of England; a second to St Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; a third to St Thomas Hobby, who dyed Embassador in France; a fourth to St Ralph Lowley; and the fifth to St Henry Killigrew.

At this time, the Sons of the Earl of Clanriccard, who scarce two moneths before had obtained pardon for their Rebellion, fell into Rebellion again; but were by the Deputy soon suppressed; and William Drury newly made President of Munster, reduced the whole Province to good Order, except only the County of Kerry, whither a number of Vagabonds were gotten, trulling to the Immunities of the place. For King Edward the third made Kerry a County Palatine, and granted to the Earls of Desmond all the Royall Liberties which the King of England had in that County, excepting Wreckby Fyre, Forefall, and Treasure Trouve. The Governour notwithstanding, who wisely judged that these Liberties were granted for the better preservation of Justice, and not for maintenance of outrageous malefactors, entered into it, and violently put to flight and vanquished the mischievous crew, which the Earl of Desmond had placed there in ambush. The Earl in the mean while made great complaints of Drury to the Deputy; and particularly of the Tax which they call Cresse, which is an exaction of provision of Victuals at a certain rate, for the Deputy's Family; and the Souldiers in Garrison. This Tax, not he only, but in Lemster also many Lords refused to pay, alleading that it was not to be exacted but by Parliament; but the matter being examined in England, it appeared by the Records of the Kingdom, That this Tax was anciently imposed; and that a certain Right of Majesty, a prerogative Royall, which is not subjected to Laws, yet not contrary to them neither, as the wise Civilians have observed. Yet the Queen commanded to use a moderation in exactions of this nature, saying, She would have her subjects shorn, but not devoured.

It was now the year 1577, and the twentieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when John of Austria, pretending to Queen Elizabeth nothing but Peace, yet is found to deal secretly with the Pope, to deprive her of her Kingdom, and himself to marry the Queen of Scots, and invade England: of which his practises the Prince of Orange gives Queen Elizabeth the first Intelligence. Whereupon (finding his deep dissembling) he enters into a League with the States, for mutual defence both at Sea and Land, upon certain Conditions; but having concluded it (because she would not have it wrongfully interpreted, as though she meant to foster a Rebellion in the Netherlands) he sent Thomas Wilkes to the King of Spain with these Informations, That he had always endeavoured to keep the Low-Countries in obedience to the King of Spain; had persuaded (even with threatenings) the Prince of Orange to accept of Peace; but withall, if the King of Spain would have his Subjects obedient to him, he then requests him to restore their privileges, and to remove John of Austria from the Government, who not only was her deadly enemy, but laboured by all means to bring the Netherlands into utter servitude. If this be granted by the King of Spain, she then faithfully promiseth, That if the States perform not their Allegiance to him, as by their Promise to her they are engaged to do, she will utterly forsake them, and bend her self with all her Forces to compel them. While Wilkes in Spain unfoldeth these matters, John of Austria sendeth to Queen Elizabeth, in most grievous manner accusing the States for disobedience and making a large declaration of the causes for which he had taken up Arms again. Thus Queen Elizabeth (like a fortunate Princess) fate as an Honourable Arbitress between the Spaniards, the French, and the States; insomuch that it was not untrue which one wrote, That France and Spain were Ballances in the Scale of Europe; and England the Beam to turn them either way, for they still got the better, to whom she adhered.

About this time, when the Judges sat at the Assizes in Oxford, and one Rowland Jenkes a Book-seller was questioned for speaking opprobrious words against the Queen, suddenly they were surprised with a pestilent favour; whether rising from the noysome smell of the prisoners, or from the damp of the ground, is uncertain, but all that were there present, almost every one, within forty hours dyed, except Women and children; and the Contagion went no further. There dyed Robert Bell, Lord chief Baron Robert D'Oyley, St William Babington, D'Oyley Sheriff of Oxfordshire, Harcourt, Weyman, Phetisplace, the most noted men in this Tract; Barham the famous Lawyer, almost all the Jurours, and three hundred other, more or lesse.

This year the title of the Lord Latimer, (which had flourished in the Family of the Nevills ever since the days of King Henry the sixth) was extinct in John Nevill, who dyed without issue male, and left a fair estate to four Daughters, whereof the eldest married Henry Earl of Northumberland, the second Thomas Cecil, who was afterward Earl of Exeter; the third, St William Cornwallis; and the fourth, St John Davers.

In Ireland the O-Moors and O-Conors, and others, whose Ancestours the Earl of Suffex in Queen Maries days, had for their rebellion deprived of their Patrimony in Leyfe and Ophalie, did now break forth into a new Rebellion, under the conduct of Rorie Oge; that is, Roderick the younger; set on fire the Village of Nassle, assault Lushin; from whence being driven back by the valour of George Carew the Governour, he was afterward slain.

Out of England at this time there went into the Low-countries, John North, the Lord North's eldest son, John Norris, second Son to the Lord Norris, Henry Cavendish, and Thomas Morgan Colonels, with many voluntaries, to learn Military experience. Thither also came Casimire the Elector Palatine's Son, with an Army of German Horse and Foot, at the Queens charges: upon these

English Volunteers go into the Low-countries, and do valiantly.

Don John, assisted by the Prince of Parma, Mondragon, and other the best Commanders of Spain, confident of victory, flyeth furiously, before they expected him, yet after a long fight, was forced to retreat; but then turning again, and thinking to break through the Hedges, and brakes where the English and Scottish Voluntaries had placed themselves, was again repulsed; for the English and Scottish were so hot upon the matter, that casting away their garments, by reason of the hot weather, they fought in their shirts, which they made fast about them. In this battell Norris fought most valiantly, and had three Horses slain under him, as also Stuard the Scott, Bingham, and William Markham.

Now for comfort to the afflicted Provinces, there came at that time into the Netherlands, the Count Swarzenberg from the Emperor, Monsieur Bellievre from the French King, and from the Queen of England, the Lord Cobham and Walsingham, with Commission to procure conditions of Peace, but returned without doing any thing, for that Don John refused to admit the Protestant Religion, and the Prince of Orange refused to return into Holland.

About this time Egremond Ratcliffe, Son to Henry Earl of Suffex, by his second wife, who had been a prime man in the rebellion of the North, and served now under Don John, was accused by the English fugitives, that he was sent under hand to kill Don John; which (whether true or false) he was thereupon taken and put to death. The Spaniards have affirmed, That Ratcliffe at his last end, confessed voluntarily, That he was freed out of the Tower of London, and moved by Walsingham's large promises to do this Fact; but the English that were present at his death, deny that he confessed any such thing, though the English Rebels did all they could to wrest this confession from him.

At this very time, Don John, in the flower of his age, died of the Pestilence, or (as some say) of grief, as being neglected by the King of Spain his Brother; a man of an insatiable Ambition, who aimed first at the Kingdom of Tunisi, and after, of England; and who, without the privacy of the French King, or King of Spain, had made a league with the Guises, for the defence of both Crowns.

Alanson although very busie about the Belgick War, yet now began again to pursue the Marriage with Queen Elizabeth; for renewing of which suit, first was Bacherville sent to the Queen; and soon after Ramboulet, from the French King; and within a moneth after that, Simier, a near Courtier, and exquisitely learned in the Art of Love, accompanied with a great number of the French Nobility; whom the Queen at Richmond entertained in such loving manner, that Leicester began to rage, as if his hopes were now quite blasted. Certainly a little before, when Ashley, a Lady of the Queens Bed-chamber, mentioned the Earl of Leicester to her for a Husband, she with an angry countenance, replied, Dost thou think me so unlike my self, and so forgetfull of Majesty, as to prefer my servant, whom I my self have advanced, before the greatest Princes of the Christian World.

But it is now time to return to the Scottish Affairs. The Earl of Morton, Regent of Scotland, though a man of great wisdom and valour, yet was now so overcome with covetousnesse, that he grew universally hated; and thereupon, with the joynt consent of the Nobility, the Administration of the Common-wealth was translated to the King, though he was yet but twelve years old, and twelve of the chief Lords were appointed to attend him in Council, three of them by course for three moneths; amongst whom, the Earl of Morton for one, that they might not seem to cast him quite off. The King having taken upon him the Administration, sent presently the Earl of Dumferlin to Queen Elizabeth, acknowledging her great deserts towards him, and requesting to have the Treaty of Edenburgh, agreed on in the year 1559, to be confirmed, for the more happy restraining the robbers about the borders; and withall, That his ancient Patrimony in England; namely, the Lands granted to his Grand-father Matthew, Earl of Lenox, and the Countesse his Grand-mother, might be delivered into his hands who was the next Heir. The Queen readily promised the former demands, but stuck a little at the last, concerning the Patrimony; For she would not grant, That Arbella, the Daughter of Charles the King of Scots Uncle, born in England, was the next Heir to the Lands in England; neither would she grant the Ambassadors proof out of History, That the Kings of Scots, born in Scotland, did anciently (without question) hold the Earldom of Huntington by Right of Inheritance. Yet she commanded a Sequestration to be made of the Revenues of those Lands, by Burligh Master of the Wards; and willeth the King, That out of the goods of the Earl of Lenox in Scotland, satisfaction might be made to his Grand-mothers Creditors here. For she took it in ill part, that the King had recalled the Infeoffment of the Earldom of Lenox (made to his Uncle Charles and his Heirs) after the death of Charles, to the prejudice (as was suggested to her) of Arbella; although indeed, it be a Privilege of the Kings of Scotland, That they may recall Donations made in their minority.

The Earl of Morton in the mean while, not enduring the disgrace to be outed of his Regency, regarded not the Prescript Form of Government lately set down, but drew the Administration of all matters to himself, and kept the King in his own power, at the Castle of Sterling, admitting none to his presence, but whom he pleased. At this presumption, the Lords growing angry, made the Earl of Atholl their Captain, and in the Kings name levied a great Army, and were ready to encounter Morton; but by the Intercession of Robert Bowes, the English Ambassadors, they were stayed from fighting; and Morton presently betook himself home, and the Earl of Atholl soon after dyed, not without suspicion of being poisoned.

Egremond Ratcliffe is put to death in Flanders, and why.

John D' Austria dyeth.

The Duke D' Alanson solicits his suit with the Queen afresh.

The Earl of Morton Regent of Scotland, is removed, and sticking though but twelve years old is admitted to govern.

The King of Spain and the Pope conspire against Queen Elizabeth.

Thomas Stukeley is by the Pope honoured with the greatest dignities, and sent into Ireland. But diverted by the King of Portugal, is slain in Africa.

Alexander Farnese Prince of Parma is made Governour of the Netherlands.

Alanson comes privately into England, and hath secret conference with the Queen. Burleigh and others are enjoined to consult of the marriage Covenants. The title of Lord D'Albany from whence it came. Esme Steward made first Duke of Lenox.

At this time the King of Spain, and Pope Gregory the thirteenth held secret Consultation, to invade at once both England and Ireland, and to work the absolute ruine of Queen Elizabeth. The Pope to gain the Kingdom of Ireland for his Son James Buon of Campagno, whom he had made Marquess of Vincola. The King of Spain secretly to relieve the Irish Rebels, as Queen Elizabeth did the Dutch, while friendship in words was upheld on both sides: and being known, That the greatest strength of England consisted in the Navy Royal, and Merchants Ships, it was advised, that the Italian and Dutch Merchants should hire these Ships for long Voyages; to the end that while they were absent, the Queens Navy might be surprised with a greater Fleet: and at that time Thomas Stukeley, an English fugitive, should joyn himself to the Irish Rebels with new Forces. For he making great boast, and promising the Kingdom of Ireland to the Popes Ballard Son, had so insinuated himself into grace with the ambitious old man, that he adorned him with the Titles of Marquess of Lemster, Earl of Wexford and Caterlogh, Viscount Morogh, and Baron of Ross (the principal dignities of Ireland) and made him Commander over eight hundred Italian Souldiers, to be employed in the Irish War. With which Forces Stukeley setting sail from Civita Vecchia, arrived at length in Portingal, where he and his Forces were by the divine Providence diverted another way. For Sebastian King of Portingal (to whom the chief Command in this Expedition against England was assigned) being first to dispatch a War in Africa, in aid of Mahomet Abdall Son to the King of Fesse, perswaded Stukeley to go along with him into Mauritania, together with his Italian Souldiers, and then afterward they would go together against Ireland: To this motion Stukeley loom agreed, and therein agreed with his destiny; for in that memorable Battell where three Kings were slain, both he and Sebastian lost their lives.

At this time St Henry Sidney (who had been Deputy of Ireland at severall times eleven years) delivered up his Deputy-ship to St William Drury, President of Munster: Such a Deputy, for good Government, that if any have equalled him, none have exceeded him.

It was now the year 1579, and the two and twentieth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when John Casimire, Son of Frederick the third, Count Palatine of the Rhine, came into England; where, after he had been entertained with Tiltings and Jests, made Knight of the Garter (the Queen tying the Garter about his leg) and rewarded with a yearly pension, he returned. And now was Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma, made Governour of the Netherlands by the King of Spain, and Queen Elizabeth supplied the States with a great sum of money, for which William Davison brought into England the ancient precious Habillments of the Family of Burgundy, and their Costly Vessels, laid to pawn by Matthew of Austria and the States.

Simier in the mean time here in England ceaseth not by all amorous devises to perswade the Queen to marry Alanson; wherein he drew her so far, that the Earl of Leicester gave out, he crept into the Queens affection by Love-potions and unlawfull Arts: and Simier on the other side endeavoured by all means to cast down Leicester, discovering his marriage with the Earl of Essex widow; whereat the Queen grew so angry, that she confined him to the Castle at Greenwich, and had meant to have him committed to the Tower, but that the Earl of Sussex (though his greatest Adversary) dissuaded her: telling her that none ought to be molested for contracting lawful Matrimoine. But Leicester notwithstanding was so provoked for his confining, that he was bent to revenge it, and if it be true, as some said, he had suborned one Tinder a Yeoman of the Guard to murder Simier. Sure it is the Queen by Proclamation commanded that no person should offer injury to the Embassadour or any of his servants. At which time it fell out that as the Queen, together with Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and Hatton Vice-Chamberlain wererowed in a barge to Greenwich, a young man shooting off a Harquebus out of a boat, shot one of the rowers in the Queens Barge through the arm with a bullet, who was presently taken and led to the Gallows, but upon solemn Protestation, that he did it unwillingly, and out of no malicious intent, he was let go and pardoned. Some would have perswaded the Queen that he was purposely suborned to shoot either her or the French Embassadour: but she was so far from suspecting her subjects, that she would often say, She would not believe any thing against them which a mother would not believe against her children.

After a few days Alanson himself came privately into England with only one or two attendants, and came to the Queen at Greenwich, at a time when she thought not of it; they had secret conference together, all parties being sent away: After which, being seen of very few, he requred home; but within a moneth or two after the Queen enjoyed the Lord Burleigh Treasurer, the Earl of Sussex, Leicester, Hatton and Walsingham, seriously to weigh both the dangers, and the commodities likely to arise from the marriage with him, and to consult with Simier concerning the marriage Covenants.

As in England there was some fear of this Frenchman: so in Scotland at this time of another Frenchman, called Esme Steward, Lord of Aubigny, who came now into Scotland to visit the King his coulen. He was the Son of John Steward Brother to Matthew Steward Earl of Lenox the Kings Grand-father, and had denomination from Aubigny in France, which title Charles the seventh King of France had anciently conferred upon John Steward of the Family of Lenox, who being Constable of the Scottish Army in France, vanquished the English in one battail, and was slain by them in another: and from that time the title belonged to the younger descent of that house. This Esme Steward, the King embraced with exceeding great love, made him Lord Chamberlain of Scotland, and Captain of the Castle of Dumbarton, and created him first Earl and then Duke of Lenox. The fear from this man was, because he was devoted to the Swiss and the Popish religion, and and that which increased the fear from this man, because he applied himself to Mortons adversariand mediated to have Thomas Carre Lord of Fernisburgh called home, whoof all men was most addicted to the Queen of Scots.

About this time Queen Elizabeth, at the request of William Harbounze an English man, procured a grant from the Turkish Emperour for the English Merchants to exercise free traffick in all places of his Dominions, as well as Venetians, Polanders, and other neighbouring Nations; whereupon they set up first the Company of Turkie Merchant, manning a most gainfull Trade at Constantinople, Alexandria, Aegipt, Aleppo, Cyprus, and other parts of Asia, bringing home Spices, Perfumes, unwrought Silks, Tapistry, Indico, Corraunts, and the like.

This year dyed St Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; but who by vertue of an Act of a Parliament, always exercised the Jurisdiction of Lord Chancellor; a very fat man, but singularly wife, and a chief prop of the Queens Privy Council: In whose place succeeded St Thomas Bromley, the Queens Solicitor, with the Title of Lord Chancellor of England.

In Ireland at this time, in the Province of Munster, James Fitz Morris kindled a new fire of Rebellion; for after his former submission upon his knees, vowing all Obedience to the Queen, he stole away into France, and promised the French King, if he would lend him assistance, to make him King of Ireland. But being by him slighted, he went into Spain, and made the like offer to the King there. The King of Spain sent him to the Pope, from whom (by means of Nicholas Sanders, an English Priest, and Alan an Irish man, both Doctors of Divinity) he obtained a little money, a Legats Authority for Sanders, a consecrated Banner, and Letters of Commendation to the Catholick King. And returning from Spain with those Divines, three Ships, and a few men, he landed at Smerrwick Kerry, a demy Island in the West part of Ireland, about the first day of July; where (the place being first of all consecrated by the Priests) he built a Fort, and brought the Ships close under it; but these were presently set upon and carried away, by Thomas Courteney, and thereby the Spaniards deprived of their opportunity of coming thither by Sea. But now John and James, Brothers to the Earl of Desmond, gathered together a small number of Irish, joyn themselves presently with their Kinsman Fitz Morris. Yet the Spaniards feeling that but a very few Irish, and those unarmed, came unto them, began to distrust the estate they were in, and to cry out, That they were undone, whom Fitz Morris heartened the best he could, telling them that Supplies were presently to come. And going himself to get more company, he passed through the Land of his Cousin William a Burgh, who though he had been a Rebel before, yet was now grown loyall, so as there fell out a skirmish between them; in which Fitz Morris being stricken through with a Pike, and shot into the head with a leaden bullet, died in the place, and most of his Company with him; but withall, two of William Burghs Sons were in that skirmish slain also; when the Queen, to comfort him for the losse of his Sons, adorned him with the Dignity of Baron of Castle Conel, and rewarded him with a yearly Pension besides: which favours so overwhelmed him with joy, that he lived but a short while after. And now St William Drury the Deputy growing very sick, appointed St Nicholas Malby, then Governour of Connaght to be President of Munster, and General of the Army; at which time, the Earl of Desmond, who had all this while made a shew of Loyalty, breaks openly out into Rebellion; when now Drury the Deputy dying at Waterford, by his death Malbys Authority ceasing, St William Pelham is by the Council chosen Justice of Ireland, with the Authority of Vice-roy, untill such time as a Deputy were appointed, and the Earl of Ormond is made President of Munster. Pelham goeth into Munster, and sendeth for the Earl of Desmond, who refusing to come, is thereupon proclaimed Traytor, and an enemy to the State; and this being published, the Justice committed the following the War to the Earl of Ormond, who slaying most of the Spaniards, and adherents to Desmond, compelleth him to send his Wife to the Justice, to beg his pardon.

The Lord Justice Pelham now certified, that Arthur Lord Gray was landed with authority to be Deputy of Ireland, at Munster delivereth the Army to George Bouchier the Son of John, second Earl of Bath, of that name, and himself returneth to Dublin, to deliver up the Province to his Successor. The Lord Gray at his landing, before he received the Sword, hearing where the Rebels had their Rendezvous, marched toward them, who presently betake themselves to Grandislongh, a grassie Valley, and beset thick with Trees, where they who dwell near, scarce know the winding out; yet the Deputy (taking one Cosbion an old man, well acquainted with the place, to be his leader) entered into it, where he lost divers of his men, namely, Peter Carew the younger, George Moore, Andley, and Cosbie himself that was his leader.

A short time after, there landed at Smerrwick in Kerry, under the command of San Joseph an Italian, about seven hundred Italian Souldiers, who fortified the place, and name it Fort del Or: Whereupon the Deputy sent a Trumpet to the Fort to demand who they were, what they had to do in Ireland, and who sent them; withall commanding them to depart immediately. But they replied, That some of them were sent from his Holiness, other from the Catholick King, upon whom the Pope had bestowed the Kingdom of Ireland, for that Queen Elizabeth (by reason of heresie) hath forfeited the Right due unto her; and therefore what they had gotten, they would maintain. Upon this the Deputy prepares for battery, let flies his Ordnance four days together, in which time the Spaniards once or twice make sallies out, to their own losse much, but not an English man slain, but only John Cheek, a courageous young Gentleman, Son to St John Cheek, a learned Knight. And now San Joseph, who commanded the Fort, a white-liver'd Souldier, terrified with the continuall assery, and having no hope of relief, either from the King Fitz Morris raiseth a Rebellion in Ireland, but is by William a Burgh encountered and slain.

The Earl of Desmond rebels.

St William Pelham is made Justice of Ireland.

The L. Gray is made Deputy of Ireland.

San Joseph an Italian with seven hundred Souldiers landeth in Ireland.

No Parlee to be allowed to Rebels.

San Joseph yields himself to the Deputy, without any condition.

His men are all slain, and why.

King of Spain, or Desmond (contrary to the will of all his Souldiers) heft up a white Flag, and desired Parlee, but Parlee was denied, because he had combined with Rebels, with whom it is not lawfull to hold Parlee. Then he demanded that his Company might pass away with their Bagge, but neither would this be granted. Then he required that some of the chieft fore might have leave to depart; but neither could this be obtained. At last, when they could prevail in nothing, they harged out the white Flag again, and submitted themselves absolutely, without any condition, to the Deputy's mercy, who presently consulted how to deal with them, and this was the Case; Their number was well-near as great as the English, there was present fear of danger from the Rebels; and the English were for detitute of meat and apparel, that they were ready to mutiny, unless they might have the spoyle granted them; and besides, there were no ships to send them away if they were spared: For these reasons it was concluded (the Deputy being gain-saying, and letting tears fall) That only the Leaders should be saved, the rest slain, and all the Irish hanged up; which was presently put in execution, to the great disliking of the Queen, who detested the slaughter of such as yielded themselves, and would not accept of any excuses or allegations.

And yet more cruelty than this was at that time committed in the Netherlands; for John Norris, and Oliver Temple, English Commanders, together with some Companies of Dutch, setting out early one morning, took Mechlyn a wealthy Town of Brabant, at an assault with Ladders; where they promiscuously murdered both Citizens and Religious persons, offering violence even upon the dead, taking away Grave-stones, which were sent into England to be sold.

About this time certain English Priests, who were fled into the Netherlands, in the year 1568, by the procurement of William Allen an Oxford Scholar, joynd themselves to study at Doway, where they entred into a Collegiate Form of Government; to whom the Pope allowed a yearly Pension. But tumults arising in the Low-countries, and the English Fugitives being commanded by the King of Spain's Deputy to depart from thence, other like Colleges, for the training up of the English youth, were erected, one at Rheims by the Guisers, and another at Rome by Pope Gregory the thirteenth, which always afforded new supplies of Priests for England, when the old failed, who should spread abroad the seeds of the Romish Religion here amongst us; from whence those Colleges had the name of Seminaries, and they called Seminary-Priests who were trained up in them. In these Seminaries, amongst other Disputations, it was concluded, That the Pope hath such fullness of Power, by Divine Right, over the whole Christian world, both in Ecclesiastical and Secular matters, that by vertue thereof it is lawfull for him to excommunicate Kings, absolve their Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. From these Seminaries at this time, there came two into England, Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campian, both of them English men, and Jesuites. Parsons was born in Somersetshire, a fierce and rough conditioned fellow: Campian was a Londoner, of a milder disposition. They had been both brought up in Oxford, Campian a Fellow of St. John's College, and had been Professor in the year 1569; and when he was made Deacon, counterfeited himself to be a Protestant, till such time as he slipped out of England. Parsons was of Baylioll College, where he made open profession of the Protestant Religion, till for dishonest carriage, he was expelled the House, and then fled to the Popish Party. Both these came privately into England, in the disguise one while of Souldiers, another while of Noble-men; sometimes like English Ministers, and sometime in the habit of Apparators. Parsons who was made the superior, brake forth in such open words amongst the Papists, about deposing the Queen, that some of themselves had a purpose to complain of them to the Magistrate. Campian, though something more moderate, yet in a Writing provoked the English Ministers to a dispute; and published in Latine an elegant Book of his ten Reasons, in maintenance of the Doctrine of the Romish Church; as Parsons in like manner, set forth another violent Pamphlet against Clark, who had written modestly against Campian's Provocation. But Doctor Whitaker soundly confuted Campian, who being after a year apprehended, and put upon the Rack, was afterward brought out to a disputation; where he scarcely made good the great fame that went of him.

Captain Drake returns from his voyage about the world. His Parentage and education.

In this year was the return of Captain Drake from his incredible Voyage round about the World (which Magellan had before attempted, but died in the Voyage) whereof to relate all particular accidents, would require a large Volume: It may suffice in this place, to deliver some speciall passages. He was born of mean parentage in Devonshire, yet had a great man (Francis Russell, after Earl of Bedford) to be his God-father. His Father, in King Henry the eighths time, being persecuted for a Protestant, changed his Soyl, and lived chfe in Kent. Henry being dead, he got a place amongst the Mariners of the Queens Navy, to read Prayers, and afterward bound his Son Francis to a Ship Master, who in a ship which went to and fro upon the Coast with Commodities, one while to Zealand, another while to France, training him up to pains and skill at Sea; took such a liking to him, that afterwards dying, he bequeathed his Barque to him by his Will to this Barque Drake sold, and then in the year 1567, went with St. John Hawkins into America in which Voyage he unfortunately lost all he had. Five years after having gotten again a good sum of money by Trading and Piracy, (which the Preacher of his Ship told him was lawfull) he bought a Ship of War, and two small Vessels; with which he set sayl again for America, where his first Prize was great store of Gold and Silver, carried over the Mountains upon Mules, whereof whereof the Gold he brought to his Ships, but left the Silver, hiding it under ground; after this, he fired a great place of Traffique, called, The Crosse, at the River Chirage, when roaming to and fro upon the Mountains, he espied the South Sea; where falling upon his knees, he craved assistance of Almighty God, to find out that passage, which he reserveth for another Voyage; and for the present, having gotten much riches, he returned home. Afterwards in the year 1577, the thirteenth day of November, with five Ships, and Sea-men to the number of 163, he set sayl from Plimmouth, for the Southern Sea, and within five and twenty days, came to Cantyne, a Cape in Barbary, and then sailed along the Isle of Fago, which sends forth flames of Sulphur; and being now under the Line, he let every one in his Ship blood. The sixteenth of April, entering into the mouth of the Plate, they espied a world of Sea-Calves; in which place John Doughty, the next to Drake in Authority, was called in question for raising Sedition in the Navy, who being found guilty, was beheaded. Some report, That Drake had charge given him from the Earl of Leicester, to make away Doughty upon some pretence or other, for that he had said, That the Earl of Essex was craftily made away by Leicester: The twentieth of August, two of his Ships he turneth off, and with other three came to the Sea, which they call, The Strait of Magellan. The sixth of September, entering into the wide Southern Ocean, which they call, The Pacificque Sea, he found it out of measure troublous, so that his Ships were here by Tempests disperfed; in one of which, John Winter was Master, who returned back into England; Drake himself, with only one ship, coasted along the shore, till he came to the Isle Moncha, from whence loofing, he lighted upon a fellow fishing in a little Boat, who shewed him where a Spanish Ship laden with Treasure lay; Drake making towards it, the Spaniards thought him to be their own Countryman, and thereupon invited him to come on; but he getting aboard, presently shut the Spaniards (being not above eight persons) under hatches, and took the Ship, in which was four hundred pound weight of Gold. At Taurapisa, going again to shore, he found a Spaniard sleeping by the Seaside, who had lying by him twenty bars of massie Silver to the value of four thousand Duckats, which he bid his followers take amongst them, the Spaniard still sleeping. After this, going into the Port of Africa, he found there three Vessels without any Mariners in them; wherein, besides other wares, were seven and fifty silver bricks, each of which weighed twenty pound: From hence, tying it to Lime, he found twelve Ships in one Road, and in them great store of Silks, and a Chest full of money coined, but not so much as a Ship-boy aboard; (such security there was in that Coast:) Then putting to Sea with those Ships, he followed the rich Ship called the Cacofaga; and by the way met with a small Ship, without Ordinance or other Arms, out of which he took fourscore pound weight of Gold, a golden Crucifix, and some Emeralds of a fingers length. The first day of March, he overtook the Cacofaga, set upon her, and took her; and in her, besides Jewels, fourscore pound weight of Gold, thirteen Chests of Silver ready coined, and as much Silver as would ballast a Ship. And now thinking he had gained wealth enough, he resolved to return home; and so on the third of Novemb. 1580, he landed at Plimmouth, having sayled round about the World, in the space of three years; to the great admiration of all that know what compass the World is of.

How he gained his great Treasure.

The Queen welcomed him home, but made a sequestration of the Goods, that they might be ready if the King of Spain required them; and commanded the Ship to be drawn on shore near Durford for a monument (where the carcase of it is yet to be seen) and her self feasted in it, at which time the Knighted Captain Drake. But Bernardine Mendoza, the King of Spain's Embassador in England, began to rage; and earnestly demanded Restitution of the Goods, and complained, that the English sailed upon the Indian Sea. To whom it was answered; That the Goods were sequestred, and ready to make the King of Spain satisfaction, although the Queen had expended against the Rebels, whom the Spaniard had excited in England and Ireland, more money than that which Drake brought home. And as for sayling on the Indian Sea, that it was as lawfull for the Queens subjects as his, seeing the Sea and the Air are common for all to use. Notwithstanding, so Pedro Sebura, the King of Spain's Agent in this business, a great sum of money was repaid; which was not restored to them to whom it belonged, but employed to the Spaniards Wars in the Low-Countries, as was known after, when it was too late.

But at this time, when Jackman and Perr, two skillfull Pilots, were sent forth with two Ships by the Londoners, to find out a shorter cut to the East-Indies, by the North-West passage; they had not the like success; for a few Leagues beyond the Isles of Vaygato, they met with such uncertain Tydes, so many Shallows, and such Mountains of Ice, that they could go no further, and had much ado to return home.

About this time, Henry Fitz Alen, Earl of Arundel died, in whom the Sirname of a most Noble Family ended, which had flourished in this Honour for above three hundred years, from Richard Fitz Alan; who being descended from the Albanets (ancient Earls of Arundel and Sussex, in the Reign of King Edward the first) obtained the Title of Earl, by reason of the possession of Arundel Castle, without Creation. He had three Daughters by his Wife Katherine, Daughter to Thomas Gray, Marquess of Dorset, all whom he out-lived; Henry a young man of great hope, who died at Brussels; Joan, Wife to the Lord Lumley; and Mary, who being married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, brought forth Philip, in her right, Earl of Arundel.

Henry Fitz Alen Earl of Arundel dies, in whom ended the Sur-name of that Noble Family.

In Ireland, Arthur Lord Gray the Deputy, going against the O Connors, who raised sirs in Ophalie, putteth to death Hugh O Mokey, quieteth all that Quarter, even the Families of the Mogobigans, and O Charles, and in the very beginning suppresseth a conspiracy which was breaking forth, by putting to death the Lord Nogent, who being confident in his own innocence, when the Deputy promised A to save his life, if he would but confesse himself guilty, chose rather to die and be held guiltlesse, than to live in infamy, by betraying his own innocence. With whose death the Queen was extremely displeased, as by which she was made a patronesse of cruelty, to her great dishonour. But the Deputy knew with what kind of people he dealt, and by this example of severity, brought Turlugh Lemigh to accept conditions of Peace; and the O'Brians and Cavenaghs (Rebellious Families in Lemigh) humbly to crave leave also, and to offer Hostages.

In Scotland at this time, great jealousie was had of Lenox, Lord of Aubigny, left being in so great favour with the King, he should allure him to marry into France, and bring into Scotland the Popish Religion. Whereupon (although he purged himself by Letters to Queen Elizabeth, and proffered himself to be a Protestant) yet many courses were taken to sequester him from the King; but so far from taking effect, that on the contrary, the Earl of Morton (who among all other was most addicted to the English) was soon after accused of Treason by the Earl of Arran, and cast into prison; and not long after (notwithstanding all the means the Queen could use to save him) was beheaded, as convicted to be accessory to the murder of the Kings Father. Whereupon the Earl of Angus, and other who laboured for Morton, fled straightways into England.

In the Low-Countries about this time, the Count Rheinberg proceeded victoriously for the King of Spain, and beleaguering Stenwick in Friesland, against whom the States sent Norris General of the field, who put the Rhinburgs Company to the worst, and raised the Siege; but afterward joining Battell with Verdugo the Spaniard at Northune, even when the Victory was almost gotten C (Roger Williams having put the enemies to flight) the fortune of the War turned, Norris was vanquished, wounded, and a great number of his men slain; amongst whom were Coton, Fitz Williams, and Bishop, stout Commanders. Here it must not be omitted, That the English (who of all the dwellers in the Northern parts of the World, were hitherto the least Drunkards, and deserved praise for their sobriety) in these Dutch Wars learned to be Drunkards; and brought the vice so farre to over-spread the Kingdom, that Laws were laid to be enacted for repressing it.

But now whilst the States and the King of Spain contend about a few Towns in the Low-Countries, he seizeth upon the whole Kingdom of Portugal. For the last year, Henry, King of Portugal dying, many Competitors challenge the Kingdom; as the Duke of Savoy, the Prince of Parma's Son, Katherine Bracant, and the Queen of France. But Philip King of Spain, the Son of Henries eldest Sister, putting the Case to his Divines and Lawyers, and adjuring them to pronounce to whom of right it belonged, they pronounced, for him; whereupon he sent Duke D'Alva, who put to flight Antonio, whom the people had elected King, and within few days subdued all Portugal. The Queen of France angry hereat, and enviously beholding the King of Spain's Dominions thus enlarged, being now Master of Portugal, the East-Indies, and many Islands besides, adviceth, amongst other Princes, Queen Elizabeth, to bethink themselves in time, of restraining his too excessive Dominions. Whereupon the Queen received Don Antonio, and lovingly relieved him, which she thought might be done without any breach of the League with Spain, seeing Don Antonio was descended of English blood, and of the House of Lancaster; and that no Caution was in the League, That the Portuguese should not be admitted into England.

And now the Queen Mother of France, and the King her Son, more eagerly than ever, pursue the Match with Alanson now Duke of Anjou, for the transacting whereof, they sent in Ambassage into England, Francis Bourbon, Prince of Dauphine, Arthur Cesse, Marshall of France, and many other honourable Personages, who were entertained with great respect (a House being purposely built at Westminster for that use, royally furnished; Tiltings and Jests proclaimed, by Philip Earl of Arundel, Frederick Baron of Wondor, St Philip Sidney, and St Fulk Grevill, against all comers. The Delegates that were to confer with the French concerning the marriage, were St William Cecil, Lord Treasurer, Edward Earl of Lincoln, Lord Admirall, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, St Christopher Hutton, and St Francis Walsingham, Secretary; by whom Covenants of Marriage were at length agreed on; First, That the Duke of Anjou, and the Queen of England, within six weeks after the ratification of the Articles, should contract Matrimony, and the rest, most of them such as were before agreed on, in the Marriage between Queen Mary and King Philip, chiefly consisting in conferring Honour upon the Duke, but Power upon the Queen. It was also agreed, That all particulars should be ratified within two Moneths, by the faithfull Promise and Oath of the French King, for him and his Heirs, and a Reservation was also added apart, with the Hands and Seals of every one of the Delegates, That Queen Elizabeth is not bound to finish the Marriage, until she and the Duke have given each other satisfaction in some Particulars, and have certified the French King of the same within six weeks. Before those fix weeks were expired, Simier, Secretary to the Councell, is sent into France, to require the King of France his Confirmation: The King will not hear him, but presseth to have the Marriage accomplished, as it was contracted, and that nothing else was to be done. Simier on the other side, sheweth by the Articles, That a League offensive and defensive must first be concluded. This the French King disclaimeth: Whereupon Walsingham is presently sent to compose this difference, who jointly with Henry Cobham, the Ambassador ordinary, and Simier, alledgeth to the French King these Particulars, That Queen Elizabeth for no other reason was willing to marry, but

For the satisfaction of her people; and seeing many Impediments were come in the way since the first Treaty, namely the Civil War in France, and the Dukes engagement in a War with Spain, which makes the wives of her Subjects now to be against the Match: This hath made her to defer the accomplishment of it, although her affection be still constant toward the Duke. For this cause the Queen would have no further Treaty to be held, till the French Duke be freed from the Spanish war, and a League of mutual offence and defence be agreed on. The French King willingly accepted of the League defensive; but of the offensive he would hear no speech, till the marriage were finished.

Not long after, the French Duke himself came into England, having with good success raised the Siege of Cambray; he was here received with as great humanity as he could wish, and nothing omitted, whereby he might judge himself to be truly welcome: Insomuch that in November, when the Anniversary of the Queens Inauguration came to be solemnized, the Queen (while they were in Love-conference) drew a Ring off from her finger, and put it upon his, upon some private conditions. The standers by imagined, that by this Ceremony the marriage was confirmed between them; and Aldegond Governour of Antwerp being there, presently dispatched messengers into the Low-Countries, to give notice of it; and thereupon Bonfires were made, and all shews of rejoicing. But the Earl of Leicester (who privily plotted to cross the Match) Haston the Vice-chamberlain, and Secretary Walsingham, first and are enraged, as if the Kingdom, the Queen and Religion, were now utterly overthrown. The Maids of Honour, and Ladies that were familiar with the Queen, made grievous lamentation, and so terrified and daunted her, that she could take no rest that night. The next day, she calleth to her the French Duke, and causing all company to go aside, they privately entertain a long discourse. At length the Duke returning to his lodging, cast the Ring away from him, and after a while takes it up again, terribly exclaiming against the levity and inconsistency of Women.

The Queen at this time was much troubled at a Book lately put forth, with this Title, The Gulph wherein England will be swallowed by the French Marriage: whereof, conceiving that some Puritan was the Author, it made her highly displeased with the Puritans: whereupon within a few days, John Stubbes of Lincolns Inne, a zealous Professor, and the Author of this Book, (whose sister, Thomas Cartwright, the Father of the Puritans, had married) William Page that dispersed the copies, and Singleton the Printer, were apprehended, against whom Sentence was pronounced, That their Right hand should be cut off, by virtue of a Law made in the Reign of Philip and Mary, against the Authors and dispersers of Seditious Writings, (though the chief Lawyers and Judges of the Kingdom could not agree concerning the force of that Statute.) Hereupon Stubbes and Page were brought to the Scaffold, made of purpose, in the Market place at Westminster, and their right hands with Butchers knife and a mallet cut off by the wrist; the Printer was pardoned. At that time, Stubbs when his right hand was cut off, uncovered his head with the left, and cried out, God save the Queen, to the great amazement of all the beholders.

At this time the Queen, upon importunatesuit of her Councell, gave way, that Edmund Campian, Ralph Sherwin, and Alexander Bryant, Priests, should be called to the Bar, who being accused by virtue of a Law made in the five and twentieth year of King Edward the third, to have plotted the ruine of the Queen and Kingdom; to be adhering to the Pope, the Queens enemy, and coming into England, to raise Forces against the State, were then condemned of High-treason, and accordingly executed. Campian after he was convicted, being demanded; First, whether Queen Elizabeth were a lawful Queen? would make no answer; afterward, Whether he would stand for the Queen, or for the Pope, if he should send an Army against the Queen; he plainly protested, That he would be of the Popes side, and witnessed so much under his hand. After this some other Papists upon the like occasion were also put to death, which the Queen rather necessarily, than willingly assented to, as being unwilling to force the conscience of any. These, and the like exorbitances of Papists, were cause, that new and strict Laws were enacted against them the Parliament following, which began the next January.

The French Duke after three moneths abode in England, took his Journey in February, into the Low-Countries, whom the Queen her self brought on his way as far as Canterbury; and then commanded the Earl of Leicester, the Lord Charles Howard, Hunsdon, Willoughby, Windsor, Sheffield, St Philip Sidney, St Francis Russell, St George Bourne, and some other prime Knights to accompany him to Antwerp, where he is made Duke of Brabant, Limbourg, and Lorrain; for the Dutch had long before removed the King of Spains Government, and quitted the people from their oath of Allegiance, that it might be in their power to choose any other Prince. Here the Duke of Anjou gave free leave to exercise the Roman Religion, to as many as would swear Fealty to him, and abjure the King of Spains authority: but after all, having spent a great matter of money, with which he was supplied from England; and observing that only vain and empty titles were conferred upon him, while the States held all the Dominion in their own hands, he rashly entered an assault upon Antwerp, and some other Towns, and shortly departed without any great matter performed.

At this time Queen Elizabeth, as well to get her some friends, as she had procured her self many enemies; received into the Order of the Garter, Frederick the second King of Denmark; to whom she employed St Peregrine Berrye (whom she had lately made Lord Willoughby of Eresby) to love him.

The Duke of Anjou comes himself into England.

And in a private conference with the Queen, the draws a Ring off from her finger and puts it upon his. The English Lords and Ladies, imagining the marriage to be confirmed, reexceedingly.

The next day she calleth the French Duke to her, and after a long discourse, made him exclaim against the inconsistency of Women.

Campian, Sherwin and Bryant are executed.

The Duke of Anjou goes out of England, whom the Queen brought on his way as far as Canterbury.

I 582. St Peregrine Berrye made Lord Willoughby of Eresby.

But

The Earl of Morton is beheaded, as accessory to the murder of the Kings Father.

General Norris raiseth the Siege at Stenwick. But is afterward vanquished, wounded, and a great number of his men slain.

In these Dutch wars the English learn to be Drunkards.

The King of Spain seizeth upon the Kingdom of Portugal, and putteth Don Antonio to flight.

Whom Queen Elizabeth received, and relieved.

I 581. The Match with Anjou now Duke of Anjou is pursued as usual.

And Articles of the Marriage are agreed on.

But the King of France disclaimeth the Articles.

The Earl Gowry and other Lords take the King and keep him as a prisoner.

But now to prevent the Duke of Guyes design in Scotland, which was to make use of the Duke of Lenox favour with the King, to withdraw his affection from the English: William Reuben, whom the King had lately made Earl of Gowry, endeavour'd with others, by all means to remove Lenox; and the Earl of Arran from the King; and so, while Lenox was gone from Perth, (where the King at that time was) to Edinburgh, and Arran was also absent on a journey: the Earls Gowry, Murre, Lindley, and other, taking the opportunity, invited the King to the Castle of Reuben, and there detained him, not permitting him to walk abroad: All his trusty servants they removed from about him, Arran they cast in Prison, enforced the King to call home the Earl of Angus, and to send away Lenox into France, who being a man of a soft and gentle disposition, for the Kings safety readily consented; and not content with all this, they compelled the King by his Letters to Queen Elizabeth, to approve and allow of this his thralldom. The Queen of Scotland the mean while, bewailing her own hard fortune, and the distress of the King her Son, layeth open the same in a large Letter, written to the Queen in French: With which Letter, Queen Elizabeth being somewhat affected, sent unto her Robert Beal Clerk of the Council, to expostulate with her concerning the querulous writing, and jointly with the Earl of Shrewsbury, to treat of the setting her at liberty. And indeed serious consultations was held at the Council Table about it, and the most were of opinion, that upon certain conditions she should have her liberty; but the Scottish of the English faction opposing it, nothing was effected.

Soon after this, the King sent Colonel William Steward, and John Colvill to Queen Elizabeth, profering all manner of respect and obsequence, and requesting her advice for quieting the tumults in Scotland, and also for his contracting of marriage. At which time, news was brought, that the Duke of Lenox was dead in France, who departing this life at Paris, even at the very point of death, as often times before, made open profession of the Protestant Religion; thereby confuting those who had maliciously traduced him for a Papist. After whose death, when the sufferers of the King were left up in their own conceits, as thinking they had him safe enough, He on a sudden (though scarce eighteen years of age) with some few others, conveyed himself to the Castle of St Andrews, to whom the Nobility presently repaired, bringing Armed Bands with them, as fearing some danger might befall him. Afterwards, in fair words he advised some of his surprizers to go from the Court, for avoiding of tumult, and promising them pardon, if they would crave it. But Gowry only asked pardon, and submitted himself, using this distinction, That he had not offended in matter, but in form only; and then the King sent for the Earl of Arran to the Court, and respected him as his intimate friend, employing him to compose the differences amongst the Nobility, and to purge the Kingdom and his own Court from civil dissensions.

While he is sedulous in these cares, comes St Francis Walsingham from Queen Elizabeth, to advise him not to be led away by evil Counsellors to the destruction of both Kingdoms. He findeth the King accompanied with the flower of the Nobility, and beholdeth another manner of Majesty than he looked for in Scotland: Having Audience given him, he put the King in minde, of what the Queen out of Isocrates, in private Letters had formerly admonished him: That a Prince must be such a lover of Truth, that more credit may be given to his bare Word, than to another's oath; and in many words advised him, to beware now in his youth of evil Counsellors, and always to be like himself. The King answered, that he was an absolute Prince, and would not that others should appoint him Counsellors whom he liked not; but that he had long since devoted the first-fruits of his amity to the Queen of England, his dear Sister, and doth now willingly make proper of the same. Walsingham now dealt with him further; not to lay to the Queens charge, what broyles had lately fallen out in Scotland; sheweth, how beneficiall to him, and to both Kingdoms Amity had been hitherto, and would be in time to come also, so it were not neglected; and that the same might the better be confirmed, if the variance between the Nobility were laid asleep, by a Law of Oblivion enacted in Parliament, the Peers which now were removed from the Court called back again, Religion looked into, and a firm League concluded between both Kingdoms. The King made answer, that he gladly embraced Amity with England, and that he would constantly defend the Religion already established: Afterward he lovingly dismissed Walsingham, though he held him no good friend to him and his Mother; and carefully looking to matters with understanding, even above his years, proposed and profered reconciliation to those that had surprized him, if within a limited time they asked pardon; which they were so fast from doing, that they entred into new consultations to surprize him again; whereupon they are commanded within a set time to leave the Kingdom, of which number, Murre, Glames, Paulet, and some other, becooke themselves into Ireland; Boyd, Zetter, Weeme, Luchlevin, into the Low-countries; Dumferlin into France; the Earl of Angus is confined to his Earldom, Gowry only to his own estate; layeth behind the limited time, hatching new devices.

About this time happened a difference, and thereupon a War, between the Emperours of Muscovia, and the King of Sweden; when John King of Sweden, doubting himself to be so fit Match for the Emperour, sent a Royal Ambassage to Queen Elizabeth, requesting her to intercede for him to the Emperour; which she did without delay, and by her Ambassadour drew the Muscovian to a Peace upon reasonable Conditions. But the Muscovian shortly after dying, and Theodorus his Successor granting free Traffique to Merchants of all Nations that would come thither, the Queen importuned him to admit of none but English Merchants, requiring him to confirm the Priviledges which his Father had granted them: Whereunto, by way of Answer, he demanded Free Trading for all the English, saying, It was not fit that a small Company should exercise a Monopoly, and all other be restrained: But as for Customs, he promised to take lesse by half of that Company, than of any other, because they first opened the way thither.

The next Summer, Albertus Alasco, a Palatine of Poland, of a comely personage, and great learning, came into England to see the Queen, who was nobly entertained, both by her, and the Nobility, as also by the Scholars of Oxford, with learned Orations, and other Recreations: but having tarried here four months, and run into much debt, he secretly withdrew himself and departed. This man I saw my self afterward in Crakow, very bare, though it was reported of him, That he had in a Dowry with a Wife, fifty Cattles of great value: but what mine can bear the charges of prodigality.

This year proved fatal to divers great men; for there dyed this year, first Thomas Ratcliffe, the third Earl of Suffex of this Family; a man of a great spirit, and great faithfullnesse to his Country. There dyed also Henry Wryghthly Earl of Southampton, one exceedingly devoted to the Romish Religion, and a great favourer of the Queen of Scotts, which cost him Queen Elizabeths displeasure, and imprisonment besides. There dyed also St Humphrey Gilbert, who was cast away at Sea, in his return from the North part of America, whither he lately sayled with five Ships, having sold his Patrimony, in hope to plant a Colony there. There dyed also Edmund Grindall, Archbishop of Canterbury, being blind through age, a grave and pious Prelate, who stood highly in the Queens favour for a long time, till he lost it at last, by favouring (as was said) the Puritans Conventicles; but the true cause indeed was, for disallowing the Marriage of Julius an Italian Physician with another mans Wife, against the Earl of Leicesters pleasure. Grindall dying, John Whitgift succeeded in the See of Canterbury, being translated thither from the See of Worcester.

At this time, certain Popish Books written against the Queen, and Princes Excommunicate, withdrew divers from their Allegiance, and particularly, so intoxicated one Somerville, an English Gentleman, that he went privately to the Court, and breathing out nothing but blood and death against all Protestants, set upon one or two by the way with his drawn sword. Being apprehended, he suck not to say, That he would murder the Queen with his own hands. Hereupon he, and upon his intimation, Edward Arden his father-in-law (a man of an ancient House in Warwickshire) Ardens wife, their daughter, Somerviles wife, and Hall a Priest, were brought to the Bar, and all condemned; Somerville as principall, the rest as accessaries. Three dayes after, Somerville was found strangled in the Prison, Arden was executed and quartered; the women and the Priest were spared. Many pitied the old Gentleman Arden, as misled by the Priest, and (as it was generally believed) brought to his end through the envy of Leicester, whom he used to call Whore-master, Upstart, and many such opprobrious names.

In the Netherlands, the English Garrison at Alost in Flanders being neglected; the Governour Pigo, and the other Captains, for want of pay, upon Composition, yielded up the Town to the Spaniards, and then fearing disgrace at home, joynd themselves to the Prince of Parma; at whose hands finding themselves slighted, by degrees they stole all away, and came all to unlucky ends.

In Ireland the famous Rebell, Gyralt Fitz Gyralt, the eleventh Earl of Desmond of this Family, having a long time in lurking places escaped the English, was now by a common Souldier found out in a poor Cottage and slain. His head was sent into England, and set upon London Bridge. This end had this great Lord, descended from Maurice, the Son of Gyralt of Windsor, an English man, famous amongst those who first set upon Ireland, in the year 1170. He possessed whole Countries, together with the County Palatine of Kerry, and had of his own Name and Race, at least five hundred Gentlemen at his Command. All whom, and his own life also, he lost within the space of three years, very few of the House being left alive. And this dyfaster he fell into, by proving Trayterous to his Prince, at the instigation of a certain Popish Priest. Of whom, the chief was one Nicholas Sanders an English man, who at the same time dyed miserably of Famine, being starved to death, when as being forsaken, and running mad upon his ill fucesse, he roamed up and down the Mountains and Groves, finding nothing to sustain him. In his Scrip were found certain Orations and Letters, written to hearten the Rebels, and promising large rewards from the Pope and King of Spain. Upon the Rebels ill successe, James Fitz Eustace, Viscount Baltinglas fled into Spain, where he pined away with grief. He out of zeal to the Roman Religion, a little before he had taken up Arms with the Rebels, and exhorting the Earl of Ormond his neighbour, to do the like, (who drew his Linage from St Thomas of Canterbury, he used these words to persuade him, That if St Thomas of Canterbury had not died for the Church of Rome, thou hadst never been Earl of Ormond: for King Henry the second, to expiate the murder of Thomas Becket, gave large lands in Ormond to his Predecessors.

The beginning of the next Spring, certain Scotts, together with Gowry, plotted again to surprize the King, pretending only a care of Religion, and to remove ill Counsellors from him: but the King having intelligence of their practise, used means by Colonel Steward, to have Gowry taken and cast into prison: whereupon Murre, Glames, Angus, and other of the confederates fled into England, and beseech the Queen to commiserate their estate, who had incurred the Kings displeasure to do her and the Kingdom of England service. The King on the other side, accuseth them to the Queen of heinous crimes, and requires to have them delivered up into his hands. But Secretary Walsingham, who bore great good will to these men, sent Letters with a Command, That they should be safely admitted into Lindisferne, otherwise called, The holy Island, where Hunsdon being Governor there, and greatly addicted to the King of Scots, resided. Walsingham's Command, alleading he could not satisfy the Secretary in this point, unless the Queen gave expresse Command. Hereupon grew a Dispute, Whether a Secretary of State might not transact business of State, without special Commission from the Prince. How this Case was determined, is uncertain; but sure it is, the Scots came not thither, though some favour they had shewed them here in England. In the mean time, Gowry was tried by his Peers, at Stirling where, being accused of many Treasons, though he gave colourable answers to them all, yet was found guilty, condemned, and beheaded; whose head his servants sewing to his body, committed to the Grave.

About this time were practises plotted against Queen Elizabeth, in behalf of the Queen of Scots chiefly by Francis Throgmorton, eldest Son of John Throgmorton, Justice of Chester, who came to be suspected, by reason of Letters sent to the Queen of Scots which were intercepted. Upon his apprehension, Thomas Lord Paget, and Charles Arundel, privately stole away into France, grievously complaining against Leicester and Walsingham, for alienating the Queen from them, and using such wiles, that scarce any man was able to live in safety. Henry Earl of Northumberland, and Philip Earl of Arundel, were confined to their houses, his wife committed to the custody of St Thomas Shirley, William Howard, the Earls Brother, and Henry Howard, their Uncle. Brother to the Duke of Norfolk, were examined about Letters from the Queen of Scots, and many Stratagems were set on foot, dangerous to some particular persons, but necessary (as should seem) for the Queens security. Certain it is, That now the Malice of the Papists against the Queen, brake forth more violently than ever before; for in printed Books they stirred up the Queens own servants to attempt the like upon her, that Judith did on Olophernes. The Author of these Books could not be found, but the suspicion lay upon one Gregory Martin sometime of Oxford, and Carter a Stationer, who printed the Books, suffered for it. And whereas the Papists every where traduced the Queen for cruelty, she desirous always to leave a blessed remembrance behind her, grew extremely offended with the Commissioners for Popish causes, taxing them of too much cruelty: inasmuch that they were fain, in a printed Declaration, to clear themselves, protesting; That they questioned no man for his Religion, but only for dangerous attempts against the Queen and State; and that Campion himself was never so racked, but that he could presently walk up and down. But all this gave no: the Queen satisfaction, but she Commanded the Commissioners to forbear tortures, and the Judges other punishments; and not long after, when seventy Priests were taken, and some of them condemned, and the rest in danger of the Law, she caused them all to be shipped away, and sent out of England: The chief of whom were Gasper Heywood, the great Epigrammatist's Son, the first Jesuite that ever set foot in England, James Bulgrave, John Hart, and Edmund Rishston.

At this time Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, was thrust out of England, for joyning with Throgmorton in his Treason against the Queen; whereupon Sir William Wade was sent to the King of Spain, to satisfy him how ill Mendoza had discharged the Office of an Ambassador here in England; who, when the King admitted him not to his Presence, but in a slighting manner, putting him off to his Counsellors; Wade taking it in great disdain, boldly said, That it was a declared Custom amongst Princes (though in heat of War) to give Ambassadors audience, and thereupon stoutly refused to declare his Ambassage, and so returned into England unheard. The greatest matters laid to Mendoza's charge, were gotten out of Throgmorton's Confession; for when he was in danger to be apprehended, he sent to Mendoza a box of Writings, and when his Chefts were searched, there were found two Scrowls, one with the names of the Ports of England, and in the other the names of the Nobility and Gentry in England, that favoured the Romish Religion. These, when Throgmorton saw brought forth, he said they were counterfeited, and stood to it upon the very Rack; but being brought to the Rack the second time, he then confessed all; That Morgan by Letters out of France, had given him information, that the Catholick Princes had decreed to invade England, and with the help of the Duke of Guise, to free the Queen of Scots; and that nothing was now wanting, but money and aid in England; and that for procuring of this, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was sent into Switzer, where the Duke of Guise intended to land; and that he had imparted all this matter to Mendoza, and intimated the names of the Ports, and of the Noblemen that should assist. But being arraigned at the Guild-hall, he denied all this again, saying, He had spoken so, because he would not be Racked again. Yet being condemned to die, he flying to the Queens mercy, confessed in manner all he had before related; and then at the Gallows went about to deny it again. So falling to it selfs the mind of man when it is divided between hope and fear, and lies under the burden of a guilty conscience.

Sir William Wade being returned from Spain, was employed to the Queen of Scots about a Treaty begun two years before: To whom the distressed Queen sincerely professed, That she devoted her service and her self to the Queen of England; and made solemn promise, That if the former Treaty might go on, she would mediate with the King her Son, to receive into favour the Earl of Angus, and the other Scottish Lords, and would charge the Bishops of Rosse and Glasgow, her Agents in France, to have no further to do with the English Fugitives. These things Queen Elizabeth heard gladly, and thereupon sent Beal to the Queen of Scots, who joyntly with the Earl of Shrewsbury should signify unto her, That if she continued still in the same minde, as she had delivered to Wade; Sir Walter Mildmay should come out of hand to her, and treat concerning her liberty; but withall she commanded Mildmay and Beale to dive into her as well as they could, to know what practises the Duke of Guise had on foot. To that which she had spoken to Sir William Wade, the Queen of Scots made a wary answer; but to that concerning the Duke of Guise, she plainly confesseth; That being sickly her self, and weak of body, she had committed her self and her Son, to the Protection of the Duke of Guise, her dear Cousen, of whose intendments she knoweth nothing; nor if she did, would she disclose them, unless she might be sure of her own liberty. Lastly, she requesteth, That being a free and an absolute Prince, she may not be worse handled, than Queen Elizabeth her self was, when she was a subject, and kept in prison by her Sister. These things had a hearing, but no feeling, and the rather by a strange accident; for Creighton a Scottish Jesuite, sayling from the Low-Countries, and taken by Dutch Pirats, had certain papers which he tore and threw away, which thrown over-board, and by the wind blown back unto the ship, miraculously (as Creighton himself said) they were brought to Sir William Wade, who patching them together with much labour and cunning, discovered by them some new intendments of the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Guise, about the Invading of England: Whereupon, and upon divers other rumours, the better to provide for the safety of the Queen, a number of her Subjects (the Earl of Leicester being the formost) men of all ranks and conditions, bound themselves mutually to each other by their oaths and subscriptions, to persecute all those to the very death, that should attempt any thing against the Queen; which league of theirs they called the Association.

The Queen of Scots who presently apprehended, that this Association was entred into for her destruction; maketh this proposition by Nave her Secretary, to the Queen and the Council; That if she might have her liberty granted, and be assured of the Queens love, she would enter a strict league and amity with her, and passing by all matters of offence, esteem and honour her, above all the Princes of the Christian world: yea, and (saying the ancient League betwixt France and Scotland) she would her self be comprehended in the Association, and a League defensive, against all that should go about to injure the Queen. Herewith Queen Elizabeth was wonderfully pleased, and at that time certainly had an inclination to grant her freedom. But see what malice can do; for many in England, but specially the Scots of the adverse party, endeavoured by all means to hinder it; exclaiming, That the Queen could be no longer in safety, if the Queen of Scots were set at liberty; That both Kingdoms were utterly undone, if she were admitted into the joynt Government of the Kingdom of Scotland, and that the reformed Religion lay a bleeding, if Papists were admitted within the Court walls; nor was this all, but the Scottish Ministers in their Pulpits, loaded the Queen of Scots with all manner of contumelies, slandering the King himself, and his Council in the most bitter manner; and being cited to appear before him, refused, saying, That the Pulpits were exempted from all Regal Authority, and that Ecclesiastical persons were not to be censured by their Prince, but by their own Consistory (directly against the Laws made the year before in Parliament) whereby the Kings Authority over all persons, whether Ecclesiastical, or Secular, was confirmed; and namely, That the King and his Council, were Supreme Judges in all Causes; and that whosoever refused to be tried by them, should be holden guilty of High-treason; all Presbyters and Lay-conventicles forbidden, Parity of the Clergy taken away, and the Authority of Bishops restored, whose Calling the Presbyteries had condemned as wicked and Antichristian: And lastly, all scurrilous Libels against the King and his Mother prohibited; namely, the Scottish History of George Buchanan, and his Dialogue, de Jure Regni apud Scotos.

At this time, upon her Adversaries suggestion, the Queen of Scots is taken from the Earl of Shrewsbury, and committed to the custody of Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drue Drury, and that on set purpose (as some were persuaded) to drive her into abrupt and desperate attempts; and indeed upon this, she grew more importunate with the Pope and King of Spain, to hasten their interment, whatsoever became of her, as ill indeed was like to become of her, if it be true (as some said) that Leicester sent out assassins to make her away, but that Drury detested the villany, and would grant them no access.

And now to alienate Queen Elizabeth utterly from her; it is suggested to her, That Allen for the Catholics of the Clergy, Inglefield for the Laity, and the Bishop of Rosse for the Queen of Scots, with consent of the Pope and King of Spain, had joyntly combined to depose her, and to bar the King of Scotland from his hereditary Right to the Crown of England, and to marry the Queen of Scots to an English Nobleman of the Romish Religion, and him the English Catholics should choose King of England, and the Pope confirm the Election; and all this upon the credit of Hari the Priest; but who this English Nobleman should be that should marry the Queen of Scots, could not be found, though Walsingham were busie to search it out: the same went upon Henry Howard the Duke of Norfolk's Brother, who was a single man, a great Papist, and of high estimation amongst the Catholics.

This year died in Exile and misery, Charles Nevell, who was in the Rebellion in the North, the last Earl of Westmerland of this Family; a House from whence descended many Noble

It was now the year 1585: and the eight and twentieth of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when, to tie the French King more nearly to her, whom the year before she had received into the number of the Knights of the Garter, she sent the Earl of Derby into France, to invest him with the Robes and Ornaments, according to the due Solemnity; which he kindly accepted, and at Evening Prayer B

At this time a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, wherein William Parry a Welsh man, a Doctor of the Laws, when in the Lower House a Bill was read against the Jesuites, he alone stood up, and exclaimed that it was a cruel and bloody Law: and being asked his reason, he stoutly refused, unless he were requited by the Lords of the Council. Hereupon he was sent to the Gate-house, but upon submission was received into the House again. Soon after, he was accused by Edward Nevill, for holding secret consultations about making the Queen away, Who thereupon apprehended, upon his examination, confessed in effect thus much, That out of discontent, he went beyond the Sea, where, by the encouragement of Campegio the Pope Nuncio at Venice, and grant of a plenary Indulgence from the Pope, he undertook to kill the Q Queen; but coming into England to that intent, he altered his minde, and disclosed to the Queen the whole matter. After this, he received a Letter from the Cardinal of Como, perswading him to go forward with the Enterprize; and this Letter also he shewed the Queen. After this, he chanced to see a Book of Doctor Allens, written contra Justitiam Britannicam, wherein was declared, That Princes who were for heresie excommunicate, might lawfully be deprived of their life and Kingdom. This Book wonderfully confirmed him, and he read it to Nevill; who, though he took an oath of secrecy, yet now upon a hope of the Earldom of Westmerland, betrayed him. This was his confession, before Baron Hunsdon, St Christopher Hutton, and St Francis Walsingham: as likewise in his Letters to the Queen, to the Lord Burleigh, and the Earl of Leicester, acknowledging his fault, and craving mercy. A few days after, he was called to the Bar in Westminster Hall, where he confessed himself guilty, and thereupon was condemned.
After the sentence of death pronounced, he curiously cited the Queen to Gods Tribunal; five days after he was laid upon a Hurdle, and dragged through the City to Westminster, where at the Gibbet he made a vain-glorious boasting of his faithfulness to the Queen, but not so much as in a word commended himself to God; and in the great Palace at Westminster was executed as a Traytor, the Nobility and Commons sitting then in Parliament.

In this Parliament, the Association before spoken of, was universally approved, and enacted in this Form; That four and twenty, or more, of the Queens Privy Council, and Peers of the Realm, should be selected and authorized, under the Great Seal of England, To make enquiry of all such persons as shall attempt to invade the Kingdom, or raise Rebellion, or shall attempt any evil against the Queens Person, for Whomsoever, that layeth any claim to the Crown of England, and that person for whom, or by whom they shall attempt any such thing, shall be altogether incapable of the Crown; and more to this purpose. Laws also for the Queens safety, were enacted against Jesuites and Popish Priests, and against all that shall receive or relieve them. These Laws terrified many, and particularly out of fear of them, Philip Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Norfolk, eldest Son, purposed with himself to travel beyond Seas; for having been once or twice cited before the Lords of the Council, and confined to his house, and after six moneths set at liberty, he thereupon wrote a Letter to the Queen, That for the service of God, and his souls health, he purposed to leave his Country, but not his loyal affection towards her; but as he was taking Shipping, by his own servants treachery he was discovered, apprehended and laid in the Tower.

At the same time lay in the Tower Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland; a man of a lofty spirit, being suspected by reason of secret consultation with Throgmorton, the Lord Paget, and the Gwis, of about the invading of England, and freeing of the Queen of Scots (whose cause he ever highly favoured) but in the month of June, he was found dead in his bed, shot into the body with three bullets, under his right pap, and the door bolted on the inside. The Coroners Inquest examining the matter, found and pronounced that he had killed himself. Three days after, the Lords meeting in the Star-chamber, Bromley Lord Chancellor, declared this fact of the Earls, and then commanded the Attorney General to shew the cause of his imprisonment, and the manner of his death; whereupon, Popham first, and then Egerton the Queens Solicitor, in long Ora-ons, lay open all his Treasons, and how for fear of the Law, he had laid violent hands upon himself.

And now the Queen knowing that the seeds of these Treasons proceeded from the Duke of Guise, and his adherents, she sought for the strengthening of herself, to enter into the League with the Princes of Germany; and to this end, she sent St Thomas Bodley to the King of Denmark, to the Count Elector Palatine of the Rhine, to the Duke of Saxony, Wittenberg, Brunswick, Lüne-burg, the Marquess of Brandenburg, and the Landgrave of Hesse; and into Scotland, she sent St Edward Wootton, to let the King understand how sincerely she was affected towards him, and wisheth

A to draw the King (if he could) into a League of mutual defence and offence, and to commess to him the Match of the King of Denmarks Daughter. The King was very inclinable to the matter of the League, but for the present the business was interrupted, by the death of Francis Russell, Son to the Earl of Bedford, slain at a meeting to compound a difference between the Borderers, by a sudden tumult of the Scots, but who it was that slew him, was not known. The English laid it upon the Earl of Arran, and the Lord Fernhurst Governour of the middle Borders; whereupon, at the Queens complaint, the Earl of Arran was confined, and Fernhurst committed to prison at Dundee, where he dyed; a man of great valour and resolution, and one that was always firm for the Queen of Scots. But Queen Elizabeth not thus satisfied, gave leave by way of connivence to the Scottish Lords that were fled into England, namely the Earl of Angus, the B Hamiltons, and John Cladius, the Earl of Marre, Glames, and other, that they should steal away into Scotland, (the supplying them with money) there to matter and subdue the Earl of Ar-ran. For Maxwell, who was lately made Earl of Bothwell, Baron Humes, Goldingknolls, and other in Scotland, had already promised them their assistance, even in the very Court. St Patrick Gray (Arrans great Rival for the Kings favour) Belenden, and Secretary Maitland (by Woottons craft) were made against Arran. These men, upon their first entry into Scotland, command all persons in the Kings name, to aid them for conserving the truth of the Gospell, for freeing the King from corrupt Counsellors, and for maintaining of Amity with the English, so as there presently joyined with them about eight thousand men. The Earl of Arran hearing hereof, makes halt to the King, and accuseth Patrick Gray as Author of this commotion: but whiles Arran was making provision for defence of the Town, the enemies were ready to scale the Walls: whereupon Arran being advised, that only his life was sought, gets secretly away with only one servant, the rest betook themselves to the King in the Castle. Then the Rebels get into the Marketplace, and display their Banners against the Castle: The King sends Gray to know the reason of their coming; they answer, to submit themselves and in humble manner to kisse the Kings hands:
the King offereth restitution of all their goods, if they would depart; They desire to be admitted to his Presence, which upon these conditions the King granted. That they should not attempt any thing against his life, or those whom he should nominate, nor make any innovation in the Government. They protest, They are ready to sacrifice their lives for the Kings safety; and of any Innovation they had not so much as a thought; only they request to have their adversaries, and the Fortifications of Scotland delivered up into their hands. Hereupon after a days Consultation, they are admitted into the Kings Presence, and forthwith the Earls of Mount Rose, Crawford, and Rothsay; Colonel Steward, Downs, Arrans Brothers, and others, were delivered to them: The Earl of Arran, who was fled into the Western Islands, is called home: the assaulters were pardoned, and pronounced good subjects. Hamilton is set over Dumfriess Castle; Goldingknolls over Edinburgh; the Earl of Angus over Tumballon; the Earl of Marre over Stirling; and Glames is made Captain of the Guard. Upon this, all Proscriptions and Outlaws against all Persons, since the Kings Inauguration (saving some few proscribed for the murder of the Kings Father) are called in, and with an unanimous consent of all parties, the Treaty of a League with the Queen of England is agreed upon, and Delegates nominated to that purpose.

In Ireland likewise was a Combustion this year, first the Burkes (descended of the ancient Family of the Burroughs in England) provoked by the severe Government of Richard Bingham, Governour of Connaught, raise Rebellion; but this was soon suppressed, for Thomas Burke dyed fighting; Meyler, and Theobald Burke, were taken and hanged. After this the Clan Gibbons, Clan Donells, and Joyes, combined together in great numbers, and say plainly, They will have a Mac-Williams of their own, one of the Burkes to rule over them, or some other Lord out of Spain; they will admit of no Sheriff into their Country, nor appear before the English Courts of Justice; and thereupon harried all the Country with Fire and Sword, and neither by the persuasions of the Archbishop Tuan, nor by the intreaties of the Earl of Clanriccard (the chief of the House of the Burkes) would be quieted, till John Bingham the Presidents Brother, following them into the Woods, drave away five thousand head of their Cattell, so as after forty days, half starved, they came forth and submitted themselves. But this was not yet an end, for now the President understood, That two thousand Scottish Islanders were landed, and ready to break into Connaught; whereupon he musters his men to give them battell; but they flying to Bogs and Woods, he retires back as though in fear, thereby to draw them from the Bogs to firm ground, and then with his whole Forces set upon them, slew three thousand of them (indeed all but fourscore amongst whom were Donell Garmy, and Alexander Garmy, the sons of James Mac-Conel, who had long disquieted this part, and those Burkes who were the first authors of this Rebellion. This was a famous Victory, for the good of the present and future times; for hereby the name of the Mac-Williams in Connaught was utterly extinct, and the insolent attempts of the Scottish Islanders absolutely crushed.

In the Low-Countries at this time the States were very hard beset, so as they held a Consultation, whither to flee for Protection, either to the French King, or to the Queen of England.
Monsieur Prunie the French Ambassadors shewed many advantages, and gave many reasons why they should flee rather to the French King; the English on the other side, alleged many reasons why they should flee rather to the Queen of England: but in conclusion they have first recourse to the King of France, and afterward being by him neglected, to the Queen of England.

England. But then in England it was consulted, Whether it were meet to protect them; wherein the Counsel was divided; some were of opinion, That it were good to receive and aid them, lest the Spaniards first conquering them, might have the better way to annoy England; other again thought, They were to be held no better than Rebels to their lawful Sovereign, and therefore unworthy of assistance. After long debating the matter, the Queen refused to take into Protection, much less to exercise Sovereignty over them. Nevertheless to raise the Siege of Antwerp, which was then beleaguer'd by the Prince of Parma, she was content to supply them with four thousand Souldiers, so as the Town of Sluce, and the Ordinance belonging to it, were given up into their hands: but while this matter was discussing, the Town of Antwerp was fain to yield it self.

But the Queen better bethinking her self, partly as fearing the growth of the King of Spain's power, and partly, as commiserating the afflicted of her own Religion, at last resolves to undertake their protection, upon condition of her part, to supply them with five thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, under a sufficient Generall, paying them during the War; and afterward the expenses to be payed back, upon condition on their part, by way of Pledge, to deliver Flushing and the Fort of Ramstein, the Town of Brill, with the two neighbouring Ports: and for the justifying of this her action, she set forth a large Declaration. And knowing that herein she incensed the King of Spain, she thought best to turn his anger further from home, and thereupon sent out

Sir Francis Drake, and Christopher Carleile, with a Navy of one and twenty Ships (wherein were two thousand Volunteers and Mariners) towards the West-Indies; who first surprized the Town of S<sup>t</sup> Jago, afterward S<sup>t</sup> Dominick (where five and twenty thousand Crows were given them, to spare the Town from burning) afterward Cartagena, which they held seven weeks, till the Spaniards redeemed it for a hundred and ten thousand Crowns. After this the Calcutra waxing hot, and diminishing their Forces, they returned homewards, passing by Virginia, a Colony which Sir Walter Raleigh had there planted; from whence Drake brings home with him Ralph Lane, who was the first that brought Tobacco into England, which the Indians take against cruelties of the Stomach. At this Expedition were lost about seven hundred men, who for the most part dyed of Calcutra: their Booty amounted to the value of three score thousand pounds Sterling, besides two hundred and forty Barres and Iron Pieces. These things were done under the Torrid Zone in America; when in the mean while, Captain John Davis, with two Ships (at the charges of William Sanderfon, and other Citizens of London) found out a way to the East-Indies, by the higher part of America, under the Frigid Zone.

But at last she undertakes it. She sends Sir Francis Drake and Christopher Carleile to the West-Indies, and what they effected there. Tobacco first brought into England at this time by Ralph Lane. John Davis finds out a way to the East-Indies by the higher part of America. The Earl of Leicester is sent General of the Queens Forces into Holland. A guering Duisburgh; which before the Prince of Parma could come to relieve, he took. And now the Prince of Parma, fearing lest Zurphin should come in danger, commandeth victuals to be carried thither, which the Spaniards carrying along in a fogge, the English by chance lighted on them, vanquished a Troop of their Horse, slew Hannibal Gonzaga, and divers others, but then on the English side was one slain, more worth than all the English and Spaniards put together, S<sup>t</sup> Philip Sidney, who having his Horse slain under him, and getting upon another, was shot into the thigh, and 25 days after, in the flower of his age, dyed: A man of so many excellent parts of Art and Nature, of Valour and Learning, of Wit and Magnanimity; that as he had equalled all those of former Ages, so future Ages will hardly be able to equal him. His Funerals were in sumptuous manner solemnized at S<sup>t</sup> Pauls Church in London. James King of Scotland made his Epitaph, and both Universities celebrated his death with Funeral Verses.

After this Leicester assaulted Zurphin, where setting upon a Fort, he takes it in this manner: Edward Stanley (of the Stanleys of Elford) catching hold of a Spaniards Lance, which was brandished at him, held it so fast, that by it he was drawn into the very Fort; whereupon the Spaniards being affrighted (as thinking all the enemies were coming up) forsook the place, Leicester Knighted Stanley for this act, gave him forty Pounds in present money, and a yearly Pension of an hundred Marks during his life. And now though in this forwardnesse to win the Town, yet Winter being already come on, he thought it unreasonable to besiege it any longer (especially so many English Garrisons lying round about it, which were in nature of a siege) but returned to the Hague, where the States entertained him with complaints, that their money was not carefully husbanded, that the number of the English supplies were not full, that foreign souldiers were levied without their consent, that the Priviledges of the United Provinces were set at nought, and new devices for contribution invented; for all which evils, they intreated him to provide some present remedy. To which complaints (having a purpose to go for England) he gave a friendly answer; but upon the very day in which he was to depart, he committeth the government of the Province, to the deliberation of the States; and the same day made another private instrument of writing, where he reserved to himself the whole authority over the Governours of the several Provinces, Cities, and Forts; and more than this, taketh away the wonted jurisdiction from the States Council, and Presidents of the Provinces, and came into England the third day of December. And thus passed the affairs of the Netherlands for this year.

But in England, Philip Earl of Arundel, who had lyen in Prison a whole year, was at last brought to the Starchamber; and being charged with fostering of Priests, and having correspondence with Allen and Parsons the Jesuite, and offering to depart the Kingdom without license, was fined ten thousand Pounds, and imprisonment during the Queens pleasure.

At this time, the Queen, by S<sup>t</sup> Horatio Palavicino, supplied with a large sum of money the King of Navarre; through whose side the Guyfies opposed the reformed Religion in Scotland, but her most intensive care was how to unite England and Scotland in a solid frinedship: To which end, she sent Thomas Randall into Scotland, who making Propositions to the King, touching a League offensive and defensive, though the King at first required some additions, and though the French Ambassadour infinitely opposed it, yet at last he consented to it; and in July following, there met at Darwick, Edward Earl of Rutland, William Lord Ever, and Thomas Randall for the Queen of England; Francis Earl of Bothwell, Robert Lord Boyde, and Humes for the King of Scots, and there the League (which was called the League of strict amity; for that the word Offensive liked not the Scots) was upon certain points concluded; First, for the maintenance of the reformed Religion, and then other such Articles, as commonly in Leagues are usual.

The very same month that this League was agreed on, a most dangerous conspiracy against the Queen was discovered. For first, one John Savage was by the persuasion of Gifford, Doctor in Divinity, induced to believe, that it was a meritorious work, to take away the lives of Princes Excommunicate, who thereupon vowed to kill Queen Elizabeth: but to make the Queen and her Council secure, at the same time they wrote a Book, exhorting the Papiests in England, to attempt nothing against their Prince, and to use only the Christian weapons of Tears, Prayers, Watching, and Fasting. About Whitsunide, one Bullard a Seminary Priest of Rhemes, acquainted with the vow of Savage, (having dealt in France with Mendoza and Charles Paget, about invading of England) arrived here in a Souldiers habit, and by a counterfeit name, called Captain Fosco, with these matters he acquainted one Anthony Babington, a Gentleman of Darbyshire, who by the Bishop of Glasco, the Queen of Scots Ambassador in France, had been commended to her, as one worthy of her love; so, as between them there passed often Letters in unknown Characters. In short time, Babington had drawn into the Plot, other Gentlemen as zealous of the Romish Religion as himself; namely, Edward Windsor, Brother to the Lord Windsor, Thomas Salisbury of a good Family in Devonshire, Charles Tilney one of the Queens Pensioners, Chydock Tichburn of Hampshire, Edward Abington (whose Father was Coferer to the Queen) Roberts Gage of Surrey, John Traverse, and John Charnock of Lancashire, John Jones, Savage formerly spoken of, Barnwell of a noble Family in Ireland, and Henry Dunne a Clerk in the Office of First-fruits and Tenths; one Pollie also secured himself into their company, a fellow thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of the Queen of Scots, who was thought to have revealed all their consultations to Walsingham day by day. To these Gentlemen, Babington communicateth his affairs, but not every particular to every one, but to Bullard, Tichburn, and Dunne, he sheweth the Letters which passed between him and the Queen of Scots; with Tilney, and the rest, he dealeth to be assistants, of whom, some at first loth, at last consented,

Leicester takes the Fort at Zurphin by the valour of Edward Stanley, and in what manner. The States complain of the Earl of Leicester's carriage.

Philip Earl of Arundel is fined, and why.

A League of strict Amity concluded with the King of Scots.

A dangerous Conspiracy is at this time discovered, begun by John Savage, but prosecuted by Anthony Babington and divers others.

confented, and in a foolish vaingloriousness, a picture of the Assassins was made to the life, and Babington in the midst with these words: Quorsum hac alio properantibus? This Picture (they say) was gotten and privately shewed to the Queen, who knew none of them by face, but only Bernwell, (who had oftentimes come to her in the caules of the Earl of Kildare, whose servant he was.) Certain it is, that the Queen one day walking abroad, spied this Bernwell, and turning to Hutton, said, Am not I well Guarded, that have not so much as one man in the company with a sword by his side? Thus much Bernwell himself told the rest of his confederacy, and how easie a matter it had been to have dispatched her at that time, if she had been present. The chief discoverer of the Plot, was the foresaid Gifford: This man was a Gentleman of a good House at Cheshington in Staffordshire, not far from Chartley, where the Queen of Scots was kept prisoner, and was now sent by the English fugitives in France, under the counterfeit name of Nelson to purchase Savage in minde of the vow he had made, and to convey letters between them and the Queen of Scots. But he, whether pricked in conscience, or dismayed in minde, came to Walsingham privately, revealing who he was, and for what end, and by whom sent into England. Walsingham courteously entertained him, and sent him down into Staffordshire, to do the work he had undertaken. Here Gifford bringing the Brewer of the house, where the Queen of Scots lay, contrived the matter in such sort with him, that by a hole in the wall, in which a loose stone was put, he should give in, and receive forth Letters, the which by messengers purposely laid by the way, came evermore to Walsingham's hands, who broke them open, copied them out, and by the rare cunning of one Thomas Philips, found out the meaning of the private Characters, and by the singular Art of Arthur Gregory, sealed them again so curiously, that no man would imagine them to have been opened, and ever sent them to the parties, to whom the superscription directed them. In like manner were the former letters from the Queen of Scots to Babington intercepted; as also, other letters written at the same time to Alondora the Spanish Ambassador, Charles Paget, the Lord Page, the Archbishop of Gloucester, and Francis Englefield. The Queen as soon as she understood by these Letters of the storm hanging over her head, both at home and abroad, commanded Ballard to be apprehended, who on a sudden is taken in Babington's house. Babington hereupon goeth to Walsingham, with whom he had long been a suitor, for licence to go into France, promising to do great matters in discovering the practices of the Fugitives; Walsingham with fair promises drives him off from day to day, and now persuades him, that for a small space till he could get his licence sealed, he would lodge at his house in London, where they might have secret conference without suspicion. This web Walsingham himself had spun hitherto, and no other of the Queens Council were made acquainted; and longer yet he would have drawn the thread out, but that the Queen was unwilling, lest (as she said) not avoiding danger when she might, she should seem rather to tempt God, than to trust in him. Whereupon, Walsingham sent a Note to his man Scudamore from the Court, to look carefully to Babington: This Note was delivered in such manner, that Babington sitting by a Table when Scudamore read it, overlooked him, and read it likewise; Hereupon suspecting that all was discovered, the next night he and Scudamore, and one or two more of Walsingham's servants supping at a Tavern, and being very merry, he made an excuse that he must needs step aside, and rose up, leaving his cloak and his sword, and so made hast through the dark to Westminster, where Gage and he changed apparel, and then together withdrew themselves into St Johns wood near the City, whither Barnwell and Dun betook themselves. In the mean space they were proclaimed Traytors all England over. Hereupon they lay lurking in Woods and by-places; they shave Babington's face, disfigure the beauty of his countenance (for he was of an extraordinary beauty) with the husks of green Wall-nuts; and when they were half starved, went to the houses of the Bellamies, near Harrow on the hill, who were great Papists; There they were hid in Barns, and put into a Countrey habit: but notwithstanding all their shifting, within ten dayes after they were discovered and brought to London. The other Complices were soon after taken, most of them in the Suburbs of the City, Salisbury and Traverse in Cheshire, and Jones in Wales, who harboured them in his house, after he knew they were proclaimed Traytors, Windsore only was never heard of. Many dayes were spent in the examination of them, who cut one the others throats, with their own confessions. All this while, the Queen of Scots and her servants are so narrowly looked to by Pawlet, that she knew nothing of all these passages: as soon as they were apprehended, Thomas Gorge was sent to acquaint her with the whole matter, which yet he did not do, till she was got on Horse-back to ride a hunting, and was not then suffered to return, but in shew of curtesie was carried up and down, to see the Houses of the Gentry thereabouts. In which mean while John Manners, Edward Aiton, Richard Bago, and St William Wade, took Nave and Curle the Queen of Scots Secretaries, and the rest of her servants, and delivered them to Keepers apart, that they might have no speech between themselves, nor with their Lady the Queen of Scots. Then they broke open all dories, and such Desks and Boxes as they found with any papers in them, they set their seals upon, and sent them to the Court: In which, being broken open before the Queen, were found a number of Letters from Foreign parts, the copies likewise of Letters sent to several persons, and three score Alphabets at least of private Characters; as also, Letters to her from some of the English Nobility, containing great proffers of love and service, which the Queen notwithstanding took no notice of, but passed over in silence, according to her Motto, Video & Taceo, I see, and say nothing. Gifford now, who had all this while served their turn, is sent into France; but ere he went hence, left an Indenture with the French Ambassador here in England, with Instructions that he should deliver no Letters to the Queen

The chief discoverer of this Conspiracy was one Gifford, and by what means.

Walsingham's State-craft.

Babington seeks to escape.

But is discovered and taken.

The Queen of Scots hath her Closets broken open and her Boxes searched.

A Queen of Scots, or the Fugitives in France; but to him that exhibited an Indenture matching with that, the which he sent under-hand to Sir Francis Walsingham.

The twentieth of September, seven of the forenamed Conspirators were Arraigned, and pleading guilty, were condemned of High-Treason. Two dayes after, seven other were called to the Bar, who pleaded not guilty, but notwithstanding were found guilty by their own confessions, and condemned; Pellie only, though he were privy to all passages, yet because he had disclosed many things to Walsingham, was not called in question. The twentieth day of the month, the first seven in St. Giles Fields, where they were wont to meet, were hanged, cut down instantly, their privy members cut off, and themselves yet living and beholding it, were in cruel manner bowelled and quartered; namely, Ballard, Babington, Savage, (who, the roap breaking, fell down from the Gibbet, and was presently taken by the hangman, his privy members cut off, and bowelled, while he was perfectly living) Barnwell, Tichburn, Tilney, and Abington. The next day, the other seven were drawn to the same place, and executed in the same fashion, but in a more gentle manner, by the Queens special charge who detested the former cruelty, for they were to hang till they were quite dead, Salisbury first, then Dun, then Jones, Chernock, Traverse, Gage, and with them Hierome Bellamy, who had concealed Babington after he was proclaimed Traytor (whose Brother being guilty of the same fact, had strangled himself in Prison.)

When these men were executed, Nave a French man, and Curle a Scotch man, Secretaries to the Queen of Scots, were examined concerning the Letters, the copies of Letters, and private Characters found in the Queen of Scots Closet; who under their own voluntary subscriptions acknowledged, that they were their own hand-writings, dictated in French by the Queen her self, taken by Nave, turned into English by Curle, and copied out in secret Characters. Hereupon, Sir Edward Wootton was sent out of hand into France, to make known to the King, the order of the Treason, and to shew him the copies of the Queen of Scots Letters, confirmed by the testimony of sundry of the English Nobility, that the French King might see what dangerous plots were by Charles Paget, and the English Fugitives contrived against the Queen of England.

And now, what should be done with the Queen of Scots, was a great consultation; wherein the Counsellours were not all of one mind; some conceived, That it were not good to take any rigorous course against her, but only to hold her in safe custody; both for that she was not Author of the Treason, but only conscious to it, and because she was crazie, and not likely to live long. Others, out of a care of Religion, were of opinion, to have her forthwith Arraigned and put to death according to Law; Leicester thought it better to have her poisoned and sent a Divine to Walsingham to prove it lawful, but Walsingham protested against that course. A difference then arose amongst them, by what Law to proceed against her; Whether by the Law of the 25 of Edward the Third; (In which they are pronounced guilty of Treason, who plot the destruction of the King or Queen, raise War in his Dominions or adhere to his Adversaries) Or else by the 27 of the Queen, Enacted a year since: Their opinion at last prevailed, who thought best to proceed against her by this latter Law, as being indeed in this case provided. Whereupon, divers of the Lords of the Privy Council, and other of the Nobility, are Authorized by the Queens Letters, to enquire by virtue of that Law, and passe sentence against all such as raised Rebellion, invaded the Kingdome, or attempted any violence against the Queen. These Commissioners therefore upon the eleventh day of October repaired to Fotheringay Castle in Northamptonshire, where the Queen of Scots was then held prisoner; and the next day, sent unto her Walter Mildmay, Pawlet and Edward Barker, publick Notary, who delivered her the Queens Letters; which having with a sealed countenance read, she said, It seems to me strange, that the Queen should lay her Command upon me, to hold up my hand at the Bar, as though I were a Subject, seeing I am an absolute Queen, no lesse than her self; but howsoever, I will never do any thing prejudicial to Princes of my degree, nor to my Son the King of Scotland. After many meetings, she standing still upon her innocence, and upon her exemption from answering, as being an absolute Prince, and specially for yielding to be tried by the English Laws; of which, One (she said) had lately been made of purpose for her destruction: It was at last told her plainly, by the Chancellor and Treasurer, That if she refused to answer to such crimes as should be objected, they would then proceed against her, though she were absent. Being brought at last with much ado to consent, the Commissioners came together in the Prefence Chamber; a Chair of Estate was set for the Queen of England, in the upper end of the Chamber under a Canopy; beneath over against, was placed a Chair for the Queen of Scots; on both sides of the Cloth of Estate, stools were set, upon which on the one side sat the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, The Earls of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke, Lincoln, and Viscount Mountacute; On the other side sat the Lords Aburgavenny, Zouch, Morley, St John of Blesbo, Compton, and Cheyne; Next to these, sat the Knights that were Privy Counsellors, St James Crofts, St Christopher Hatton, St Francis Walsingham, St Ralph Sadler, St Walter Mildmay, and St Amias Pawlet; Forward, before the Earls, sat the two Chief Justices, and the Lord chief Baron; on the other side, the two Barons, and the other Justices; Dale, and Forod, Doctors of the Civil Law; at a Table in the midst, Popham the Queens Attorney General, Egerton her Solicitor, Gawdie her Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Notaries. When the Queen of Scots was come, and had placed her self, silence being made; Bremley Lord Chancellor turning towards her, said;

Fourteen of the Conspirators are Arraigned, and hanged.

Sir Edward Wootton is sent into France, to acquaint the King with this conspiracy.

Consultation's held, what should be done with the Queen of Scots and the resolution.

Commissioners are sent to the Queen of Scots to acquaint her with the resolution.

But she stood upon her Innocency, and upon her exemption from answering as being an absolute Prince.

Yet at last she was brought to consent.

Hereupon she appears before the Commissioners.

And the Queens Council open the crimes with which she was charged.

Upon which afterward, in the Star chamber, Sentence was pronounced against her.

And in a Parliament presently following, the Lords petition the Queen, that the Sentence passed against her might be promulgated. And the Queens Answer.

A while after, the Queen treats the Lords to think of some way, by which the Queen of Scots life may be saved, and her own not endangered. The Lords return Answer, that there can be no way of her safety, but the Queen of Scots death.

said, That the Queen had appointed these Commissioners, to hear what she could answer to a crimes laid to her charge, assuring her, that nothing would be cause of more joy to the Queen, than to hear, that she had proved her self innocent. Upon this, she rising up, said; That although, being an absolute Prince, she could not be compelled to appear before the Delegates, yet to manifest her innocency, she was now content to appear. Then Gardie, opened every speciality of the Law lately made (against which she had taken exception) shewing by Babingtons confession, by Letters passed between them, by the confessions of Ballard and Savage, by the confessions of her Secretaries, Nave and Carle, that she was privy to their Treasons, and consented to the Invasion of England, and destruction of the Queen. To which she answered, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted, the rest, in hope of life, might be drawn to confesse that which was not true: In this she stood peremptorily. That she never consented to any attempt against the Queens Person; though for her own delivery, she conspired the did. After many other charges by the Commissioners, and replies by the Queen of Scots; At last, she requested, that the might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen her self, and her Council. But this request prevailed not; for on the twenty fifth day of October following, at the Star chamber in Westminster, the Commissioners met again, and there pronounced sentence against her; Ratifying by their Seals and subscriptions, that after the first day of June, in the seven and twentieth year of our Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth, divers matters were compassed and imagined in this Kingdom, by Anthony Babington, and others, with the privy of Mary Queen of Scots, pretending Title to the Crown of England, tending to the hurt, death, and destruction of the Royal Person of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen.

After a few days, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, the which was begun by Authority from the Queen, derived to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Derby; and the same, not without some Presidents. At this Parliament, the Proscriptions of the Lord Paget, Charles Paget, Francis Inglesfield, Francis Throgmorton, Anthony Babington, Thomas Salisbury, Edward Jones, Chydwick Tichburn, Charles Tilney, and other the complices, was confirmed, and their goods and possessions adjudged confiscate. Also the Peers of the Kingdom, with an unanimous consent, exhibit a Petition to the Queen by the Lord Chancellor, that for the preservation of the true Religion, and safety of the Queen, of themselves, and their Posterity, the sentence passed against Mary Queen of Scots, might according to Law be presently promulgated: They put the Queen in minde of the fearful examples of Gods Judgements extant in Scripture, upon King Saul, for sparing of Agag, and upon Ahab, for not putting Benhadad to death. But the Queen answereth them to this effect: First, acknowledging Gods miraculous preservation of her, and then their constant affections towards her, for whose sakes only she desires to live: Otherwise, when she calls to minde things past, beholds the present, and expects what may happen in time to come, that she accounts them most happy, who go soonest hence. That the Law lately made, by which the Queen of Scots is condemned, was not made (as some maliciously have imagined) to ensnare her, but contrariwise, to forewarn and deter her from attempting any thing against it, which though it had not been made, yet were there other ancient Laws enough to condemn her, Nothing could have been more grievous to me, than that a Prince, and one so near allied unto me, should deserve the sentence pronounced against her; and seeing the matter is of rare example, and of a very weighty consequence, I hope you will not expect, that I should at this present determine any thing; yet that there may be no danger in delay, I will in due time signify my minde unto you; and in the mean time, would have you expect from me, whatsoever good Subjectalook for, from a Gracious Prince.

Twelve days after, having deeply weighed the matter in her minde, she sent the Lord Chancellor to the Peers, and Puckering to the Lower House, entreating them to advise more diligently concerning so weighty a matter, and to bethink themselves of some wholesome remedy, by which the life of the Queen of Scots might be spared, and their security also provided for. They, when they had a long time in most serious manner deliberated hereof, return at last this Verdict; That the Queens life could not be in safety, while the Queen of Scots lived, unless she either repented and acknowledged her crimes, or were kept in straight custody, or bound by oath and obligations, or gave Hostages, or lastly, departed the Kingdom. And seeing none of these were likely to be remedies; it remained, that only her death would be a remedy. Repentance in her they could little hope for, who would not so much as acknowledge her self faulty; Close Imprisonment, Obligations, Oath, and Hostages they accounted as nothing, which all vanished, if the Queens life were once taken away; and if she departed the Kingdom, they feared she would straightway go about to invade it again. These things the Lord Chancellor, and the would straightway go about to invade it again. These things the Lord Chancellor, and the Puckering the Speaker of the Lower House, declared to the Queen at large, and urged her in their names, to have the Sentence put in execution. Hereupon, the Queen after a short pause, spake at last to this effect: I protest, my chief desire hath been, that for your security, and my own safety, some other way might be devised, than that which is now propounded; but seeing it now evident and certain, that my safety without her destruction, is in a more deplorable estate, I am most grievously affected with inward sorrow; that I, who have pardoned to many Rebels, have neglected so many Treasons (either by connivance, or silence) should now at last exercise cruelty upon a Prince so nearly allied to me. As for your Petition, I beseech you to rest in an Answer, without an Answer: If I say I will not grant your Petition, I shall happily say what I meant not; If I should say, I will grant it, then cast I my self into destruction headlong, whole

A whose safety you so earnestly desire; And that I know, you in your wisdoms would not I should do.

After this, the Parliament was prorogued, and then were the Lords Buckhurst and Beal sent to the Queen of Scots, to let her understand that Sentence was pronounced against her, and confirmed by Parliament, and that the execution of it was earnestly desired by the Nobility and the Commons; and therefore persuaded her, that before her death, she would make acknowledgement of her offences, against God and the Queen; intimating, that if she lived, the Religion received in England, could not subsist. Hereupon, she was taken with an unwonted alacrity, and seemed to triumph for joy, giving God thanks, and gratulating her own felicity, that she should be accounted an Instrument, for establishing Religion in this Island; and therewith requested, she might have some Catholick Priest to administer the Sacrament to her; but was denied, which she deemed, not inhumane only, but tyrannicall and heathenish. The Bishop and the Dean, whom for this cause they commended to her, she utterly rejected, and jeered at the English Nation, saying; The English were ever and anon wont to murder their own Kings, and therefore no marvell, they should now thirst after her destruction. In December following the Sentence against her was proclaimed, in London first, and after over all the Kingdom, wherein Queen Elizabeth seriously protested, that this Promulgation of the Sentence was extorted from her, to her great grief, by the impotency of the whole body of the Kingdom. The Queen of Scots being told hereof, seemed not a whit dejected with it; but writing to the Queen, never maketh intercession for her self, nor expostulateth her death, but only makes three small requests; one, That she might be buried in France by her Mother; another, That she might be put to death privately, but her servants to be present; the third, That her servants might freely depart, and enjoy such Legacies as she had given them. Of which Requests, she desired the Queen to vouchsafe her an answer; but whether this Letter ever came to Queen Elizabeth, is uncertain.

This condemnation of the Queen of Scots, as a thing strange, and scarce credible, was soon spread far and near; so as intercessions came thick in her behalf to Queen Elizabeth, but specially from the King of Scots, and the King of France, who sent their severall Ambassadors, using all the reasons that natural affection in the one, and likeness of condition in the other, could urge, for sparing of her life; but when the necessity of the State, seemed to obstruct all ways of clemency, the French Ambassador L'Aubespine, falleth from reasons to action, and thinketh no way so effectual for saving of the Queen of Scots life, as to take away Queen Elizabeths life; and thereupon, first, he dealt covertly with William Stafford, a young Gentleman, and prone to embrace hopes (whose Mother was of the Bed-chamber to Queen Elizabeth, and his Brother at that time, Ambassador Liger in France) and afterward, more openly by Trappe his Secretary, to murder the Queen. Stafford, though not daring to act such a villany himself, yet commended one Moody to him, a resolute fellow, and one that for money would be sure to do it. Upon this, Stafford brings Trappe to Moody, being then in the common Goal, who upon Trapps offer, undertakes it: But then the consultation was, by what way it should be done? Moody propounded poyson, or else to lay a bag of Gunpowder under the Queens Bed, and suddenly fire it. But Trappe liked of neither of these ways, but would rather have it done, as was done to the Prince of Orange. But while they are thus consulting about the way of doing it, Stafford discovers all to the Lords of the Council. Whereupon Trappe who was now bound for France, was apprehended, and being examined, confessed the whole matter. Upon this, the Ambassador himself was sent for to *Cecil*s house, the twelfth of January; where met him by the Queens appointment, Cecil Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Leicester, Sr Christopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlain, and Davyson one of her Secretaries; who declare to the Ambassador every particular which Stafford, Moody, and Trappe his Secretary had confessed. As soon as Stafford was brought forth, and began to speak, the Ambassador interrupted him, and reviling him, made asseveration, that Stafford first propounded it; when Stafford falling on his knees, made fearful imprecations, that the Ambassador first propounded it himself. But whosoever propounded it (saith Burleigh) it appears, that you were made acquainted with the matter. To which he presently replied; That if he had known of any such thing, yet, being he was an Ambassador, he ought not to give notice of it, but to his own King. After much reasoning in this manner, the Lord Burleigh admonished him, to beware how he offended hereafter in this kinde; and let him know, That he is not quitted from the offence, though for this time the Queen be pleased to forbear him.

But upon this Treason, the Queen of Scots Adversaries put many terrors into Queen Elizabeths minde, giving out, That the Spanish Navy was come to Milford Haven; That the Scots were broken into England; That the Duke of Guyse with a great Army was landed in Staffex; That the Queen of Scots was escaped out of Prison, and had gotten a Company up in Arms, and many other such feigned suggestions; Through which, at length they drew the Queen to this; That the sealed Letters, for executing the Sentence against the Queen of Scots, and one of her greatest persuaders to it (as the Scots reported it) was one whom the King of Scots had sent to disswade her from it; namely Patrick Grey, who sounded often in her ears, Mortua non mordet; when she is dead, she cannot bite.

The Queen notwithstanding, began to weigh with her self, whether it were better to rid her out of the way, or else to spare her; and many great reasons offered themselves on both sides, but Upon this the Queen of Scots is made acquainted with the Lords Petition to have the Sentence executed, at which she seemed to rejoyce.

The King of Scots and the King of France solicit for her life.

L'Aubespine the French Ambassador, set agents awork to kill Q. Elizabeth.

Q. Elizabeth terrified with many rumors, seals a Warrant for executing her.

But being long in suspense about it, at last the commanded Secretary Davyson to get the Commission made: but not disclose the matter to any. Yet Davyson acquaints divers of the Privy Council with it. Hereupon Beale is sent down to give authority to the Earl of Shrewsbury and others to see her executed.

The Commissioners acquaint her with it, with which she was not a whit daunted.

She makes her Will.

Her devout carriage at her death.

She is belated.

Her age when she died.

Q. Elizabeth hearing of her death, is infinitely dejected but where only speculative reasons presented themselves for sparing her, many practical reasons, and those pressed both by Courtiers and Preachers, were presented to her; so as long holden in suspense, she would oftentimes sit speechless, and her countenance cast down: At last, her fear prevailing, she delivered to Secretary Davyson, Letters under her hand and Seal, to get the Commission made under the Great Seal of England, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots, which might be in a readinesse upon any fear of danger; charging him not to disclose the matter to any whomsoever. But the next day her mind was altered, and sent Sir William Killigrew to Davyson, to countermand the making of the Commission. Whereupon Davyson goes to her, and lets her know, That the Commission was already made, and the Seal put to it; Whereat, the Queen extremely angry, rebuketh him sharply for his haltnesse; yet Davyson imparteth the matter to Privy Counsellors; and periwades them, That the Queen commanded, the Commission should be put in execution. Hereupon, Beale Clerk of the Council, is sent down with Letters, wherein authority is deputed to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others, that she should be put to death according to the Law; with which proceeding, the Queen was not once made acquainted; and more than this, although she had intimated to Davyson, That she would take some other order concerning the Queen of Scots, yet did not he stay Beale from going.

And now comes in the last Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy, for as soon as the Earls were come to Fotheringay; they, together with Sir Amias Pawlet, and Sir Drue Drurie, with whom she was then in custody; go unto her, and reading the Commission, signify the cause of their coming; and in a few words, admonish her to prepare her self for death, for that she must die the next day. Whereunto, without any change of countenance or passion of minde, she made answer; I had not thought that my Sister the Queen would have consented to my death, who am not subject to your Laws; but since it is her pleasure, death shall be to me most welcome. Then she requesteth that she might confer with her Confessor, and Melvyn her Steward, which would not be granted: The Bishop or Dean of Peterborough they offered her, but them she refused. The Earls being departed, she gave order that Supper should be hastened, where the eat (as she used to do) soberly, and sparingly; and perceiving her men and women servants to lament and weep, she comforted them, and bid them rejoice rather, that she was now to depart out of a world of misery. After supper, she looketh over her Will, read the Inventory of her Goods and Jewels, and writ their names severally by them, to whom she gave any of them; at her wonted hour she went to bed, and after a few hours sleep, awaking, spent the rest of the night in her devotion. And now the fatal day being come, which was the eight of February; she getteth up, and makes her ready in her best Apparel, and then betook her self in her Cloist to Almighty God, imploring his assistance with deep sighs and groans; untill Thomas Andrews Sheriff of the County gave notice, that it was time to come forth, and then with a Princely Majesty, and cheerful countenance she came out, her head covered with a linnen Vail, and carrying an Ivory Crucifix in her hands. In the Gallery the Earls met her, and the other Gentlemen, where Melvyn her Servant upon his bended knees, deplored his own fortune, that he should be the messenger to carry this sad news into Scotland; whom she comforted, saying, Do not lament Melvyn, Thou shalt by and by see Mary Steward freed from all cares. Then turning her self to the Earls, she requested that her Servants might stand by her at her death, which the Earl of Kent was very loth to grant, for fear of superstition; to whom she said, Fear nothing, these poor wretches desire only to give me my last farewell. I know the Queen my Sister, would not deny me so small a request. After this, the two Earls, and the Sheriff of the County leading the way, she came to the Scaffold, which was set up at the upper end of the Hall, where was a Chair, a Cushion, and a Block, all covered with Mourning. Then the Dean of Peterborough going to Prayers, she falling upon her knees, and holding up the Crucifix in both her hands, prayed with her Servants in Latine, out of the Office of the blessed Virgin. Prayers being ended she kissed the Crucifix, and signing her self with the sign of the Crosse, said, As thy arms, O Christ, were spread forth upon the Crosse, so embrace me with the open arms of thy mercy, and forgive me my sins. Then the Executioner asking her pardon, she forgave him. And now her women helping off her outer Garments, and breaking forth into shrieks, and cries, she kissed them, signed them with the Crosse, and willed them to leave lamenting, for now an end of her sorrows was at hand; and then shadowing her face with a linnen cloth, and lying down on the Block, she repeated the Psalm, In te Domine speravi, ne confundar in aeternum; at which words she stretching forth her Body, her head at two blows was taken off. Her body was afterward Royally buried in the Cathedral Church at Peterborough; but since that, her Noble Son James, King of great Britain, erected a Royal Monument for her, in King Henry the seventh's Chappel at Westminster. This end had Mary Queen of Scots, in the six and fortieth year of her age, and of her Imprisonment in England the eighteenth; a Lady so compleat in all excellent parts of body and minde, that must needs have made her a happy woman, if she had not been a Queen; and perhaps a happy Queen too, if she had not been Heir to the Crown of England: For why did all her endeavours want successe, but only from the fear of that Succession? and no Innocency of hers could be a Defence, where the fury of Jealousie made the Assault.

As soon as it came to the Queens knowledge, that the Queen of Scots was put to death, her countenance grew dejected, and her speech failed her; insomuch that all in mourning weeds, she gave her self over to sorrow, commanded her Counsellors from her Presence, and caused Davyson

A Davyson to be cited to the Star-chamber. And as soon as grief would suffer her, she wrote a Letter with her own hand to the King of Scots, and sent it by Sir Robert Cary, to this effect; That her mind was infinitely disquieted, in regard of this lamentable event, against her meaning and intent, entreating him to believe, that if he had commanded it, she would never have denied it, and with all protesting her true affection towards him, and her assiduous watchfulness for the prospering of his affairs.

While Cary was on his journey, Davyson is cited to the Star-chamber before these Delegates, Sir Christopher Wray Chief Justice of the Kings Bench, for that time made Lord Privy Seal, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Earls of Worcester, Cumberland, and Lincoln, the Lords Gray, and Lumley, Sir James Croft, Comptroller of the Queens Houfe, Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edmund Anderson, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Sir Roger Manwood, Lord Chief Baron (where note, that Bromley Lord Chancellor, Burleigh Lord Treasurer, Leicester, and Hatton, who were indeed more guilty of the fact than Davyson, were none of the number.) Before these Delegates, Popham the Queens Attorney layeth to Davyson charge Contempt of the Queens Majesty, violating of his trust, and neglect of his duty, laying open all particulars of his fact; which after Egerton the Queens Solicitor, Gawdy, and Puckering, Serjeants at Law, urged also against him with great aggravation: To which Davyson mildly answered, That he would not contest with the Queen; only Protests, That if he had done any thing otherwise than he ought, it was out of ignorance and mistake, and not out of any purpose to disobey her Majesty. It seems the Queen had carried her self as one that would have it done, and yet was loath to do it, scarce knowing her own mind, and yet would have another know it, meaning to make it the work of mistaking, rather than of purpose, that so at least she might leave some place of satisfaction to her self, that it was not absolutely of her doing.

The pleadings ended, the Commissioners went to censure; Manwood began, and gave his opinion that Davyson for the inconsideratenesse of his fact, should be fined ten thousand pounds, and Imprisonment during the Queens pleasure; the rest went on in that sentence, only the Lord Gray excused Davyson so far That he thought him worthy of reward rather than of punishment: The conclusion was, the first Sentence for his Fine and Imprisonment, was by Wray Keeper of the Privy Seal confirmed; and Davyson never after recovered the Queens favour, though she relieved him sometimes in his necessity. A man ingenious indeed, but not thoroughly acquainted with the ways of the Court; and thought to have been raised to this place, of purpose to act this part, and for nothing else.

By this time Sir Robert Cary, Son to the Lord Hunsdon, who was sent to excuse the Queen, was come to the Borders; but being come thither, was not suffered to set foot in Scotland; The King would scarce hear him by another, and with much ado received his Letters. He called home his Ambassador out of England, and thought of nothing but revenge.

But the Queen still laying the fault upon Davyson, and the unadvised credulity of her Counsellors, by little and little allayeth his passion; and expecting till time had somewhat allwaged his grief, that it would indure to be touched, at length by her Agents in Scotland, and soon after by the Lord Hunsdon Governour of Berwick, she admonished him, How dangerous it would be for him, to break out into War against England, and what little help he could justly expect from either Spain or France; but if he persisted in the amity with England, he might be sure the Queen of England would most lovingly account him for her Son. And to the end that he should assure himself, that the Queen his Mother was put to death without her privacy, she sent him the Sentence against Davyson, under the Seals of all the Delegates, and attested under the Great Seal of England; and another Instrument likewise signed with the hands of the Judges of England; in which they aver, That the Sentence against the Queen of Scots, could in no wise be prejudice to his right in the Succession.

Having now by these and the like courtes somewhat allwaged the King of Scots indignation; to prevent the War which they foresaw was imminent from the King of Spain, they send forth Drake with four of the Queens ships and others, unto the Coast of Spain, to set upon their ships in the Haven, and to intercept their Munition. Drake entering into the Port of Cales, sunk, took, and fired about an hundred ships, wherein was great store of Munition and victuals: Then returning to the Cape of St Vincent, he set upon three Forts, and compelled them to yeeld. Thence setting sail to the Western Islands, called Azores, under the great Meridian, by great good fortune he happened upon an huge and wealthy Carack, called St. Philip, returning from the East-Indies, and easily vanquished it; Whereupon the Mariners on both sides, from the name of Philip, portended no good luck to Philip King of Spain.

At the same time, Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk, in the other part of the World, who two years before had set sail from England with three ships, passing through the Straights of Magellan, in the Coast of Chily, Peru, and Nova Hispania, fired a great number of Spanish Towns, took and pillaged nineteen great ships and amongst them a wealthy ship of the Kings nigh unto California, in North America; and so by the Philippine Isles, the Molucces, the Cape de Bone Esperance, and the Island of St. Hilene, returned home the next year, being the third after Magellan, that sailed about the World.

As Drake and Cavendish at this time gained great fame and renown; so two other men in the Netherlands (Stanley and York) purchased as great infamy and disgrace: This York was a Londoner, a bold fellow, and of loose behaviour; famous for bringing fire into England, the manner of turning the point upon the Adversary in single Combats, whereas the English till this time, were wont to be armed with Bucklers and Swords, and to strike with edge, and it was held no manhood to turn the point; or strike below the girdle. He suffered some affront from the Earl

And soon after writes to the King of Scots to satisfy him in it, that it was done against her meaning.

Davyson is cited in the Star-chamber, and charged with violating her Majesty's trust.

And his answer.

His censure in the Star-chamber.

The King of Scots will not admit the Queens messenger and threatens revenge. Queen Elizabeth seeks to pacify him, and by what reasons.

Drake is sent to the Coast of Spain, and what mischief he did the King.

And the like also did Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk.

Tork and Stanley in the Low-Countries, perfidiously deliver up Towns to the Spaniards and their ends.

Earl of Leicester, fled away, and for a time, served under the Spaniards in the Netherlands, till at a length being reconciled to Leicester, he was set over the Fort near Zutphen; but being bribed, he not only yielded up the place to the Enemy, but drew to the like villany one Stanley, who with great valour had served in an Irish expedition, to yield up Davenport to the Spaniards, a wealthy and well fortified Town. But what got they by their treachery? The Spaniards let York and Stanley at variance, they poison York and seize upon his goods, his carcass was three years after digged up by the States commandment, and hanged upon a Gibbet till it rotted away; Stanley went into Spain, where there was no credit given to him; for the Spaniards have a saying, It is lawful to give honour to a Traytor sometimes, but never to trust him.

Upon the complaint of the States against the Earl of Leicester, the Lord Buckhurst is sent to examine his doings.

These late Treacheries wrought the Earl of Leicester much envy with the Confederate Netherlands, because the Traytors were very intimate with him; whereupon the States in large letters to the Queen, accuse Leicester for his ill managing of the Weal publick, in the matter of money, Merchandize, and Military affairs; and to his credulity, they impute the harm which accrued by York and Stanley. The Queen, for the narrow sifting of the matter, and composing it, sent thither Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst (lately taken into her Privy Council in Leicester's absence) Norris, and Bartholomew Clerk: But when the officious diligence of Buckhurst, seemed to trench upon Leicester's reputation, his grace with the Queen proved so forcible, that Buckhurst at his return, was for certain months confined to his house.

Afterward Sluce being beleaguered by the Prince of Parma, Leicester was by the States sent for out of England, to succour it; the Town was furiously assaulted, with seventeen thousand great shot, and a mighty breach was made into it; which nevertheless Roger Williams, Francis Vere, Nicholas Barker, with the Garrison of the English and Walloons, was valiantly defended for a while, but at last were enforced to yield it up, Leicester, that came to relieve it, finding himself too weak for the besiegers, being gone away. And indeed, the States would not commit any great Army to his Command; who (they knew) had a determination to seize Leyden, and some other Towns into his own hands, and had a purpose to surprize the absolute Government. Whereupon the States use means, that Leicester was called home; gave up the Government to the States, and in his room succeeded Maurice of Nassau Son to the Prince of Orange, being now but twenty years of age. Peregrine Lord Willoughby, was by the Queen made General of the English Forces in the Low Countries, to whom she gave command to reduce the English Factions into the States obedience; the which, with the help of Prince Maurice, he easily effected.

Leicester is called home, and gives up the Government to the States.

Being called to examination before the Lords of the Council, how he eludes it.

Leicester being now come home, and perceiving that an accusation was preparing against him by Buckhurst and others, for his unfaithfull managing of affairs in Holland; privately with tears cast himself down at the Queens feet, entreating her, that she should not receive him with disgrace, at his return, whom she had sent forth in honour, and so far prevailed with her, that the next day being called to examination before the Lords, he took his place amongst them, not kneeling down at the end of the Table, as the manner of Delinquents is; and when the Secretary began to read the heads of his accusation, he interrupted him, saying, That the publick instructions which he had received, were limited with private restrictions; and making his appeal to the Queen, concluded the whole crimination, with the secret indignation of his Adversaries.

How the honour of Aburgavenny came to the Family of Nevil.

This year was famous for the Death of many great Personages: In the month of February, dyed Henry Nevill, Lord of Aburgavenny, great Grandchild to Edward Nevil, who in the Reign of King Henry the Sixth, got this Title in the right of his Wife, only Daughter and Heir to Richard Beauchamp Earl of Worcester, and Lord of Aburgavenny; In which right, whenas the only Daughter of this Henry, Wife to St Thomas Fane, challenged the Title of Baroness of Aburgavenny, a memorable contention arose concerning the Title between her, and the next Heir Male, to whom by Will (and the same confirmed by Authority of Parliament) the Castle of Aburgavenny was bequeathed. This question being a long time debated; at last in a Parliament holden in the second year of King James, the matter was tried by voyces; and the Heir male carried the Lordship of Aburgavenny, and the Barony Le Dispencer, was ratified to the female.

St Ralph Sadler dies, the last Banneret of England.

St Christopher Hatton is made L. Chancellor.

This year also, in the month of April, dyed Anne Stanhope, Dutchess of Somerset, ninety years old, who being the wife of Edward Seymer Duke of Somerset, and Protector of England, commended for precedency with Katherine Parre, Queen Dowager to King Henry the Eighth. There dyed also St Ralph Sadler, Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, the last Banneret of England, with which dignity he was adorned at the Battel of Mussilborough in Scotland. After him dyed Thomas Bromley Eord Chancellor of England; and six days after, he, whom the Queen meant should have succeeded him, Edward Earl of Rutland; but he now taying, Sir Christopher Hatton was made Lord Chancellor, who though he were a Courtier, yet the Queen knowing him to be an honest man, thought him not unfit for the place, where conscience hath, or should have more place than Law; although some were of opinion, That it was not to much the Queens own choice, as that she was persuaded to it by some that wisht him not well, both thereby to be a cause of abetting him from the Court, and thinking that such a sedentary place, to a corpulent man that had been used to exercise, would be a means to shorten his life, and indeed he lived not full out three years after.

This year St John Perot was called home out of Ireland, and left all in great quiet to Fitz Williams his Successor. For hitherto the English found it no hard matter to vanquish the Irish, by reason of their unskillfulnesse in Armes; eight hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse, were held an invincible Invincible Army: but after by Perots command, they were exercised in Feats of Arms, and taught to discharge Muskets at a Mark, and had in the Low Countries learned the Art of Fortification, they held the English better to it, and were not so easily overcome.

And now we are come to the one and twentieth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign, being the year 1588, long before spoken of by Astrologers, to be a wonderfull year, and even the Climatrical year of the World. And yet the greatest Wonder that happened this year, was but the wonderful Fleet that Spain provided for invading of England, if the defeat of that wonderful Fleet were not a greater Wonder.

It is true, there was at this time a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain; and the Earl of Derby, the Lord Cobham, St James Crofts, Dale, and Rogers Doctors of Law, Commissioners for the Queen, for the Prince of Parma, the Count Aurenberg, Champignie, Richardot, Mais, and Garoyer, Doctors, had many meetings about it, neer to Offend; but it seemed on the part of Spain, rather to make the English secure, that they should not make provision for War, than that they had any purpose of reall proceeding, being they accepted not of any reasonable Conditions that were offered, but tr fled out the time, till the Spanish Navy was come upon the Coast, and the Ordinance heard from Sea, and then dismissed the English Delegates.

The Spanish Navy consisted of one hundred and thirty Ships; whereof Galeasses and Gallies seventy two, goodly Ships, like to floating Towers; in which were Souldiers 19290; Mariners, 8350; Gally slaves, 2080; Great Ordinance, 2630; For the greater holiness of their Action, twelve of their Ships were called the twelve Apostles. Chief Commander of the Fleet was Don Alphonso, Duke of Medina; and next to him, John Martin Recalde, a great Sea-man. The twentieth of May they weighed Anchor from the River Tagus, but were by Tempest so miserably disperst, that it was long ere they met again; but then they sent before to the Prince of Parma, that he with his Forces, consisting of fifty thousand old Souldiers, should be ready to joyn with them, and with his Shipping conduct them into England, and to land his Army at the Thames Mouth.

The Queens Preparation in the mean time was this; The Lord Charles Howard, Lord Admiral, with all her Navy, and St Francis Drake, Vice-Admiral, to be ready at Plymouth; and the Lord Henry Seymer, (second Son to the Duke of Somerset) with forty English and Dutch Ships, to keep the Coasts of the Netherlands, to hinder the Prince of Parma's coming forth. Then for Land Service, there were laid along the Southern Coast, twenty thousand Souldiers, and two Armies besides of Trained men were levied; over one of which, consisting of a thousand Horse, and two and twenty thousand Foot, the Earl of Leicester commanded, and pitched his Tents at Tilbury, near the Thames mouth: Over the other, appointed to guard the Queens Person, and consisting of four and twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, the Lord Hamdon was General. Arthur Lord Grey, St Francis Knoller, St John Norris, St Richard Bingham, St Roger Williams, and other Military men, were chosen to make a council of War, and consult how the Land service should be ordered. These declared amongst other things, That the places which lay fittest for the Enemies landing, as Milford Haven, Falmouth, Plymouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, the Downs, the Thames mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, and such other, should be fortified with Works and Garisons; the Trained Souldiers of those Shires, which lay near the Sea Coast, should defend those places, and be ready at the Alarm to hinder the Enemy from Landing; but if he did land, then to spoil the Country round about, that he might find no Food; and by continual crying, Arm, Arm, give the Enemy no rest, but yet should not give Battel, till good store of Commanders were come together.

At this time many fearing the Papists at home, no lesse than the Spaniards abroad, persuaded the Queen to take off the heads of some of the greatest of them; but she detesting such cruelty, took order only, That some of them should be committed to custody in Wubych Castle.

Many Papists are committed to custody in Wubych Castle.

And now all things on both sides prepared, the Spanish Navy set forth out of the Groyn in May, but was disperst and driven back by weather. The English Navy set forth, somewhat later out of Plymouth, bearing up towards the Coast of Spain; but partly by occasion of contrary winds, partly by advertisement that the Spaniards were gone back, and upon some doubt also that they might passe by towards the Coast of England, whilst they were seeking them afare off, they returned to Plymouth: At which time, a confident (though false) advertisement came to the Admiral, That the Spaniards could not possibly come forward that year: whereupon the English Navy was upon the point of disbanding, and many of the men were gone on shore, when suddenly the invincible Armada (for so it was called in a Spanish ostentation) was discovered upon the Western Coast: whereof the Lord Admiral being informed, had much ado to get the Queens Navy out of the Haven (the wind being contrary) yet at length he hailed it forth. The next day, the English beheld the Spanish Ships, in height like to Castles, sayling slowly along, whom they suffered peaceably to passe by, that they might have the benefit of the wind to follow after. The one and twentieth day of July, the Admiral of England sent a Pinnace before, called The Defiance, which by a great shot, challenged the Spaniards to fight, and by and by they fell to it. Then Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher let fly against the outmost Squadron, which Recalde commanded, making him glad to fly to their main Navy for succour. The night following, a mighty Byscayner of Oquenda's (in which the King of Spains Treasure was) was by chance fired with Gun-powder, but was timely quenched by other

In the time of a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain, the King of Spain sends his great Armado against England.

Of what number of Ships the Armado consisted: and who was General.

The Queens preparation both by Sea and land, to resist it.

The two Fleets encounter; and the passages and events of it.

Ships sent to her succour; one of which Ships, was the Galleon of Don Pedro, whom S<sup>t</sup> Francis Drake took prisoner, and sent him to Dartmouth. The Biskayner it self (the Treasure being taken out by the Spaniards) they left behind them, which the English brought into the Haven at Weymouth.

The three and twentieth day of this Moneth, they had a second fight, in which most of the Spanish shot flew over the English Ships, and never hurt them; Only Cock an English man, being with his little Vessel in the midst of the Enemies, died valiantly. The four and twentieth day they rested on both sides, in which time the Lord Admiral ranked his whole Fleet into four Squadrons: The first he ruled himself, Drake the second, Hawkins the third, and Forbisher the fourth.

The five and twentieth day (which was Saint James's day) they fell to it the third time, in which Fight, the English had again the better, so as after this time, the Spaniards would no more turn upon the English, but holding on their course, dispatched a Messenger to the Prince of Parma; requiring him forthwith to joyn himself to the Kings Fleet, and withall to send them Bullets.

The day following, the Lord Admirall knighted Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Roger Townsland, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbisher; and holding a Council of War, they decreed not to let again upon the Enemy, till they came to the Straight of Calice, where the Lord Henry Seymour and S<sup>t</sup> William Winter waited for their coming. And now so far were the English from being terrified with this invincible Navy, that many of the Nobility and other of special note, hired Ships at their own charges, and came to the Admirall; as the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brook, S<sup>t</sup> Charles Blunt, S<sup>t</sup> Walter Raleigh, S<sup>t</sup> William Hatton, S<sup>t</sup> Robert Cary, S<sup>t</sup> Ambrose Willoughby, S<sup>t</sup> Thomas Gerard, S<sup>t</sup> Arthur Gurg and others.

The seven and twentieth of July towards the Evening, the Spaniards cast Anchor near unto Calice, and not far from them rode the English Admirall, within shot of a great Ordinance, to whom Seymour and Winter joyned themselves: so as by this time there were in the English Navy a hundred and forty Ships, nimble and serviceable for fighting or Sailing, yet only fifteen of them bore the stroke of the Battell. And now again the Spaniards sent Post after Post to the Prince of Parma to send them forty Fly-boats, without which they were not able to skirmish with the English, by reason of the greatesse and unwieldiness of their Ships, and importune him presently to put to Sea with his Army; But he was unprepared, and his Flat-bottomed Boats were full of chinks and leaked, and besides, the Hollanders hovered before the Ports of Dunkerk and Newport, in such sort, that he durst not look forth.

The eight and twentieth day, the Lord Admirall made ready eight of his worst Ships, on the outside dawbed with Wilde-fire, Rozin and Brimstone, within full of combustible matter, and under the conduct of Young and Prosser, sent them down with the winde in the silent time of the night, towards the Spanish Fleet; the which when the Spaniards saw approach them, and the Sea as it were all on a light fire; imagining withall, that those Fire-ships might carry in them some murdering Engines, they made a hideous noise, took up Anchors, cut Cabies, spread Sails, and betook themselves to their Oars, but more to flight: One of the Spanish Gallies having lost her Rudder, and floating up and down, was held in sight by Annis Priest, Thomas Gerard, and Harvie, who slew Captain Hugh Moncada, cast the Souldiers on board, and carried away a great deal of Gold, but the Vessel and Ordinance was wreck to the Governour of Calice.

Drake and Fenner in the mean while perceiving the Spanish Fleet to gather together again before Graveling, set upon them with great violence, to whom straightways, Fenton, Southwell, Beecham, Crosse, and Riman joyned themselves, and soon after the Admirall himself, S<sup>t</sup> Thomas Howard, and the Lord Sheffield; the Galleon called Saint Matthew, was sorely battered by Seymour and Winter, driven toward Ostend, and set upon again by the Zealanders, and at last was taken by the Flushingers.

And now the Spanish Navy having want of many necessities, and no hope of the Prince of Parma's coming, they resolved to return Northward for Spain; in which passage they lost both many Ships and men, the English Navy still following them close, till they were faine to give them over for want of Powder. Whilst these things passed at Sea, the Queen in Person came to Tilbury to view the Army and Camp there, where she shewed such undaunted Courage and Resolution, that it wonderfully animated the spirits of them all.

And thus this Navy, which was three whole Years in preparing, in the space of a Moneth was often beaten, and at length put to flight, many of their men being slain, more than half of their Ships taken and sunk (of the English not above a hundred at the most missing, nor so much as a Ship, but Cocks little Vessel) and sailing about all Brittain by Scotland, the Orkneys and Ireland, they returned into Spain with as much dishonour as they came out with boasting, for indeed Moncada in France by a Book in Print, triumphed before the Victory.

For the happy successe of this Action, Queen Elizabeth appointed prayers and thanksgiving over all the Churches in England, and she (as it were in Triumph) came in Person, attended with a great Troop of Nobility into the City, and went into the Cathedral Church of S<sup>t</sup> Paul (where the Banners taken from the Enemy were placed in view) and there in most humble manner gave thanks to Almighty God. And that which increased the publick joy, was the news which S<sup>t</sup> Robert Sidney

A Sidney brought out of Scotland, That the King had over-past all injuries, was lovingly affected towards the English, and desired to imbrace sincere and perfect amity with the Queen. For as for the King of Spain, he wittily told the Embassadour, that he expected no other curse from him, but such as Polyphemus promised Ulysses, that he should be the last whom he would devour.

And now dyed the great Earl of Leicester the fourth day of September, at his Manor of Killingworth of a violent Fever; I may well say the great Earl, considering the many great honours he enjoyed, which are extant in the Story, yet one honour greater than any he had before, he effected even then when he was ready to go out of the world, and that was, To be Vicegerent in the high Government of England and Ireland, for which the Patent was already drawn, and had been sealed, but that Burleigh and Hatton shewed the Queen how dangerous a thing it might prove, for so great Authority to reside in one Subject. He was while he lived in so great favour with the Queen, that some thought (and himself not the least) that she meant to marry him; yet when he dyed, his goods were sold at an Outcry to make payment of the debts he owed her.

About this time Philip Earl of Arundel, who three years before had been cast in prison, was now cited in Westminster Hall, to the judgement of his Peers, and Henry Earl of Derby was made High Steward of England for the time. The matters laid to his charge were these: That he had contracted friendship with Cardinall Allen, Parsons the Jesuite, and other Traytors, exciting divers both abroad and at home to restore the Romish Religion, promising his assistance thereunto; and for that reason had a purpose to depart the Kingdom. That he was privy to the Bull, in which Pope Sixtus Quintus had deposed the Queen, and given England to the Spaniard; That being imprisoned in the Tower, he caused Masse to be said for the prosperous successe of the Spanish Fleet, and for that purpose had framed peculiar prayers for his own private use. Being demanded whether he were guilty of these things, turning himself to the Judges, he asked them these questions: First, whether it were lawfull to heap up so many crimes together in one Bill of Indictment? They answered that it was: Then whether Arguments taken from presumptions were of force? They answered, that it was lawfull for him to interpose exceptions if he saw cause. Then again, if he might be Arraigned for those things which were Capital, by the Law made the thirteenth year of the Queen, after that the time expressed in the Act was expired? They promised, they would proceed against him by no Law; but the old Statute of Treason, made in the Reign of King Edward the third. But now again asked if he were guilty or not? he pleaded not guilty; whereupon Puckering the Queens Serjeant at Law, Popham Attorney General, Shutlworth Serjeant at Law, and Egerton the Queens Solicitor, in their turns, urged and proved the crimes objected, some whereof he denied, some he extenuated; but in conclusion was by his Peers found guilty and condemned; yet the Queen spared his life, and was content with thus much done in terror to the Papists.

It was now the year 1589. and the two and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign; when to be in some sort revenged of the Spaniards for their Invasion, she gave leave to S<sup>t</sup> John Norris and S<sup>t</sup> Francis Drake to undertake an Expedition at their own private charges, requiring nothing of her but a few Ships of War, who took along with them Anthony the ballard, laying claim to the Kingdom of Portingall, and of Souldiers to the number of eleven thousand, of Seamen about fifteen hundred: setting sayl from Plimmouth the fifth day of April, they arrived at the Groyne in Galatia; whereof with great valour they took first the Lower Town, and afterward the Higher, and from thence sailing towards Portingall, they met Robert Earl of Essex, who without the Queens leave had put to Sea: After two days they arrive at Pe nycha a Town of Portingall, which they took; and left the Castle to Don Antonio, and from thence they march by land towards Lisbon threescore miles off: The Foot Companies led by Norris, whom Drake promised to follow with the Fleet, being come to the West Suburbs of Lisbon, they found no body there but a few poor disarmed Portugals, who cried out, God save King Antonio. The day following the Spaniards made a sallie out, in which skirmish Bret, Curelly, and Carre, (stout Commanders) were slain; yet did the Earl of Essex drive the Spaniards to the very gates of the City. And now having tarried here two days, and seeing no sign of the Portugals revolting; which Don Antonio had assured them would be, finding fresh supplies come into the Town, their own Army sickly, Victuals and Powder failing; and which was most of all, S<sup>t</sup> Francis Drake not bringing the great Ordinance as he promised, they departed from the Suburbs of Lisbon towards Castais, a little Town at the mouth of the River Tagus, which Town Drake had taken this mean while, who excused his not coming to Lisbon, by reason of the Flats he must have passed, and the Castle of Saint Julian fortified with fifty pieces of great Ordinance. Near this place they found threescore Hulks of the Hanse towns of Germany, laden with Corn and all manner of Munition, which they took as good prize towards their charges, in regard the Queen had forbidden them to carry Victuals or Munition to the Spaniard. From hence they set sayl to Virgo, a forlorn Town by the Sea-side, and pillaging all along that Quarter, returned for England, having lost in the Voyage of Souldiers and Mariners about six thousand; yet not so much by the Enemy, as by eating of strange fruits and distemper of the Climate.

It concerns the Fate of England, to look at this time into the Fate of France, for while those things were in doing between Spain and England, the Popish Princes of France, under pretext pretext of defending the Catholick Religion, entred into a combination, which they called The Holy League: The purpose whereof was, to root out the Protestants, and to divert the Right of Succession to the Crown of France; For they bound themselves to each other by oath, to suffer no person but a Catholick to be King of France, which was directly to exclude the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde, if the present King without issue male should fail. The head of this League, was the Duke of Guise, who having given some overthrows to the German Forces, that came into France in aid of the Protestants, was immeasurably extolled by the Clergy and others, and grew to such a height of reputation, that entering into Paris, he made the King glad to leave the City, and in an Assembly at Blois, to make him great Master of the French Cavalry, and to consent by Edict, to the cutting off the Protestants. So as the King standing now in fear of him, used means at last, even in the very Court, to have him murdered; and soon after, the Cardinal his Brother to be strangled. Hereupon so great a confusion followed, that the people every where disobeyed the Magistrates, and spoiled the Kings very Palace at Paris. Some Cities affected a Democracy, others an Aristocracy, but few liked of a Monarchy. The Confederates in the mean while made a new Seal, usurped the Royal Authority, seized into their hands the best fortified places, intercepted the Kings Revenues, call in Spanish Souldiers, and in all places denounce war and violence against the King. And the King in this case being forced to flee to the Protestants for succour, they then most wickedly, by one James Clement a Monk, made him away. The King being ready to die, Declareth the King of Navarre to be his lawful Successor, but the Confederates would exclude him as an open Heretick; and yet whom to make choice of they cannot well agree, some would have the Duke of Lorraine, as being descended from the ancient Kings of France, some the Duke of Savoy, as born of the French Kings Daughter, a Prince Potent and Courageous; others would have the Duke of Guises Brother that was murdered; others the King of Spain; but the greatest part gave their voices for the Cardinal of Bourbon, who was one degree nearer allied to the slain King, than the King of Navarre his Nephew. He therefore was proclaimed King of France, with the Title of Charles the Tenth; but he being a Priest, the King of Navarre also was at the same time proclaimed King of France, who abode at Diepe a Sea Town in Normandy, and doubted not to drive the Cardinal easily out of France.

The King of Navarre being thus raised in Dignity, but weak in means, implored Aid of the Queen of England, offering to make a League Offensive and Defensive; the Queen out of a pious respect to a King of her own Religion, sent him presently two and twenty thousand pound sterling in Gold (such a sum of Gold, as he professed he had never seen at one time before) and withall supplied him with four thousand Souldiers, under the command of Peregrinus Lord Wilkoughby; for Colonels, she appointed St Thomas Wilsford, who was made Marshall of the Field, John Borroughs, St William Drury, and St Thomas Baskerville, and gave them a months pay in hand. Hereupon the Confederates (whom the King had vanquished a little before at Arques beyond all expectation) began to quail, and the day before the arrivall of the English they vanished away: with this addition of Forces the King marcheth to Paris, and being ready to enter the City, causeth a retreat to be sounded, as loath to have spoil made of a City, which he hoped shortly should be his own. Afterwards by the assistance of the English he won many Towns, and then having marched at least five hundred miles on foot, he gave them leave after a long Winters service, to return into England. In which Voyage of men of note, died Captain Hunninges, but of a natural death, also Stubbbs (he whose right hand was cut off for writing the Book against the Queens marriage) and St William Drury slain by Master Borroughs in a single Combat, where the quarrell was, that he being but a Knight, would take place of Borroughs that was the younger Son of a Baron, contrary to the Laws of the English Gentry.

About this time, James King of Scots (with Queen Elizabeths goodliking) espoused Ann the Daughter of Frederick the second King of Denmark by his Deputy; but the afterward sayling for Scotland, was by tempest cast upon Norway, and there, through continual storms forced to stay, so as the King in the Winter season set sayl thither, that the marriage according to his vow might be accomplished within the year: some were of opinion that those storms were caused by witchcraft, and was confirmed indeed by some witches taken in Scotland, who confessed they had raised those storms to keep the Queen from landing in Scotland, and that the Earl Borthwell had asked Counsel of them concerning the Kings end; who was thereupon cast into prison, but in a short time breaking loose, occasioned new Riots in Scotland.

This year many Noble personages dyed; Frances Countesse of Sussex, Sister to St Henry Sidway, St Walter Mildmay, Chancellor and Vice Treasurer of the Exchequer, William Somerset Earl of Worcester, so numerous in his off-spring, that he could reckon more children of both Sexes, than all the Earls of England. Also John Lord Brunton, Henry Lord Compton, and at Brussels the Lord Pager.

At this time, the Queen who was always frugall, strained one point of Frugality more than ever she had done before; for upon the information of one Carmarden, (though Leicester, Burgh, and Walsingham were offended, that credit should be given to such a one, and themselves neglected) she raised Thomas Smith the Customer from thirteen thousand pounds yearly, to two and forty thousand pounds, and at last to fifty thousand.

It was now the year 1590. and the three and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths Reign, in which the Earl of Cumberland made a Voyage to the Indies, where he laid sevell to the ground the Fort of the Isles of Fiala, and brought away eight and fifty Pieces of great Ordinance.

This

This year was fatal to many Noble personages, first dyed Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, (Son to John Duke of Northumberland) without issue. After him St Francis Walsingham, Secretary, a man more skilfull in the Politicks, than in the Oeconomicks; more cunning in managing matters of the publick State, than of his own private estate, which he left so mean, and dyed so much indebted, that he was faine to be buried by night, without any Funerall pomp, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul; leaving behinde him one only Daughter, famous for her three husbands, all of them the goodliell men of their time; the first St Philip Sidney; the second, Robert Earl of Essex; the third Richard Burgh Earl of Clanriccard, by King Charles made Earl of Saint Albans. Within two Months after Walsingham dyed St Thomas Randall, who had been fourteen times sent in Embassage to severall Princes, yet was never rewarded with any greater dignities, than the Chamberlainship of the Exchequer, and the Postmastership of England. Soon after him dyed St John Crofts, who had done good service in Scotland, in Edward the Sixths time; in Queen Marys time was condemned of high Treason; in Queen Elizabeths time set at liberty, and made Comptroller of her house. After him dyed George Talbot, the seventh Earl of Shrewsbury of this house; he was made Earl Marshall of England, and left behinde him a memoriall of Wifdom and Integrity. Lastly dyed Thomas Lord Wansworth, the last of the English that had been Governour of Calice.

In Ireland at this time Hugh Gaveloo (so called, because he had been long kept in Fetters) the natural Son of Shain O Neale, caused Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen, for holding private consultations with certain Spaniards, who in 88 were by Ship-wrack cast upon the coast of Ireland: Tir-Oen to prevent the Accusation, took the said Hugh, and when others refused to do it, took a cord and with his own hands strangled him. Hereupon he was sent for into England, and came, and upon pardon obtained, solemnly undertook in presence of the Queen at Greenwich, to maintain the peace with Turkegh Leynigh; Not to usurp the Title of O Neale, nor any authority over the Gentry about him; to reduce the Territory of Tir-Oen to the form of a County, and civill behaviour, and many such matters, giving hostages for his true performance; and indeed for a time he observed all things very duly. This trouble allayed, another arose; for soon after this, Hugh Ros Mac-Mahon, a Potentate in the Territory of Monaghan, compelled those under his jurisdiction to pay him tribute; whereupon the Deputy caused him to be taken, and tried by a Jury of common Souldiers, and then to be hanged up, dividing his lands amongst certain English, and some of the Mac-Mahons, reserving a certain yearly Rent to the Crown of England, by this means thinking to extinguish the Power and Title of Mac-Mahon. But hereupon, O Rork, fearing that he should be served in like manner, took up Arms against the Queen, whom Bingham President of Connaghy soon distressed, and drove into Scotland, and at the Queens request, was by the King delivered up into his hands.

It was now the year 1591. and the four and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when she, carefull lest Brittain should come into the Spaniards hands, sent Edmund Tork into France, to advertise the King to take care thereof; and promising to send him Forces to that end, if he would name some Towns, where they might be in safety. Hereupon he named Cherbourg, Granville, or Briff, as the fittest; and it was agreed, that three thousand English should be sent into Brittain and Picardy; but in the mean time, Henry Palmer was sent to Sea, with certain Ships, who seized upon thirteen Spanish Ships, as they were returning from Nova Francia. And now Roger Williams, with a Company of six hundred Souldiers, passeth over to Diepe in Normandy; and St John Norris with the rest of the Forces, hasten into Brittain soon after. Roger Williams, with his own six hundred, and the help of Charter Governour of Diepe, put to rout the Confederates, that had blocked up the passages; whose valour, the French King in his Letters to the Queen, highly extolled. Whereupon growing more courageous, and not minding his charge, which was to stay at Diepe, he accompanied the King to the very Suburbs of Paris, where in honour of his Nation, he sent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to encounter two hundred Pikemen of the English, and a hundred Musqueteers, with as many Spaniards, in open Field.

After this, the King of France acquainted the Queen, that he had a purpose to set upon Roan, or New-haven, before the Prince of Parma should come into France, and thereupon requested her, to send four thousand English into Normandy, which upon certain conditions he willingly did, and sent them under the command of Robert Earl of Essex, accompanied with St Thomas Lightson, and St William Killgrew, as his Counsellours. When the Earl came into France, he found that the King was at Noyen, and in Normandy no preparation for the War at all, which seemed strange, and much troubled him; but by and by St Roger Williams comes to him from the King, requesting him to come to Noyen, that they might confer concerning a course of War. Thither the Earl made a tedious journey, and being come thither, the King told him he was now of necessity to go himself into Champagne; but promiseth to send Marshall Biron, and the Duke of G Montpensier forthwith to him, to lay siege to Roan. Hereupon the Earl returned to his Tents, expecting their coming, but neither of them came, which troubled the Earl more than before, so as being weary now of doing nothing, he made himself one approach to Roan, where his Brother Walter Devereux was unfortunately slain. Indeed the affairs of the King of France were at this time upon so uncertain terms, that before he could act what he had resolved, something still intervened, that diverted him for which, by his Letters he excused himself to the Queen of England, and by the mediation of the Earl, and Adornay Lord du Plessis, whom to that end he sent into England, obtained new supplies, and then besieged Roan.

led Emperour;) but upon a sudden, dissembling his discontent, he submitted himself to the Deputy and promised all obedience.

It was now the year 1594, and the seven and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths Reign, when the good correspondence between the King of Scots and Queen Elizabeth, gave the Papists small hope that ever he would prove an Instrument to restore the Catholick Religion. Whereupon, they began to bethink themselves of some English Papist, that might succeed the Queen; but finding none of their own Sect, a fit person, they fixed their thoughts upon the Earl of Essex, whose ways seemed a very moderate man; and him they devised to have some right to the Crown, by Descent from Thomas of Woodstock, King Edward the Thirds Son. But the English Fugitives were for the Infanta of Spain; and desiring to set the King of Scots and the Earl of Essex at odds, they sent forth a Book, which they Dedicated to Essex, under the name of Doleman, but was written in deed by Parsons, (Dolemans bitter Adversary) Cardinal Allen, and Francis Englefield. The scope of which Book was, to exclude from Succession, all persons whatsoever, and how near soever allied to the Crown, unless they were Roman Catholicks; Contending further, for the right of Isabella, Infanta of Spain, as being descended from Constance, Daughter of William the Conqueror; from Eleanor eldest Daughter to Henry the Second, married to Alphonso the ninth King of Castile, from Beatrix, Daughter to King Henry the third: Titles obsolete, and which exceed the bounds of Heraldry to discuss. This year, the nineteenth of February, was Henry Prince of Scotland born, to whom the Queen was Godmother, and sent Robert Earl of Sussex for her Deputy.

But now greater matters were in hand, Plots were laid against the Queens life; some Spaniards thinking to make her away by Poyson, and not daring to trust any English man in such a business, they treat to that purpose, with Roderick Lopes a Jew, and Physician to the Queen, with Stephen Ferreira, Emmanuel Loyse, and other Portugals; for divers of that Nation came into England at this time, in relation to Don Antonio; who being discovered by letters of theirs, that were intercepted, were Arraigned at Guild hall, and by their own confessions convinced; to have conspired against the life of the Queen: they were all condemned, and Executed at Tyburn; Lopes professing that he loved the Queen, as well as Jesus Christ: which was the cause of laughter to them that knew him to be a Jew. The next day after them, was condemned Patrick Cullen an Irish Fencer, sent him by the English Fugitives, to kill the Queen, who was straightway executed, though he were at that very time sick and ready to die.

About this time, St John Norris having been in a hot conflict at Sea against the Spaniard, where St Martin Forbysser received his deaths wound, was now called home, with a purpose to send him into Ireland. In which mean while, Rich. Hawkins son of St Joh. Hawkins the famous Sea Captain, had been sent forth a year since, with three of the Queens ships, and two hundred men in them; whereof one of them at the Isle of St Anne, was by chance fired, another of them separated by tempest, returned into England; himself in the third, passed the Straights of Magellan, being the sixth man in the Spanish scompt, that had ever done it; and being now come into the wide Southern Sea, he took five ships laden with Merchandize; one whereof he took away, the rest he suffered to redeem themselves for two thousand Duckats: But at last being set upon by Bertrandus a Castro, who was sent out by the Vice-Roy of those parts, with eight ships against him, after three days battery, he yielded, and though upon composition, yet was nevertheless sent into Spain, and there for divers years kept prisoner.

But James Lancaster in another part of America, had better success; for being set forth by some London Merchants (whose goods the Spaniards had seized) with three Ships and a long Boat, he took nine and thirty Spanish Ships, and at Fernambucks in Brasile, where the wealth of an East-Indian Caraque was lately unladen; he desperately venturing upon the shoar, loaded fifteen ships with the wealth of the Indian Caraque; Sugar, Reed, Red wood called Brasill, and other Merchandize, and then safely and victoriously returned home.

At

At Rome, about this time dyed Cardinal Allen, born in Lancashire, of an honest Family, brought up in Oxford, in Oriol Colledge. In Queen Mariess days he was Proctor of the University, and after Canon of the Cathedral Church at York. Upon the change of Religion in England, he left the Kingdom, and was Divinity Professor at Doway in Flanders, and made Canon of the Church at Cambray. He procured a Seminary to be set up in Doway, for the English; another at Rhims, and a third at Rome; and through zeal of the Romish Religion, forgot whose subject he was born.

At home, at this time, dyed John Peers Archbishop of York, in whose place, succeeded Matthew Hutton, translated from the See of Durham. There dyed also Ferdinand Stanley Earl of Derby, being in the flower of his age, miserably tormented, and vomiting stiffe of a dark rusty colour, being thought to have been poysoned or bewitched. There was found in his chamber a little Image of wax, with hairs of the colour of his hairs, thrust into the belly: which some thought was done of purpose, that men should not suspect him to be poysoned; his vomit so stained the silver Andirons, that it could never be gotten out, and his body though put in scarclothes, and wrapped in lead, did so stink and putrefie, that for a long time none could endure to come near where he was buried. The Master of his Horse was much suspected, who the same day the Earl took his bed, took one of his best Horses, and fled away. About this time also dyed Gregory Fines Lord Dacres, a man somewhat crazed, the Son of Thomas Lord Dacres, hanged in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

And now St William Fitz Williams Lord Deputy of Ireland was called home, and William Russell youngest Son of Francis Earl of Bedford, was sent in his room; to whom presently came the Earl of Tir-Oen, and in humble manner craved pardon of his fault, that he had not presented himself at the call of the late Lord Deputy. Bagnal Marshal of the Irish Forces, exhibited many Articles against him, but he so pleaded for himself with promise of loyalty hereafter, that he was difficult. But fee the subdolisness of this man, for he would never after be gotten to come again, though the Deputy sent for him with many kinde messages.

It was now the year 1595, and the eight and thirtieth year of Queen Elizabeths Reign; when Edmund York and Richard Williams who were formerly apprehended, came to their trial, and were executed at Tyburn, for being bribed to kill the Queen.

At this time a constant rumor was blown abroad from all parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were coming again against England, with a far greater Fleet than that in Eighty eight, and that it was already under sayl; whereupon, Souldiers were levied, and placed on the Sea-coast. Two Navies were made ready, one to expect them at home in the Channel; the other to go for America, under Hawkins and Drake; but when all came to all, it was but certain Spaniards, who loosed from the Sea-coast of France, with four Gallies, which betimes in the morning landing in Cornwall, fired a Church standing alone in the fields, and three Villages of Fishermen, New-lyn, Mossfule, and Pensans, and then presently retired, not taking or killing any one person;
And these were the first and last Spaniards that in hostile manner ever set Foot upon English ground.

And now mischiefs growing dayly in France, a great number persuaded the King, to conclude a peace with Spain, and the Queen her self began to mistrust him; especially, having lately received intelligence out of the Popes Conclave; that he was received into the bosome of the Church of Rome, with the Popes Benediction, and that upon conditions prejudicial to the Protestants.

And therefore at this time, were divers undertakings of the English against Spain; St Walter Rawleigh Captain of the Guard, having desoured a Maid of Honour (whom afterward he married) had lost the Queens favour, and was held in prison for certain moneths; but afterward being set at liberty, though banished the Court, he undertook a Voyage to Guyana, setting sayl from Plymouth in February, he arrived at Trinidad, where he took St Josephs Town, but found not a jot of Money there: From hence, with Boats, and a hundred souldiers, he entred the vast River Orenoque, ranging up in Guyana four hundred miles, but getting little but his labour for his travel. In like manner, Amyas Preston and Sommers, pillaged sundry Towns of the King of Spains in the Western parts, and three ships of the Earl of Cumberland, set upon a huge Caraque which by casuality was fired when they were in sight, and these were the enterprises of private persons: but the Queen being informed, that great store of wealth for the King of Spains use, was conveyed to Port Rico, in St Johns Island, sent thither Hawkins, Drake, and Barkerville with land Forces, furnishing them with six ships out of her own Navy, and twenty other men of War. They set sail from Plymouth the last of August, and seven and twenty days after, came upon the Coast of the great Canarie, which being strongly fortified, they forbore to assault. A month after, they came to the Isle of St Dominick, where five Spanish ships being sent forth to watch the English, sighted upon one of the small English ships which was strayed from the Company, and putting the Master and Mariners upon the Rack, understood by them, that the English Navy was bent to Port Rico; whereupon they make all possible speed to give notice thereof, that being forewarned, they might accordingly be armed. And thereupon as soon as the English had cast Anchors in the Road of Port Rico, the Spaniards thundered against them from the shore; St Nicholas Clifford, and Brus Brown were wounded as they sat at supper, and two days after dyed; Hawkins also, and Drake, partly of disease, & partly of grief for their ill success, dyed soon after. At the end of eight months, the Fleet came home, having done the Enemy little hurt, fired only some few Towns and Ships, but received infinite damage themselves; lost two such Sea-men, as the Kingdom, I may say, all Europe had not their like left. For the Spaniards having of late years received great harms by French and English, had now provided for themselves with Fortifications which were not ealie to be won.

At this time the Queen made known to the States in the Low-Countries, the great charges she had been at in relieving them ten years together; for which she requirerth some considerable recompence: The States again alleadge the great charges they were at in Eighty eight, in repelling the Spaniards in her cause; yet (not to fall out about the matter) they were content to allow some reasonable retribution; but yet for the present, nothing was concluded. Likewise at this time, the Hanse Towns in Germany make a complaint to the Emperour, and the Princes of the Empire, That the Immunities from customs anciently granted them by the Kings of England, began to be antiquated, and that a Monopoy of English Merchants was set up in Germany; To which the Queen by St Christopher Perkins, first shewing the cause of the first Grant, and then the reason of Queen Maries prohibiting it afterward, makes them so satisfactory an answer, that those very Hanse-Towns which complained, brought into England at this time, such store of Corn, that it prevented a mutiny, which through dearth of Corn, was like to have hapned in London.

This year was famous for the death of many great Personages, Philip Earl of Arundel, condemned in the year 1589. The Queen had all this while spared, but now death would spare him no longer, having since that time been wholly given to contemplation, and macerated himself in a strict course of Religion, leaving one only Son, Thomas by his Wife Anne Dacres of Giltland. He had two Brothers, Thomas Lord Howard, whom Queen Elizabeth made Baron of Wal-den, and King James afterward Earl of Suffolk; and William Lord Howard of the North, who yet live; and one sister, the Lady Margaret, married to Robert Sackville, afterward Earl of Dorset, and father of Edward Earl of Dorset now living; a Lady so milde, so vertuous, and so devout in her Religion, that if her Brother macerated himself being in prison, she certainly did no lesse, being at liberty; whom I the rather mention, because I had the happinesse to know her living, and the unhappinesse to be a Mourner at her Funerall. There dyed this year also, William Lord Vaux, a zealous Papist, and St Thomas Hineage, Vice-Chamberlain, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, whose only Daughter married to St Moyle Finch of Kent, was no small advancer of that House. There dyed also William Whitker, Master of St Johns Colledge in Cambridge, and Divinity Professor: As likewise St Roger Williams, and St Thomas Morgan; so as this year was honoured with the deaths of two great Lords, one exquisite Courtier, one great Scholar, and two famous Souldiers.

In Ireland at this time Russel the Deputy doubting a storm of War from Tir-Oen, sent into England, requiring to have some experienced souldiers sent to him with Forces, who though he desired Baquerzyle to be the man, yet St John Norris was sent, with thirteen hundred old souldiers, besides a further supply; whom Tir-Oen hearing to be coming, set presently upon the Fort of Blackwater, and in the absence of Edward Cornwall the Governour, took it. But now being doubtful of his case, in a subdalous manner (as he was a double dealing man) he both offereth his help to the Earl of Kildare, against the Deputies servants; and at the same time, maketh promise to the Earl of Ormond, and St Henry Walpole, of loyalty and obedience; but notwithstanding he was forthwith proclaimed Traytor, under the name of Hugh O'Neal, bastard Son to Con O'Neal. There was at this time with the Rebels in Ulster, a thousand Horse, and 6280 Foot: and in Connaught, two thousand three hundred, all at Tyr-Ons command: and the Forces of the English under Norris, not much fewer, with whom the Deputy himself joyned, and marched together to Armagh; which so terrified the Rebels, that Tyr-Oen forlaking the Fort of Blackwater, began to hide himself. Whereupon the Deputy returned, leaving Norris to follow the War, with the Title of General of the Army. But this satisfied not Norris, and therefore out of emulation betwixt himself and the Deputy, he performed nothing worth the speaking of, and seemed to favour Tyr-Oen, as much as the Deputy hated him; inasmuch, as he had private conference with him (a thing not lawfull with proclaimed Traytors) and upon his submission, and hostages given, a Truce was granted both to him and Odonell, till the first of January. When the Truce was expired, Tyr-Oen exhibited certain Petitions, protesting, if they were granted, he would then perform all duties of a loyal subject. In consulting about which Petitions, another Truce was concluded, till the first of April: during which Truce, Tyr-Oen dealt secretly with the King of Spain for Aid to be sent him, making nevertheless a fair shew of willingness to obedience, so far, that by the procurement of Norris and Fenton, a pardon was granted him; the which he pretended to receive more joyfully, than the Instrument which conferred the Earldome upon him; yet all this was but dissimulation, to win time for his own ends.

In the midst of these Irish Affairs, Albertus Arch-Duke of Austria, and Cardinal, whom the King of Spain had newly set over the Netherlands, mulstered together the Spanish Forces, upon pretence of raising the Siege of La Fere in Picardy; but upon a sudden turneth aside, and besiegeth Calice; and taking Norham Fort, the very first day became Master of the Haven. The Queen informed hereof, forthwith upon the very Sunday in time of Divine Service, commanded to levy Souldiers, whom she committeth to the Earl of Essex; but before they could be shipped, certain

A certain news came, That the Town and Fort were taken by the Spaniard: Whereupon, the Queens Army was dimissed, and only some money lent to the French King.

But a few days after, a far greater, and more select Army is raised in England, wherein many of Noble Houses served as Voluntaries: For the Queen, to divert the King of Spain from invading her Borders, thought it the best way to invade his: Whereupon a Navy of a hundred and fifty ships was made ready; where were Souldiers under pay, 6360; Voluntaries of the Nobility and Gentry, 1000; Mariners, 6772, besides the Dutch men, who brought two and twenty Ships. Robert Earl of Essex, and Charles Howard Lord Admirall of England, were made Generals with equal Authority; but the Admirall to hold Prerogative at Sea, Essex at Land. To these, for a Council of War, were joyned, the Lord Thomas Howard, Walter Rawleigh, Francis Vere, George Carew, and Conyers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; The Admirall commanded the first; Essex the second, the Lord Thomas Howard the third, and Rawleigh the fourth. The Officers of the Army were Francis Vere, Serjeant Major General, or Marshall; John Winkfield, Quarter-Master General; George Carew Master of the Ordnance; Conyers Clifford, Serjeant Major. Colonels were, Robert Earl of Sussex, St Christopher Blunt, St Thomas Gerrard, St Richard Winkfield; William Winkfield was Commander of the Voluntaries, and Anthony Abley Secretary to the Council of War, was to Register their Acts and Consultations. The Commission being drawn the Queen gave them private Instructions, and withall, a Prayer of her own making, to be daily used in every Ship.

This Fleet set forth from Plimmouth at the beginning of June. Nigh unto Cabo S. Vincent they lighted upon an Irish Barque, which told them, That at Cales they were secure, and that in the Haven there were at Anchor Gallies, Ships of War, and a great many Merchants Vessels. The twentieth of June, they cast Anchor on the West side of the Island; within two days they were agreed to set upon the Spanish Ships, whereat the Earl of Essex cast up his Cap for joy. This business was allotted to the lesser Ships, because the Road was too shallow for the great. The Gallies quickly fled, and creeping along the shore, shifted away, but the Spanish Ships that lay at Anchor at Puntall, turned their broad sides; so as the English fight with them, lasted from break of day till noon; at which time the Spaniards having their Gallies miserably torn, and many of their men slain, resolved to fire the Ships, or run them on shore. The Spanish Admirall being fifteen hundred Tun of burthen, was fired by a Moor, and two other Ships which lay next her took the fire, and were lost likewise. When this Sea-fight was ended, Essex landed eight hundred Souldiers at Puntall, a league from the Town of Cales, when half a mile from the Town, the Spanish Horse and Foot shewed themselves, and presently gave back again; but straight way cometh forth a greater number: Then Essex commanded his Forces to make a fair retreat; and having enticed forth their enemies, they turned upon them with such violence, that they forced them back into the Town. Then the Earl got up to a Bulwark newly raised, near the Gate, where he spied a passage into the Town, but to high from ground, that they must leap a Spears length to get down. Yet Evans the Earl of Sussex his Lieutenant, Arthur Savage, and other, leaped down; and the mean while St Francis Vere broke the Gate, and rushed in, and the rest with him. In the Market-place John Winkfield was shot in the head, and with stones from the tops of houses divers were wounded; amongst whom, Samuel Bagnall received eight wounds, and Arthur Savage was bloody all over; which two were Knighted in the place. The next day the Castle was yielded, upon condition, That the Inhabitants might depart with the cloathes on their backs, the rest to be left for spoyle. For five hundred and fourscore thousand Duckets the Castle was to be redeemed; and for the payment, forty of the chief Citizens to be sent Hostages into England. Now Rawleigh was commanded to fire the Merchants Ships lying at Port Real when they promised two Millions of Duckets to redeem them: but this the Admirall would not hear of, saying, He was sent to destroy Ships, not to dismisst them upon Composition. A world of Munition was found in the City, and great store of Money privately carried away, every one shifting for himself. It was thought by the wiser sort, That the Spaniard could not be damaged lesse by this Expedition, than twenty Millions of Duckets. None of note was slain, amongst the English, but only Winkfield, who also slew a Spanish Captain; and now at last, three-score Military men were honoured with Knighthood. After this, having spoyled the whole Island, and demolished the Forts, they returned into England, much against the will of Essex, who would fain have been attempting some other enterprise.

The Queen receiving them home with much affability, giving many thanks to those of principal note, but extolling the Earl of Essex and the Admirall, above the rest. And now, bethinking her self of a fit man to be Governour of the Bryll, which was given by the States as a Caution Town for money due, she made choice of St Francis Vere, although Essex commended other to her for the place: but another thing he took with great indignation, That in his absence she had made St Robert Cecil Secretary, whereas he had formerly with great instance commended St Thomas Bodley to her.

And now the King of Spain, to recover his honour lost at Cales, setteth forth a Navy for England and Ireland, with a great number of Irish Fugitives; but being at Sea, most of his ships were either run upon Rocks, or cast away in storms; so as this Expedition came to nothing.

But the Queen, at this time, for her better security, entred a League of Defence and Offence with the French King, against the Spaniard, upon certain Conditions; which League she confirmed by Oath, in the Chappell at Greenwich, the nine and twentieth of August, laying her hand upon the hand of Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bulloigne, and Marshall of France, the Bishop of Chichester holding forth the Evangelists, and a great company of the Nobility standing round about. In September following, Gilbert Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, was sent on Ambassage into France, to take the French Kings Oath, and to present St. Anthony Mildmay for the Queens Ambassadors in Ordinary in the room of St. Henry Unton lately there deceased, and to invest the King with the Order of the Garter. Soon after, Baskerville went into Picardy with two thousand Souldiers; for no more were by agreement to be sent this year.

An. Reg. 39. Thomas Arundell of Warder is by the Emperour made Earl of the Empires, and what the priviledges of that honour are. Whether honours given to the Queens Subjects without her privy, are to be admitted.

Many great persons die.

It was now the year 1596, and the nine and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths reign, when Thomas Arundell of Warder returned into England, from the Wars in Hungary against the Turk, whom, for his good service done there, the Emperour by his Letters Patents, had created Earl of the sacred Empire, and all and singular his Heirs and their Posterity, Males or Females, lawfully descended from him, to be Earls and Countesses of the holy Empire for ever. Those who are graced with this Title, have a Place and Voice in the Imperiall Diets, may purchase Lands in the Emperours Dominions, may take up voluntary Souldiers, and are not bound to answer any matter before any Judge, but only in the Chamber of the Empire. At his return, a great Question came in agitation, Whether Titles of Honour given to the Queens subjects without her privy, ought to be accepted by them, or admitted by her. For this new Earl stuck in the stomachs of the English Barons, who inwardly grudging to give him place. The matter was long disputed on both sides, but what issue it had, or whether he were permitted this honour here at home, I find not: Certain it is, That St. Nicholas Clifford, and St. Anthony Sherley, whom the French King two years since received into the Order of St. Michael, were laid in Prison at their coming home, and charged to resign their Robes of the Order.

This year many great Persons dyed; John Puckering, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, whom Thomas Egerton succeeded; Richard Fletcher, Bishop of London, who for marrying the Lady Baker (as goodly a Lady as he was a Prelate) incurred the Queens displeasure; and to cure his cares, fell immoderately to drinking of Tobacco, and so expired. Henry Cary, Baron of Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain of her Majesties Houfe, and her Cousin german. St. Francis Knolls, who married Hunsdons Sister, in Queen Maries days an Exile in Germany for the Gospel, by Queen Elizabeth made first Vice-Chamberlain, then Captain of the Guard, afterward Treasurer of the Household, and Knight of the Garter. Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntington, and President of the Council in the North, who spent his estate upon Puritan Ministers: Francis Lord Hastings, Nephew to him by his Brother George, who succeeded him in the Earldom, and Margaret Clifford Countesse of Derby, (who defended of the blood Royall, from Charles Brandon) conspired with forgers and cunning men, and thereupon a little before her end, was in a manner excluded from the Queens favour.

The Queen at this time was told, that the King of Spain was preparing a new Fleet against Ireland; whereupon to encounter him, she also prepared a Navy of a hundred and twenty Ships, seventeen of the Queens, three and forty lesser Ships of War, the rest for the carriage of provision: They were parted into three Squadrons: Essex commanded the first, who was also chief Commander in the expedition; the Lord Thomas Howard the second, and Rawleigh the third. In this Fleet were sundry of the Nobility and Gentry, Charles Blunt, Lord Monmouth, Vere, Carew, St. Christopher Blunt, the Earls of Rutland and Southampton, the Lords Grey, Cromwell, Rich, and many other. The ninth of July they weighed Anchor from Plimmonth, and went to direct their course to Ferall and the Groyne, to seize upon the Spanish Fleet in the Harbour, and towards the Isles called Azores, to intercept the Indian Fleet at their return into Spain; but this expedition was crossed and overthrown by Tempests, for they had not sailed forty Leagues, from Plimmonth, when they were shaken with such a terrible Tempest for four days together, that the Mariners themselves were at their wits end, and the Fleet had much ado to recover Plimmonth; The Navy being mended, they hoise up sayl the second time, but the wind fell presently again to cross, that for a whole Moneths time they could not get out of the Haven; returning to Plimmonth the seventeenth of August they got out of the Haven; and now the third time, with a side winde hoise up sayl, but before they came in view of Spain, they were dispersed by another horrible tempest, wherein of the two great Ships which were taken at Celice, one was dashed in pieces, the other wandered no man knew whether. At the Island Flora the Fleet met again, where Rawleigh being distressed for water went on shore without leave, and ere he had watered, had charge to follow Essex to Fayall: but not finding him there, he observed the Port, and calling a Councell, the Commanders wished him to set upon the place, and not let slip so fair a booty. Upon this Rawleigh with some of the prime Volunteers, got to shore, and won the Town, but found no booty in it. The next day Essex came thither, whom Merrick informeth what Rawleigh had done, affirming spitefully, that he had done it only to prevent his Lordship in the honour of the exploit: whereupon some perswaded the Earl to call a Councell of War and then displace him; others again to take off his head for going to Land, without the chief Commanders leave; saying, he was never like for to have such another opportunity to be rid of his Adversary; upon this Sidney, Brett, Berry, and other of Rawleighs company were displaced, and laid by the heels; Rawleigh himself was sent for, and entertained with a grim look by Essex and all his Party; Essex rebuketh him angrily, for landing his Forces, which none upon pain of death might doe, without the the Generals command; Rawleigh made answer, that the Captains indeed, Shipmasters, and the rest were within the compasse of that Law; but not the Three prime Commanders, of whom himself was One: That he had a long time waited his coming, and longer would have waited, but that the Islanders provoked him to fight. And now the Lord Thomas Howard mediated, that no severity might be used against Rawleigh, and perswaded him to acknowledge his fault; which being done, all were friends, and the displaced Captains were restored to their places, for the Earl was of a placable disposition; easily apt to take offence, and as easily to remit it.

From hence they sail to Gratiola, where the Inhabitants craved mercy and obtained it; and here Essex would have tarried, in expectation of the Indian Fleet; but that Graves the Pilot dissuaded, because the Harbour was not good: and now see the unluckiness of ill counsel, for the English were not gone above an hour, or two, from this place; when loe, the American Fleet (wherein were forty Ships, and seven of them laden with treasure) cometh thither; which, hearing that the English were thereabouts, directed their course to Tercera, where they gained the Haven, all but three Ships, indifferent wealthy; which the English took: and then were minded to set upon the rest, in the Port; but finding the attempt not feasible, they passed from hence to St. Michaels, where Southampton, Rutland, Evers, Bredon and Dockway were Knighted. And then Essex landed within six miles of the Town, nigh unto Villa Franca, a fair Town, and well furnished with Merchandize, Wine, Wood, and Corn; where they tarried six days: and the common Souldiers found good booty. And now a Caraque was espied, coming out of the East-Indies; which by a warning-piece shot off in a Dutch Ship, perceiving that the English were there; run her self ashore, unloaded her Merchandize, and then fired her self. Thus the English had ill luck every where in this expedition: And the ninth of October they hoisted sail for England; but within two days, a terrible tempest, from the Northward dispersed them; and the Spanish Fleet also at the same time, so as they never came in view of one another: one Spanish Ship was cast upon Dartmouth, the Mariners and Souldiers half starved in her; who intimated, that the Spanish Fleet intended to seize upon some Haven in Cornwall, which being nigh the mouth of the Channell, might be convenient to receive Forces from Spain: but the divine Providence frustrated the designs both of the Spaniard and the English.

But now at his return, the Earl of Essex found that done in England, in his absence, which infinitely discontented him: St. Robert Cecil made Chancellour of the Dutchy of Lancaster; and which was more, Charles Lord Howard, created Earl of Nottingham, with relation in his Patent to the Victory in eighty eight; and his good service at Cales: This glory he envied him, and besides stomached it, that he must now take place of him: It being enacted in the Reign of Henry the eighth, that the chief Officers of the Kingdom, should have Precedence of all men of their degree. Whereupon the Queen, to give him content, was faine to create him Earl Marshal of England; by which he recovered his place again.

About this time, an Ambassadour came into England, from the King of Poland; who, when the Queen expected he should give her thanks for having procured a Peace between the King his Master, and the Turk; he clean contrary expolulated unkindness, for breach of Priviledges, in trading with Spain, requiring a present remedy, or else the King would otherways right himself. The Queen not a little offended, suddenly replied, How was I deceived? I expected an Ambassadour, and behold a Herald; such a speech I never heard in all my life time. And after some further checking of him for his boldness, she referred him to her Councell; and then retired into her Closet. The Ambassadour afterward, in private conference with some of the Councell, excused himself, saying, that his speech was penned by others, and then given him in writing. To his Message, the Councell gave the like answer, as they had given before the Hanse-Towns, upon the like occasion: though now again, the Hanse-Towns obtain of the Emperour, to prohibit the English from trading in Germany, which made the Queen to prohibit the Hanse-Towns from trading in England, and put them out of the Steelyard till this difference was accorded.

This year the Chancellour of Denmark came into England to restore the Garter, which she had bestowed upon the Kings Father, and withall offering the Kings help, to make a peace for the Queen with the Spaniard. The Queen thanked him, but meant not to use his help for that which she did not desire, and especially not now, when he had newly molested the King of France her Allye, and had taken Amyens the strongest Town of Picardy: Though why should the Queen be so tender of the French King, when now to get an aid of four thousand Souldiers from her, he fell to devices, intimating unto her, that he was now offered by the Popes Nuntio a very commodious peace, if he would but forsake her. But while these things were in Treaty, Amyens was recovered again by the valour of Baskerville (who dyed at the siege) and of St. Arithur Savage, as the King in his Letters to the Queen thankfully acknowledged.

About this time a Parliament was holden at Westminster, where Subsidies were willingly granted; and to this Parliament was called the Lord La Ware, and restored to his blood, which by Act of Parliament in the reign of King Edward the sixth was tainted; Also to this Parliament was called Thomas Lord Howard, by the Title of Baron Howard of Walden.

In Ireland at this time, a great part of Ulster, and almost all Connaght was in Rebellion; Whereupon Russel the Deputy was called home, and Thomas Lord Burroughs sent in his place, a man very stout and courageous, but no souldier: This infinitely discontented Norris, who thought thought himself sure of the place himself, and now to see his Rival preferred before him, and himself to be under him, President of Munster, drove him into such a melancholy, that in a very short time (and as he thought to himself with much disgrace) he ended his life.

And now the Earl of Tir-Oen craveth, and obtaineth a moneths Truce of the new Deputy, at the moneths end, the Deputy marcheth against the Rebels, and gaineth the Fort at Blackwater, when suddenly the Rebels flew themselves upon a hill hard by, against whom the Earl of Kildare marcheth and puts them to flight; but yet with some losse of his own side, as Francis Vaughan the Deputies Brother in Law, Turner a Serjeant Major, and two Foster, Brothers of the Earl of Kildare, whose death he took so heavily, that within a few days he dyed himself.

The L. Burroughs dies.

Tir-Oen complains to the new Lieutenant of his grievances; and at the same time stirreth up Mac-Hugh to a new Rebellion. The King of France concludes a Peace with Spain, against Q. Elizabeths liking. A Consultation, whether a Peace with Spain were convenient for England or no. Burleigh is for it, Essex against it.

The Queen gives the Earl of Essex a box on the ear, and why; and how he took it.

The Lord Burleigh Lord Treasurer dies.

The Earl of Cumberland takes Port-Rico.

As soon as the Deputy had fortified the Castle at Blackwater and withdrawn his Army, the Rebels began to besiege it again; (for this was the main place of their strength) which caused the Deputy with all possible speed to make thither, but unhappily dyed by the way. Whereupon the Rebels set upon the Fort more fiercely than before; but being still repelled, they comforted themselves with this, that there was not many days provision left in the Fort; yet the admirable fortitude of Thomas Williams the Captain, and the Garrison Souldiers saved the place, who, when their Horse-flesh was all spent, fed upon weeds growing within the Trenches, and endured all kinde of misery. And now the Lord Burroughs the Deputy being dead, the Army by direction from England, was committed to the Earl of Ormond, and the Government to two Lords Justices, Adam Lofthouse Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellor, and Robert Gardiner: To this new Lieutenant, Tir-Oen exhibiteth a Bill of his oppressions and grievances with request of pardon, and at the same time stirreth up Mac-Hugh to a new Rebellion in Leinster.

In France at this time, the French King being importuned by the Pope, and by his own subjects, began to incline to a Peace with Spain; which the Queen understanding, she sent into France Robert Cecil, Herbert and Wilks, (who died at his landing in France) The States likewise sent thither, Justine of Nassau and Barneveldt, and others likewise into England to dissuade the Peace, but notwithstanding all they could say or do, the French King shortly after concluded a Peace, to the great discontentment of the Queen and the States, but to the great good, and establishment of the French Common-wealth.

And now the Queen providing for her own and her peoples safety, sent Sr Francis Vere to the States, to know if they were willing to joyn in a Treaty of Peace with the Spaniards; if not, what they would afford toward a War; and to deal earnestly with them, about repayment of money due to her from them. At home in the mean time, a great Consultation was holden, Whether a Peace with Spain were convenient for England, or no; and many Reasons were on both sides alleadged. Burleigh Lord Treasurer was for Peace, Essex for War, and so vehement in it, that the Treasurer, after a long debating, in a strange manner of Presage, reached forth the Book of the Psalms to him, pointing him to that Verse, The bloody minded man shall not live out half his days. Which made Essex afterward to set forth an Apology, with Reasons for justification of his opinion.

But now another Consultation was held, about a fit man to be Deputy of Ireland; The Queen intended to send Sr William Knolles, Essex his Uncle; but Essex was violent for Sr George Carey, whom he had a minde to remove from the Court; and when he could not by any means persuade the Queen to it, he then, forgetting himself and his duty, uncivilly and contemptuously turned his back upon the Queen, muttering certain words. Whereupon she growing impatient, gave him a box on the ear, and bid him be gone with a vengeance; Essex laid his hand upon his sword hilt, and swore a great oath, That he could not, nor would not put up such an Indignity; and that he would not have taken it at King Henry the Eighth his hands; and so in a rage flung away from the Court. But afterward, admonished by the Lord Keeper, he became more milde, and in a short time, returned into the Queens favour.

About this time, William Cecil Lord Burleigh, and high Treasurer of England, finding himself to droop with age, (for he was now threescore and seventeen years old) sent Letters to the Queen, intreating her to release him of his publick charge; whereupon she went to visit, and comfort him, but within a few days he ended his life, after he had been the principal stay of the English Common-wealth for many years together. One great good he did to his Countrey, a little before his death, that he brought the States of the Low Countries to a Composition, for the payment of Eight hundred thousand pounds, by Thirty thousand pounds yearly; likewise a new League to be concluded with them.

The King of Denmark's Subjects having lately seized upon some goods of the English as Prize, to the value of a hundred thousand Dollers; the Queen sent the Lord Zouch, and Christopher Perkins Doctor of Law, in Embassy to the Dane, both to congratulate his late marriage with the Electors Daughter of Brandenburg; and also to crave restitution of the English goods; who obtained, that in lieu thereof, Threescore thousand Dollers were repaid. And now George Clifford Earl of Cumberland, having with a Navy of eleven ships, waited for Portingall Cariques, and the American Fleet, till the season of the year was past (they not daring to stir forth) he at last set upon Port-Rico and took it; but seven hundred of his men falling sick of Calentures, and dying within forty days, he was fain to return home with some honour, but little profit.

About

About this time, one Edward Squire was Arraigned of high Treason; he had been at first an ordinary Scrivener, afterwards a Groom in the Queens stable, and going as a Souldier in Drakes last expedition, was taken prisoner and carried into Spain, there he came acquainted with one Wallpoole an English J-suite, who caused him to be put into the Inquisition for an Heretick, and the fellow talking of misery, was easily drawn to become a Papist, and afterward to attempt any thing for the Catholick cause. His ghostly father perswaded him it were meritorious to make away the Queen and the Earl of Essex, and sent him into England with a certain payson, wherewith to annoint the pommel of the Queens Saddle, and the chair in which the Earl should sit, which accordingly performed, but neither of them took effect, whereupon Wallpoole suspecting Squires fidelity was bent to revenge it, and sent one into England, who in general terms should lay this aspersions upon him; whereupon Squire is called in question, and never thinking that his Confessor would detect him, directly denied all at first; but after seeing himself betrayed, confessed all the matter and was executed.

This whole year the rebellion was hot in Ireland; For Tir-Oen notwithstanding his pardon lately obtained, all on a sudden besieged the Fort at Blackwater, to the raising of which siege, the Lieutenant General (for there was as yet no Deputy) sent thirteen Companies under the command of the Marshal, Tir-Oens sworn adversary, him Tir-Oen slew, and put his whole Army to rout, and achieved such a Victory, with so great losse to the English, as they had never felt the like since they first set footing in Ireland; for thirteen valiant Commanders, and fifteen hundred common Souldiers were slain at this skirmish, and soon after the Fort of Blackwater was yielded up. And now Tir-Oens fame began to resound as the Assessor of the liberty of the Nation, and upon a sudden all Munster brake forth into Rebellion. For the cheif rising whereof Tir-Oen sent thither Omny Mac-Rorye and Terell (who originally an English man, was grown a deadly enemy to the English Nation) with four hundred Kernes. Against these, Thomas Norris President of the Province, marched to Killmallock with a good force; but finding that the Irish Souldiers of his Company were ready to revolt, he was fain to disperse his Army and retire to Corke. Hereupon the Rebels grew insolent, spoiled the Countrey, and in cruel manner put all the English to the sword. Furthermore they declare Fitz-Thomas to be Earl of Desmond, but upon condition he should hold of O-Neale, that is, of Tir-Oen, who now dispatched Letters to the Spaniards, relating his Victories to the full, and vowing to accept no terms of peace with the English, and yet at the same instant (after his wonted treacherous manner) proffered some kinde of submission to the Lieutenant, but withall made unreasonable demands.

The State of Ireland being thus in combustion, a serious consultation is holden whom to send to quench it: the Queen and most of the Council thought Sr Charles Blunt Lord Mounjoy the fittest man; but Essex covertly intimated, that he had no military experience, and besides was too Bookish to prove a good Commander: he seem'd to aim at the place for himself, though he made a shew modestly to refuse it, and yet still ready with his exceptions if any other were nominated: many thought it dangerous to have an Army put into his hands, for his followers talked of great matters, that he (forsooth) was descended of the bloud Royal of Scotland and England, and had better Right to the Crown, than any other of the Competitors. In conclusion, he is appointed Vice-Roy, with ample Authority, to make War or conclude Peace, and pardon all offenders, even Tir-Oen himself. An Army is allotted him as great as he desired: Indeed greater than ever Ireland had seen before, Twenty Thousand Foot, and Thirteen Hundred Horse: with these, and a great Retinue besides of the Nobility, he passeth into Ireland, where as soon as he had taken the Sword, contrary to his Commission (which was to go immediately against the Arch-rebel) he marched towards Munster, against the petty Rebels, taketh the Castle of Cahir, and driveth the Rebels into the Woods and Groves adjoining. His Forces being now impaired, he carrieth to make them up; but in the mean time sendeth directions to Sr Conner Clifford, President of Connacht, to set upon the Rebels in one place, (thereby to sever their forces) while he assaulted them in another; Clifford marched toward Belike, with 1500 Souldiers, where the Rebels are upon them at unawares, under the conduct of O-Rorke, (his Son that was hanged here in England) The English repel them at first with ease, and march along, but the Rebels finding they wanted Powder, set upon them again, and put them to flight; in which skirmish, Clifford and many of the old Souldiers were slain.

Essex having by this time received new supplies out of England, and a check for neglecting the Queens Command, setteth forth at length towards the Borders of Ulster, with Thirteen hundred Foot, and five hundred Horse; being come thither, Tir-Oen by a Messenger requested Parley, Essex refuseth, saying, he might speak with him the next morning, between the two Armies; the next day word is brought to Essex, that Tir-Oen craved the Queens mercy, and that he might only be heard speak, appointing the shallow of Balla Clinch for a most convenient place; thither came Essex alone, with whom Tir-Oen (riding his Horse up to the girls) had private conference a full hour. A while after, Con Tir-Oens bafe Son came to Essex, requesting in his Fathers name a second Parley, and that some of the chief on both sides might be present: Essex consented, so there came not more than six. At the day appointed, many words had not passed, but it was agreed, that their Delegates should Treat the next day concerning a Peace: between them it was concluded, that a Truce should be held from six weeks to six weeks, till May day.

Edward Squire executed, and why.

Tir-Oen breaks openly into Rebellion, and gives the English a great defeat.

Yet at the same time makes some offer of submission.

A Consultation is held, whom to send against Tir-Oen.

At last the Earl of Essex is sent with ample authority.

He hath private conference with Tir-Oen.

A Truce is concluded,

The Queen writes to Essex blaming his delay.

Essex without leave comes over to the Queen.

Is welcomed with committing him to the L. Privy Seal.

The Earl of Tir-Oen, upon Essex's departure carries himself as Monarch of Ireland. Sir Charles Blunt L. Montjoy is sent Deputy into Ireland.

A Treaty of Peace is agreed on with Spain.

The English Commissioners have a charge not to give precedence to Spain, and why.

The Spaniards being denied Precedence break off the Treaty.

The famous Battail of Newports, won by the valour of the English.

By this time, the Queen understanding that no more was done, after so much time and money spent, in a great anger taxeth the Earls proceedings, and I know not how, it fell from her to some others that stood by, that he had other thoughts in his minde, than the good of his Prince and Country: And thereupon dispatched very sharp Letters to him, blaming his delay, and letting slip every fair opportunity: with which Letters Essex was so nettled, and chiefly troubled, that the Queen had now made Cecil Master of the Wards, which he expected himself: that he began to cast strange projects within his minde, and held private consultations of returning into England with part of his Forces, to surprize his Adversaries; But from this course, the Earl of Southampton, and Sir Christopher Blunt dissuaded him, as being dangerous and wicked. Yet within a moneth, over he went, and came to the Court at Nonsuch, to inform the Queen of the State of Ireland. By the way, the Lord Gray of Wilton crossed him, but saluted him not; whom one of his followers offered to kill for his contempt: but Essex would not suffer him: And made such hast, that early in the Morning he was upon his Knees before the Queen in the Privy Chamber. She entertained him courteously, but not with the countenance she was wont: and after a little talk bid him keep in his Chamber; And soon after, Committed him to Custody, in the Lord Privy Seals House; where entering into Consideration of his case, he giveth himself wholly to Divine Contemplation, and writeth wonderfull Letters to his friends, of the vanity of the things of this life.

It was now the year one thousand six hundred, and the two and fortieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when after the departure of the Earl of Essex, Tir-Oen began to carry himself as Monarch of Ireland, and sendeth Kernes to make spoil in the possessions of such as continued in their loyalty to the Queen, under Mac-Guir their Captain, who lighting casually upon Sir Warham Saint-Leger, thrust him through with a spear, and was himself thrust through withall. Whereupon the Queen sent Sir Charles Blunt Lord Montjoy, to take upon him the Deputies place, who loseth no time, but first of all marcheth towards Ulster, buildeth a fort within eight miles of Armagh, which, in honour of Sir John Norris, under whom he had his first military schooling, he calleth by the name of Mount Norris; there he placed Edward Blanche, who kept the Rebels in awe in those parts, from thence back he goeth into Leinster, wherein the Glynnes he reduceth into order, Donel-Spanish, Phelim Mac-Pheoph, and the rebelling Nation of the O Tooles, taking hostages of them; then back into Ulster again, being victor whosoever he cometh, and at Tradagh, receiveth into protection Mac-Henry, Mac-Comly, and other Rebels who fell at his feet for mercy. All this and more he did in his first year, and no lesse successfull was Carew President of Munster, who drave out of the County the Titular Earl of Desmond, and having found Munster a turbulent Province in April, he overcame and made it so quiet by December following, that the Rebels maintained not one fort in it against the Queen.

And now a new consultation was holden in England, touching a peace with the King of Spain, the which he sought both by the French King, and by Albericus the Archduke, who was now returned into the Netherlands out of Spain, where he was marryed to the Infanta. The Queen consenting to a Treaty, left it to the French King to nominate both the time and place for the meeting of the Delegates, who set down the month of May, and Bulloigne in France; But now fore-seeing that a question would arise about Precedency, some were appointed to search the Ancient Records concerning that point. These men found in the Book of the Ceremonies of the Court of Rome, which (according to the Canons) giveth Rule to the rest, as the Lady and Mistress; that amongst Kings, the first place is due to the King of France, the second to the King of England, and the third to the King of Castile; That the English quietly held this privilege in the General Councils of Basil, Constance, and others: besides the Kingdom of Castile, which is the Spaniards first Title, is but an upstart in regard of England, which had Earls, but no Kings till the year 1017. In like manner, that Pope Julius the third, gave sentence for Henry the seventh of England, against Ferdinand, who was then King of Castile.

At the day appointed, the Delegates met at Bulloigne, Sir Henry Nevill, Legier Embassadour, Sir John Herbert, Robert Beal, and Thomas Edmunds for the English, and other for the King of Spain, and the Archduke. The English had instructions, first concerning Precedency, in no case to give way to the King of Spain, yet if they contended, to put the matter to the division of the Lots, rather than the Treaty should be dissolved; and for the rest, to propose and mention the renewing of the ancient Burgundian League, freedom of commerce, &c.

At the meeting, when they had severally shewed their Commissions; the English challenge the Precedency, the Spaniards do the like, and in so peremptory a manner that without it they would dissolve the Treaty: Hereupon the English made a proposition, to let passe the question of Precedency; and to transact the business by writing, and Messengers between them: Or that the Treaty might be intermitted only for threescore days, not quite broken off; but all was to no purpose; and at three moneths end they parted.

The States the mean while, were so far from regarding a Peace, that at this time they thought upon reducing the Sea Coast of Flanders into their command; and thereupon they landed an Army there, of fourteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, under the conduct of Maurice of Nassau; and fifteen hundred of the English under the command of Sir Francis Vere, and his Brother Horatio: At which time happened the famous Battail of Newports, against the Archduke, wherein nine thousand of the Spaniards were slain; and the Victory, by the valour of the English, fell to the Dutch; for so forward were the English in this Battail, that of their fifteen hundred, eight hundred

A hundred were slain and sore wounded, eight Captains killed, and of the rest every man hurt.

All this year, and the year past, sundry quarrels and complaints arose between the English and the French, touching reprisals of goods taken from each other by Pirates of either Nation: Also touching Customs and impositions, contrary to the Treaty of Blays, and deceit in English Clothes, to the great infamy of our Nation. In Denmark likewise arose controversies touching Commerce, and the Fishing of the English upon the Coast of Iceland and Norway. The Queen also at that time, for the increase of Navigation and Commerce, Founded the Company of East-India Merchants, allowing them large Priviledges: but whether this hath proved beneficial to the Common-wealth, (there having been by this means such a masse of money and great store of other commodities carried out of the Kingdom, and so many Mariners lost every year) will make a question.

About this time also, Pope Clement the eighth, perceiving the Queen to be in her declining age, sent two Breeves into England, the one to the Popish Clergy, the other to the Laity, to suffer no person whatsoever, to take the Kingdom upon him after the Queens death, but one that should promise by Oath, to promote with all his might, the Roman Catholick Religion, how neer soever otherwise, he were allyed to the Bloud Royal of the King of England.

This year by reason of intemperate weather, happened a great scarcity of Corn in England, and thereby many grievous complaints were occasioned. The common people call out reproachfull slanders against the Lord Treasurer Buckhurst, as the granter of Licences for transportation of Corn; but he appealing to the Queen, she forthwith defended his Innocency, and made it known by open Proclamation, imputed the fault upon the Broggers of Corn, and Foretellers of Markets, and gave order that the slanderer should be reprehended and punished.

The Earl of Essex, who had now been Prisoner six moneths in the House of the Lord Privy Seal, he then began to repent in good earnest, resolving to put away his perverse Counsellors, Gilly Merrick and Henry Caffe, and then he shewed so much patience and great submission, that the Queen then sent him to his own house, and to be there confined, always protesting that he would doe nothing that should be for his ruine, but only that, which should be for his amendment. Nevertheless, whenas the common people extolled his Innocency, the could not for the removal of suspicion of injustice, free her self and her Counsellors, but bring him to tryall; not in the Star-Chamber, lest the censure should fall too heavy on him; but in the house of the Lord Privy Seal, where the cause should have a plain hearing before the Lords of the Council, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges of the Realm. The objections were, That contrary to his Commission he had made the Earl of Southampton Generall of the Horse, had drawn his Forces into Munster, neglecting the Arch-rebell Tir-Oen, entertained a Parlee with him, against the Dignity of the Queens Majesty, and the person of a Viceroy, which he represented; and that the said Parlee was suspicious, in regard it was private. Some aggravations the Lawyers added from abrupt sentences in his Letter to the Lord Privy Seal, written two years since, as these; No storm is more fierce than the indignation of an Impotent Prince. What? cannot Princes erre? May they not injure their Subjects? and such like.

He falling upon his knee at the end of the Board, professed he would not contest with the Queen, nor excuse the faults of his young years, either in whole, or in part; Protesting that he always meant well, howsoever it fell out otherwise, and that now he would bid the World farewell; withall shedding many tears, so as the slanders by wept also. Yet could he not contain himself, but began to plead excuses, till the Lord Privy Seal interrupted him, advising him to proceed as he had begun, to fly to the Queens Mercy, who would not have him questioned for disloyalty, but only for a contempt; and that he did not well to pretend obedience in words, which in deeds he had not performed. At length, in the name of the rest, he pronounceth this Sentence against him; That he should be deposed from the Office of a Privy Counsellor, suspended from the functions of the Earl Marshall, and Master of the Ordinance, and be imprisoned during the Queens pleasure. She had given expresse charge, not to suspend him from the Office of Master of the Horse (minding shortly to take him into favour) and that his Censure in no case should be Recorded. After this he made shew of wonderfull humility and mortification, which so affected the Queen, that shortly he removed Barkley his Keeper, and gave him leave to go at large; only admonishing him, To make his own discretion his keeper, and not to come at the Court, or in her Presence.

After this Sentence, Caffe, who always perswaded the Earl to stand stoutly in his own defence, began so plainly to tax him of cowardize and pusillanimity, that the Earl in anger, commanded his Name to be put out of the Rowl of his servants, yet Merrick the Steward did it not, as being of Caffe's minde himself.

Essex being now ready to go into the Countrey, remembered himself to the Queen, by the Lord Henry Howard in these words; That he kissed the Rod, and the Queens hands, which had only corrected, not overthrown him; yet he should never enjoy solid comfort, till he might see those blessed eyes, which had been his load-stars, whereby he had happily steered his course, while he held on his way at lawfull distance; But now he resolved to eat grass with Nebuchadnezzar, till it please the Queen to restore restore his senses. She being greatly joyed with these his speeches; Would to God (said she) his deeds might be answerable to his words; he hath long tried my patience, I must now make trial of his unity.

And now the Earl grew to confident of the Queens favour, that he became a tutor to her for the Farm of sweet Wines; but she to try his temper, and with what mind he would bear a repulse, made him Answer; That she must first know what it was worth, and not give away things hand over head; and had oftentimes in her mouth, the Aphorism of Physicians, That foul bodies, the more you nourish them, the more you corrupt them. And indeed, this was the right way to finde, whether the ulcer of his mind were thoroughly cured or no; for being not thoroughly cured, it would endure no touching; and no more did his, but as though every denial of a courtesie, were an injury that required revenge; his melancholy was presently turned into choler, now he began to hearken to Cuspe again; telling him, That it was now plain, the Queen determined to make him as poor as Job, that he should live of the basket, and gather crums under the Table. Hereupon he returned to London, Southampton is sent for out of the Low Countries, his doors are set open for all comers, Merrick his Steward receiveth to his own table decayed souldiers, discontented and audacious persons, Sermons are made there every day by Puritan Ministers, to which the Citizens flock, and all signs of popularity appeared; which matters coming to the Queens ears, alienated her affection from him daily more and more; but especially she was exasperated, that her Person was despised by him; for (not to say the worst) he had muttered, That the Queen was now old and decrepit, and withered as well in minde as body.

And now again, he runneth upon desperate counsels, for the removal of his adversaries from the Court, seeketh to serve himself into the King of Scots favour, to whom he traiceth his adversaries, by name Raleigh, Cobham, Carew, Cecil, and the Admirall as inclined to the Spanish Faction, and at one and the same time, seeketh to win to him both Puritans and Papists. Many were of his party, but few of his counsell; and these were the Earl of Southampton, St Charles Davers, St Ferdinando Gorge, Captain of the Garrison of Plimouth, St Christopher Blunt, and some other. With these he met privately in Drury house to avoid suspicion, where he first giveth them a Catalogue of the Nobility and Gentry that favoured him, to the number of a hundred and twenty. Then they consult, whether it were better to set upon the Tower of London, or the Queens Palace; this latter they resolve upon, which should be done in this manner. Blunt should keep the great Gate with a select number of men, and Davers seize upon the Prefence Chamber; Then Essex with his Company should come from the Mues, and present himself before the Queen. But now suspicions arising from divers circumstances, Secretary Herbert was sent to call him before the Council, at the Treasurers House; but he doubting the matter, excuseth himself that he was not very well. And now the Plot of seizing upon the Court, which had been four moneths in contriving, was by this means quite dashed, for they had ready at the present, neither Souldiers, nor munition, so as some speedier course must now be thought on; at which time very opportunely cometh one to them (set on no doubt by Essex his Adversaries) as if he had been sent on purpose from the Citizens, to promise him their Aid, which made Essex to applaud his own great good fortune.

And now were four of the Lords, namely the Lord Keeper, the Earl of Worcester, St William Knolles, and the Lord Chief Justice of England, sent by the Queen to Essex house, who could hardly be suffered to come in, all their Attendants were kept out, save he that carried the Seal before the Keeper. In the Court, they found a confused number of people, and the Earls of Essex, Rutland, and Southampton in the midst of them. The Keeper turning himself to Essex, told him, The Queen had sent him and the rest to understand the cause of this concourse, promising Justice, if any person had done them wrong. Essex with a loud voice cryeth out, Theyly in wait for my life, we are met to defend our selves. The Keeper urging Essex again to unfold some part of his grievance; the unruly multitude cryeth out, Away, let us be gone, they come to betray you, Kill them, cast away that Great Seal Essex retireth into the House, the Lords follow him, he chargeth them to make the doors fast, and turning him to the Lords, Have patience for a while (saith he) I must go into the City, to dispatch a little business with the Mayor and Sheriffs, I will return presently.

There the Lords are kept prisoners; Essex maketh hast into the City, with a Troop of 200 men at his heels, the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Cromwell, and other Lords meeting him by the way, joyn themselves: coming into London, he cryeth out aloud, For the Queen, for the Queen, they lay wait for my life. The Citizens came running to gaze, but not so much as one person took Arms to take his part. Passing along the City, he came all in a sweat to the Sheriff Smiths house, who shiftest himself forth at a back-door, and goeth to the Lord Mayor. By this time, certain of the Nobility entred the City with a Herald, declaring Essex and his adherents Traytors. Hereupon, hearing also that the Lord Admirall made towards him with an Army, he began to be disheartened, Gorge taketh care for himself, requesteth he might be sent to release the Counsellors, and with them to crave the Queens mercy, whiles the issue was yet doubtful. The Earl contents that Popham only should be freed; but he refused, unless the Keeper also might be dismissed. Then Gorge freeth them all, and goeth along with them to the Court by water.

Now when Essex thought to return, he found a chain fastened crosse the street, at the West end of Pauls, and men in Arms on the other side: then he began to draw his sword; and having once given the word, Blunt letteth fly at them, slew one of them incontinent, himself being sorely wounded wounded and taken. Essex himself had his Hat shot through; whereupon retiring he took Boat at Queen-Hythe, and went to Essex house, where finding the Counsellors all dismissed, he grew extreme angry and dismayed, and cast certain papers into the fire, saying, They should tell no tales. By and by the Admirall besiegeth the house, commanding them to yeeld. Southampton offereth, if the Admirall would give Hostages to secure them, they would present themselves to the Queen. The Admirall answereth him by Sidney, That Rebels are not to proffer Conditions. Within an hour, Essex finding the case desperate, resolved to rush forth; and the Lord Sands (the most aged in the company) greatly urged it, saying, It were better to die valiantly than by the hands of a Hang-man. But Essex his mind upon a little deliberation altering, they fell upon their knees, and deliver their weapons to the Admirall, when it was ten a clock at night. Owen Salisbury, and one or two more were slain with Musket shot, and as many of the besiegers. The next day, Thomas Lea, Commander of a Company of Souldiers in Ireland, who to one Crosse a Sea-Captain (that detected him) intimated, how noble an exploit it were, for six stout fellows to go to the Queen, and compell her forcibly to release Essex and Southampton, was presently apprehended, examined, found guilty, and executed. Essex and Southampton were carried first to Lambeth, to the Archbishops house, because it was a dark night; but anon were sent to the Tower, by the Queens direction; and with them, Rutland, Sands, Cromwell, Mounteagle, Danvers, and Bromley, the rest were put in common prisons.

On the nineteenth of February, Essex and Southampton were called to their Arraignment, before their Peers in Westminster-Hall, where Buckhurst Lord Treasurer, was appointed Lord High Steward of England for that time. The Peers being severally called by their names, Essex demanded, If it were not lawful for them to except against some of the Peers, as private persons might do against the Jurors. The Judges made answer, That the credit and fidelity of the Peers of England was presumed to be such, that in Tryals they were not bound to take an Oath, nor are they lyable to any exception. Then were they jointly indited of High-Treason; namely, that they plotted to deprive the Queen of her life and Kingdom, To surprize her in her very Palace; and that they brake forth into open Rebellion, by imprisoning the Counsellors of the Kingdom; by exciting the Londoners to Rebellion with vain Fictions; by assaulting the Queens loyal Subjects in the City; and by defending of Essex House against the Queens Forces. Hereunto they pleaded, Not guilty: Essex withall averring, That they had done nothing but of necessity, and the Law of Nature. Tilperton aggravateth the specialties; and Edward Coke Attorney, argueth That the Earl could not excuse himself from the Law of Nature, seeing Majesty is not to be affronted for private revenge. The Earl of Essex with great confidence made answer, That to his Prince and Countrey, he always had and would bear a loyal affection. Then Francis Bacon (one that was little expected to speak against Essex, by whom he had been raised) in defence of Cobham, Cecil, and Raleigh, aggravateth his crying out, That the Crown of England was sold to the Spaniards: whereto Essex replied, That he heard indeed, that Cecil the Secretary should say to one of the Lords of the Council, That the right of the Infanta of Spain to the Kingdom of England, was as good as any of the Competitors. Upon this Cecil (who stood by as an Auditor) steppeth in, and falling upon his knees, beseecheth the Steward, that with his good leave, he might quit himself from this foul aspersion: which leave being granted him, he provoked Essex, if he durst, to name the Counsellor; but he would not: therefore (saith Cecil) it is a fiction: Still Essex averreth it. Then Cecil turning himself to Southampton, besought him, by all manner of Obsecrations, to name the man. He referreth it to the Honourable Assembly, and to Cecil himself, if in Honour and good Reason he ought to do it; they affirming He might, Southampton nameth St William Knolles, Essex his Uncle. He being sent for, at Cecil intreaty, said, That Cecil two years since told him, that one Dolman in a Book, had asserted the Right of the Infanta; and had spoken no otherwise than so.

Now after the Judges had delivered their opinion what was Law in the matters alledged, the Earls, by the Stewards direction, were taken aside: Then the Peers rose, and went apart, and having consulted about an hour, returned to their seats, and in their order, pronounced the Earls guilty of high Treason. Then the high Steward advising Essex to implore the Queens mercy, giveth Sentence, and that done, brake his Staff and departed.

The next day, St Robert Vernon, St William Constable, St Edward Baynham, Littleton, Cluff, Captain Whitlock, John and Christopher Wright, and Orell an old Souldier, were called to their Tryall: but the Queen (informed by St Falk Grevill, That most of them were drawn unwittingly into the danger) commanded that only Littleton, Baynham, and Orell should have their Tryall, the rest to be sent back to prison. These were all condemned, but their lives spared; which favour (Raleigh for a good sum of money received of Baynham) procured.

Essex in the mean while, requested he might speak with some of the Counsellors, to whom he reconciled himself, and to Cecil especially; and then intimating that the Queen could not be in safety while he lived; he requested he might be executed privately in the Tower: He grievously inveigheth against some of the Conspiracy, & wisheth to speak with some of them, but specially with Blunt and Cusse; whom as soon as he saw, he brake forth into these words; O Cusse, ask pardon of God and the Queen, for thou hast chiefly provoked me to this disloyalty. Also he intimated St Henry Nevill ordinary Ambassadour in France, to have been acquainted with the Conspiracy; and that other in Scotland, France, the Netherlands, and the Lord Mountjoy, Deputy of Ireland, knew of his purpose, and other in England; who being many in number, and the Lord Mountjoy, ordering the Affairs of Ireland in good fashion, the Queen wisely would take no notice of it.

Essex returning and finding the Counsellors all dismissed, grows much dismayed.

At ten a clock at night, Essex yeelds himself to the Lord Admirall.

He is sent to the Tower, together with the Earl of Southampton and other Lords. Essex and Southampton are arraigned.

They plead not Guilty.

But are found guilty by their Peers.

Essex complains of Blunt and Cusse.

The five and twentieth day of February, which was to be the fatal day, there were sent to the Earl divers Ministers to give him ghostly comfort. The Queen now wavering in her self, one while remembering the ancient kindeffne she had shewed him, she commanded he should not be executed; then again, thinking of his stubbornness, that he would not once ask her mercy, and had said openly, That he could not live, but she must perish; countermanning her former word, she gave order that he should be executed.

Then was he brought forth into the Yard, where a Scaffold was erected, and sundry of the Nobility present, among whom Ramleigh also; but being told, it was an inhumane thing to stand by and behold the death of his adversary, he withdrew himself into the Armory, and from thence beheld the Tragedy. Essex being ascended the Scaffold, uncovered his head, cast up his eyes towards Heaven, and crying God mercy for the manifold sins of his youth, but this last specially, which he said was a bloody, crying, and contagious sin; craved pardon of the Queen and her Counsellors, commended his spirit into the hands of God, and had his head taken off at the third blow, though the first bereft him both of his sense and motion.

The fifth of March, St Christopher Blunt, St Charles Davers, St John Davis, St Gyllie Merrick, and Cusfe, were brought to their Tryall in Westminster-Hall, before the Queens delegates. The Heads of their Indirements, were the same which were objected to Essex and Southampton. The others said little in their defence, only Cusfe stood upon these two Answers; Whereas (saith he) I am challenged of Treason, because I was in Essex house the day of the Rebellion; by the same Argument the Lyon in the Cellar might be indicted; all that day I lamented the Earls fortune, and dealt with him to fly to the Queens mercy. And as for the Consultation in Drury House, it is no more to be called High Treason, than an Embryon may be accounted a perfect man. The Lawyers on the other side demonstrated, That no necessity lay upon him to tarry in the House; and that the Consultation in Drury House was it self a Treason, though it had never broke forth into act. Merrick said only this, The Earl of Essex raised me, and he hath over-turned me.

The thirteenth of March, Merrick and Cusfe are drawn to Tyburn, where Cusfe entering into a long Speech, was by the Sheriff interrupted; and then, after prayers to God, and desiring God and the Queen to pardon him, he was cast from the Ladder: a man of great Wit and Learning, but of a boisterous and turbulent disposition. In the same manner dyed Merrick.

The fifteenth of March, St Charles Davers, and St Christopher Blunt were beheaded on the Tower Hill; albeit Davers offered ten thousand pounds to redeem his life, though with perpetual imprisonment. The Earl of Southampton, and the Sheriff Smith were kept prisoners; though Smith, after some time, was upon sureties suffered to go at large. The eighth of July, Sir Henry Nevill was cited before the Lords of the Council, where it was laid to his Charge, That he was present at the Consultation in Drury House, yet had not revealed their sinister purposes, and had imparted to Essex the secrets of his French Embassy. He confessed, That at the Earls intreaty, he shewed him the Commentaries of the French proceedings, was present at one of their Consultations only; but contemned their counsels, yet durst not be an Informer against so great Personages. Hereupon he had a grievous check given him, and was committed to prison.

One act of the By, is not here to be omitted. Essex at his Arraignment had complained, That his hand-writing was counterfeited. It happened the Countesse of Essex being fearfull in her Husbands behalf, gave a Letter which she had received from him, to the custody of one Rhibow, a Dutch woman that waited on her; this Dutch womans husband named Daniel, lighted by chance upon the Letter, and perceiving some passages in it which might bring the Earl of Essex into danger, got a cunning fellow to draw a counterfeit Copy of the said Letter; with this he cometh to the fearful Lady, who was newly brought to bed, threatening to give the same to her husbands adversaries, unless she would presently give him three thousand pounds. She to shun the danger, paid him eleven hundred and seventy pounds at the very instant; yet did he deliver her the counterfeit Copy only, meaning to make use of the true one, to get another sum of the Earls Adversaries. This imposture being found out, he was censured to perpetual imprisonment, condemned in three thousand pounds (two of which were to go to the Countess:) and his ears nailed to the Pillory, with this Writing over his head; A notorious Cheater.

Soon after a Parliament was assembled, wherein grievous complaints being tendered to the lower House touching Monopolies, the Queen, by way of prevention, sendeth out Proclamations, declaring the said Licences and Patents to be void in part, leaving some part to the discussion of the Laws: which thing was so acceptable to the lower House, that they presently sent eighty select persons, together with the Speaker, to give the Queen thanks; and she on the other side, gave them thanks, for being such faithfull Monitors to her, to recall her from an error, whereinto through ignorance, not willfulness she was fallen.

In Ireland, the Deputy at the entry of the Spring, draweth his Forces together, and driveth Tir-Oen from where he had fortified himself; Carm, President of Munster, taketh the titular Earl lurking in a Cave, and receiveth intelligence, That the Spaniards invited by Tir-Oen, had a purpose to land in Munster, yet could not persuade the Deputy they had any design for Ireland; but in the midst of September, certain news was brought, the Spaniards were in sight, who wanting wind to carry their Fleet to Cork, put into Kinsale, the three and twentieth of September,

The Queen sets forth a Proclamation, declaring all Monopolies to be void.

The Spaniards land in Ireland and take Kinsale.

September, and land their Souldiers without resistance. Richard Percy having but few Souldiers to defend the Town, is commanded to come away and leave Kinsale to the Spaniards, into which they enter with Ensignes displayed, and by the Magistrates and Inhabitants, were bidden welcome.

D' Aquila, who commanded the Spaniards, publisheth a Declaration, wherein he sheweth, That Queen Elizabeth was deposed from her Kingdom by sentence of the Pope, her subjects absolved from their Allegiance; And that the Spaniards were now come to deliver Ireland from the jaws of the Devil. Tir-Oen joyneth his Forces with them, so as they were now six thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and promised themselves assured Victory, the English being not near so many. The four and twentieth of December, a Battell is joyned; where, after a long fight, the Victory inclined to the English. Tir-Oen, Odonell, and the rest, cast away their weapons, and save themselves by flight. Alphonso O Campo, chief Leader of the Spaniards, together with three other Captains, was taken prisoner, and six Ensign-bearers, twelve hundred were slain, nine Colours taken, whereof four belonged to the Spaniards: of the English not many were slain, but a great number wounded.

After six days, D' Aquila sendeth Letters to the Deputy by a Drummer, requesting that some person of account might be sent to him, with whom to confer; St William Godolphine is sent, to whom he complained of the cowardise, and (he feared!) treachery of the Irish; and therefore, although he wanted nothing to hold out the Siege, and did daily expect great Forces from Spain, yet was willing to make a Composition; whereupon, at last it was agreed, The Spaniard should yeeld up Kinsale to the Deputy, as also the Castles and Forts at Baltimore, Bere-Haven, and Castle-Haven, and should depart with life and goods, and Colours displayed. The English, at a reasonable price, should furnish them with ships and provision into Spain; and that they should not carry Arms against the Queen of England, till they were arrived in Spain, &c.

And now the Spaniards being driven out of Ireland, the Queen, to prevent their coming again, sendeth out St Richard Levison, and St William Monson, with eight ships of her own, and some smaller ships of War, to attempt something upon the Coast of Spain. On the nineteenth of March, Levison hoisteth Sayl, and Monson afterward, having in vain tarried behind for some Dutch ships to joyn with them. Levison in the mean time lighted upon the Spanish Navy of eight and thirty ships, which brought the Treasure from America, and set upon them, but to no purpose. When Monson was come with the rest of the Fleet, they had certain notice, That a mighty Indian Caraque of sixteen hundred Tun, and richly laden, was upon the Coast of Portugal. There indeed they found it, but it lay close under a Fort, attended with eleven Gallies; and the Caraque it self appeared as big as a Castle; yet they resolved to fire it, if they could not take it. The next day, they thundred so violently against the Gallies, that within seven hours the Marques of St Croffe, together with the Portugal Gallies which he commanded, withdrew themselves; two of them were taken and fired; and in them was great store of powder, which was going for the Low-Countries. And now Levison signified to the Captain of the Caraque, That the Gallies which they trusted to, were driven away, and therefore, if they now refused mercy, they must expect none hereafter. After much speech to and fro, it was at last agreed; That the Caraque, with the Ordinance and Merchandize should be yeelded up. Thus the English, having a fair winde returned home with a Booty, to the value of a Million of Duckets, by the Portugal account, and not past five of their men lost in the Voyage.

At this time there arose a Contestation amongst the Popish Clergy here in England; for the Jesuites and Secular Priests, made bitter Invektives in their writings, one against the other. The original of the Priests quarrel was, That Blackwell, one wholly at the beck of the Jesuites, was set over them as Arch-Presbyter, who first of all despoyled them of their Faculties; and when they appealed to the Pope, caused them to be declared Schismatics and Hereticks. They in sundry Books extolled the Queen very highly, as one that dealt mildly alwayes with the Catholics, till such time as they set all in a combustion in England; and by their Treasons, caused most severe Laws to be enacted against the Catholics. Parsons they traduced as a Bastard, an Equivocator and a Traytor. Whether they contended thus in good earnest, or in jest only, is hard to say; but the Bishop of London politickly nourished the contention; and all he gained, was this, That the Queen and her Council, finding them dangerous to the Common-wealth, both the one and the other, upon penalty of the Laws, were by Proclamation commanded to depart out of the Kingdom presently.

In France, the Marshal Biron, for entering into dangerous attempts against the publick Peace, was arraigned, and lost his head. His confession brought some other into danger; and amongst them, the Duke of Bulloign, of the Protestant Religion, that when he was cited, he durst not appear, but fled into Germany. Hereupon the King of France sendeth to Queen Elizabeth, complaining that the Duke held his marriage unlawful, and the Popes dispensation nothing worth, pronouncing his sons illegitimate; had defined the Prince of Conde to the Succession of the Crown, and conspired the Destruction of the prime of the Nobility. The Queen, by her Legier Ambasadour, adviseth the King not too credulously to entertain those reports, as doubting these suggestions might proceed from some of the Spanish Faction. Hereupon the King grew very angry, saying, The Queen held a better opinion of the Duke than he deserved, and that he was one of the chief Architects of Essex his Treason, and being questioned by the King about it, was not able to deny it. About this time also, the Duke of Savoy, by cunning sleights, Tir-Oen joyneth his Forces with the Spaniards, which together make a great Army, but in a battail are defeated. Alphonso O Campo their chief leader is taken prisoner.

D' Aquila who commanded the Spaniards, requires a Composition, and departs.

St Richard Levison sets upon the Spanish Fleet of Treasure, but cannot prevail. But he takes a Caraque of 16 hundred Tun, worth a Million of Duckets.

The Jesuites and the secular Priests contend against one another.

Both of them are commanded to depart out of the Realm.

The King of France complains to the Queen against the Duke of Bulloign, and her Answer to it.

and open force, practised against the State of Geneva; and the Queen relieved them with a great sum of money, gathered amongst the Clergy and Laity all over England.

Tir-Oen yields himself to the Deputy absolutely without any condition.

And now the Earl Tir-Oen, perceiving himself in a desperate estate, resolved to sue for mercy, and promised at last to submit his life and fortunes to the Queens pleasure, absolutely without condition. Hereupon, being admitted to the presence of the Deputy, at the very entry of the room, he fell on his knees; and then passing on a few steps, prostrated himself again, saying, I confesse and crave pardon for my great fault, against God, and a most bountifull Princely dread Sovereign; I fly to the Queens mercy, as a sacred Anchor, permitting her to dispose of my life and fortunes at her pleasure. Upon this his submission, the Deputy commanded him to go aside, and the next day took him along to Dublin with him, meaning to bring him into England that the Queen might deal with him according to her Royal pleasure: But before he could come in to England, the Queen dyed.

Her Taxations.

She refuseth to burden her Subjects with Subsidies.

IN a Parliament holden the first year of her Reign, a Subsidy was granted, of two shillings eight pence the pound of Goods, and four Shillings of Lands, to be paid at two severall Payments, of every person Spiritual and Temporall. In her sixth year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, one Subsidy was granted by the Clergy, and another by the Laity, together with two Fifteenth and Tenth. In her eighth year, in a Parliament then holden, there were offered to her four Subsidies, upon condition she would declare a Successor; but she refused their offer, and directly remitted the fourth Subsidy, which they had granted, saying, It was all one, whether the money were in her Subjects Coffers, or in her own. In her thirteenth year, in a Parliament then holden, towards her charges of repressing the Northern Rebellion, there was granted her by the Clergy, a Subsidy of six shillings in the pound, and by the Temporality, two Fifteenth, with a Subsidy of two shillings and eight pence in the pound. In her six and thirtieth year, a Parliament was holden, wherein was granted by the Clergy, two whole Subsidies, and by the Laity three, besides six Fifteenth and Tenth; but it was put into the Act, That this great Contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former Ages, should not be drawn into example. In her fortieth year, in a Parliament at Westminster, were granted her by the Clergy, three entire Subsidies; and by the Laity, as many, with six Fifteenth and Tenth. In her two and fortieth year, to furnish her self with money towards the Irish War, she delegated certain Commissioners, to confirm the Crown Lands to the possessors, that held any of controverted Titles, and to take money for the Confirmation, thereby to take away the troubles by concealers, who at this time were very busie.

Of her Laws and Ordinances.

IN a Parliament holden in her first year, an Act was made, That every person should go to Divine Service upon Sundays and Holy days, or else pay twelve pence to the poor. Also it was enacted, That Bishops should not let the Lands of the Church, longer than for one and twenty years, or three Lives, except to the Queen or her Successors. In her third year, a Proclamation was made, That the Tallow, coyned for twelve pence, and in the Reign of King Edward embased to six pence, should not be current but for four pence; the Groat, but for two pence; and the piece of two pence, but for a penny: And not long after, all the said base moneys were called in, and fine Sterling money was allowed for them, after the Rate. For Ireland also, she coyned Sterling money; where nine pence in England, went for twelve pence there. The Queen was the first that brought certain Counties to deliver Provision at a certain rate, that so they might be freed from the Parveyors: Also the first that granted allowance to Judges for their Circuit. In her sixth year, in a Parliament then holden, it was made Treason to refuse taking the Oath of Supremacy; yet with this limitation, That by it the blood should not be dishonoured, nor goods confiscated; nor the Oath to be required of any Baron of the Kingdom. Also this year, by a Common Council in London, it was enacted, That all such Citizens as from thenceforth should be constrained to sell their household-stuff, Leases of houses, or such like; should first cause the same to be cryed through the City, by a man with a Bell, and then to be sold by the common Outcrier appointed for that purpose, and he to receive one farthing upon the shilling for his pain. In her three and twentieth year, she represseth by Proclamation excess in apparel, Gold Chains, and Cloaks which men wore down to their heels. The length of Swords was limited to three Foot, and Daggers to twelve Inches, besides the hilts. Buildings likewise in the Suburbs were restrained, in-mates forbidden, and expresse charge set forth, That no dwelling house should be new built within three miles of any of the City Gates, under pain of imprisonment, and losse of the materials. In her time was set on foot by St Thomas Smith, the Law made for the serving of Colleged with provision, to the great benefit of those Scholastical Societies. In her two and fortieth year, the setteth forth Proclamations against the Transportation of Gold or Silver, wrought or unwrought, according to the former Acts of Parliament in that case provided. This year, also she founded the Company of the East-India Merchants, and allowed them ample Pri-

Bishops limit d for letting their lands.

All base moneys called in. Provision for the Queens house first ordained. Allowance to Judges for their Circuit first ordained. Outcrier for sale of Goods first ordained.

Buildings in London restrained. Colleged Rents to be paid part in provision, first ordained. The Company of East-India Merchants first set up.

Privileges. In her three and fortieth year, all Monopolies are called in by Proclamation. In her four and twentieth year, severe Laws are made against Papists, some inflicting death, some fine and imprisonment. In her eight and twentieth year, a Proclamation was set forth, prohibiting to fow Wood within eight miles of any of the Queens Houses, and four miles of any Cities or Towns Corporate. In her five and twentieth year, was first instituted and founded a publick Lecture in Surgery: to begin to be read in the College of Physicians in London, and the Reader to have a Stipend no lesse than those of the Universities erected by King Henry the eighth.

All Monopolies called in by Proclamation. Wood not to be fowed near the Queens houses.

Affairs of the Church in her time.

ON Sunday the first of January next after the Queens coming to the Crown, by vertue of her Proclamation, the English Letany was read accordingly as was used in her Graces Chappel, in all Churches through the City of London, and likewise the Epistle and Gospel of the day, begun to be read at Masse-time in the English Tongue. Also in a Parliament holden in her first year, the first Fruits and Tenth were restored to the Crown, and the Supreme Government over the State Ecclesiastical, and the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments in the English Tongue was restored, and by degrees the Protestant Religion was established. The Bishops that refused the Oath of Supremacy, were all removed and Protestant Bishops placed in their room. It was enacted also, That all persons should go to Divine Service upon Sundays and Holy dayes, and a Fine of twelve pence impose upon every one that should be absent, and the same to be given to the poor. In her fourth year, the Queen was solicited by Pope Pius, to send her Oratours to the Council of Trent, which she refused, as not acknowledging it a lawfull Council. In a Parliament holden in her eighth year, it was enacted and by a general consent declared, That the Election of the Archbishops and Bishops in England, together with their Consecration, Confirmation, and Investiture (which some persons slanderously called in question) was lawful and Canonical, and that they were rightly, and according to the Acts and Statutes of the Kingdom, chosen and consecrated. In her eleventh year, there arose in England two contrary factions in Religion: on the one side, Thomas Harding, Nicholas Sanders, and other Divines that had fled out of England, began to exercise the Episcopal Jurisdiction upon the Queens Subjects which they had derived from the See of Rome: On the other side, Coleman, Burton, Hallingham, Benson, and other, making profession of the pure Religion, would allow of nothing but what was directly taken out of the Scriptures, openly condemning the received Discipline of the Church of England, together with the Church Liturgy, and the very calling of Bishops, as favouring too much of the Romish Religion, protesting in the Pulpits, That it was an impious thing to hold any thing common with the Church of Rome, and used all diligence to have the Church of England, reformed in every point, according to the Rule of the Church of Geneva. These, although the Queen commanded to be committed to Prison, yet it is incredible how upon a sudden their followers increased, known by the envious name of Puritans. This sect so mightily increased, that in her sixteenth year, the Queen and Kingdom was extremely troubled with some of the Clergy, who breathing out nothing but Evangelical parity, cryed down the Ecclesiastical Form of Government (as a thing polluted with Roman dregs) and setting forth Books likewise, intituled, The Admonition to the Parliament, and the Defense of the Admonition; they refused to resort to the Divine Service publicly in use, and framed to themselves other Rites. Whereupon, the Queen to suppress them, whom by no means she liked, commanded every where the severity of the Law touching the Uniformity of Common Prayer, to be put in execution, and those Books, upon pain of Imprisonment, to be delivered into the hands of the Bishops, or some of the Queens Council. And this year were taken at Masse in their several houses, the Lord Mortley's Lady and her children, the Lady Guilford, and the Lady Brown, who being thereof indicted and convicted, suffered the penalty of the Law in that case provided. Until the twentieth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, the Papists in England were mercifully connived at, while they solemnized their own Rites within their private houses (though that also were against the Laws) but when as that Thunderbolt of excommunicating the Queen came abroad, then was the Law enacted against those who brought into the Kingdom any Agnus Dei, or hallowed Beads, or reconciled any of the Queens subjects to the See of Rome; yet for six whole years together after this Law was made, it was not executed upon any Papist, till Cuthbert Mayn, a Priest, and an obdurate maintainer of the Popes authority against the Queen, was executed at Launceston in Cornwall, and the Gentlemans goods that harboured him confiscated, and himself adjudged to perpetual Imprisonment. In her three and twentieth year, divers Priests and Jesuites came into England, amongst whom, Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campian, English men and Jesuites, being now bound for England, to promote the Catholick Cause, at which time a Proclamation was set forth, That whosoever had any children beyond the Sea, should by a certain day call them home; and that no person should receive or harbour any Seminary Priest or Jesuite. At this time also, there arose up in Holland a certain Sect, naming themselves, The Family of Love, who perswaded their followers, that those only who were adopted into that Family, were elected, and no other could be saved, but were all reprobates, and damned, and that it was lawfull for them to deny upon oath whatsoever they pleased, before any Magistrate or whomsoever that were not of their Family. Many of their books were printed, under these titles, The Gospel of the Kingdom, The Lords Sentences, The Prophecie of the Spirit of Love, The publication of Peace upon earth, by the thor H. N. but who this Author was they would by no means reveal : at last he was found to be a Henry Nichols of Leyden, who blasphemously preached, That he was partaker of the Divinity of God, and God of his humane Nature : all which books were by Proclamation commanded to be burnt. In a Parliament holden the eight and twentieth year of her Reign, some out of a desire of Reformation, began to pick quarrels at the Clergy, desiring to passe Laws for the restraint of Bishops in their granting of Faculties, conferring of holy Orders, Ecclesiastical Censure, and the Oath Ex Officio. They complained likewise of the non-residency of Ministers, and the like. But the Queen, who always hated Innovation (which for the most part changeth for the worse) would give no ear unto them ; conceiving besides, That these proceedings in Parliament in Ecclesiastical Affairs, derogated from her Prerogative. In her six and twentieth year, the Queen gave a special charge to Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, to settle an Uniformity in the Ecclesiastical Discipline, according to the Laws, which through the connivence of Bishops, and perverseness of the Puritans, lay now almost gaiping : Whereupon, he provided three Articles, to which every Minister should subscribe.

Parliaments not to meddle in Ecclesiastical Affairs.

Three Articles to which every Minister must subscribe.

The first, That the Queen had Supreme Authority over all persons born within her Dominions, of what condition soever they were ; and that no other Prince, or Prelate, or Potentate, hath, or ought to have any Jurisdiction, Civill or Ecclesiastical, within her Realms and Dominions.

The second, That the Book of Common Prayer, and the Ordination of Bishops, Priests and Deacons, containeth nothing contrary to the Word of God, but may lawfully be used, and that they will use that and no other.

The third, That the Articles agreed on in the Synod holden at London, in the year 1562, and published by the Queens Authority, they did allow of, and believe them to be consonant to the Word of God.

It is incredible what reproaches the Archbishop incurred by setting forth these Articles, both from factious Ministers, and from some also of the Nobility ; yet by his patience and constancy, he brought at last peace to the Church, making this his Motto, Vincit qui patitur. Neither did these at home only disturb the Peace of the Church, but others also from abroad, as Robert Brown, a young Student of Divinity in Cambridge ; from whom came the Sectaries called Brownists ; and Richard Harrison, a petty Schoolmaster. These presuming to judge matters of Religion by their own private spirit, by Books set forth in Zealand, and dispersed at this time over England, condemned the Church of England for no Church, and enured many in the nets of their new Schism. Neither could they be restrained, though their Books were prohibited by the Queens Authority, and soundly confuted by sundry learned men ; and one or two of the Ring-leaders executed at St Edmunds Berry. In her one and thirtieth year, these Puritans flames brake forth again, Books are written by the names of Martin Mar-Prelate, and A Demonstration of the Discipline, by Penry and Udal against the Government of Bishops, and nothing would please them, but the Discipline of Geneva : Many Abettors they had, Knights and Wigstone, Knights, besides Carterwright (the father of them) Snape, King, Pradlow, Payne, and others, who though called in question, fined and imprisoned, could never be reclaimed. In her six and thirtieth year, the Queen caused the severity of the Laws to be executed upon Henry Barrow and his Sectaries, for disturbing the Church, and the publick Peace, by scattering of their monstrous Opinions, condemning the Church of England as no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queens Authority in Causes Ecclesiastical.

Works of Piety in her time.

His Queen converted Westminster Abbey into a Collegiate Church, and there ordained a Dean, twelve Prebendaries, a Master, Usher, and forty Scholars, Vicars, Singing-men, and twelve Almshouses. In her third year, the Merchant-Tailors founded a notable Grammar School, in the Parish of St Lawrence Pountney in London. Also this year, William Harpur, Maior of London, founded a Free School in the Town of Bedford, where he was born. In her seventh year, on the seventh of June, St Thomas Gresham laid the first stone of the Royal Exchange in Cornhill, which in November the year after, at his own charges was finished, being the year 1567. In her tenth year, the Citizens of London builded a new Conduit at Walbrook corner, near to Dowgate, the water whereof is conveyed out of the Thames. Also this year, St Thomas Roe Maior of London, caused to be enclosed within a wall of Brick, one Acre of ground, near unto Bedlam, without Bishops Gate, to be a place of Burial for the dead of such Parishes in London as lacked convenient ground, within their Parishes : He also builded a convenient room in Pauls Church-yard, on the South side of the Crosse, to receive a certain number of Hearers at Sermon time. St William Peter, having himself been born at Exeter in Devonshire, he gave to Exeter College in Oxford, a hundred pounds Lands a year : He also builded at Ingershoe in Essex, Almshouses for twenty poor people, and giving them some competent maintenance. St Thomas Gresham had his dwelling house in Broadstreet London, which he dedicated to the profession of the Liberal Sciences, erecting there Lectures of Divinity, Civil Law, Physick, Geometry, Astronomy, Musick, and Rhetorick, allotting to the Professors very competent allowance. In her seventeenth year dyed Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, who founded a Grammar School in Rochdale in the County of Lancaster : He also procured to Corpus Christi College in Cambridge, thirteen Scholarships, and built two Chambers for Scholars, and the inward Library of the same College, and procured to it the patronage of St Mary Abchurch in London, with many other works of like kinde. St Nicholas Bacon Lord Keeper gave for six Scholars to be found in Benet College in Cambridge, three pounds, six shillings and eight pence for ever. Edmund Grindall Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a Free-School in Cumberland, where he was born, and gave many Penfions to both Universities. Frances, Countesse of Suffex, sister to St Henry Sidney, founded Suffex Sidney College in Cambridge : As likewise St Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, founded Emmanuel College in the same University. St Thomas Bodley erected and furnished the famous publick Library at Oxford. Alexander Nowell Dean of Pauls, endowed Brazen-nose College in Oxford, where he was brought up with two hundred pound per annum, and dyed in the year 1602. St Roger Manhood, chief Baron of the Exchequer, built seven Almshouses in Canterbury, giving to every Almshouse four pounds yearly : and our worthy Countryman William Lambard built an Almshouse at Greenwich, which he called, The College for the poor of Queen Elizabeth. Also in her time, namely in the year 1595. Bevis Bulmar Gentleman, builded a large house of great height, called an Engine, at the Bridge foot, for the conveying and forcing of Thames water to serve in the middle and west parts of the City. Also in her time, namely in the year 1596. Ralph Rokeby one of her Masters of Requests, then dying, gave by his Will, to Christs Hospital in London, 100 l. to the College of the poor of Queen Elizabeth in East Greenwich, 100 l. to the poor Scholars in Cambridge, 100 l. to the poor Scholars in Oxford, 100 l. to the prisoners in the two Compters in London 100 l. to the prisoners in the Fleet 100 l. to the prisoners in Ludgate 100 l. to the prisoners in Newgate 100 l. to the prisoners in the Kings Bench 100 l. to the prisoners in the Marshalsey 100 l. to the prisoners in the White Lyon 20 l. a liberal and pious Legacie ; and worthy not to be forgotten.

Casualties in her time.

In the first year of her Reign, dyed St Thomas Chyney, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, of whom it is reported for a certain, That his pulse did beat more than three quarters of an hour after he was dead, as strongly as if he had been still alive. In her third year there was found near Keswick in Cumberland, a most rich Vein of pure and native Brasse, which had lain neglected a long time : Also the stone called Lapis Calaminaris, which is of great use in Brasse Works, was first brought into England at this time, and that in most plentiful manner. Likewise this Queen was the first that caused Gun-powder to be made in England, which before was had from forain parts, and at dear rates. In her third year, the Spire of the Cathedral Church of Pauls, being five hundred and twenty foot from the ground, and two hundred and sixty from the square Steeple where it was placed, and was made of wooden materials, but covered with Lead, was with lightning burnt down, together with the Roofs of that large Church, and that within the space of five hours ; the Roofs were after re-edified, but the Spire is yet wanting. The Queen gave towards it a thousand Marks in money, and a thousand load of Timber ; and the City granted a Benevolence, and three Fifteens ; and the Clergy also contributed towards it. Also this year there were many monstrous Births : A Mare brought forth a Foal with two heads, and a long tail growing out between the two Heads. A Sow farrowed a Pig with two Bodies, eight Feet, and but one head. A man-child was born at Chichester in Suffex, having arms and legs like to an Anatomy, the Brest and Belly monstrous big, about the neck a great collar of flesh and skin, growing like the ruff of a shirt. In her sixth year, upon the returning of the Army from Newhaven, the Pestilence was brought into England, but especially into London ; where in one year there dyed one hundred and twenty thousand and five hundred. This year also, in the Moneth of December, was driven on the shore at Grimseby in Lincolnshire a monstrous Fish, in length nineteen yards, his tail fifteen foot broad, and six yards between the eyes. Twelve men stood upright in his mouth to get the Oyl. In her seventh year on the one and twentieth of December began a Frost, so extreme, that on New-years Even people passed over the Thames on foot ; some played at Foot-ball, some shot at pricks, as if it had been firm ground. Yet this great Frost, the third of January at night began to thaw, and by the fifth day, there was no Ice at all to be seen ; which sudden thaw caused great Inundations. In her eighth year, within the space of ten Moneths, there dyed in London seven Aldermen, namely, Edward Banks, Richard Chamberlain, St Martin Bowes, St Richard Mallory, St William Hewet, St Thomas White, and Richard Lamberti, one of the Sheriffs for that year. The same year also, in the Town of Ossifrey in Wales, two hundred houses, in the space of two hours, were consumed with fire. In her tenth year, were taken in Suffolk, at Downham Bridge near to Ipswich, seventeen monstrous Fishes ; some of them being seven and twenty Foot in length : And in the same year, many Dutch flying into England, to avoid the persecution of the Duke of Alva, were the first that brought into England the Art of making Bayes, Sayes, Serges, and such woven stuffs both Woollen and Linnen. In her time a rich Vein of Copper was found in the Earl of Northumberland's Grounds, which she by her Prerogative seized upon. In her thirteenth year, a prodigious Earth-quake happened in the East parts of Hertfordshire, at a little Town called Kinnaston. On the seventeenth of February, at six of the clock in the evening, the earth began to open, and a Hill with a Rock under it (making at first a great bellowing noise, which was heard a great way off) lifted it self up a great height, and began to travel, bearing along with it the Trees that grew upon it, the Sheep-folds, and Flocks of Sheep abiding there at the same time. In the place from whence it was first moved, it left a gaping distance forty foot broad, and fourscore Ells long; the whole Field was about twenty Acres. Passing along, it overthrew a Chappell standing in the way, removed an Ewe Tree planted in the Church-yard, from the West into the East; with the like force it thrust before it High-ways, Sheep-folds, Hedges and Trees, made tilled ground Pasture, and again turned Pasture into Tillage. Having walked in this sort from Saturday in the evening, till Monday noon, it then stood still. In her fifteenth year, in the month of November, a new Star, or rather a Meteor (but that it was found to be above the Moon) was seen in Cathedra Cassiopea, exceeding Jupiter in brightness, and in that place was carried with the Diurnal motion of the Heavens sixteen months together, though after eight months it was perceived to grow lesse and lesse. In her sixteenth year, was a great Dearth, so as Wheat was sold at five and six shillings the Bushell, and other things in proportion. In her seventeenth year, a vast mighty Whale was cast upon the Isle of Thanet in Kent, twenty Ells long, and thirteen foot broad from the belly to the back-bone, and eleven foot between the eyes. One of his eyes being taken out of his head, was more than a Cart with six Horses could draw; the Oyl being boyled out of the head, was Parmacitte. This year also, the River Thames ebbed and flowed twice within an hour: and in the month of November, the Heaven seemed to be all on fire. Also on the four and twentieth of February, being a great Frost, after a Flood which was not great, there came down the River of Severn such a swarm of Flies and Beetles that they were judged to be above a hundred Quarters; the Mills thereabout were dammed up with them for the space of four days, and then were cleansed by digging them out with Shovels. In her two and twentieth year, a strange apparition happened in Somersetshire, three score personages all clothed in black, a furlong in distance from those that beheld them; and after their appearing and a little while tarrying, they vanished away, but immediately another strange company, in like manner, colour and number appeared in the same place: and they encountered one another, and so vanished away. And the third time appeared that number again, all in bright armour, and encountered one another, and so vanished away. This was examined before St George Norton, and sworn by four honest men that saw it, to be true. In her three and twentieth year, in the beginning of April, about six a clock after noon, happened an Earthquake not far from Tork, which in some places strook the very stones out of Buildings, and made the Bells in Churches to jangle. The night following, the earth trembled once or twice in Kent, and again the first day of May. In this year also, in the Town of Waltham in Staffes, a child of eleven years old, named William Withers, lay in a trance for the space of ten days without any sustenance, and at the last coming to himself, he uttered to the standers by, many strange speeches; inveighing against Pride, Covetousnesse, coldnesse of Charity, and other enormous sins. In her six and twentieth year, being the year 1588, the like Prodigie happened in Dorsetshire; as in the year 1571 had happened in Hertfordshire; A field of three acres in Blackmore, with the Trees and Fences, moved from its place, and passed over another field, travelling in the High-way that goeth to Herne, and there stayd. In her eight and twentieth year, Tobacco was first brought out of the West-Indies into England by Ralph Lane. In her five and thirtieth year, there was so great a drought, that not only the fields, but the Springs themselves were dried up, and many Cattel every where died for want of water. The River of Thames likewise did so fail, that a Horseman might ride over at London-bridge. In her six and thirtieth year, was a great Plague in London, so as there dyed this year, in London and the Suburbs, seventeen thousand eight hundred and ninety, besides the Lord Maior, and three Aldermen; and Michalmas Term was holden at St Albons. For the prices of victuals in her time, we may take a pattern of the rest by one kinde: for John Stow reporteth, that in his youth he fetched many a half pennisworth of Milk from a Farm by the Minories, and never had lesse than three Ale Pintes for a half penny in the Summer, nor lesse than two Ale pintes for a half penny in the Winter. Also in the year 1533, a fat Ox was sold at London, for twenty six shillings at the most; a fat Weather for three shillings four pence; a fat Calf the like price: a fat Lamb for twelve pence, three pound of Beef for a penny.

Of her Personage and Conditions.

She was of stature indifferent tall, slender and straight, fair of Complexion, her hair inclining to pale yellow, her fore-head large and fair, her eyes lively and sweet, but short sighted, her nose somewhat rising in the midt; the whole compasse of her countenance somewhat long, yet of admirable beauty, but the beauty of her minde was far more admirable: She had been a subject, which taught her to rule; she had been in misery, which taught her to be mercifull; and indeed, never Prince ruled with more justice, and with her justice mingled more mercy: She had more Valour in her than was fit for a woman, but that she was a Ruler over men; and more Humility in her than was fit for a Prince, but that she meant to be a President to women. She delighted in nothing so much, as in the joye of her people, which she procured by ordaining good

A good Magistrates, and forbearing Impositions. Her way not to need them, was frugality; and her way to have them when she needed them, was liberality. She made honour in her time the more honourable, by not making it common; and indeed, knowing it to be an influence from her self, she kept it, as her self, a Virgin, and would not prostitute it to unworthy persons. She declined being a mother of children, to the end she might be a mother of her Country; and indeed, no mother ever loved her children more, than she did her people; and therefore never children loved a mother more, than her people did her. She coveted not so much to be an owner of riches, as of rich Subjects; for she thought money did as well in their Coffers, as in her own: and indeed, she never wanted it, when they had it; and they alwayes had it, when she needed it. Never Prince had a wiser Council than she, yet never Prince needed it lesse; for she was her self a Counsellor to her Council. In sum, whatsoever may in flattery be said of a wife, just, mercifull, religious, and learned Prince, may truly be said of her: in all which, if ever she had an equall, yet she never certainly had a superiour. In playing her game of Fortune, she loved not an after-game, for she liked preventions better than Remedies. She was admirable in expressing her minde, both by speech and writing: and if collection could be made of her Apophthegms, and extemporall Orations, it would certainly excell any thing extant in that kinde: And for her writing, St Henry Savile affirms, That he had seen some Translations of hers, which far exceeded the Originals. Never Prince kept greater State with lesse flatinesse: Her Pensioners and Guard were always the tallest and goodliest Gentlemen and Yeomen of the Kingdom: her maids of Honour and other women about her, the fairest and most beautifull Ladies of the Realm; and yet her self a Diana amongst her Nymphs; insomuch that a great Lord of France being entertained at Court, and the Queen asking him how he liked her Ladies, made answer, It was hard to judge of Stars, in presence of the Sun.

Of her Death and Buriall.

It was now the year 1602, when she feeling some Infirmities of Old age and sicknesse, retired her self at the end of January, to Richmond; at which time, in a sad Omen, she commanded the Ring to be filed off her finger, wherewith she was solemnly at the first inaugurated into the Kingdom, and since that time had never taken it off, it being grown into the flesh in such manner, that it could not be drawn off without filing. At the beginning of her sicknesse, the Almonds of her Jaws began to swell, and her appetite by little and little failed her; withall she gave her self wholly to sadnesse and heavinesse, which some imputed to her care for the losse of the Earl of Essex; others, because she heard, That divers of the Nobility sought the favour of the King of Scots, adoring him as the Sun rising, and neglecting her: but howsoever, in March kinde of benumbednesse seized upon her, with a deep melancholy, so as she would sit silently, refrain her meat, and not admit of any conference, but with the Archbishop of Canterbury, with whom she prayed fervently, till such time as her speech failed her, which failed her a day before she dyed. She being in this case, it was thought fit the Admiral and Secretary should go to her, to know her minde concerning a Successor; to whom she gave this answer; My Throne hath been the Throne of Kings, I would not a mean person should succeed me. The Secretary requesting her to speak more plainly, I will (said she) have a King succeed me; and what King, but the King of Scots, my nearest kinsman? After this, the Archbishop exhorted her to think of God, That do I (said she) nor do my thoughts ever wander from him. And when her tongue no longer served her, it was evident by the lifting up of her hands and eyes; that her thoughts were fixed upon him. And so on the four and twentieth day of March, being the last day of the year 1602, she yielded up her soul to God, when she had lived threescore and nine years, six months, and seven dayes; Reigned four and forty years, four months, and seven dayes. Her Body was embalmed, wrapped in Lead, and brought to White-hall, from whence on the eight and twentieth of April following, in great solemnity, it was carried into the Collegiate Church of Saint Peters at Westminster, and there interred in the Vault of her Grand-father, King Henry the seventh, in his magnificent Chappell, where our renowned Sovereign King James hath built her a Princely Monument, inscribed with Epitaphs to her eternall glory. At her Funerall were said to be Mourners in black, to the number of one thousand and six hundred persons.

Men of note in her time.

THE Ocean is not more boundlesse, than the number of men of note in her time; but though all of them cannot be reckoned, yet some of them must not be omitted. And to begin with states-men: An exquisite States-man for his own ends, was Robert Earl of Leicester; and for his Countries good, St William Cecil, Lord Burleigh; as also St Francis Walsingham, that great underminer of Conspirators. Famous Sea-men, were the Earl of Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, afterward Earl of Suffolk; and of meaner Rank, St John Hawkins, St Martin Forbysher, St Walter Rawleigh, Cavendish, Preston, Ryman; and, to name the worthiest last,

Roger Askam
his delight in Gaming and Cockfighting.

Famous Players, and Play-

last, St Francis Drake, who though he were but a short square bodied man, yet his great Acts have made the Spaniards believe that he was some goodly personage. Great Commanders by Land, were Robert Earl of Essex, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Grey of Wilton, St Francis Vere, St Roger Williams, Buckerville, Savage, and the Honour of his Family, and our English Nation, St John Norris. Learned Gentlemen and Writers, were St Thomas Chaloner, employed by Queen Elizabeth as her Lager in Spain, who wrote five books of the restoring of the English Common-wealth, in Elegant Verses, while (as he said) he lived in a Stove in Winter, and in a Bath in Summer: Roger Askam, born in Torke-shire, notably skillfull in the Greek and Latine Tongues, who had sometime been schoolmaster to Queen Elizabeth, and her Secretary for the Latine Tongue, but taking too great delight in Gaming and Cockfighting, he both lived and dyed in mean estate, yet left behinde him sundry Monuments of Wit and Industry. St Thomas Smith, borne at Saffron Walden in Essex, sometime Secretary to King Edward the Sixth, who wrote an imperfect Work of the English Common-wealth, a singular Book of the Orthography of the English tongue, and another of the Pronunciation of the Greek, the first man that set on foot the Law for serving the Colledges with Provision. St Henry Savill, Provost of Eaton, and Reader to Queen Elizabeth, who set forth all St Chrysostom's works in Greek, and by translating of Cornelius Tacitus, deserved as much of the English Tongue, as he of the Latine: But above all, the admirable St Philip Sidney, who by writing in a light Argument, shewed how excellently, and beyond all comparison he could have done in a grave. Learned Divines were John Jewell, born in Devonshire, a Student in Corpus Christi College in Oxford, in Queen Mary's time an Exile, by Queen Elizabeth made Bishop of Salisbury, who wrote an Apology for the Protestant Doctrine, and dyed at scarce fifty years of age, in the fourteenth year of Queen Elizabeth. John Whitaker Masters of St Johns College in Cambridge who learnedly answered all the Books of Beelarmino. Bilson Bishop of Winchester, sometimes Fellow of new College in Oxford, who, amongst his other learned Works, hath written notably of Christs descent into hell. Richard Hooker, Preacher at the Temple, who with too much meeknesse smothered his great Learning, yet hath something discovered it in his five Books of Ecclesiasticall Discipline, and dyed in the year 1599. Alexander Nowel Dean of Pauls, who forbearing deeper Works, set forth a Catechism, according to the Doctrine of the English Church, and dyed in the year 1620. After such men, it might be thought ridiculous to speak of Stage-players; but seeing excellency in the meanest things deserve remembering, and Rejcius the Comedian is recorded in History with such commendation, it may be allowed us to do the like with some of our Nation. Richard Bourbidge and Edward Allen, two such Actors as no age must ever look to see the like and, to make their Comedies compleat, Richard Tarleton, who for the Part called the Clowns Part, never had his match, never will have. For Writers of Plays, and such as had been Players themselves, William Shakespeare and Benjamin Jonson, have specially left their Names recommended to posterity.

THE REIGN OF KING JAMES.

Anno Dom.
1603.

King James is proclaimed King of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

JAMES the fourth King of Scotland, married Margaret eldest Daughter of Henry the seventh King of England, by whom he had James the fifth, who had one only child Mary Queen of Scots, who had one only Son James the sixth, who from James the fourth had undoubted right to the Kingdom of Scotland, and from Margaret, King Henry the seventh's eldest Daughter (the male line being clean extinct) unquestionable title to the Crown of England: whereupon Queen Elizabeth being dead about ten a clock in the morning the 24th of March, King James the sixth King of Scotland was the very same day (Mr Secretary Cecil himself reading his title, and Queen Elizabeth's Will) proclaimed King of England, Scotland and Ireland, by sound of Trumpet, first at White-hall, and then in Cheapside, in presence of all the Lords of the Council, and other of the Nobility, with a generall acclamation of all sorts of people, that we may truly say, sorrow was never more received than at this time; for where upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, it was expected there would be nothing for a long time but sorrowing and lamenting; now that very sorrow was swallowed up of joy, her death bringing with it no other alteration but only of sex, in all other points in a manner the same, the like wisdom, the like learning, the like justice, the like religiousness in them both: only bettered in this, that we changed a Queen of 70 years old, whom we could not look to keep long, for a King of 36, whom we might well hope to enjoy many years.

Sr Robert Cary
him with the Queens death.

Queen Elizabeth was no sooner dead, but Sr Robert Cary a younger son of the late Lord Howdon, posted away unfettered, to King James in Scotland, informing him of the accident, for bringing which news, the King afterwards rewarded him with making him a Baron of the Realm, and Lord of Leppington. But though it were sufficient for the Kings information that he heard the news by Sr Robert Cary; yet it was not sufficient for the Lords of the Council in discharge of their duty, if he heard it not from them, and therefore within a very few days, as soon as they could provide fit men, they sent first Sr Charles Percy, and Mr Thomas Somerjet, and after them Sr Thomas Lake, Clerk of the Signer, a man well acquainted with the State of the Kingdom, both to acquaint him with the generall applause of all the Realm, to receive him for their Sovereign, and also inform him in what terms the State of the Kingdom stood, that so he might not come altogether a stranger when he came into it.

Queen Elizabeth indeed had left him not only a Kingdom, but a Kingdom without incombrance, no wars abroad, no sedition at home; and not only so, but a Kingdom furnished with all the fruits of Peace, plenty of all things necessary, and of all necessary things; the chiefest a Privy Council, for she left Sr Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellour, Thomas Lord Buckhurst Lord Treasurer, Charles Earl of Nottingham Lord Admiral, and Sr Robert Cecil principall Secretary: Four such men that the meanest of them were sufficient to sit at the Helm of any Kingdom. Yet to these and divers others besides (all whom the King now by his letters authorized to execute their severall places, as formerly they had done) he added certain new ones of his own choosing, as namely the Earl of Northumberland, and Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, and then after the Lord Henry Howard, the one the brother, the other the son of the late Duke of Norfolk, who had suffered so much, that at last he suffered for the Queen his mother. But although the calling of these two last to such place, was done (no doubt) out of favour to that house; yet one of them being known, the other doubted to be a Papist, it was presently apprehended, as a favour to that side; and the Catholics were not a little confident of his good inclination to them all in general. And it was indeed but necessary they should at this time have such a conceit, for in the late Queens sickness, a little before her death, Pope Clement the eighth, had written two Brevies to the Catholics in England, to admit of none to succeed in the Kingdom, when that miserable woman should happen to die (so he pleased to style the most glorious Queen that ever lived) but such a one, of whose good inclination to the See of Rome, they had not at least be well persuaded. And now King James having sealed the Government of his Kingdom of Scotland, & made convenient preparation for his journey: on the fifth of April 1603, he set forward and rode that day from Edinburgh to Dunglassie, and from thence the next day to Bermick, where having stayed two days, the eighth of April he rode to Witherington a house of Sr Robert Curies, from thence the ninth to Newcastle, where he stayed Sunday and heard the Bishop of Durham preach, and so joyful were the Townsmen of his being there, that all the time of his stay they bore the charge of his household. The thirteenth of April he set forward to Durham, and from thence the fourteenth to Walsworth, the fifteenth towards Tork, where his train increased to such a multitude, that he was fain to publish an inhibition of the peoples resorts, and flocking to him. At Tork it was a question to whom it belonged to bear the sword before the King in that place, for both the Earl of Cumberland claimed it, as hereditary to his House, and the President of the North claimed it as belonging to his place, but it was adjudged to George Earl of Cumberland, who accordingly did it, from Tork the eighteenth day the King rode to Grimston, to a house of Sr Edward Stanbops, the nineteenth to Pomfret, and so to Dunelm, where he lodged at the sign of the Bear and Sun: The twentieth of April he rode towards Worshippe, a house of the Earl of Shrewsbury; from thence the twenty one to Newmark upon Trent, where a Carpentier being taken in the fact, was by the Kings warrant hanged; a most unreasonable delinquent, who would force the King to a work of Justice at a time when he intended nothing but mercy: the 22, to Beaver Castle, a house of the Earl of Rutlands, hunting all the way as he rode: From Beaver the 23 to Burleigh, where having stayed two or three days, the 27 he removed to Hinchinbrook, a house of Sr Oliver Cromwells, where the heads of the University of Cambridge met him: From thence he rode towards Royson, and as he passed through Godmanchester, a Town close by Huntington, the Bailiffs of the Town presented him with 70 Teem of Horses all traced to fair new Ploughs, at which the King wondring, they said, it was their ancient custom so to do when any King of England passed through their Town, and by which as being the Kings tenants, they held their land. At Royson, he lodged that night at Mr Chesters house, at his own charge, which he had not done before, since his coming into England. The 30 of April he rode to Standon, a house of Sr Thomas Sadlers, where he stayed Sunday and heard the Bishop of London preach. The second of May he removed to Broxbourn a house of Sr Henry Cocks, cofferer to the late Queen, and now to the King, where met him the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Admiral, and divers other Lords: The third of May he came to Theobalds, a house of Sr Robert Cecils; where all the Lords of the late Queens most honourable Privy Council presented themselves, and there the Lord Keeper made a grave Oration. At this house, the fourth of May, the King made divers Noblemen of Scotland, of his Privy Council here in England; namely the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume, and Sr George Hume Treasurer of Scotland, Sr James Elphinston his Secretary, and the Lord of Kinlosse, made afterward master of the Rolles. Saturday the seventh of May, he rode towards London, where by the way, the Sheriff Swinnerton, and the Aldermen met him; and by their Oratour Mr Richard Martin, made him an Eloquent Oration; and then he rode on to the Charter-house near Smithfield, a house belonging to the Lord Thomas Howard, where he stayed four days: and at his departing from thence made the Lord Fitzhugh, and the Lord Burgley, of his Privy Council. But wee must not here omit, that from the Kings first setting forth of Scotland; as he was in all places received with Royall entertainment and rich presents; so he again carried himself most affable and distributed his favours in most plenteous manner: in some places discharging all prisoners, but such as lay for Treason or murder: but especially in conferring the order of Knighthood, of which sort the first he made, was Mr John Peyton, son to Sr John Peyton, Lieutenant of the Tower. After him divers Scots in sundry places; at Theobalds, eight and twenty; (of which number the compiler of this work, though the unworthiest, was one;) at Charter-house above fourscore: and not many days after, no fewer than at least a hundred; and before the year went about, God knows how many hundreds, that one would wonder what the King would do with so many Millins, having now war toward: But it was indeed fit to give a vent to the passage of Honour, which during Queen Elizabeth's Reign had been so stopped, that scarce any County of England had Knights enow to make a Jury.

Before we go further, it will not be amiss, to shew what great men attended King James out of Scotland; as namely the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume and many other great Lords; and many other whom he afterward made great Lords, as being in his special favour, first Sr George Hume, made afterward Earl of Dunbarre; then Sr Thomas Erskin, made Earl of Kelly; then Sr John Ramsey made Earl of Holderness; (which two last had the fortune fortune to come first in to his rescue against the Gowries ) then S<sup>r</sup> James Hay, made afterward Earl of Carlisle, and then S<sup>r</sup> Richard Preston made Earl of Kildare in Ireland; but whose great fortune by marrying the Heir of that Earldom, was afterward the occasion of his great misfortune; for coming out of Ireland, he was unfortunately cast away and drowned.

But though King James was now safely come himself to London; yet he accounted himself but half come, until his Queen and children were come to him; and therefore there are now appointed to go to conduct them, of Lords, the Earl of Suffolk, the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, and S<sup>r</sup> George Carew Knight, Lord President of Munster: of Ladies, the Countesse of Worcester, the Countesse of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herbert Daughter to Henry Earl of Pembroke; the Lord Scroopes Lady, the Lady Rich wife to the Lord Rich, and the Lady Walsingham, one of the late Queens Bedchamber: But although these only were appointed to go, yet many other Lords and great Ladies went of themselves to attend her Majesty, as the Countesse of Bedford, the Lady Hastings, the Lady Cecil, the Lady Hatton, the Lady Harrington, and divers others; and with this Princely attendance, the Queen with two of her children, namely Prince Henry of the age of nine years, and the Lady Elizabeth on the eleventh of June came to York: where telling themselves some few days, on the seven and twentieth of June they came to Euston in Northamptonshire, a house of S<sup>r</sup> George Fermors, where the King met them at dinner: and afterward they rode together to a house of S<sup>r</sup> John Fortescue, and so to London. The Kings younger son, Charles Duke of Albany, came not at this time, as being not three years old, and therefore not thought able to endure such a journey, but the year following falling sick of a Fever, Doctor Atkins one of the Kings Physicians was sent to conduct him, who in six weeks cured him of his fever; and the first week of October brought him safe to Windsor, where the King then lay; for which service he was so well rewarded, that together with the gains of his usual practise, he grew to a greater wealth than was usual for Physicians.

King James had distributed the meaner Order of Knighthood, very plentifully; now he thinks fit to raise his distributions to a higher degree, and thereupon the twentieth of May, he made S<sup>r</sup> Robert Cecil Baron of Eslington, S<sup>r</sup> Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurst, S<sup>r</sup> William Knowles Baron of Gryes; and S<sup>r</sup> Edward Wootton Baron of Morley; and not long after he made the Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton; and Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst, he made Earl of Dorset.

The King had by this time found the love and affection of his own people; but the affection of neighbouring Princes towards him stood yet in suspense, when now to take away that doubt came first in the beginning of June, an Embassador from the Palgrave of Rhine, presently after another from the States of Holland and Zealand; another from the Archduke of Austria; another from the King of Spain; from the Seignior of Venice another; another from the Duke of Florence; and lastly on the eighth of June Monsieur de Rosny from the King of France: all congratulating his happy coming to the Crown of England; for entertainment of which Embassadors, and all other that should come after; the King had erected an Office by the name of Master of the Ceremonies, allowing him two hundred pounds a year Fee, and the first that had the place was S<sup>r</sup> Lewis Lenkenor: a Gentleman, who besides other good parts, was very skillfull in the neighbouring languages.

Upon the seventeenth of May this year, were made fourteen Serjeants at Law: whereof eleven had received Writs the last year of Queen Elizabeth: namely Thomas Coventry, Robert Houghton, Lawrence Tansfield, John Crook, Thomas Foster, Edward Philips, Thomas Harris, James Altham, Henry Hubbard, Augustine Nicolls, and Robert Parker; to whom the King added three new; John Sherly, George Snygge, and Richard Hutton, who all kept their Feast together in the middle Temple Hall.

One would think that this time all Offences against Queen Elizabeth had been forgotten; but King James more tender of wrongs done to her than to himself, would not suffer Valentine Thomas to escape; who after he had lyen many years prisoner in the Tower, was on the fourth of June arraigned at the Kings Bench-Barre; and for conspiracy against the late Queen and some of her Council, was on the seventh of June after six a clock at night, drawn to S<sup>r</sup> Thomas Waterings, and there hanged and quartered.

About this time the Honourable Charles Lord Montjoy, returned out of Ireland; bringing along with him Hugh O Neale, Earl of Tir-Oen; at whose coming to the King, the Lord Montjoy was sworn of the Kings Privy Council; and the Earl of Tir-Oen, who had been the cause of so much English blood shed, was yet pardoned, and Proclamation made, that by all men he should be used with respect and honour.

All this while the King had moved within his own Sphear, and had done nothing out of the Realm; his first Employment abroad was now in June, to his brother the King of Denmark, to whom he sent in Embassy the Earl of Rutland upon two occasions: the one to be Godfather to his Son, who was named Christianus, the other to present him with the Order of the Garter; upon the like employment, soon after, he sent the Lord Spencer to Frederick Duke of Wirtenberg; which Lords saw the said Princes invested with the Garter, and after honourable entertainment returned home.

It was now a time that every man might sit under his Vine, and enjoy the happiness of a peaceable Government: when suddenly like a storm in a fair Summers day, brake forth a Treason of a strange Composition: for where in all Treasons commonly they are all of some one

Faction,

A Faction, in this, there were people of all sorts; Priests and Laymen, Papists and Protestants, Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen; that one would think it should be a well managed Treason, and yet was the shallowest that was ever set on foot; so shallow, that it could scarce be observed, either what the Authors of it aimed, or what it was they would have done. Indeed the great favour which King James at his first coming to the Crown, shewed to the Earl of Southampton, was like to breed no good blood in those that were his opposites; and it was said (how true I know not) that as the King had sent to enlarge the Earl of Southampton, and appointed him to meet him upon the way: so when he heard of an intention that the Lord Cobham and S<sup>r</sup> Walter Rawleigh had to meet him; he sent them word they should spare their labour. But whether it were so or no, it seems they found some cause of discontentment, and discontentment will never want Complices; and by this means was the composition of this Treason made up, and thereupon were apprehended Henry Lord Cobham, and George Brook his brother, Thomas Lord Grey of Wilton, S<sup>r</sup> Walter Rawleigh, S<sup>r</sup> Griffith Markham, (and S<sup>r</sup> Edward Parham Knights, Bartholomew Brookesby and Anthony Copley Gentlemen, William Watson and William Clerk Priests: But though they were apprehended in July, yet they came not to their arraignment till November following; for by reason of the sickness, which was then hot in London, the Term was put off till Crispino Martini, and then to be kept at Winchester in Hampshire, only the Courts of the Exchequer, Wards, Liveries and the Dutchy of Lancaster were kept in the Kings Manor at Richmond in the County of Surrey; and so in the fourth of November following, all the foresaid Delinquents were removed from the Tower of London and other Prisons, by strong Guards to Winchester, and there arraigned; whose Indictment was for Conspiring

1. To kill the King.
2. To raise Rebellion.
3. To alter Religion.
4. To subvert the State.
5. To procure Invasion by Strangers.

Concerning the first Point, it was proved that the Lord Grey intended to obtain the levying of two thousand men, for defence of the Low-Countries, and with them to seize upon the King and Prince, and take the Lords of the Council in their chambers. For the other Points, it was proved, that the Lord Cobham and S<sup>r</sup> Walter Rawleigh, met at S<sup>r</sup> Martins in the Fields, and there consulted about raising Sedition, moving Rebellion, altering Religion, subverting the State, and to set up the Lady Arbella. And particularly for the Point of subverting the State; it was proved, that Watson was designed to be Lord Chancellor, George Brook Lord Treasurer, S<sup>r</sup> Griffith Markham Secretary, and the Lord Grey to be Master of the Horse, and Earl Marshal of England. And for effecting of these Treasons, it was proved that Watson the Priest had devised Oaths in writing, by which all parties were bound to keep them secret. And for the last point, it was proved, that S<sup>r</sup> Walter Rawleigh was appointed to treat with Count Aramberg for six hundred thousand Crowns, and the Lord Cobham to go to the Archduke and to the King of Spain, to persuade them to assist the Lady Arbella. These things being proved against them, on the days in which they were severally indicted, the most which was replied in mitigation of their fault, was first by Watson, who affirmed it could not be Treason, because the King was not yet Crowned; and then by the Lord Grey, that it was but a verbal matter and never took effect, and therefore could be no Treason: but these assertions being both refused, they were all (except S<sup>r</sup> Edward Parham, who only was acquitted) on their several days of indictment, found guilty of Treason, and had Judgement accordingly. The Priests Watson and Clerk were executed at Winchester, the nine and twentieth of November: George Brook was beheaded the fifth of December, but then the hand of Justice stayed; and this was the course which the King held in shewing mercy. After the death of the three before named he signed three other Warrants for the execution of the late Lord Cobham, the Lord Grey, and S<sup>r</sup> Griffith Markham, on a certain day then following; but before that day came he privately framed another Warrant written with his own hand to the Sheriffe, (who was then S<sup>r</sup> Benjamin Tirchburn) by which he countermanded the former Warrants: and that there might be no notice taken of it, he sent it by M<sup>r</sup> John Gybbe, a Scotch man, and one utterly unknown of all the company, appointing him to deliver it so, that it might not take effect, till after their severall confessions, and at the very point of their Execution, which was accordingly performed: At which time it was a wonderful thing to see how the Delinquents falling on their knees, lamented their misdoings, and most of all how they extolled the Kings unspeakable mercy. But though thus pardoned, yet were they carried back to the Tower, where the Lord Grey not long after dyed, and in him was extinct that Barony, which had formerly brought forth many valorous and worthy men. S<sup>r</sup> Griffin Markham after some time was set at liberty and passed beyond Sea, where he lived long after in mean account. The Lord Cobham likewise was afterward discharged of imprisonment, but deprived of his Estate, lived divers years in great penury; and in him ended that noble Family, which had flourished in great honour many Ages. S<sup>r</sup> Walter Rawleigh was kept in the Tower, where to his great honour he spent his time in writing, and had been a happy man if he had never been released, but such is our fate that no mans fortune is understood, whether it be good or bad until it be discovered by the Event.

But in this mean time many things had passed, for his Majesty having deferred the Feast of S<sup>r</sup> George until his being at some of his own houses, held now the said Feast at Windsor, the second of July; where the Prince was installed Knight of the Garter; as also the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of

Southampton,

Southampton, the Earl of Marre, and the Earl of Pembroke; and at the same time were elected the King of Denmark, and the Duke of Wirtemberg: though their inyelling have been spoken of before.

Divers Lords made. And now was preparation made for the Kings Coronation, and for a preparative unto it, he first reitord the Earl of Southampton, and then raised in honour these following: S<sup>t</sup> Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellor, he made Baron of Elsemere; S<sup>t</sup> William Russell, Baron of Thornough; S<sup>t</sup> Henry Grey, Baron of Groby; S<sup>t</sup> John Peter, Baron of Writtle; S<sup>t</sup> John Harrington, Baron of Exton; S<sup>t</sup> Henry Denvers, Baron of Dantsey; S<sup>t</sup> Thomas Gerard, Baron of Gerards Bromley in the County of Stafford; and S<sup>t</sup> Robert Spencer, Baron of Wormelcyton. After this he conferred inferior Orders; and made Knights, all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen Ushers and divers other: and lastly made Knights of the Bath three score and two, most of them Noblemens sons, and the rest Gentlemen of special worth. These things done, on the five and twentieth of July, being S<sup>t</sup> James day, the King and Queen were together crowned, and anointed at Westminster, by the hands of John Whitegift, Archbishop of Canterbury, in presence of the Nobility and other, namely S<sup>t</sup> Robert Lee Lord Mayor of London, in a Gown of Crimion Velvet, his Brethren the Aldermen in Gowns of Scarlet, and 12 principal Citizens admitted to attend on them: all other Citizens stayed from passing thither either by water or by land, by reason of the sicknesse; and the first of August following, all suiters were by Proclamation forbidden to repair to the Court till the Winter following.

The fifth of August kept holy day, for the Kings deliverance from the Gowries. At this time the King forgot not a deliverance he had formerly had, which though it were had in Scotland, yet he would have notice of it taken in England, which was his deliverance from the conspiracy of the Gowries on the fifth day of August three years before; and thereupon Friday being the fifth of August was by commandment appointed to be holy day, with Morning Prayer, Sermons, and Evening Prayer that day, and Bonfires at night; which was then, and after during his life solemnly observed.

King James had in him as it were two persons; one as he was the King of Scotland; and in this he was in perfect amity with the King of Spain, another as he was King of England, and in this he had some difference with Spain; but he, as Rex pacificus, took the best from both, and was altogether for the Olive branch, and thereupon when at his coming into England, he found letters of Marc granted against Spaniards, he first caused them all to be called in, and then consented to a Treaty of perfect reconciliation: In which Treaty handled at London, the 18th of August, 1604, the Commissioners for the King of England were Tho. Earl of Dorset, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Charles Earl of Devonshire, Henry Earl of Northampton, and Robert Viscount Cranburn: For the King of Spain, John de Velasco Countable of Castile, John de Tassis Earl of Villa Mediana, and Alexander Robidino Professor of the Law in the College of Millain: For the Archdukes, Charles Count of Aramberg, John Richardot President of the Privy Council, and Lodowick Verrikin principal Secretary: by whom a Peace being concluded and contained in many Articles; the Summer following, the King of Spain sent Don John de Velasco Countable of Castile and Duke of Fryas, also Pedrade de Sierra, his great Chamberlain accompanied with divers Marquesses, Earls and Barons, who coming into England, were by the Earl of Devonshire on the nineteenth of August brought to the Court, where the King in his Chappel in the presence of the Commissioners and other English Lords, (the Duke of Fryas holding the Kings hands between his) took his Oath upon the holy Bible, religiously to observe and keep all the Articles of the Peace and League agreed upon; and in March following, being now the third year of King James, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Lord high Admiral of England was sent into Spain to take in like manner the King of Spain's Oath: who accompanied with three Barons, and many Knights, Gentlemen and other, to the number of six hundred and fifty, the fifteenth of April arrived at Groyne, from whence he was conducted to Valledolid, three hundred miles off, where the King of Spain then kept his Court, entertained in 'all' places as he passed, at the King of Spain's charge, with so great provisions and such demonstration of love and gladnesse, that it plainly shewed the Spaniards were as glad of our friendship as we of theirs. The Lord Embassadour being come to the Court, he caused Thomas Knoll Esquire, to deliver the presents sent from the King of England, which were six goodly Horses, with saddles and saddle clothes very richly embroidered, whereof three for the King, and three for the Queen: two Crosse-bows with sheafs of arrows: four fowling pieces inlaid with plates of gold: and a couple of Lyme-hounds of singular qualities: which the King and Queen in very kinde manner accepted; and then on the thirteenth of May, the Lord Embassadour being feasted, the King came forth into a large room: where having a little Table set before him, and a Bible very reverently laid upon it, together with a Crucifix: the Archbishop of Toledo read the Oath, at the reading whereof, the Lord Embassadour held the Kings hands between his, and the King kneeling down, laid his hands upon the Book, and after his Oath, subscribed to the Articles formerly concluded. Whilst the Earl of Nottingham was thus employed in Spain, the right honourable Edward Earl of Hartford, was likewise sent Embassadour to Albertus and Isabella, Archdukes of Austria, to take their Oaths, for confirmation of the said Articles of Peace, which were taken at Bruxels the first of May with great state and solemnity: After which, as the Earl bestowed on the Archdukes servants, to the full sum of three thousand pounds; So the Archduke at his departy, bestowed upon the Earl, a Jewel worth nine hundred pounds, and a suit of Arras worth three hundred, and bore his charges all the time of his stay at Bruxels. And now was King James truly Rex pacificus, in peace and amity with all Princes of Christendom, which few of his Ancestors ever were.

A little before this, in the Moneth of August, in the year 1604, the strong Town of Offend in Flanders, after above three years siege, and the slaughter of above a hundred and twenty thousand men of both sides, and in defence whereof, S<sup>t</sup> Francis Vere General, and his brother S<sup>t</sup> Horatio Vere had shewed great Valour, was by the Marquess Spinola taken; for which service, the King of Spain made him Duke of Santa Severina, and the Lord General of all the Forces in the Low-Countries.

It was now the third year of King James his Reign, when he kept Saint Georges Feast at Greenwich, and there made two new Knights of the Garter; namely the High and Mighty Prince Duke Ulrich, heir of Norway, and brother to our gracious Queen Anne; and the right Noble Lord Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton. And upon the Saturday following, in the Hall at Greenwich, being richly hangd with Arras, he created three Earls; one Viscount and four Barons: namely S<sup>t</sup> Robert Cecil Viscount Cranburn, he created Earl of Salisbury: Thomas Cecil, Lord Burley his eldest brother, he created Earl of Exeter, and S<sup>t</sup> Philip Herbert, younger brother to the Earl of Pembroke, he created Earl of Montgomery: then Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurst, Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, he created Viscount Lisle: S<sup>t</sup> John Stanhope, Vicechamberlain to the King, he made Lord Stanhope of Harington: S<sup>t</sup> George Carew Vicechamberlain to the Queen, he made Lord Carew of Clopton: M<sup>r</sup> Thomas Arundell of Devonshire, he made Lord Arundell of Wardez; and M<sup>r</sup> William Cavendish, he made Lord Cavendish of Hardwick.

About this time a strange fancy possessed the brains of a professed Physician, one Richard Haddock of new College in Oxford, who pretended to preach at night in his sleep, in such sort, that though he were called aloud or stirred and pull'd by the hands or feet, yet would make no shew of either hearing or feeling. And this he did often, in the presence of many honourable persons, that came to hear him, so as within a short time, his fame was spread through the land, by the name of the sleeping Preacher. At length the King commanded him to be brought to the Court, where his Majesty late up the most part of a night to attend the event: when at last Haddock making a shew to be asleep, began to pray; then taking a Text, made his Division; applying it to his purpose, for in his Preaching his use was to inveigh against the Pope, against the Crosse in Baptism, and against the last Canons of the Church of England; and having ended his Sermon seemed to continue sleeping. His Majesty having well observed the manner of his carriage, after a few days, called the said Haddock before him, and in Conference with him (as he had indeed an admirable facility in discovering of Fictions) made him confesse, that all he did was but imposture; and thereupon to fall upon his knees, and ask forgiveness: which the King granted, upon condition, that in all places he should openly acknowledge his offence; because many were brought into belief, that his nightly preaching was either by inspiration or by vision.

We may not here think it unworthy, the relating, seeing King James thought it not unworthy the seeing, thereby to observe the nature of the Lyon, and make a solemn matter of it; for on Monday the 3<sup>d</sup> of June (taking with him the Duke of Lenox, and divers Earls and Lords) he went to the Lyons Tower, and caused two Lyons, a male and female, to be put forth, and then a live Cock to be beat before them; which they (as being their natural enemy) presently killed and sucked his blood. Then a live Lamb to be put down to them, which the generous Lyons (as having respect to its Innocency) never offered to touch, though the Lamb was so bold as to go close unto them. Then the King caused those Lyons to be taken away and another Lyon to be put forth, and two Mastiffs to be put in to him, who presently flew upon the Lyon and turned him upon his back, and though the Lyon were superior to them in strength, yet it seems they were his matches in courage, and so much superior as they were the first assailants, with whom otherwise, perhaps the Lyon would not have offered to meddle.

On Fryday the 4th of January in the Kings second year, Charles Duke of Albany the Kings second Son, being then but four years old, was created Duke of York; which because it was done with extraordinary solemnity, is not unworthy to have the manner of it, here related. First were appointed Knights of the Bath, the Duke of Albany himself, then the Lord Willowby, the Lord Chandos, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, William Cecil, son and heir to the Viscount Cranburn, Alan Percy, brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Thomas Somerset, second son to the Earl of Worcester, Francis Manners brother to the Earl of Rutland; Thomas Howard second son to the Earl of Suffolk, and John Harrington son and heir to the Lord Harrington, the Earls of Oxford and Essex were Equires to the Duke of Albany; all the Knights took their lodging that night in the first Gate-house going to Kings street; where they supped, and had Bathes provided for them. The next morning being Saturday, they went out into the Park in their Hermits weeds, the Minstrels playing and the Heralds going before them into the Court, and so into the Chappel, where every Knight with his Equires went to the Altar, and there offered, (the Dean of the Chappel, in a rich Cope, holding the Bafon.) After this they went up into their lodgings, and there new attired themselves in robes of Crimion Taffaty, with hats and white feathers, and so went back to the great Chamber: where by the King they were girded with the sword, and had guilt spurs put upon them. This done, they were solemnly served at dinner, and after went again to the Chappel, and there offered their swords. The next day being Sunday and Twelfth day, in robes of purple Satin, with Doctors hoods on their shoulders, and hats with white feathers, they issued out of the Reveltry with the Duke of Albany (being then to be made Duke of York) into the Hall, where the King fate under the cloth of Estate, and then the Heralds going before, the Knights of the Bath followed, and then the Earl of Suffolk Lord Chamberlain came alone, then followed Henry Howard Earl of Northampton, and Charles Blunt Earl of Devonshire, carrying the robes of Estate for the Duke of York, after whom Wriothesley

Earls and Barons created.

Richard Haddock his pretending to preach in his sleep.

Discovered by the King.

The King tries the nature of the Lyon, with a Cock and a Lamb.

Charles the Kings younger son is created Duke of York, and the solemn manner of it.

Earl of Southampton carried the Coronet, George Clifford Earl of Cumberland, the Golden Rod, the Earl of Worcester the Cap of Estate, and the Earl of Northampton bore the Duke of Albany in his Arms, supported by the Earls of Dorset and Northumberland, who all coming in this order before the King, the Duke of Albany was after the Patent read created Duke of York with the Robes and Coronet put on him; and the Golden Rod delivered into his hand: all which performed, they went to dinner, and the solemnity ended.

Thomas Douglas a Scotch-man hanged in Smithfield, and why.

About this time on the fifteenth of June, Thomas Douglas a Scotch-man, was committed to the Tower, and had Irons put upon him, being sent thither, but three days before from the Count Palatine of Rhine. His offence was, that he had counterfeited the Kings Privy Seal to divers Princes of Germany; One to the Archbishop of Cullen, another to the Archbishop of Trer, another to the Duke of Cleve, another to the Archbishop of Mogunna, and a fifth to the Count Palatine of the Rhine; whereof being examined and convicted, he was drawn on an hurdle into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered.

And now was a second Parliament appointed to be held at Westminster, on the nineteenth of March following, when four days before the day of sitting, the King, the Queen and Prince rode solemnly in great state through the City of London, where in divers places were erected Pageants, Presents given, Orations made, and all demonstrations of love and observance; and then the Parliament beginning, the King made a long and loving speech to the House, wherein he signified the causes of his calling it; but in the time when it should have proceeded, there was suddenly discovered a Plot of Treason (so damnable and foul, that posterity will hardly think it true, when they shall hear it) the Plot was to blow up with Gun-powder, both Houses of Parliament at a time, when the King, Prince and all the Nobility should be sitting in the Upper House, and all the Knights and Burgesses in the lower.

The Gun-powder Treason. By whom first plotted.

And with what Assistants.

The principal contriver of this Plot was Robert Catesbie, a Gentleman of great account in Northamptonshire, defended from that Catesbie who had been a special Counsellor of King Richard the third, to whose family the Divine Providence had now ordained to give a disastrous period. This Catesbie not able to perform the work himself alone, draws in many to assist him, as namely, Thomas Percy, Thomas Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, John Wright, Francis Tresham, Guido Fawkes, and at last Sir Everard Digby, all earnest Papists, and all bound by Oath, and by receiving the Sacrament to be secret; For effecting of this plot, they hired a house close adjoining to the Upper House of Parliament, where they were to dig through a Wall, for the fit placing of their Powder. About Candlemasse they had wrought the Wall half through: when suddenly they heard a noise in the next room, which made them fear they had been discovered: but sending Guy Fawkes (who went now under the name of John Johnson, as Master Percies man) to see what the matter was, he brought word, that it was a Cellar where Sea-coles had been laid, and were now a selling and the room offered to be let for a yearly rent. This room therefore as most fit for their purpose, being right under the Parliament House, Master Percy presently went and hired, laying into it twenty barrels of powder, which they covered with Billets and Faggots, for being discovered. Thus the first part of the plot was put in good readiness. It now remained to consider what was to be done, when the blow should be given: for though the King and Prince might be slain, yet the Duke of York and the Lady Elizabeth should still be safe, and so they should be no nearer their end than now they were. This work therefore for surprizing the Duke of York, Percy undertook, and for surprizing the Lady Elizabeth, they agreed upon a match of hunting near to Dunchurch, under colour whereof they would draw company together, and surprize her at the Lord Harringtons house in Warwickshire, where she then lay, and then proclaim her Queen, and so be sure to have all things done, as they would themselves. Thus far their bloody Plot went fairly on, and had perhaps gone on so still, if they had continued only bloody; but now a tenderness of heart took some of them, lest their friends should perish together with the rest, and this tenderness overthrows them; for to prevent such promiscuous slaughter, a Letter was framed, and sent to Lord Montague, son and heir to the Lord Morley, brought him by one of his Foot-men, which he received from an unknown man in the Street: The Letter was this: My Lord, out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation; therefore I would wish you, as you tender your life, to forbear your attendance at this Parliament; for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time: And think not slightly of this Advertisement; for though there be no appearance of any stir; yet I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned; because it may do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is past, as soon as you have burnt this Letter, and I hope you will make good use of it.

By what means first discovered.

My Lord having read the Letter, though much perplexed, yet went presently to the Court at White-hall, (the King being then a hunting at Royston) and delivered it to the Earl of Salisbury, principall Secretary of State, and the Earl having read it, acquainted first the Lord Chamberlain with it, and then the Lord Admiral, the Earl of Worcester and Northampton, who as soon as the King was returned from Hunting, acquainted him with it: the Earl of Salisbury telling him, that he thought it must be written either by a fool, or by a mad man, because of those words, (For the danger is past as soon as you have burnt this Letter) for if the danger were so soon past, what needed any warning? But the King considering it more deeply, apprehended presently some violent motion; and that it must be some sudden danger by blowing up with powder, and thereupon commanded, that diligent search should be made in the Parliament House, and

A and all other rooms and lodgings near adjoining: which search was made by the Lord Chamberlain, accompanied with the Lord Montague, who entering the Cellar under the upper Houle, found there great store of Faggots and Billets; which was answered to be for Mr Percies own provision: but then (it being considered why such store should be laid in for Mr Percie, who used to make but little stay in Town) and thereupon more diligent search being made, there was found under the Billets one of the Barrels of powder; and after that all the rest, being six and thirty; together with other instruments fit for their purpose, and then spying the said Fawkes to stand suspiciously, they apprehended him, and found in his pocket a piece of Touch-wood, a Tynder-box to light the Touch-wood, and a Watch, which Mr Percie had bought the day before, to try the short and long burning of the Touch-wood, which he had prepared to give fire to the train of powder. The plot being thus discovered, yet the most of the confederates met at Dunchurch, as they had agreed; where they divulged many detestable untruths against the King and State: signifying withall, that they were there met for advancement of the Catholick cause; hoping thereby to have drawn many to joyn with them in their Rebellion: but this availed them nothing: for first Sir Richard Verney high Sheriffe of Warwickshire chased them from thence; and then Sir Richard Welb, Sheriff of Worcestershire, knowing them to be entered into Master Littletons house at Wallbach, betel them round, where Catesbie and Percie issuing forth, were both slain with one shot of a Musquet; and after them, both the Wrights, John and Christopher, were likewise slain outright; Thomas Winter was taken alive: all which time, Francis Tresham remained still about the Court, offering his service for their suppression: but being suspected, was examined, and sent to the Tower, where he confest all, and within a few days after dyed of the Strangurie. On the seven and twentieth of January following, a Commission was directed to divers Lords and Judges of both Benches, for tryal of the rest of the Confederates: namely, of Thomas Winter, Guido Fawkes, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bates, Robert Winter, late of Hoodington in Warwickshire Esquire, John Graunt, late of Northbrook, in the County of Warwick Esquire, Ambrose Rookwood, late of Stanningfield in Suffolk Esquire, Sir Everard Digby, late of Gotherst in Buckinghamshire, Knight, who were all condemned, and had Judgement to dye, and on the Thursday following Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Grant and Bates, were accordingly drawn, hanged and quartered at the West end of Pauls Church in London, and on the Friday, the other four; namely, Thomas Winter, Keyes, Rookwood, and Fawkes were executed in the Parliament yard at Westminster. Of all whom, none was so much lamented as Sir Everard Digby, and indeed worthily; for he was a goodly personage, and of excellent parts, and had it seems been cunningly drawn in, and bound to secrecy by Oath, when he little thought of any such Treason. The seventh of November the Earl of Northumberland, upon suspicion of being acquainted with the plots, was first commanded to his house, and after a while committed to the Tower. And thus was this great plot discovered, and the plotters punished: to the great rejoicing of all people: inasmuch, that even the King of Spains and Arch-dukes Embassadors made Bonfires, and threw money among the people in token of joy. And at this time, on the fourth of January, the Spanish Embassadour delivered a Present to the King from the King his Master: namely six Jennets of Andalusia, with saddles very richly embroydered, and fiddle-clothes of cloth of Tissue: One of which Jennets was snow white, and had a main which reached to the ground. But this was a present sent before any knowledge had of the Powder Treason: but as soon as that was known, there was presently another Present sent from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England, of purpose to congratulate the Kings happy deliverance from the intended Powder Treason; and the Present was brought by Don John de Mendoza, which was a Rob of Murrie Sarrain, embroydered all over with Amber leather; and upon the leather, in every seam and skirt twice embroydered about with gold; the fore-part whereof were set with eight and forty tagges three inches long of beaten gold, hollow within, and filled with Amber-greece, also two large Chains of Amber-greece; Two Carkanets of Amber-greece, a Velvet Cap with gold Buttons, curiously enameled, and a girdle futable to the Buttons; all which were presented together in a large vessel of gold, in form of a Basin; so as it seems there was none rejoiced more for the overthrow of this plot for the Catholick cause, than the Catholick King himself. And now King James, not to be unmindefull to the Lord Montague, for being the means of discovering this Treason, he gave unto him in Fee Farm of Crown land 200 l. to him and his heirs, and 500 l. a year besides, during his life: and not to be unthankfull to God for the deliverance, he caused the fifth of November, being the day of the discovery, to be kept holy, with Prayer and Thanksgiving to God, which was then solemnly performed, and hath been since, and is likely for ever to be continued.

Fawkes first apprehended.

Catesbie and Percie slain.

The rest of the Confederates arraigned, condemned and executed.

The Earl of Northumberland committed to the Tower, and why.

A Present from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England.

Another from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England.

The Lord Montague rewarded for being a means of discovering the Treason.

The fifth of November kept holy in thankfulness for this deliverance.

A rumour spread that the King was slain at Oking, but false: and the joy upon hearing the truth.

But in the midst of this great joy, there was suddenly spread a rumour of greater sorrow, for on Saturday the two and twentieth of March, news was brought to the Court for certain, that the King was slain at Oking, twenty miles from London, stabbed with an invenomed knife; whereupon the Court gates were presently shut, and double guard set in all places about London, and all mens mindes were infinitely distracted; but within two houres all these clouds were slain and dispersed, and the Sun began to shine out again; and it was certainly known, that the King was safe, and in perfect health: for which a Proclamation was presently sent forth to signifie it to the people; and that afternoon the King came himself to White-hall, where thousands of people, ravished with joy, came flocking to see him; and so generally was the rejoicing, that the Spanish Embassadour gave Sir Lewis Lewknor, Master of the Ceremonies, a chain of gold of good value for bringing him the news: Though afterward it was thought by some, that this rumour was but politickly devised to make the Parliament and people more tender of the Kings safety, and by A making them more sensible what a treasure they had of his life, to make them more willing to part with their treasure for his living, asindeed this Parliament they did, giving more Subsidies than are usual.

Henry Garnet a Jesuite executed, and why.

The eight and twentieth of March following, Henry Garnet Provincial of the English Jesuites, was arraigned in Guild hall, for concealing the forelaide treason, where he had Judgement to be hang'd, drawn, and quartered, and accordingly on the third of May, was drawn from the Tower to the West end of Pauls Church, and there executed. At his death, he confessed his fault, asked forgiveness, and exhorted all Catholicks never to attempt any treason against the King or State, as a course which God would never prosper.

On Tuesday the twentieth of May were enstalled at Windsor Knights of the Garter, Robert Cecil, B Earl of Salisbury, and Thomas Howard Viscount Byndon; both of them honourably attended, but the Earl of Salisbury beyond ordinary proportion.

Henry L. Mor-dant, and Edw.
Lord Sturton fined, and why

There was yet a Flag end of the late Powder treason behind to be examined: whereupon two Barons of the Realm, namely, Henry Lord Mor-dant, and Edward Lord Sturton, were brought from the Tower, to the Star-chamber: and there, not charged indeed with any point of the treason, but only reflectingly, because they neglected to appear at the Parliament, according to their summons, for which neglect only, without any further charge, they were fined to pay to the King, the Lord Mor-dant ten thousand Marks, and the Lord Sturton six thousand, and to be prisoners during the Kings pleasure. But on the 27th of June, Henry Earl of Northumberland was likewise brought from the Tower to the Star-chamber, and more directly charged with circumstances concerning the Treason, specially in regard of Thomas Percy, whom he had admitted to be one of the Kings Gentleman Pensioners, without ministring unto him the Oath of Supremacy, knowing him to be a Recusant; for which, and some misprisions, he was fined to pay to the King thirty thousand pounds, to forfeit all his Offices, and to be kept prisoner during the Kings pleasure, as indee he continued many years, and at last released, was yet confined.

It was now the fourth year of King James his Reign, and was a time of Princely visitation; for this Summer, the 17th of July, Christianus King of Denmark, brother to the Queen, having been long expected, with eight ships came into the River of Thames, and anchored before Graves-end; to whom the next day, King James, with Prince Henry, and divers of his Lords went by Barge, and conducted him to London, where he stayed till the twelfth of August following: in D which time, he was entertained with all the Magnificence that could be devised; the King and he riding in great state through the City; where Pageants in many places were erected; and after he had been shewed the chief places about London: as namely the old Exchange, the Tower, the Mo-numents at Westminster, and had gone up to the top of Pauls, had been feasted by the King, by the Earl of Salisbury four days together at Theobalds, had seen Tiltiing, Fencing, Wrestling, and many other pastimes, on the twelfth of August, conducted by the King, the Queen, and Prince, with many other great Lords, he departed to his ships, and in eight days arrived at home: A happy thing when Princes can converse together like private persons, and are not kept asunder with jealously of State.

After the King of Denmark's departure, on the 23<sup>d</sup> of September, arrived at London Francis Prince of Vandemount, third Son to the Duke of Lorraine, accompanied with seven Earls, ten Barons, forty Gentlemen of quality, and sixscore common persons; who all the five and twentieth of September went by Coach to the King at Hampton Court, where fourteen days together they were feasted and royally entertained, and then returned.

But these Festivals were followed with a little disturbance; for in May, the year after, great Assemblies were gathered together in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire, and Leicestershire, throwing down Inclosures, at first, without any particular head: but at last rose up a base fellow, called John Reynolds, whom they named Captain Pouch, because he had a great leather Pouch hanging by his side, who affirmed to the Company, that in that Pouch he had sufficient to defend them against all comers: but when he was afterward apprehended, and his Pouch searched, there was nothing found in it but a piece of green cheese. Proclamation was made, commanding them to surcease their disorder: But this prevailed nothing, till the King sent Henry Earl of Huntingdon, Thomas Earl of Essex, Edward Lord Zouch, and Sir Edw. Cook Lord Chief Justice of England, to suppress them by force of Arms, and to punish the Levellers according to the nature of their offences; some by death, as for Treason, some by Fines, as for Routs: but Captain Pouch was made exemplar.

On Fryday the twelfth of June, his Majesty attended with divers Lords, dined with the Lord Maior, Sir John Watts, who after dinner presented him with a purse full of Gold, and humbly be-sought his Majesty, that he would be pleased to be free of his Company the Cloth-workers: To which, the King graciously condescended; and thereupon called to Sir William Stone, Master of the Company, and said, Stone give me thy hand; and now I am a Cloth-worker: And in token of my special favour to this Fraternity, I do here give to this Company a brace of Bucks yearly for ever, against the time of the Election of the Master and Wardens: at which time also many Lords and Gentlemen were made Free of the Cloth-workers.

A chesney, one Archbishop, one and thirty Earls, threecore and six Barons, seven Abbots, seven Priors, with a great number of Knights and Esquires, who had been free of that Company; which His Majesty graciously accepted, but told them, that he himself was already Free of another Company: but the Prince his Son should be free of theirs, and that he would see the Garland put on his head: whereupon the Master presented the Prince also with a purse of Gold, which he graciously accepted, and said, that not only himself would be free of the Merchant-Tailors, but the Lords also that were with him should do the like, all which was performed with great solemnity.

The fourth of July this year, Sir Thomas Knevet was called by Writ to the Parliament by the name of Baron of Efrick, the next day Sir Julius Caesar, Chancellor of the Exchequer was sworn a Privy Counsellor; and the sixteenth of November following Sir Jervis Clifton Knight, was called to the Parliament by Writ, by the name and title of Baron of Layton Bramcwell, whose only Daughter and Heir, was soon after married to Eysme Steward, Baron of Aubigny in France, sole Brother of the Duke of Lenox; whom he afterward succeeded in that Dignity.

About this time, Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen, most ungrateful and utterly forgetfull of the Kings great clemency to him, together with Terconell, Hugh Baron of Dungannon, and divers other Irish Lords, fled into the parts beyond Sea, with a purpose to solicit forain Princes against the King, and to offer the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope, which was presently signified to the Realm by Proclamation.

On the eleventh of April this year, George Jervis, a Seminary Priest, and the three and twentieth of June following, Thomas Garnet a Jesuit, were both executed at Tyburn; Thomas Garnet having the favour offered him to be pardoned, if he would but take the Oath of Allegiance, which he refused.

The nineteenth of April at Whitehall, dyed Thomas Earl of Dorset Lord Treasurer, (whose death because he dyed suddenly as he sat at the Councel Table) was by some untowardly interpreted; but being dead, and his head opened, there were found in it certain little bags of water, which whether by the straining of his study the night before, in which he sat up till eleven a clock, or otherwise by their own maturity, suddenly breaking and falling upon his brain, caused his sudden death. So certain it is that death comes not always by determinate steps, but sometimes per saltum, and we all carry about us the causes of sudden death, though unlesensible of them till we be unlesensible. This Lord was of excellent parts, and in his place exceeding industrious, and I have heard many Checker men say, there never was a better Treasurer, both for the Kings profit and the good of the subject.

The twentieth of May at Windsor, were made two Knights of the Garter, George Earl of Dunbar, and Philip Earl of Montgomery; but the Earl of Dunbar, within a year or two after left both his honour and his life; but not his life without honour, having been a faithfull servant, and a wife Counsellor to the King, and was honourably interred in the Church at Westminster.

About this time were many famous English Pirates that stuck not some of them to turn Turks, and lived in great state at Tunis, of whom the chief were Ward, Bishop, Sir Francis Verney, and Glanville, whom after many depredations and outrageous acts at Sea, partly the King of Spain suppressed, and partly the K. of England, and 19 of their associates being taken, were hanged at Wapping.

Also at this time, in the Strand on the North side of Durham house, where stood an old long flachle: Robert Earl of Salisbury now Lord Treasurer of England, caused to be erected a stately building, which upon Tuesday the tenth of April, in the year 1609, was begun to be richly furnished with wares; and the next day after, the King, the Queen, and Prince, with many great Lords and Ladies came to see it: and then the King gave it the name of Britains Bursse.

On the eighth of May this year, the King by Proclamation prohibited all forein Nations, that after August they should not fish upon any of the Coasts of England, Scotland, or Ireland, nor the Isles adjacent, without the special licence from the Commissioners in that behalf ordained.

At this time the making of Allum, which heretofore with great charges had been fetched from forein parts, was by divers that laboured in it, and now lastly by Sir John Bourchier, brought to perfection in England, and thereupon the King prohibited upon pain of confiscation, any Allum to be brought from beyond the Seas, and took the whole traffique thereof to himself.

And now the King according to an ancient custom, had aid of his Subjects through England, for making his eldest Son Prince Henry Knight, which yet was levied with great moderation, and the Prince to shew himself worthy of it, performed his first Feats of Arms at Barriers, with wonderful skill and courage: being not yett full sixteen years of age.

It was now the eighth year of King James his Reign, being the year 1610, when Prince Henry being come to the age of seventeen years, it was thought fit he should be Initiated into Royalty: and thereupon the thirtieth of May this year, he was Created Prince of Wales in most solemn manner; which was thus, Garret King at Arms, bore the Letters Patents, the Earl of Suffex the Robes of Purple Velvet, the Earl of Huntingdon the Train, the Earl of Cumberland the Sword, the Earl of Rutland the Ring, the Earl of Darby the Rod, the Earl of Shrewsbury the Cape and Coroner, the Earl of Nottingham and Northampton supported the Prince, being in his Surcoat only and bare-headed and in this manner being conducted to the King, attended on by the Knights of the Bath, five and twenty in number, all great men, and great mens sons, the Earl of Salisbury principall Secretary, read the Letters Patents: the Prince kneeling all the while before the King, and at the words accustomed, the King put on him the Robe, the Sword, the Cape and the Coroner, the Rod and the Ring, and then kissed him on the cheek, and so the solemnity ended.

He keeps Court by himself and who were his great Officers.

After this, it was thought fit, he should keep his Court by himself: and thereupon St Thomas Chaloner, a learned Gentleman, who had before been his Governour, was now made his Lord Chamberlain, St Edward Philips his Chancellor, and all other Officers assigned him, belonging to a Princes Court: wherein he shewed himself so early ripe for Majesty that he seemed to be a King, while he was yet but Prince: and all mens eyes began to fix upon him.

Seminaries and Jesuits commanded to avoid the Realm, and why.

King James had long since shut up the Gates of Jamaica, and was in Peace with all Princes abroad; his only care now was how to keep Peace at home; and to this end, the three first days of June, in his own Person he heard the differences between the Ecclesiastical and the Temporal Judges, argued, touching Profections out of the Kings Bench and Common Pleas; to this end, the eighth, ninth, and tenth of June, he heard the manifold complaints of the abuses of the Victuallers, and other Officers of his Navy Royal; to this end, the fourth of June, 1610, he once again by Proclamation, commanded all Roman Priests, Seminaries and Jesuits, as being the chief incendiaries of troubles, to depart this Kingdom by the fifth of July next, and not to return upon pain of severity of the Law: also all Recusants, to return home to their dwellings, and not to remain in London, nor to come within ten miles of the Court, without special License. After which Proclamation, the Oath of Allegiance was presently minitred to all sorts of people, and their names certified to the Lords of the Council, that refused to take it; and this he the rather did out of consideration of the bloody fact, committed lately by one Ravillack, upon the person of the renowned King of France, Henry the fourth: and whereas Queen Elizabeth in her 43 years, had granted her Letters Patents to continue for 15 years to the East-India Merchants, now upon their humble Petition, the King was pleased to enlarge their Patents, giving them a charter to continue for ever, enabling them thereby to be a body Corporate and Politick, which so encouraged the Merchants, that they built a ship of twelve hundred tun, the greatest that was ever made in this Kingdom by Merchants; which the King and Prince honoured with going to Debsford to see it; and then named it, The Trades increase: and at this time gave to St Thomas Smith, (Governor of that Company) a fair chain of Gold, with a Jewel, wherein was his Picture. But this great Ship having been in the Red Sea, and returning to Banham, was there lost and most of her men cast away. But then the King himself builded the goodliest ship of War, that was ever built in England, being of the burthen of 1400 Tun, and carrying three score and four pieces of great Ordnance, which he gave to his Son Prince Henry, who named it after his own dignity, The Prince.

And now whereas a Parliament had been holden this year, and was prorogued to a certain day, the King perhaps not finding it to comply with his designs, or for some other cause known to himself on the last day of December, under the great Seal of England dissolved it.

Before this time one St Robert Carre, a Gentleman of Scotland, or of the Borders, at a time of Tilting before the King, chanced with a fall off his Horse to break his leg; upon which mischance, he was forced for some days to keep his bed, in which time the King was sometime pleased to come and visit him: and then it was first perceived that the King had begun to cast an eye of favour upon him: and indeed from that time forward (as he was a very fine Gentleman and very wife) many great favours were heaped upon him: So as on Easter Munday, in the year 1611, he was Created Viscount Rochester. On the two and twentieth of April, 1612, was sworn a privy Counsellor. On the fourth of November 1613, was created Earl of Somerset, and the tenth of July following, made Lord Chamberlain.

But this Sun-shine of Fortune lasted not long; yet not by any inconstancy in the King, but by the Earls own undeserving, which thus fell out: The Right Honourable Robert Earl of Essex, had before this time married the beautiful Lady Francis Howard, Daughter of Thomas Earl of Suffolk, who upon causes judicially heard, were afterward Divorced and left free to marry any other. After which Divorce, this great favourite (the Earl of Somerset) takes her for wife; the King gracing their marriage with all demonstrations of love and favour; and the Lords gracing it with a stately Masque that night, and a few days after, the Bride and Bridegroom, accompanied with most of the Nobility of the Kingdom, were Feasted at Merchant-Taylors Hall, by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. But see how soon this fair weather was overcast: For it happened, that one St Thomas Overbery, a very ingenious Gentleman, and the Earls special friend, who had written a witty Treatise of a Wife: and it seems not thinking the Lady in all points answerable to his description, had been an earnest dissuader of the Match, and to strengthen his dissuasion, laid perhaps some unjust imputation upon the Ladies fame, which so incensed them both against him, that a little revenge could not give them satisfaction, than to take away his life: So true is that saying:

Upon this, they finde pretences to have the said St Thomas committed to the Tower, and there by their Instruments effect their revenge: some say by a poisoned Tansey sent him to eat, some by a poisoned Glyster ministred unto him, but howsoever effected it was, for which fact St Jervis Yelvis then Lieutenant of the Tower, and three or four other of inferior condition were put to death, the Lady and Earl themselves were arraigned and condemned: but through the Kings great clemency had their lives spared, but in such a sort spared, as was to them no less grievous than death, in self, being never after suffered to see the Kings face, nor to come near his Court.

St Thomas Overbery Poysoned.

St Jervis Yelvis Lieutenant of the Tower executed.

The Earl of Somerset and his Lady condemned, but their lives spared.

This Favourite being thus out of favour, there was place made for entertaining another; for indeed King James was of so sociable and loving a nature, that he could not be long without an Alter idem; a bolome friend with whom to communicate his Internos sensus, and upon whose shoulders he might sometimes lay a burthen, which he was not willing to bear himself; and this new friend was Mr George Villers, a Gentleman of a good House, but younger brother, but of so delicate a composure of body, and withall of so excellent parts of minde, as if nature had framed him on purpose to be a Kings Favourite. And indeed never any man was partaker of the Royal influence like to him, made first a Knight and Gentleman of the Kings Bed-chamber, soon after made a Viscount and Master of the Horse; while after created Earl of Buckingham, then Marquess of Buckingham, and made Lord Admiral: Lastly, made Duke of Buckingham, the greatest Title of Honour that a Subject is capable of, and yet this Title not greater than his Power: for all matters of Grace passed from the King by him, and to grace him the more, his Mother (who after his Fathers death, had married a younger Son of the Lord Comptons) was created Countesse of Buckingham, his Sister who had married a Gentleman of no extraordinary Family, had her husband made Earl of Denbigh, his two Brothers were made, one of them Viscount Purbach, the other Earl of Anglesey; besides many other of his friends and kindred highly advanced; For this Lord affected not an advancement that should be only personal, but rather be in common to all his Family, and was not of the disposition of some, who like to great Oaks, love to keep all that are near them underwood; though it be in truth both against Nature and Policy to stand alone, when they would be lesse subject to the violence of winds, if more flood together. And though never any man had juster cause to be envied than he, yet never any man was lesse envied; because though his honours made him great, yet they made him not swell, but he retained the like temper of affable carriage after his advancement, as he had done before.

But before all these favours were heaped upon him, many other great passages had intervened; for first, after the death of Thomas Earl of Dorset, Robert Earl of Salisbury had been Lord Treasurer, and after him Thomas Earl of Suffolk. But this Lord, though of a most noble disposition, yet as having had his training up another way, seemed lesse ready in discharging the place, and whether for this, or for his Ladies taking too much upon her by his indulgence, the staffe was soon after taken from him; after whom there came in, such a sequence of Treasurers as no Age before had ever seen; all wise and able men indeed; but yet in whom the Office seemed an imployment, rather to ennoble the Officer than to enrich the King. For first St Henry Montague was taken from the Kings Bench: and on the fourth of December, 1620, made Lord Treasurer, and presently upon it Earl of Manchester, and before the year went about put off. After whom St Lionel Cranfield, from Master of the Wards was made Lord Treasurer, and shortly after Earl of Middlesex: and then not only put off, but fined to pay the King fifty thousand pounds: After him, St James Lee from chief Justice of the Kings Bench was made Lord Treasurer, and soon after Earl of Marlborough; and then having made a good return of his Place, put it off himself. After him St Richard Weston, from Chancellor of the Exchequer was made Lord Treasurer, and soon after Earl of Portland: so as within the compass of little more than four years, four Treasurers in a row were made four Earls; enough to make a prescription for all Treasurers hereafter, to claim a right of being made Earls, which yet I speak not as derogating from those worthy men, whose memories I reverence, but as observing, Fataque fortunaque Virum, so rare as that there was never any Precedent of the like.

Also the five and twentieth of June, 1612, the Lord Sanguer, a Nobleman of Scotland, having in a private revenge suborned Robert Carlile, to murder John Turner a Master of Fence, thought by his greatness to have born it out; but the King respecting nothing so much as Justice, would not suffer Nobility to be a shelter for villany, but according to the Law, on the nine and twentieth of June, the said Lord Sanguer having been arraigned and condemned by the name of Robert Creighton, Esquire; was before Westminster Hall gate executed, where he dyed very penitent.

About this time, the King in special favour for the present Plantation of English Colonies in Virginia granted a Lottery to be held at the West end of Pauls, whereof one Thomas Sharplys a Taylor of London had the chief Prize, which was four thousand Crowns in fair Plate.

At this time also the Corps of Mary late Queen of Scotland, the Kings Mother, was translated from Peterborough, to St Peters Church in Westminster, and from thence was carried to the Chappel Royal there; where it was interred in a Royal Tombe, which the King had erected for her.

About this time also St Robert Sherley, third son of St Thomas Sherley of Suffex Knight, who sixteen years past had betaken himself to travell, and had served divers Christian Princes for the space of five years; but chiefly Rodolphus the Roman Emperour; who for his service, made him an Earl of the Empire: he afterward went into Perfia, and served the Perfian ten years, who made him General of the Artillery; and held him in so great account, that he gave him the Lady Terefa in marriage; whose sister was one of the Queens of Perfia, after which the Perfian employed him to sundry Princes of Europe; and sent him in special Embassage into England to King James, to whom he delivered his Letters, and shewed his Commission; all which signified the Perfians great love and affection to his Majesty: with frank offer of free Commerce to all his Highnesses Subjects through all the Perfians Dominions: After a years stay here, in which time his Lady lay in of a son, to whom the Queen was God-mother, and Prince Henry God-father; he left the child here in England, and then with his Lady departed into Perfia.

Mr George Villers comes into the Kings favour, and of the many honours heaped suddenly upon him.

Thomas Earl of Suffolk, Lord Treasurer hath the Staffe taken from him.

Four Lord Treasurers made in four years.

The Lord Sanguer of Scotland hanged, and why.

A Lottery granted for the Plantation of Virginia.

St Robert Sherley comes into England Ambassador from the King of Perfia.

The order of Baronets erected: and why.

It was now the year 1612, and the tenth of King James his Reign, when the Illustrious Prince Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine, which whom a Treaty of marriage had been before, with the Lady Elizabeth: on the sixteenth of October arrived at Gravesend, to whom the Duke of Lenox and divers other Lords were sent by the King, who conducted him to White-hall, and from thence into the great Banqueting house, where the King, the Queen, Prince Henry, and the Lady Elizabeth entertained him in all kinde manner, and after by Barge conducted him to Essex House, appointed for his lodging. It was many years since any Kings Daughter had been married in England; which now happening, and to so Illustrious a Prince, was just cause of Triumph and rejoicing; but see the misery of Humane Affairs; joy can no sooner be setting forth, but sorrow will be sure to follow her at the heels, as now indeed it happened: for on the nine and twentieth of October, the Prince Palatine, with all the great Lords of the Kingdom, in most jovial manner dining at Guild hall: Prince Henry who was also invited and expected, could not come being newly fallen exceeding sick of a popular malignant Fever, which reigned that year in most parts of this Land: where of on the sixth of November, between seven and eight a Clock at night, at his Court of St James he dyed: But he being infinitely beloved of the people, and one that had given great hope of proving an Heroick Prince, it caused suspicion in many mens heads, that his death was not without violence offered to Nature; some said, by bunches of Grapes given him to eat: some by Gloves of a poysoned perfume, given him for a present: but these were but idle rumours and conceits: It seems the Divine Providence had ordained it should be said of him; Hunc tantum terris ostendunt Fata, nec ultra esse sinunt: whose death would have given a great blow to the happineffe of this Kingdom, if there had not been another Prince left, of a mil-der Spirit perhaps, but so accomplished with all excellent endowments, that there could be no great want of Prince Henry, as long as there was left Prince Charles. The Corps of Prince Henry, who dyed at the age of eighteen years, eight months, and seventeen days, was drawn in a Chariot to the Abbey Church at Westminster, and there interred in the Chappel Royal, on the seventh of December following.

This Accident something appalled the generall joy, but yet triumphs went on. Upon Saint Thomas day, the Palgrave and Grave Maurice were Elected Knights of the Garter: and the seven and twentieth of December, the Palgrave was betrothed to the Lady Elizabeth. On Sunday, the seventh of February, the Palgrave in person was enstalled Knight of the Garter at Windsor, and at the same time was Grave Maurice enstalled by his Deputy, Count Lodowick of Nassau. On the fourteenth of February, being Shrove-Sunday, and Saint Valentines day, this happy marriage of the Palgrave with the Lady Elizabeth was solemnized in the Chappel at White-hall: The Bride was led to Church by two Batchellors, her Brother Prince Charles, and the Earl of Northampton, Lord Privie Seal: she was attired all in white, having a rich Crown of Gold upon her head, her hair hanging down at length, curiously beset with Pearls and precious Stones, her Train supported by twelve young Ladies in white garments: The King gave her in marriage, the Archbishop of Canterbury married them, the Bishop of Bath and Wells preached the Bridal Sermon: which ended, the Bride was led home by two married men, the Duke of Lenox, and the Earl of Nottingham, Lord Admiral. This marriage was solemnized the first night with a stately Masque of Lords and Ladies: the second night with a magnificent Masque of the Gentlemen of the Middle Temple, and Lincolns-Inne: The third night with a sumptuous Masque of the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple, and Grays-Inne, provided indeed then, but was not performed till Saturday night following, by reason the concourse of people was so great, it would have hindered the Show. After this the Lord Maior and Aldermen gave the Bride a Chain of Oriental Pearl, valued at two thousand pounds: and now when all things had been done for honouring their Marriage, which either love and observance could devise, or art and magnificence could perform, on the tenth of April, the Bridegroom with his Bride took leave of the King and the Queen at Rochester, (who had by Barge conducted them thither) and there taking ship on the nine and twentieth of April they arrived at Flushing; from whence the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Viscount Lisle, and the Lord Harrington waited upon them to their chief City of Heydelburgh, in all places as they passed, being received with all state and magnificence: but them on the fourteenth of June, the English Lords returning home, the Lord Harrington dyed by the way at Worms, whose Corps was brought over, and buried in England. And here it will not be amiss, to shew of what extent and largeness the Palgrave's Country is, because of the iniquity of some that seek to disgrace it. It is in length about two hundred English miles, taking the lower and upper Country. In the lower he hath six and twenty walled Towns, besides an infinite number of fair Villages, and two and twenty houses of residence. In the upper, not so many walled Towns, and houses, but those that are generally fairer than in the lower, especially Amberg, and New-market.

But it is now time to look home; in the year 1609, the King having care for the quietness of Ireland, had granted to the City of London the present possession and Plantation in the Province of Ulster: whereupon afterward in the year 1612, they sent thither about three hundred persons, of all sorts of handy-crafts men, chiefly to inhabit the two Cities of London-Derry and Coleraine: where they ordained Alderman Cockain for the first Governour. And for their advancing of this, or the like Plantation in Ireland, King James about this time began a new Order of Knights which are called Baronets, because they take place next to Barons younger sons; and he appointed certain Laws, to make them capable that should be admitted.

First

A First that they should maintain the number of thirty foot Souldiers in Ireland, for three years, after the rate of eight pence a day, and to pay the wages of one whole year, upon the passing of their Patent: Then that they should be Gentlemen of Bloud of three Descents; and lastly, should have land of Inheritance, in possession or immediate Reversion, to the value of a thousand pounds per annum: And to keep the Order from swarming, he stinted it within the number of only 200, and as the issue should fail the Order to cease. But he that will look, how well the end of the Institution, and the Laws of it have been observed, shall perhaps find it to be here, as it was in the Order of St Michael in France, into which at first, there were none admitted, but Princes and eminent persons: but afterward, all sorts of men, without any difference, were admitted, that it came almost to be doubted, whether the Dignity of the Order did more grace to the persons, or the meanness of the persons disgrace the Order: and indeed, when the Laws of an Institution are not in some measure observed, it seems to make a kinde of nullity in the collation.

About this time, on Sunday the 24th of October, an exemplar penance was imposed upon St Peckhall Brackas Knight, which was to stand at Pauls Crosse in a white sheet, holding a stick in his hand, having been formerly convicted before the high Commissioners, for many notorious Adulteries with divers women.

This year 1614 in the moneth of July, Christianus King of Denmark, (out of his love to his Sister, and King James) came the second time into England; but as being now secure of himself, privately, and with a small company, so as he came to the Queen at Somerset house unexpected, and before any knowledge was had of his coming; but King James being then in progresse in Bedfordshire, and hearing of it, came presently back, and after he had entertained him here, with Hunting, Hawking, running at Ring, Bear-baiting, Plays, Fire-works, and Fencing, on the first of August Prince Charles brought him aboard his Ship, who then took his leave, and returned home.

In October this year was a call of Serjeants at Law, being 11 in number, namely, George Wilde, William Toves, Richard Bawtrie, Henry Finch, Thomas Chamberland, Francis Moore, Thomas Armin, John Moore, Francis Harvey, Charles Chibbourn, and Thomas Richardson; and in Trinity Term before there had two other been called, namely, St Randal Crew of Lincolns Inne, and St Robert Hicham of Grays Inne, Knights.

About this time an Embassador came from the young Emperor of Russia to King James, desiring his continual love and amity, and to be a means of making atonement, between him and the King of Swethland, and withall presented him with a rich present of Furs: which was no small honour to the King of great Britain to have so great a Potentate as the Emperor of Russia sollicite him to be his mediator.

Though King James out of a naturall goodness was addicted to peace, yet out of providence he neglected not to be prepared for war, and thereupon in the year 1610, had granted priviledges to a society called of the Military Garden; and this year 1614, caused a Muster of men to be presented before him; which was performed to his great liking, and to the great commendation of the City.

About this time a memorable Act was performed by Mr Hugh Middleton, Citizen and Goldsmith of London, and born in Denbighshire, who having an Act of Parliament for his Warrant, with infinite cost and indefatigable labour, brought water to the City of London, from the two great Springs of Chadwell and Amwell in Hartfordshire, having cut a Channel from thence to a place near Islington, whither he conveyed it, to a large Pond, and from thence in pipes of young Elms to all places of the City, for as the Poet saith:

"Aequor ubi ducor.

Nothing is so commodious for the life of man, as Water.

Another memorable act was about this time done on the North side of London, called Moorfields, which being before invironed with deep stinking ditches and noysome common shoars, was now, not only made fair and sweet, but so levelled into walks and set with trees, that it is the pleasantest place of all the City.

The next year being 1615, another memorable act, for the benefit and beauty of the City of London, was performed; for Smithfield, which was before a rude dirty place, was now paved all over, and strong rails sequestering the middle part of it, were set up, to make it a fair walking place, and fit for Market or any other use.

The Lady Arbella a near kinswoman of the Kings, had sometime before, without the Kings privacy, secretly married Master William Seymour, younger Son of the Earl of Hartford, now Earl of Hartford himself; for which they were both committed to the Tower: and now this year on the seven and twentieth day of September she ended her life there, and was buried in the Chappel Royal at Westminster.

This year also in July were enstalled Knights of the Garter, Francis Earl of Rutland, St George Killers Master of the Horse, and St Robert Sidney, Viscount Lisle, and in another kinde of Honour, the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Carews, and Doctor Andrews Bishop of Ely, were sworn Privy Counsellors.

St Walter Rawleigh is set at liberty to fetch gold from Guyana.

He sacks and pillageth the Town of Saint Thome. This fact Gundamora aggravatech against him.

Wales by the death of Prince Henry, had been a good while without a Prince, and now to supply that place, Prince Charles is created Prince of Wales: In joy whereof, the Town of Ludlow in Shropshire, and the City of London, performed great Triumphs: and the more to honour his Creation, there were made five and twenty Knights of the Bath; all of them Lords or Barons sons: and yet more to honour it, there were forty selected Gentlemen of the Innes of Court, that performed solemn Jests at Banquets, with great magnificence.

This year was a Censure of divers great Delinquents, for first St Edward Coke, was upon displeasure discharged from being Lord Chief Justice of the Kings Bench; and two days after his discharge, St Henry Montague the Kings Sergeant at Law, was placed in his room: Next to him the Lord Egerton, whether disabled by sickness or age, to exercise the place, or upon displeasure also, had the Seal taken from him, which was delivered to St Francis Bacon the Kings Attorney; he made first Lord Keeper, and the Lord Egerton dying soon after, Lord Chancellor. Not long after him St Henry Yelverton the Kings Attorney, for adding new privileges to the Londoners Charter, without the Kings pivity, was in displeasure put from his place; and in his room was placed St Thomas Coventry, the Kings Solicitor. But a while after, St Henry Yelverton, was made a puny Judge of the Common Pleas; having indeed the reputation of an excellent Lawyer.

And yet this work of Censuring layed not here, for much about this time, Thomas Earl of Suffolk Lord Treasurer of England, had the Staff of his Office taken from him; which was soon after delivered to St Henry Montague Lord Chief Justice of the Kings Bench. If St John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court, had made a little more haste, he might have made one in this number of Delinquents: but he came short three or four years, and then being charged by his own servant with bribery, he was put from his place and censured in the Star-chamber to pay twenty thousand pounds: and in his room was placed St William Byrde a man of more integrity.

Though King James upon the death of Queen Elizabeth, came to reside in England, yet he forgot not that Scotland was his native Country; and therefore after he had spent some years in England, to acquaint himself with the State of the Kingdom, in March this year one thousand six hundred and sixteenth, he made a Journey into Scotland: for though he had left very able men to sit at the Helm therein in his absence, yet he knew, that as it is the Masters Eye, that makes the Horse fat: so it is the Princes presence sometimes that keeps out many distempers in a State, that would otherwise creep in; and now, when in his staying six Months there, he had seen all things well settled, both in the Ecclesiastical State and in the Temporal, and made it appear that he resided not in England out of any neglect of Scotland; but to the end, he might be in the place of most convenience to both Kingdoms: on the fifteenth of September, he returned to London, not more to the grief of the Scots to leave him, than to the joy of the English to receive him, so much was King James as a just and wise Prince, beloved of both the Nations.

The 15th of February 1617 in the fifteenth year of this King, Francis Ashley of the middle Temple London Esquire, where he had been Reader the year before, was by a writ called to be Sergeant at Law, selus Serviens ad legem electus, and the fifth of July following was Knighted, and about that time was Steward of the Marshallcy of the Kings house, and by King Charles, the fifth of May, in the first year of his Reign was by Letters Patents made one of the Kings Sergeants at Law, and so continued unto his death; which happened by the will of God the 28th of November, 1635, at Sergeants Inn in Fleetstreet: and was Recorder of Doncaster in Dorsetshire, where together with his Lady in the great Church he lies Involved: leaving Dorothy his only Daughter and heir (by the Lady Anne his wife, the eldest Daughter and Coheir of Bernard Samraves of Dorsetshire Esquire) married unto the Honourable Denzell Holles Esquire, whose only issue is Francis Holles of Wintborne St Martin in the County of Dorset Esquire.

Now comes to be related a matter of speciall observation; St Walter Rawleigh had lived a condemned man many years in the Tower, and now his Destiny brought him to his end by liberty, which it could not do by imprisonment; for out of a longing for liberty, he propounded a project to the King, upon which (as he was a well spoken man, and of a great capacity) he set such colours of probability; especially guiding it over, with the Gold he would fetch from a Mine in Guyana; and that without any wrong at all to the King of Spain (if he might be allowed to go the Journey) that the King, if he gave not credit that he could perform it, at least gave way that he should undertake it: and thereupon with divers ships accompanied with many Knights & Gentlemen of quality, he set forward on the Voyage; but when after long search or shew of search, no such place of Treasure, or no such Treasure could be found, whether it were, that he thought it a shame, to return home with doing nothing: or that his malus Genius thrust him upon the Design: he fell upon Saint Thome, a Town belonging to the King of Spain: sacked it, pillaged it, and burnt it: and here was the first part of his Tragical Voyage acted, in the death of his eldest son: the last part was acted in his own death at his return: For Gundamora the Spanish Leger, did so aggravate this fact of his to the King, against him; that it seemed nothing would give satisfaction but Rawleighs head, without which he doubted there would follow a breach of the League between the two Nations. Rawleigh excused it, by saying that he was urged to it by the Spaniards first assaulting of him; and besides, that he could not come at the Myne, without winning this Town: but Gundamora was too strong an adversary for him; and the King preferring the publique Peace, before the life of one man, already condemned, gave way

A way to have the Sentence of his former Condemnation executed upon him; and thereupon brought to the Kings Bench Bar, he was not newly Arraigned or Indicted, as being already Mortuus in Lege, but only hath the former Sentence averred against him, and so carryed to the Gatehouse, and from thence the next morning to the Parliament Yard: a Scaffold was there erected, upon which after fourteen years reprivall, his head was cut off: at which time, such abundance of blood issued from his veins, that shewed he had stock of Nature enough left to have continued him many years in life, though now above threecore years old, if it had not been taken away by the hand of Violence.

And this was the end of the great St Walter Rawleigh: great sometimes in the favour of Queen Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great scourge and hate of the Spaniards, who had many things to be commended in his life; but none more, than his constancy at his death, which he took with so undaunted a resolution, that one might perceive, he had a certain expectation of a better life after it: so far he was from holding those Atheistical opinions; an aspersions whereof some traducing persons had cast upon him.

About this time King James made a progresse to the University of Cambridge, where delighted with the Disputations and other Scholastical exercises, he stayed three whole days, and could have been content to have stayed as many years: for next being a King, he was made to be a Scholar.

In the year 1619, being the seventeenth year of King James his reign, that knot of love which above twenty years had been tyed, between him and his Queen, was by death dissolved; for on Tuesday this year the second of March, Queen Anne dyed at Hampton Court, whose Corps was brought to Denmark house, and from thence conveyed to Westminster: where in the Royal Chapel with great solemnity it was interred: a Princess very memorable for her vertue, and not a little for her Fortune, who besides being a Queen, was so happy as to be Mother of such admired children, as she brought into the World. But the dissolving of this knot cast the King into an extreme sickness, and after some recovery, into a Relapse: from which notwithstanding, it pleased God to deliver him, as having yet some great work to do.

This year on Monday the 3d of May, one Mr Williams a Barrister of the Middle Temple, was arraigned at the Kings Bench, for libelling, and for writing Books against the King: and upon Wednesday following was hanged and quartered at Charing Crosse.

But an action of another nature was performed this year, the seventeenth of July, not unworthy the relating, which was this, that one Bernard Calvert of Andover, rode from St Georges Church in Southwark to Dover, from thence passed by Barge to Calice in France, and from thence returned back to Saint Georges Church the same day, setting out about three a clock in the morning, and returned about eight a clock in the Evening, fresh and lusty.

In the year 1621, a Parliament was holden at Westminster; wherein two great examples of Justice were shewed; which for future terror are not unfit to be here related: One upon St Giles Montpeyson, a Gentleman otherwise of good parts; but for practising sundry abuses in creding and letting up new Innes and Alehouses, and exacting great sums of money of people, by pretence of Letters Patents granted to him for that purpose, was sentenced to be degraded, and disabled to bear any office in the Common-wealth, though he avoided the execution by flying the land; but upon St Francis Michell, a Justice of Peace of Middlesex, and one of his chief Agents, the sentence of Degradation was executed, and he made to ride with his face to the Horse-lail through the City of London. The other example was of St Francis Bacon, Viscount St Albans, Lord Chancellor of England, who for bribery was put from his place, and committed to the Tower: but after some few days enlarged: in whose place Doctor Williams Dean of Westminster was made Lord Keeper.

The Count Palatine being now strengthened with the alliance of the King of Great Britain, was thought a fit man to be King of Bohemia, and accordingly was elected, by the States of that Kingdom, but he was no sooner invested in the Crown; but the Emperor with great Forces assaulted him in Prague, and not only drove him with his wife and children from thence; but took from him also his own Patrimony the Palatinate: so as though now a King, he was fain to fly to the States of the Low-Countries for a place of residence. King James though he had never given his consent to the Palgrave taking upon him that Kingdom, as fore-seeing in his great judgement what the event would be: yet in this distresse, he could not forbear to take care of his Daughter, and thereupon sent St Richard Weston, the same that was after Lord Treasurer, in Embassy to the Emperor, to sollicite the restoring of the Palatinate to the Palgrave; but he returning without success, the King had then conference with Count Gundomar the King of Spains Legier in England, what course might be taken to procure the restoring it: who made him answer, there could be no better course than to make a marriage between his Son the Prince of Wales, and the Infant of Spain, which he said would easily be effected, if the Prince might have leave to make a Journey into Spain. King James though he considered the inveterate grudges between Spain and England, and how dangerous it might be to put the heir of the Kingdom into the Spaniards hands, yet grounding himself upon the saying, Fidelem si putaveris, facies: and drawn on by the insinuating speeches of Count Gundomar, not perhaps without some inclination in the Marquesse of Buckingham, was contented at last the Prince should go. And so Prince Charles sending his ships about, and taking along with him only the Marquesse of Buckingham (who in the time of his being in Spain was created Duke of Buckingham) Endymion

St Francis Michell is degraded, and in what manner. St Francis Bacon Lord Chancellor put from his place by bribery.

The Palgrave is chosen King of Bohemia, but is soon driven out, and his Palatinate seized on.

The King hath conference with Gundomar how the Palatinate might be restored.

Gundomar adviceth by making a marriage between the Prince of Wales and the Infant of Spain. Hereupon the Prince is sent into Spain, and how accompanied.

Forster,

Porter, and Mr. Francis Cottington: (two that were well acquainted with the language and affairs of Spain) he took his journey by the way of France, went to Paris, and secretly in disguise to the Court there, where he had the sight of that Lady, that might well have stayed him from going further, but yet on he went.

Gundomar gets much money of Ladies by perfwading them of the certainty of the match.

In the mean time Gundomar a cunning man, and one that besides his Master's had ends of his own, and could play his game no leffe for his own profit than his Masters Honour, as he had perfwaded the King of the facility of the Match with Spain, so he perfwaded a certainty of it, especially amongst the Catholick Ladies, by which means he brought no small store of Grift to his own Mill, receiving from one Lady three hundred pounds to be made Groom of the Stool, when the Spanish Princeſſe ſhould come; of another a good round ſum to be Mother of the Maids, and of divers other the like for other places.

The Princes entertainment in Spain.

But the prince being arrived in Spain, was received indeed with all the demonstrations of love and kindeſſe that could be deviſed, ſo as the charge of his entertainment was ſaid to ſtand the King of Spain in nine and forty thouſand Duckats; but yet his acquaintance with the Lady was much reſtrained, for in all the time of his ſtaying in Spain (which was no leſſe than eight months, being from February to October) he ſaw her but very ſeldom, and that at good diſtances, never ſpoke with her but twice, and that before company, beſides that his ſpeeches were limited, how much and what he ſhould ſay, far from any means of tying the Knot between them which was pretended. What the cauſe ſhould be was much in obſcurity; ſome thought that a difference between the Duke of Buckingham and the Count Olivares, the King of Spain's great Favorite, was a great hindrance of the proceeding, but other, and more likely, that the Spaniards indeed never really intended the Match at all, but had drawn the Prince into Spain for other ends; but what thoſe ends were, was no leſſe uncertain; one thought it was done to hold the Prince in a Treaty of marriage with a Daughter of Spain, till the Daughters of France ſhould be beſet, thereby to keep him from that alliance; but others and more likely, that the King of Spain entertained this Treaty with the King of great Britain, meaning to ſpin it out till he had compaſſed ſome deſignes in the Low-Countries, and the Palatinate, at leaſt to make King James leſſe vigilant for thoſe parts.

The King ſends for the Prince to return home.

But when much time had been ſpent in protracting, upon pretence of difficulties in obtaining the Popes diſpenſation, King James partly wearied with delay, but chiefly angry with deſuſion, ſent to the Prince, with all ſpeed to return into England; which the Prince preſently ſignified to the King of Spain, and had his leave to depart; but upon promiſe to continue the Treaty of the marriage ſtill. Though it was ſaid, the Prince was gone but a few days on his journey, when a Poſt was ſent to have ſtayed him, if he had been overtaken. But whether it was ſo or no, it was Gods Providence that he came ſafely to his ſhips, with no leſſe gladneſſe, than the Sun after a long Eclipse; and now his ſafe returning did both juſtify King James his judgment in ſuffering him to go, and the King of Spains juſtice, in ſuffering him to come back: and was cauſe, that the people began to have a better opinion of the Spaniſh faith, than they had before. But now it preſently breaks out, that this match with Spain could never take effect: for King James having received Declarations of the Articles touching the marriage, found many very ſtrict and large for the exerciſe of the Catholick Religion: but none at all for reſtitution of the Palatinate; which made him ſo much diſcontented, that he preſently brake off all Treaty of the marriage, and ſignified as much, not only to the King of Spain, but to divers other Princes of Chriſtendom: Upon which breach two great Points were preſently had in conſultation: One for preparing Forces, for recovering the Palatinate by way of Arms, which could not be done by a way of friendſhip: and for this purpoſe, a Council of war was called, and a propoſition reſolved on both of men and money, for undertaking the enterpriſe: as alſo a great contribution by way of benevolence was collected; towards which, the compiler of this work, gave himſelf fifty pounds: as many other far greater ſums, though the collection went not through the whole Land; by reaſon there was hope given of a peaceable reconciliation: ſo as many that were not over-haſty in their payments eſcaped without contributing at all. The other point was for providing a ſit Wife for the Prince, in ſome other place. It was ſaid the States of Holland offered a very great portion in marriage to the Prince, if he would match with ſome Lady of that Country, but matches are made in Heaven, and there was a young Lady of France deſtined to his bed: and for this purpoſe, the Earl of Carliſle, and the Earl of Holland were ſent into France, to treat of a marriage with the younger Daughter of the great Henry the fourth, King of France deceased, and Siſter to the preſent King Lewis; which marriage afterward took effect, but was not accompliſhed in King James his dayes, who died ſoon after the agreement.

I 623. A Call of fifteen Serjeants at Law.

It was now the year 1623, in which in Michaelmas Term, there was a Call of fifteen Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feaſt in the Middle Temple Hall. Two things in this Kings dayes grew to loſe their Luſtre. One the exerciſe of Tiltiſg, which in Queen Elizabeths time, was ſo much uſed, that no year paſſed without a ſpecial ſolemnity in that kinde. The other, the Band of Gentlemen Penſioners and Yeomen of the Guard: which in her time conſiſted of the choyceſt perſons both for ſtature and other good parts throughout the Realm; and was ſo great a grace to her Court, that no Prince of Chriſtendom could ſhew the like: but King James was ſo intentive to Realities, that he little regarded ſhews: and thereby both theſe in his time came utterly to be neglected: No ſolemnity

A ſolemnity of Arms but very rare, no regard had what perſons were admitted into the other places.

We may here obſerve, how the Surname of the Kings of England, hath at ſundry times been changed. From William the Conqueror, to King Henry the ſecond, what ſurname they had or whether they had any or no, is moſt uncertain: but then King Henry the ſecond brought in the French ſurname of Plantagenet: which continued in all the ſucceeding Kings, till King Henry the ſeventh; and he brought in the Welch ſurname of Tudor; which continued the ſurname of all the ſucceeding Princes; till King James the ſixth of Scotland: and he brought in the Scottiſh ſurname of Stewart: in which it is likely to continue, (and God grant it may do ſo) to the worlds end.

Some paſſages of ſmall moment I conſiſſe are omitted by me, in this Reign of King James; as whereof ſome I want of knowing the particulars; I dare not venture upon making the Relation: which if ſome men would have done, the Truth of our Chronicles ſhould not have been mingled with ſo many falſities.

Of his Taxations.

In his ſecond year, in the month of September, he ſent Privy Seals to the wealthieſt Citizens of London, for monies to be borrowed of them; and in October following, the Cuſtoms of Merchandizes, both outward and inward, were raiſed, and then were letten out to Farm. In a Parliament holden at Weſtmiſter, the third year of his Reign, there were given him three entire Subſidies, and fix Fifteens by the Temporality, and by the Clergy four entire Subſidies. This year alſo Henry Lord Mordant, convicted in the Star-chamber, for divers miſprifions, was fined to pay ten thouſand Marks, and Edward Lord Sturton for the like offence to pay thirty thouſand Pounds, and ſome years after Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court was fined to pay twenty thouſand Pounds. In his fourth year he repayed threeſcore thouſand pounds to the Citizens of London, which the Londoners lent to Queen Elizabeth, three years before her death; an act by which he got more love, than he payed money. In his ſeventh year he had paid throughout England, for making his eldeſt Son Prince Henry Knight: which though levied with great moderation, brought him in great ſums of money. In his eighteenth year, in a Parliament holden at Weſtmiſter, the Temporality gave him two Subſidies, and the Clergy three: and in another Parliament, in the year 1623, the Temporality gave him three Subſidies, and three Fifteens; the Clergy four Subſidies. Beſides theſe Subſidies he ſent abroad many Great Privy Seals, and had alſo a Benevolence throughout the Realm: not without ſome grudging, but without any juſt cauſe; for it ſhould have been remembered, that he took it not out of covetouſneſſe to gather wealth, but out of very neceſſity to ſupply plants: For by his employing many Embaſſadors in Ordinary, many Extraordinary, by his neceſſary bounty to his followers, and by his charge of keeping ſeverall Courts; none of all which he could avoid: his expences were far greater than any of his Predeceſſors had ever been.

The Cuſtoms of Merchandize raiſed.

Privy Seals ſent out, and alſo a Benevolence.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

THE day of his removing from Charter houſe, at his firſt coming into England, he cauſed a Proclamation to be made, that all Monopolies and Protections ſhould ceaſe; as likewiſe all oppreſſions done by Salt-Peter men, by Purveyers, and Carters. On the 26th of May following he ſet forth a Proclamation, reſtraining all perſons under great penalties from killing of Deer, or any kind of Fowl uſed for Hawking. The ſeventh of May, Proclamation was made againſt Robberies on the borders: and on the nineteenth of May, another for uniting the people inhabiting about the borders of England and Scotland, to live in love and quietneſſe. In this firſt year, in a Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, that neither Archbiſhop, nor Biſhop ſhould Alienate, Grant, or Demiſe, or in any ſort convey, no not to the King himſelf, any of the Honours, Lands, Teneſments, or Hereditaments, being parcell of the poſſeſſion of his Archbiſhop, or Biſhoprick: and if any were, it ſhould be utterly void, and of no effect, notwithstanding any former Law, Act, or Ordinance to the contrary. He then alſo cauſed himſelf by Proclamation to be enſtyled King of Great Britain, that the diſtinction of England and Scotland might be no more remembered. In his ſecond year, by his Letters Patents he incorporated the Felt-makers of London, by the name of the Felt-makers Wardens, and Commonalty of the Art or Myſterie of the Felt-makers, granting them divers priviledges and liberties, for their good government of their Corporation. In November, of his ſecond year, were Proclaimed in London certain new pieces of Coyn, both of gold and ſilver, with the true valuation and weights of them, according to the Mint of both Nations, Engliſh and Scottiſh. In a Parliament holden the third year of his Reign, the Oath of Allegiance was deviſed and ordained, and ſoon after miniſtered to all ſorts of people.

main top, the Red Crosse commonly called Saint Georges Crosse, and the White Crosse, commonly called St. Andrews Crosse joyned together, and the Subjects of South Britain should carry in their Foretop only the Red Crosse as they were wont; and the Subjects of North Britain only the White Crosse. In this fourth year on the tenth of June he set forth a Proclamation, commanding all Jesuits, Seminary Priests and Fryers to depart the Realm before the first of August following: and never to return upon pain of death, according to divers Statutes in that behalf provided. In his second year he had set forth a Proclamation against Inmates and encrease of new buildings, which being little regarded, now in his fourth year he renewed the said Proclamation, adding withall the Forefronts and windows of all new buildings should be either of Brick or Stone, for disobeying whereof, many were called in the Star-chamber, and there fined. In his fifth year, he gave order for planting of Mulberry Trees, and breeding of Silk-worms, that England might be a Country as well of Silk as Cloth. In his eleventh year, he instituted the Order of the Barronets, which hath much degenerated since his Institution, and thereby having been devised for the benefit of Ireland, hath caused but little contentment unto England. This year also the King himself in person came to the Star-chamber, where he had appointed the Mint-men to meet, and there, for the better keeping of Coyns of Gold within the Realm, he raised the prizes of them; ordaining the price called the Unity, which went before but for twenty shillings, to be current now for two and twenty, the double Crown and all other pieces to encrease in the like proportion. In his fifteenth year, he granted to the Apothecaries of London to be a Corporation for themselves, and their successors for ever; and by Letters Patents made them a Body Politick, and Corporate. In his time by his appointment a strict decree passed in the Star-chamber against Duels and single Combats, and a strict Law was made in Parliament against stabbing with a dagger or knife, making it to be a wilful Murder.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

THE King as a Religious Prince, desiring nothing so much as to settle Peace in the Church, and hearing of some dissensions of his Divines in point of Religion, in the very first year of his Reign, appointed a Conference to be holden before himself at Hampton Court, to which were called divers Bishops, Deans, and Doctors of one side, and of the other four eminent Divines, namely Doctor Reynolds, Doctor Sparks, Mr. Knewstubs, and Mr. Chadderton: who all meeting before the King, the 14th day of January: the King first signified the cause of his calling them together, and then told them he was there ready to hear, what they could object or say against the present Government of the Church; whereupon Dr. Reynolds being their Foreman, reduced all matters disliked, or questioned into these four Heads.

1. That the Doctrine of the Church might be preserved in purity, according to Gods Word.
2. That good Pastors might be planted in all Churches to preach the same.
3. That the Church Government might be sincerely administered, according to the Word of God.
4. That the Book of Common Prayer might be fitted to more encrease of Piety.

Out of these Heads, he drew and moved divers Points: One that Confirmation might not be by Bishops only, but that every Pastor in his Parish might Confirm: but this was thought to trench too much upon the Jurisdiction of Bishops, and to be a Rep to bring in a Presbyterian Government, which the King much disliked; and the Bishop of Winchester challenged Dr. Reynolds with all his learning to shew, where ever he had read, that Confirmation was at all used in ancient times, by any other than by Bishops. Another motion of Dr. Reynolds was, that there might be a new Translation of the Bible, because the present Translations were corrupt, and not answerable to the truth of the Original, whereof he alleged divers examples; particularly that in the 105. Psalm. 28.v. where it is said, They were not Obedient, when in the Original it is, They were not Disobedient: To this it was agreed, that a new Translation should be made: and accordingly soon after was performed by the most learned Divines of the Kingdom; and is that, which is now used. After many other Points moved by Dr. Reynolds, he came at last to subscription: Intreating it might not be exacted, as heretofore; which many good men refused for these reasons. First, because the Apocryphal Books are by the Common Prayer Book appointed to be read; albeit in some of them there are manifest errors, directly repugnant to the Scriptures. To this, the King himself answered, That as he would not wish all Canonical Books to be read in the Church, unless there were one to Interpret; so he would wish no Apocryphal to be read wherein was any error: but for the other which were clear and correspondent to the Scriptures, he would have them read, seeing there was good use of them, to make up the story of the Persecution of the Jews; but withall he would have the people be taught, they were not to teach a man, either to sacrifice to the dead, or to kill himself. The next scruple against subscription was, That in the Common Prayer Book, it is twice set down Jesus said to his Disciples, when by the Original Text it is plain He spake to the Pharisees. To which it was answered, that for any thing could be gathered by the place, he might speak as well to the one as to the other: But the King for more plainness sake, willed, that the word Disciples, should be omitted, and only the words, Jesus said, to be printed in a different letter, that it might appear to be no part of the Text.

Another

A Another scruple was, concerning the Crosse in Baptism, which Doctor Reynolds confessed to have ever been used since the Apostles time, at going abroad, or entering into the Church, or at their Prayers and Benedictions; but doubted of the ancient use of it in Baptism: to which the Bishop of Winchester answered, that in Constantine's time it was used in Baptism; and the Dean of Windsor shewed out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen and others, that in their time it was used in Immortali Lavacro: which could be nothing but Baptism: and this the King judged to be antiquity enough to warrant the continuance of it still. At last Master Knewstubs moved how far an Ordinance of the Church was to binde them, without impeachment of their Christian liberty? At which the King seemed much moved, and told him he would not argue that point with him, but answer therein as Kings are wont to speak in Parliament Le Roy s'aviserá; and therefore, I charge you (said he) never speak more to that point, how far you are bound to obey, when the Church hath once ordained it. Doctor Reynolds added, that the Crosse should be abandoned, because in the time of Popery it had been superstitiously abused. To which his Majesty answered, that his very reason was an inducement to him to have it retained still: For in as much as it was abused (so you say) so superstition in time of Popery, it doth plainly imply, that it was well used before Popery.

The next thing objected, was the wearing of the Surplice: to which the King answered, that seeing it appeared out of Antiquity, that in the celebration of Divine Service, a different habit appertained to the Ministry, and principally of the white Linnen; he saw no reason, but that in this Church, as it had been for comeliness and order sake, it might be still continued.

Last of all, Master Chadderton, and Master Knewstubs requested, that in regard of some tender Consciences, the Surplice and Crosse in Baptism, might not be urged: To which the King himself answered, If after the Gospels preaching five and forty years amongst you, there be any yet in these points unsatisfied, I doubt it it proceeds rather out of stubbornness of opinion, than out of tenderness of conscience; and therefore let them conform themselves, or else they shall hear further of it.

It was now observed, that in all their Objections, there was not a word spoken against Bishops, nor against the Ring in Marriage; for Dr. Reynolds himself confessed that the Ring was a very meek ceremony; and the King affirmed he should not think himself rightly married, if he had not been married with a Ring: And as for Bishops, he declared himself to be verily persuaded, they were Divine Ordinations, and most necessary to Monarchy; and would often say, No Bishop, no King. Many other points were handled, as about Predestination, Absolution, and Remission of sins, Baptizing by women, about the words in Marriage, With my body I thee worship, the Oath of Office, the high Commission and some other; in all which the King gave so good satisfaction, that they all joyntly promised to be quiet and obedient, now they knew it to be his mind to have it so: and the King was so admired for his excellent Resolutions and Answers, that the Archbishop of Canterbury said, undoubtedly his Majesty spake by the special assistance of Gods Spirit. After this Conference, the King in his second year set forth a Proclamation, to confirm the Ecclesiastical Government, and the Book of Common Prayer, in the form and estate as Queen Elizabeth left them.

After this he sent divers learned Divines into Scotland, to have a Conference with the Divines there; and if it might be, to reduce the two Kingdoms to an uniformity of Religion, as he brought them to an union of Possession. And now entering into consideration of this Title, of being Defender of the Faith: he conceived it might extend not only to his own Dominions, but in some sort to Neighbouring Countries: if not in Authority, at least in care: and hereupon bearing that the States of the Low-Countries were determined to entertain one Vorstius to be publick Professor of Divinity in Leyden, and knowing him, though otherwise a learned man, yet tainted with many erroneous opinions, concerning the Essence and Substance of God, making him to be Quale & quantum, changing Eternity into Eternity; teaching Eternity to consist of a number of Ages, and denying God to be Per se a se, but to have in some sort aliquid Diverfitatis, & Multiplicitatis in seipso, and by his Lieger, St. Ralph Winwood, by no means to admit the said Vorstius into that place; lest his doctrine having once infected their Country, might soon after spread it self into his Dominions. Which request of his, after much soliciting, the States at length granted, and expelled Vorstius from amongst them.

At this time a Synod was assembled at Dort in Holland, consisting of learned Divines, sent from the Count Palatin of the Rhine, from Hassia, from Zwitserland from the Church of Geneva, from Bern, Emden, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland and other Provinces: Some also sent from England, as namely, George Bishop of Landaff, John Davison and other Professors of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, Samuel Ward, Master of Sidney College in Cambridge, Thos. Good Dr of Divinity, and Walter Belcangull, a Scottish man Bachelor of Divinity: Which Synod was Assembled to examine and determine the Doctrine of Arminius, first concerning Gods Predestination, Election, and Reprobation; then concerning Christs death and Mans redemption by it; then concerning Mans corruption and conversion to God; then concerning the perseverance of the Saints: In all which points the doctrine of Arminius was rejected, as also of Vorstius, and the true Doctrine by a general consent, together with the Approbation of the Lords the States, which yet the Papists made so little reckoning of; that one of them in scorn, made Echo to censure it in this Distich:

Conventus? Venus. Sessio Stramen? Armin.

But

But who knows not, that ill will never spake well, and that nothing is so obvious in the mouth of an adversary, as scandals and inventions?

Antonius de Dominis Archbishop of Spalato comes into England, and sets forth Books for the Protestant Religion.

After five years stay here he retracted all, and went to Rome, but dyed there in prison.

John Trask for holding diverse Judicial opinions is censured and after three years recants.

George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, by misfortune killing a man is Censured.

In the year 1616, May Antonius de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, in the Territory of Venice, came into England, leaving his Country (as he affirmed) for Religion; whereof he set forth in writing many reasons, and being thereupon entertained by the Archbishop of Canterbury, was afterward made Dean of Windsor, and Master of the Survey, in which time he published publicly divers times before divers Lords of the Council, printed in London the first four of his ten Books, Intituled Of the Common-wealth of the Church: wherein with great earnestness he maintained the Doctrine and Discipline of the Protestants: But after all this, whether all he had done was but dissimbling from the beginning, or whether out of remorse of conscience, he repented him of that he had done: after five years staying here, he retracted all he had said or written before, which so incensed King James, that he commanded him (within three days at his perill) to depart the Realm: who thereupon went to Rome, and there inveighed as bitterly against the Protestants, as he had done in England against the Papists, hoping at least for Pardon, if not for Pardonment: but notwithstanding his Recantation, according to the Law of the Inquisition, having once Revolved, (though now Returned) he suffered the death of an Heretick, though not the shame, had the punishment of a Martyr, but not the honour; and was publicly burnt at Rome, yet not burnt alive, but dying in prison and then buried, it is said, his body was afterwards taken up and burned.

In the Kings tenth year, two obstinate Arian Hereticks, Bartholomew Legat and Edw. Wighman, were burnt for Heresie, Legat in Smithfield, and Wighman at Lichfield.

In his sixteenth year, one John Trask a pretended Minister, was Censured in the Star-chamber, for depraving the Ecclesiastical Government, and for holding divers Judaical Opinions; as, that it was not lawful to do any thing forbidden in the old Law, nor to keep the Christian Sabbath, for which he was lat on the Pillory at Westminster, and from thence whipt to the Fleet, and there to remain prisoner: but three years after he writ a Recantation of all his former Heresies and Schismatical Opinions.

In this Kings fifth, George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, being a hunting in a Park, and shooting a Deer, his arrow by mischance glanced and kill'd a man: upon which fact it was much debated, Whether by it he were not become irregular, and ought to be deprived of his Archiepiscopall Jurisdiction, as having his hands imbrued (though against his will) in blood: but Andrews Bishop of Down standing much in his defence, as likewise St. Henry Martin, the Kings advocate, gave such reasons in mitigation of the fact, that he was cleared from all imputation of crime; and thereupon adjudged Regular, and in state to continue his Archiepiscopall charge: yet himself (out of a religious tenderness of conscience) kept the day of the year, in which the mischance happen'd, with a solemn Fast, all his life after.

Works of Piety done by this King, or by other in his time.

Structures of Piety King James made none at all, nor many of magnificence, only the great Banqueting House at White-hall; a wall of Brick about his Park at Greenwich, another at Theobalds, and some little buildings at Royston, and such like. His greatest charity was expressed by largesses and Pensions: as first where the Gentlemen of his Chappel, being 33 in number, had by largesse then but 30 pounds a year fee, he made it up 40. Then he enlarged the Pensions of his Alms Knights of Windsor, being 13 in number, from twelve pence a day to two shillings. Then as he increased his number of the Yeomen of the Guard, from seven score to two hundred, so he increased their Pensions, from two shillings a day, for three months in the Summer, to seven groats a day for six months in the Summer. Then, where at his coming, he found but only four Judges in the Courts of Law at Westminster, he added a fifth, with the like allowance as the former had; besides many other Pensions of like nature. But the works of Piety done by others in his time, were very many: whereof we may justly set in the first place, the repairing of Pauls Church, begun in his time, though not finished till many years after; a work of as great cost and labour, as the first founding of it: towards the furtherance whereof though many well devoted persons contributed liberally, yet none was more industrious, than the learned Doctor Laud, first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canterbury, who also was a bountifull Benefactor to the Colledge of Saint Johns in Oxford, where he had his Education. Next to him his Predecessor next before him, the worthy George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a fair Almshouse at Guilford in Surrey where he was born, as likewise Robert the second Earl of Darley, founded another in Sussex; to the maintenance whereof, he gave Lands to the value of three hundred pounds a year. But of all the Almshouses that were ever founded in Christendom, there is none I think can parallel that of Thomas Sutton Esquire. This man born at Snayth in Lincolnshire, having always lived a Bachelor, and by sundry employments, and parcimony, being grown to great wealth, bought of the right Honourable, Thomas Earl of Suffolk, his Mansion-house, called the Charter-house, near to Smithfield in London, and out of a pious mind converted it into an Almshouse, by the name of Suttons Hospital, endowing the same with above three thousand pounds of yearly rent; wherein are maintained fourscore poor men, with convenient lodging, diet, and allowance of money for apparel: also forty poor children with the like provision, provision, and a Grammar School, with a Master and Usher to teach them: over all whom, he ordained a learned man to be Master of the household, and to be chosen by the Governours, whom he appointed for the present, by the Authority of the Kings Letters Patents, to be George Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Lord Elmore Lord Chancellor, Robert Earl of Salisbury, Lord Treasurer, John Bishop of London, Lancelot Bishop of Ely, St. Edward Cook, chief Justice of the Common Pleas, St. Thomas Foster, Judge of the Common Pleas, St. Henry Hubbard, the Kings Attorney General, Doctor Overall Dean of Pauls, Doctor Mountain Dean of Westminster, Henry Thurstle Esquire, Master of the Chancery, Richard Sutton Esquire, Auditor of the Imprests, Jessy Nightingall Esquire, John Low Gentleman, Thomas Brown Gentleman, and Master of the Household for the time being, to be always one: and as any of these sixteen Governours should die, the Survivers to make present addition of others. Next to this was a fair College in Oxford founded by Nicholas Wilbe Esquire, and called after his name. About this time also Edward Allen of Dulwich in Surrey founded a fair Hospital at Dulwich for six poor men, and six poor women, and for twelve poor children, from the age of four or six years, to be there maintained and taught till the age of fourteen or sixteen, and to have a Schoolmaster with dyer, and a convenient stipend. This man may be an example, who having gotten his wealth by Stage-playing converted it to this pious use, not without a kind of reputation to the Society of Players. In this Kings time also William Camden, King at Arms, founded an History professor in Oxford, to which he gave the Manor of Bexley in Kent, which some years expired, will be worth four hundred pounds a year. In his tenth year St. Baptist Hick, one of the Justices of Peace in Middlesex, who was afterward made Viscount Camden, built a fair Sessions house of Brick and Stone in St. Johns street, which by the Justices was called after his name Hicks Hall, a great convenience for the Justices; who late before in a common Inne called the Castle. He also founded a fair Hospital of free stone, at Camden in Gloucestershire, for six men and six women, allowing each of them a yearly Gown, and two shillings six pence a week, with two rooms and a Garden. In this Kings time, George Patyn Citizen and Grocer of London, gave to good uses, three thousand and six hundred pounds, whereof twelve hundred pounds to the two Universities, nine hundred pounds for an Almshouse, and a certain sum of money to buy two Bells, and make a Chime in Bow Church. Also Thomas Tesdale of Glympton in the County of Oxford Gentleman, gave five thousand pounds to purchase lands, for perpetual maintenance of seven Fellows, and six Schollars, to be placed at Baylyoll in Oxford, and to be chosen thither from time to time, out of the Free School of Abington in Berkshire: to which School he also gave lands for the maintenance of an Usher. In this Kings time also, St. Marmaduke Darrell, being Lord of Fulmer, being a Town in Buckinghamshire, where was an old ruinous Church, standing a mile distant from the Town, pulled down that old Church, and at his own charge builded a fair new one in the Town, and furnished it with a Font, a Pulpit, and all Ornaments necessary. Also Thomas Watson of Halfstead, in the County of Kent, Esquire, new builded a fair Chappel on the North side of the Parish Church of Halfstead, of Freestone from the ground, and gave to the Church four new Bells, and two Pulpits. In his time also Doctor Alymer Bishop of London, and Elizabeth Countesse Dowager of Shrewsbury, gave certain sums of money towards the better maintenance of Sermons at Pauls Cross: As likewise Thomas Russell Draper gave ten pounds a year for ever, to be given to unbenefficed Ministers, that should preach there: and to the same use, George Bishop Stationer of London, gave ten pounds a year more. In this Kings time also, the Citizens of London new builded Algate, where pulling down the old Gate, they found many ancient Roman Coyns.

John Whiggis Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a fair Almshouse in Croydon. On the thirtieth of June, 1614, dyed Henry Earl of Northampton, who built from the ground a house near Charing Cross; and dying, was buried in the ancient Chappel of Dover Castle, who in his life time founded three fair Hospitals, and endowed them with large maintenance for ever, one at Ryding in Norfolk for twelve poor women and a Governesse, a second at Clun in Shropshire, for twelve poor men and a Governor: The third at Greenwich in Kent, for a Governor and twenty poor Almshouses. In this Kings time also, Master Robert Dows of London Merchant, gave a competent maintenance for ever, unto Sepulchers Parish, for the tolling of the great Bell, and for finding some Divine to come to the prison of Newgate, the midnight before Execution, and there to ring a hand Bell, and to put the prisoners in mind of their approaching death, with a Christian remembrance and exhortation; and the next morning to toll the great Bell, from six a clock till ten, and then to ring it out when the Execution should be past. He also established a free singing School, in Christs Hospital: for the better education of the poor children there: besides many other good deeds of Alms. About the same time Robert Peake of London Goldsmith, gave to Sepulchers Church a Communion Table of two yards long, and three quarters and a half broad, richly guilded over, and at every corner inboist with plates of silver. In this Kings fourteenth year, William Jones of London Merchant, gave about eight thousand pounds to found a Free School in Wales, where he was born, with Almshouses and Pensioners in London; and a hundred pound a year for ever to a learned Preacher in London, ordaining all things to be ordered by the Company of Haberdashers, whereof himself was free. This year also the old ruinous gate called Aldersgate was taken quite down, and new builded from the foundation, towards the building whereof, William Parker, Merchant-Taylor of London, gave a thousand pounds. In this Kings time also, was erected a building near to Chelsey, with a purpose to be a College for Divines to study the controversies of Religion, but upon second thoughts, the

Of his Death and Buriall.

OF his death, there were many scandalous rumors spread, and some were so impudent, as to write that he was poysoned, as the Duke of Richmond, and the Marquess Hamilton had been before: but King James being dead, and his body opened, there was found no sign at all of poyson, his inward parts being all sound, but that his Spleen was a little faulty, which might be cause enough to cast him into an Ague: the ordinary high way, especially in old bodies, to a naturall death: of this Ague after a moneths languishing, notwithstanding all the remedies that could be applied, he departed this life at Theobalds, on the 27th of March, in the year 1625, in the 59th of his age, when he had Reigned two and twenty years compleat; His body for the greater State, was conveyed by Torch light, from Theobalds to Denmark house, who having rested from the 23<sup>d</sup> of April, to the 7th of May, it was carried to Westminster, and there interred in the Chappel Royal with great solemnity, but with greater lamentation: there being scarce any of the infinite multitude that was present, of whom it might not be said,

Of Men of note in his time.

Military Men of Note, in a time of Peace, as the whole Reign of King James was, we have no reason to expect; yet if we look amongst the Voluntaries that went to the School of War in the Low-Countries; we shall finde a pair of brothers, that may stand in comparison with the greatest souldiers in the most Martial times, St Francis Vere, who as another Hannibal, with his one eye, could see more in the Martial Discipline, than common men can do with two, and St Horatio Vere, who as another Philopamen, contained in a very little body, a very great both skill and courage. But for men of Note in Learning, as being in the time of a most learned Prince, there was never greater store; of whom these for example. In curiousness of Preaching, there was Doctor Andrews Bishop of Winchester; who hath left to posterity, a Century of such golden Sermons, that shews, he as well deserved the name of Chrysostom, as he that had it. In multiplicity of Reading, there was Doctor Reynolds of Corpus Christi College in Oxford, who seemed as it were, a living Library; and one would have thought his Memory to be a perfect Index of all the Books had ever been written. In knowledge of Law there was St Edward Coke, Chief Justice of the Kings Bench; who hath written such excellent Commentaries of the Law, that he seems as another Bartholus or Baldus amongst us. In Elegancy of writing, there was St Francis Bacon Viscount Saint Albans, who besides his profound Books of Novum Organum, hath written the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, in so sweet a style, that like Manna, it pleaseth the tast of all palats. In the skill of Antiquities, there was William Camden, King at Arms; who hath set forth the Description of Britain, and the life of Queen Elizabeth in so lively colours, that he seems to have brought Britain out of darkness into light, and to keep Queen Elizabeth alive after death. And to speak it in a word, the Trojan Horse was not fuller of Heroick Grecians, than King James his Reign was full of men excellent in all kinds of Learning. And here I desire the Reader leave to remember two of my own old acquaintance, the one was Mr John Dunne, who leaving Oxford, lived at the Innes of Court, nor dissolute, but very neat; a great Visiter of Ladies, a great frequenter of Playes, a great writer of conceited Verses; untill such time as King James taking notice of the pregnancy of his Wit, was means that he betook him to the study of Divinity, and thereupon proceeding Doctor, was made Dean of Pauls; and became so rare a Preacher, that he was not only commended, but even admired by all that heard him. The other was Henry Wootton, (mine old acquaintance also, as having been fellow pupils, and chamber fellows in Oxford divers years together.) This Gentleman was employed by King James in Embassage to Venice; and indeed the Kingdom afforded not a fitter man, for matching the Capriciousness of the Italian Wits: a man of so able dexterity with his Pen, that he hath done himself much wrong, and the Kingdom more, in leaving no more of his Writings behinde him.

Of the English Plantations in the Indies, that were in King JAMES his time.

AND now we are come to a time, wherein we may very near say as much of King James, as was said of Augustus Caesar: Super & Garamanis & Indos proficere Imperium. In this better, that where Augustus did it by the violent way of Arm, King James did it by the civil way of Plantations: for in his days began the great plantation of the English in the Indies; and must be acknowledged the proper effect of his peaceable Government. The first Plantation

A of the English in the Indies, was that which is now called Virginia, in memory of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth: but called before Wingandacon. It was first discovered by St Walter Rawleigh, in the year 1584; to whom the first Letters Patents were granted for making a Plantation there: but yet no Colony was sent thither, till the year 1606. It is a Country in America, between the degrees of 34 and 45 of the North Latitude: but that part of it which is planted by the English, is under the Degrees of 37, 38, and 39. It is no Island, as many have imagined, but a part of the Continent adjoining to Florida. The first and chief Town made here by the English, is called James Town, in honour of the Kings most excellent Majesty. It is a Country abounding with all sorts of Fish and Fowl; so fruitful, that it yeelds thirty and sometimes forty Bushels of Corn upon an Acre; and that, (which is to us more strange) hath three harvests in a year, the Corn being sowed, ripe and reaped, in little more then two moneths. Many plantations had been attempted here before, but came to nothing: the first to any purpose was in the year 1607, under the conduct of Captain Gosnold, John Smith, and Mr. Edward Maria Winkfield, who carried a Colony thither of a hundred persons; but of these, many dying of sickness or slain by the Savages, a new supply came in the year 1608 of a hundred and twenty persons, under the conduct of Captain Nilson. After which, was sent another supply of three score and ten persons; and in the year 1609, a third supply came of five hundred persons, under a Patent granted to St Thomas West, Lord de la Ware, but conducted thither by St Thomas Gates, St George Summers, and others. In the year 1611, was a fourth supply of three hundred men under the conduct of St Thomas Gates. In the year 1612, two other supplies were sent of forty men in each, and now was the Lottery spoken of before granted by the King, for further supplies of this Plantation. After this, Master Samuel Argall being appointed Governour in the year 1618, the Lord de la Ware came thither with a supply of two hundred people; but in his stay there dyed: After this in the year 1620, were sent thither eleven Ships, with twelve hundred and sixteen persons, and now they founded themselves into Corporations: in the year 1621, St Francis West was sent thither Governour, with thirteen hundred men, women, and children, and now they founded Schools, and Courts of Justice; and the Plantation was extended a hundred and forty miles up, on the River of both sides. But now when the English were secure, and thought of nothing but peace, the Savages came suddenly upon them, and slew of them three hundred and seven and forty men, women, and children. For repairing of which losse, the City of London sent presently over a supply of a hundred men. This massacre happened, by reason they had built their Plantations remote from one another, in above thirty severall places, which made them now upon consultation, to reduce them all to five or six places, whereby they may better assist each other: since which time they have always lived in good security. And thus much for Virginia.

Next was the Plantation of the Island called Bermudas, so called of a Spanish Ship, called Bermudas which was there cast away, carrying Hogs to the West-Indies, that swam a shoar, and there increased. The first English man that entered this Isle, was one Henry May in the year 1591, but in the year 1610, St George Somers was sent thither, who dying there, in memory of his name, the Isles have ever since been called Somers Isles. In the year 1612, one Mr Moor landed there with 50 persons, and then builded the chief Town there called St Georges, together with 8 or 9 Forts. The same year a supply of 30 more persons was sent thither, and the year after 60 more, under one Mr Bartley, with a shew to survey the land; but with a purpose indeed to get from thence a great lump of Amber-greece, and no lesse than 80 pound weight, that had been found and taken up in the Island some few years before, and was there still retained. A while after this came a Ship called the Blessing, with a 100 passengers; and two days after came the Star, with 180 more; and within 14 days after that again came thither the Margaret and two Frigates, with 130 passengers: so as now they began to divide the Countrey into Tribes, and the Tribes into shares. In the year 1616, Captain Daniel Tucker was sent from Virginia to be Governour there, and now it began indeed to be a Plantation; for now they began to build them houses: and now was sent from thence into England, a Ship freighted with 30000 weight of Tobacco, valued there but at 25 6d the Pound, though sold here oftentimes for Verino's at great rates. In the year 1619, Captain Nathaniel Butler was sent Governour with new supplies, in whose time they builded them a Church; held Assizes for Criminal causes, twice a year, and began to have Parliaments as in England: and now in the Ship called the Mazarin, came divers Gentlemen of good fashion, with their wives and families: so as now their number was no fewer than fifteen hundred people, dispersed twenty miles in length. In the year 1622, came Governour Mr John Bernard, bringing with him a supply of 140 persons; but he and his wife dying presently upon their coming, Mr John Harrison in the year 1623, was chosen Governour. These Isles of Bermudas are in 32 degrees of Northern latitude: so as they are distant from Virginia, at least 500 leagues, and from England above three thousand three hundred. This Countrey is of a most healthfull air, abounding with all sorts of Fowls, Birds and Fish; and where great pieces of Amber-greece are oftentimes found, which is valued there at no lesse than three pounds an ounce. And thus much concerning the state of Bermudas, till the year 1624.

Next comes the Plantation of New-England, concerning which, we must first know, that King James in the year 1606, granted two Letters Patents for Plantations in Virginia, one to the City of London; another to the City of Bristol, Exeter and Plimmouth, with power to plant Colonies any where between the Degrees of 38 and 44, provided there should be at least a 100 miles distance between the two Colonies. So as the first Colony was from the City of London,

London, and is that which is called Virginia. The second Colony was from Bristow and the other Towns, and is that which is now called New-England, and is situate between the degrees of 41 and 45: the very mean betwixt the North Pole and the Line. And now to speak a little of the Countrey, there are on the Sea coast, 25 excellent good Harbours, in some whereof there is Anchorage for 500 sail of Ships of any burthen. The Earth is fruitful, and the Air as healthfull, as any part of the World: abounding with all sorts of Grain, Fowls and Fish: Many of such kinds as are to us unknown, yet excellent meat: Many Voyages had been made for the perfect discovery of the Countrey: Many attempts for settling a Plantation there: Many Misadventures and Disasters in making the attempts: but all at last came to this, that in the year 1624 (which is the limit of our Narration) there was a Plantation settled, though but a small one: but a few years after (by the sending forth of new supplies) encreased to so many thousands, that if God continue to prosper it, as he hath begun, the New-England in a few ages may prove as populous as the Old; and the King of England likely to have as many and greater Crowns in the Indies than he had in his Realms of Great Britain and Ireland. But seeing of these and all other English Plantations in the Indies, whereof there are many; large discourses are written by divers Auliers, it should be more than superfluous to speak more of them in this place: It is sufficient to have shewed that King James had the honour, to have them settled in his time, and under the influence of his peaceable Government.

Of the Earls and Barons made by King JAMES.

IN former Kings Reigns, the making of Earls and Barons was but rare, and therefore they are fitly set down, at the severall times of their making; but in King James his Reign, there were so many made, that it may not be unfit, to set them down in a Catalogue together.

In his first year were made four Earls and nine Barons: namely, Henry Howard, younger brother of the last Duke of Norfolk, was made Earl of Northampton: Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst, was made Earl of Dorset; and shortly after Charles Blunt Lord Mounjoy, was made Earl of Devonshire, and Thomas Howard Baron of Walden, was made Earl of Suffolk: Henry Grey was made Lord Grey of Groby, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Stanford) Henry Danvers was made Baron of Danby, (afterwards by King Charles made Earl of Danby) St John Peter of Essex, was made Baron of Writtle: St William Russel was made Baron of Thornhaugh: St Thomas Grad was made Baron of Gerards Bromley in Staffordshire: St Robert Spencer was made Baron of Wormelayton in the County of Warwick: St Thomas Egerton was made Baron of Elsmere: and St Robert Cecil was created Baron of Henden in Rutlandshire; and St John Harington was made Baron of Exton.

In his third year on the 4th of May, were created three Earls, and one Viscount, and four Barons; namely, St Robert Cecil Viscount Cranburn, was created Earl of Salisbury: St Thomas Cecil his elder brother Lord Burghley, was created Earl of Exeter; and St Philip Herbert, younger brother to the Earl of Pembroke, was created Earl of Montgomery: Robert Sidney Baron of Penbroke, was created Viscount of Liste: St John Stanhope, was made Baron of Harington: St George Carew, Baron of Clopton: Mr Thomas Arundell of Devonshire, Baron of Wardour; and Mr William Cavendish, Baron of Hardwick.

In his thirteenth year, on the 29th of June, St James Hay of Scotland was created Baron of Sawley, and about three years after, was made Viscount Doncaster, and St Robert Dormer was created Baron of Wyng, (afterward by King Charles was made Earl of Carnarvan.)

In his fourteenth year, on the 9th of July, St John Hollis Knight, was created Haughton of Haughton in the County of Nottingham, and St John Roper of Kent, was made Baron of Tenham: and on the 17th of August, St George Villiers was created Baron of Wbadden, and Viscount Villiers, and on the 7th of November, Thomas Egerton Lord Elsmere, was created Viscount Brackley, and he dying soon after, his Son John was created Earl of Bridgewater; William Lord Knowles was created Viscount Wallingford; and St Philip Stanhope was created Baron of Shelford: On the 5th of Jan, the Viscount Villiers was created Earl of Buckingham, and on the third of March, St Edw. Noell of Rutlandshire, was made Baron of Ryddlington.

of Buckingham, and on the 12th of July, St Francis Bacon Lord Chancellor of England, was created Baron of Verulam, and not long after Viscount Saint Albans. Also in the Summer of this year, the King created four Earls and one Countesse: namely the Viscount Liste was made Earl of Leicester, the Lord Compton was made Earl of Northampton, the Lord Rich was made Earl of Warwick, the Lord Cavendish was made Earl of Devonshire, and the Lady Compton wife to St Thomas Compton, and mother of the Marquess of Buckingham was created Countesse of Buckingham.

In his sixteenth year, on the 25th of November, St John Digby Vicechamberlain to the King, was created Baron of Sherburn, by Patent to him and his heirs Males.

In his seventeenth year, in the month of June, Esme Steward Lord of Aubigny, younger brother to the Duke of Lenox, was created Earl of March; James Marquess Hamillon was created Earl of Cambridge, and St John Villiers brother to the Marquess of Buckingham was created Baron of Stock and Viscount Pinbeck.

In his eighteenth year, William Cavendish was created Viscount Mansfield. (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Newcastle) and on Munday the fourth of December, St Henry Montague, being first made Lord Treasurer, was created Baron of Kimbolton, and Viscount Mandeville, and not long after, Earl of Manchester, and St John Ramsey Viscount Haddington of Scotland was created Earl of Holmerrasse, and William Fielding was created Baron of Newham, and Viscount Fidling.

In his nineteenth year, Henry Cary was made Lord Cary of Leppington, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Monmouth) St Edward Montague elder brother to the Viscount Mandeville was made Baron of Boulton, the Lord Darce of Essex, was created Viscount Cotchester. (afterward by King Charles made Earl Ryvers) the Lord Humdon was created Viscount Rochford, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Dover) St Lyonell Cranfield, Master of the Wards, was created Baron Cranfield in Bedfordshire, and St Thomas Howard, second son to Thomas Earl of Suffolk, was created Baron of Charleton, and Viscount Andover, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Barkshire.)

In his twentieth year, in the month of September, the Viscount Doncaster, was created Earl of Carle, the Viscount Fielding was created Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Digby was made Earl of Bristol, the Lord Cranfield was created Earl of Middlesex, and St Henry Rich was made Baron of Kynghston.

In his one and twentieth year, the Marquess of Buckingham, being then in Spain with Prince Charls, had his Patent sent him to be Duke of Buckingham; William Grey was created Baron of Wark, Elizabeth the widow of St Moyle Finch of Kent, was created Viscountesse Maidstone, (afterward by King Charles made Countesse of Winchelsey.)

In his two and twentieth year, the Earl of Clanriccard of Ireland, was created Viscount Tunbridge in Kent, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Saint Albans.) St John Hollis Knight, Baron Haughton of Haughton was created Earl of Clare, St Henry Rich Baron of Kensington was created Earl of Holland, the Lord Fines, Baron of Say and Seale, was made Viscount Say and Seale: St Francis Fane was created Earl of Westmerland, Oliver Lord St John of Blisbo, was made Earl of Bullinbrook, St Christopher Villiers brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was made Earl of Anglesey, and St James Ley was made Lord Lee (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Marlborough.) Also this year, St Francis Leak was made Baron of Deincourt, and St Richard Roberts was made Lord Roberts of Truro in Cornwall.

And this was the number of all the Earls and Barons made by King James; but in his time also began another sort of Nobility to be made in England, which had none of the privileges of English Barons, but had only Title to be called Lords, of some place either in England or Ireland, although they possessed not a foot of Land in either: Of which sort, the number being great, I forbear to rehearse them, lest I should be tedious, or otherwise be thought to encroach too much upon the Heralds office. It is sufficege to have shewed, that King James advanced so many in honour, that in a kinde it might be said of him, as was said of Augustus Caesar, That he left Rome of Marble, which he found but of Brick.

THE REIGN OF KING CHARLES.

ING James being deceased on the 27 day of March in the Forenoon, the same day in the Afternoon, Charles, Prince of Wales, his only Son then living, was proclaimed King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, with the general Acclamation of all sorts of People, as being a Prince of admirable Endowments both of Mind and Body. He was now about the Age of 25 years, whereof, the most part of one he had spent in Spain; where, although he was frustrated of the end for which he went, yet it gave him a tincture of Travell and Experience, more worth perhaps, than the end he went for: For by this means he attained to a greater degree of that, which made Ulysses so famous.

The first thing he did after his Coronation, and the Ceremonies of his Fathers Funerall (in which he himself in person followed as chief Mourner, immediately after the Hearse, having his Train of black Velvet, borne up by twelve Peers of the Realm; and at his right hand the Earl of Arundel, at his left the Earl of Pembroke.) Was to proceed in the Marriage agreed upon in his Fathers time, with the beautiful and virtuous Lady Henrietta Maria, younger Daughter of the Great Henry the Fourth, King of France: After which Marriage, we have only to say, that he was happy in the Wife of his Bosome, happy in his hopefull Issue, happy in the Love of his People, happy in the Peace and Tranquillity of his Kingdoms, and happy in the continuance of all these Happineffes, for fifteen years together, and might have so continued still, if it had not been for

But of that which happened afterward, I dare not take upon me to be a Register; Neither is it indeed safe to begin a Narration, which I must be fain to break off in amazement, as having nothing left me to say, but, Omnia in malum ruere: and so far from any appearance of humane remedy, that our only Anchor must be this; In se Domine speramus, non confundamur in aeternum: Quid enim nisi vota supersunt? Yet our hope is, It will be but a fit, and the storm once past, fair Weather again, and fairer perhaps then it was before, and then with Joy we shall resume our Stile,

Latumque choro Panna canemus.

In the mean time, comforting our selves with the words of the Prophet David; Many are the troubles of the Righteous, but the Lord delivers him out of them all.

Carolus in Rex magnus in armis, major inermis.
Quid mirum? Imperio magnus, amore magis.

Thus far Sir Richard Baker, an elegant and acute Writer, hath deduc'd the History of England, from the very beginning of the Romans Government in this Nation; having brought us to the very Threshold or Entrance of King Charles his Reign, and there left us; though intending, as it seems, had the success of things been answerable to his expectation, and the storm blowing over, been followed, by a Calm and Halcyon Season, to have proceeded unto the end thereof: and it were to be wish'd, that he who wish to happy a Career had travel'd through a History so full of variety, and fraught with so many great and memorable passages, had also brought it down to the very close, and finish the Catastrophe of this Tragedy: but if the lowering Menaces of the Storm he speaks of, induc'd him to break off in amusement, expecting the return of fair Weather, and better Days; no wonder if the sad and fatal Effects it afterwards produc'd, forc'd him to abandon all thoughts of resuming his Style. This task therefore I rather by others sollicitation, than my own choice, have undertaken, though not without some reluctance, as both distrustful my Ability to keep up the Reputation of the History, coming after so judicious and well receiv'd an Author, and toucht with the same sense of the deplorable and unhappy passages I shall come at last to deliver, Infandum adigor renovare dolorem: but since it is necessary, that all Occurrences should be equally known and transmitted to Posterity, as well those which have the smiling Aspect of Prosperity, as those which founding nought but misery and calamity, may be less graceful in the relation: I here recommend to the general View, a faithful account of what ever hapned observable in this Kings Reign, which I may safely say, affords no less variety and wonder, then the Reign of any former King, either of this, or of any other Nation: and what ever I may haply want of our Authors Style, and prudent Conduct; I hope I shall not be thought to come far short in Truth and Impartiality of the Relation, it having been my intention neither on the one hand, out of a fawning Assentation, to resolve the crying up of all things acted by the prevailing power; nor on the other, to be over frequent in censuring or casting satyrical Reflections upon the degraded Party, (though never could it have been done more excusably then now, considering the justice of his Majesty's Government, and the grand Enormities of the late Usurpation); since every Action, according to the nature thereof, whether good or bad, either commends it self, or proclaims its guilt without any Comment, which doth but forestall the Readers Judgment, which naturally inclines to censure the actions of great Men in Power, especially in matters so notorious as become liable to the censure of all men; as, when it shall be read by future Generations, that the most virtuous Prince of the World was brought to a violent and untimely end by his own Subjects. My business therefore shall be impartially, and as near to truth as my utmost search can discover, to lay down matter of Fact, and then let the World judge whether side were most to be charged with the Blood spilt in the late Wars, when, through the whole course of this present History, the Intercourse of Messages between the late King and his two Houses, shall be well mark'd and weigh'd; his Majesties Concessions on the one Hand, their Demands on the other: And how glorious a Reformation (the thing given out to be fought for) succeeded after His being remov'd out of the way, in so deplorable manner.

The Introduction to the History you have already had from Sir Richard Baker himself; of that which next immediately follows, you may now proceed to the perusal.

IN prosecution of the Marriage, the King having sent over an Emissary to Lewis the Thirteenth, then King of France (as he did to other Princes in Amity with him) to give notice of his Fathers decease; he order'd also Letters of Procuration or Proxy, to the Duke of Chevreux, of the House of Guise, his near Kinsman, as being lineally descended from Clandins of Esraime, Father-in-law to James the Fifth of Scotland.

The Duke of Chevreux therefore, as the Kings Proxy, Espoused her on Sunday, May the first, according to our stile; the Espousals were performed by Cardinal Richelieu, notwithstanding that the Office was desir'd and claim'd by the Arch-bishop of Paris, from whose Palace the young Queen was conducted in solemn Pomp, by the King, Queen, and Nobles of France (the Duke of Chevreux in a rich black Suit, lin'd with Cloath of Gold, and beset with Diamonds, being attended on each hand by the King of Englands Ambassadors, the Earls of Carlisle, and Holland, both attir'd in beaten Silver) to the Church of Nostre Dame, before the Front of which, was erected a Theater, where, under a Canopy of State, the Queen of England was deliver'd up to the Duke of Chevreux, in behalf of King Charles, by her two Brothers, the King of France, and the Monsieur Gaston, Duke of Orleans: thence they went to the Church, where their Service was performed; after which the English Ambassadors came to the Door of the Quire, and took their places: then the whole Company, in the same order they came, return'd back to the great Hall of the Archbishops Palace; where a splendid Entertainment was prepared for them at the middle of the Table; under a Canopy sat the King of France, at his left hand the Queen of Great Britain, at his right, the Queen-Mother, next the Queen of England, sat the Duke of Chevreux, and next him the Earls of Carlisle and Holland.

As soon the Nuptial Solemnities were past, her Majesty prepared for England; for whose more honourable conveyance, the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earls of Carlisle, Holland, and Montgomery, cross'd the Seas, and came to Paris: hence after a convenient stay for interchanging of reciprocal Adieus, the royal B. ide, accompanied with her Mother, younger Brother, Duke and Duchesse of Chevreux, and other Persons of eminent Quality, besides the fore-mentioned English Attendants, set forwards for Amiens, where for a Fortnight (space she received Princely Entertainment, and then took leave of her Mother, who was there attacked with a violent sickness, which stopp'd her further journeying. From Amiens the Queen with the rest of her Company pass'd on to Bologne (for Calais was then infected) at which place she found ready for her reception the Royall Fleet of 21 Ships sent from her Spouse, with a noble Convey of the Countess of Buckingham, and

The Duke of Chevreux as King Charles Proxy, Espouses the Queen in France.

She prepares for England.

An honourable Train of Ladies. It will be needless to relate what Garb'd the old Countess did there receive for her Sons sake; as A personal Visit from the Monsieur at her own Lodging, and the precedence given upon her by a too civil Complement of the great Dutchess of Chevreux. And now Monsieur takes leave of his Sister, who presently set sail for England, and arriv'd safe at Dover, notwithstanding the Tempestuous turbulence of the Sea, which then seem'd to portend her future felicity.

The King himself was come thither from Canterbury to greet his long desired Consort, at which meeting, both Parties were wondrously surpris'd: he to find his Queens Beauty and Stature (to his joy) incredibly amended since his first view of her at Paris; (she to see her self (hitherto free) now in the power and subjection of another. But these Relelements being over, their Majesties began to think of their Journey to Canterbury, where their Nuptials were in most stately manner accomplished: And the Duke of Chevreux, in his Sovereigns Name, surrendered up his Charge to the British Monarch. From Canterbury the Royal Pair pass'd in Coach to Gravesend, with the Acclamations of millions of People (who had plac'd themselves all along the way to behold them) and there took water in the Barge of State, for Somerset-House, being towed through the Navy-Royall, which was dispos'd on each side of the Shoars; and in order Volla'd the Princely Passengers till their Landing: three days after, the King and Queen shew'd themselves on magnificent Thrones to the Nobility, and had their Marriage solemnly proclaimed; which being perform'd, their Majesties removed to Hampton-Court, by reason that London was infected with the Plague, as it had also been in the first year of King James.

The King now taking Truce with his Affections, call'd a Parliament about the Business of the Palatinate, which Assembled on the Eighteenth of June; And Sir Thomas Crew was Speaker of the House of Commons: It was observ'd, that the precedent Kings (the last only excepted) usually transmitt'd their Minds to Parliaments by their Chancellors; but King Charles himself saluted these Senators with a short, yet pithy Speech.

The Kings Speech to the Parliament.

Wherein he represented unto them the urgent necessity of raising a Subsidy; seeing, That it would not agree with his Kingly Honour to shrink from a War which his Father, upon solid Considerations, had by consent of both Houses undertaken, although prevented by Death from putting it in Execution.

That Moneys, the Sinews of War, must be levied, without which neither Army, nor Fleet could move, former Contributions being already disburs'd to a Penny.

That he should seem ridiculous to all Europe, if he did not now at length proceed to Action.

That it was his first Enterprise, the Success whereof would be influential upon his following Reign.

That it concern'd their own Reputations, herein to assist him effectually, least the World should judge them to have betrayed their King.

That Celerity was requisite, because of Winter then approaching, a Season prejudicial to Martial Attempts; the Pestilence at that time Regnant in the City, which in all probability might cause a sudden dissolution of their Meeting.

All which Arguments, if duly consider'd, did evidently demonstrate, That it was most Honourable, Opportune, and Safe, to use Expedition in the Business.

As for his Religion, and manner of Government, he determin'd to tread in his Fathers Steps, hoping that his former Life had ministr'd no just Grounds of any contrary suspicion. It is reported of an Asian King, that he told his Son; If he knew the ponderous burthenfomness of a Crown, he would not take it up; though lying at his Feet: And certainly King Charles at this present found his Brows to be oppress'd with the weight of the massie Gold, and precious Stones of his Crown, that for the ease of them he was then forced to move it with his hand; and afterwards complain'd of the pain received by it: his ensuing Reign plainly proving it to grow like the Child upon St. Christophers Back, each hour more heavy and burthenfome than other; And even then some curious and critical Wits took occasion to make many ominous Prefages the upon. The motion of the Parliament was as heavy as the Crown; who acknowledged the fore-mentioned Incitements for a Subsidy to be very rational, yet would not suddenly resolve upon it, untill they had first presented their two Petitions concerning Reasons of Religion, and Complaints of their Sufferings; which Points had been offer'd to his Father in the close of his last Parliament, and by his death left hitherto unanswered.

In both which receiving competent satisfaction, as also an account of the disbursement of his Land, and Naval Forces, with an Audit of the future Charges and Expences of the Spanish War: He obtained of the Layity absolutely and freely two Subsidies from Protestants, four from Papists, and of the Clergy three. In this Parliament Doctor M. magne, the Kings Chaplain, was questioned for certain Tenets in his Answer to the Romish Gagger, and his Defence thereof, stiled, Apello Casarum; being brought to the Bar, the Speaker declared the pleasure of the House, That they would refer his Censure to the next Meeting; and in the mean time he should stand committed to the Serjeants Ward, untill two thousand pounds Bail could be procured for his appearance next Sessions; and although the King took him into his protection, as being his Servant, yet his Bail-Bond remained uncanceled. In this Parliament were Laws Enacted;

Against Abuses committed on Sundays.

For the King to make Leases of Lands, parcel of his Highness Dutchy of Cornwall, or annexed to the same.

For the ease of obtaining Licenses of Alienation, and in the pleading of Alienations with license, or of Pardon of Alienations without license in the Court of Exchequer, or elsewhere.

For the further restraint of Tipling, and such like misbehaviour, in Houses, Ale-houses and other Visiting Houses.

That this Session shall not determine by the Kings assent to these Acts.

There passed also in the House of Commons, A Bill of Tonnage and Poundage: but this was founded in the House of Lords, because the House of Commons had limited it to a year, (whereas former Grants to the Kings Predecessor were for term of life) out of a design to reduce those Customes to the Rate settled in Queen Maries Reign. During this Session, the Lord Mordant, a Papist, and his Wife a Protestant, desirous of one anothers Conversion, put their Cause upon a Disputation between the Archbishop of Armagh, and one Rockwood, a Jesuit, calling himself Beaumont; wherein the Learned Primate so foiled his Adversary, at Dratton in Northamptonshire, about the points of Transubstantiation, Invocation to Saints, Images, and Visibility of the Church: That the Lord Mordant was convinced and converted, and his Lady confirmed.

On the Eleventh of July this year, the Parliament, by reason of the Sickness, Adjourned till the First of August; when they met in at Oxford, the Commons in the Divinity School, and the Lords in the Gallery above: shortly after which, the King calling them together at Christ Church Hall, urged to them (first by a Speech delivered to them himself; next by the two Secretaries, the Lord Conway, and Sir John Cook, who succeeded Sir Albertus Morton) His necessities of setting forth a Fleet, for the recovery of the Palatinate. Moreover, the Lord Treasurer instanc'd the several sums which King James died indebted to the City of London. These things produced high Debates among the Commons, who all edge;

That the Treasury was mis-employed.

That our Necessities arose through Improvidence.

That it would be necessary to Petition the King for a freight Hand, and better Councell to manage his Affairs.

That though a former Parliament engaged the King in a war, yet, if things were managed by contrary Designs, and the Treasury mis-employed, this Parliament was not bound to be carried blindfold in Designs not guided by sound Councell.

That it was not usual to grant Subsidies upon Subsidies in one Parliament, and no Grievances redress'd.

With several other passages of the like Nature: They had also many Reflections upon the Dukes Mil-carri ges; but in conclusion, they promis'd to take the Kings Desires into Consideration, and presented him a Petition against R. culants, Describing their Ends, ascribing their growth to certain Causes, and prescribing certain Remedies: Whereunto a satisfactory Answer (if ought would have satisfied) was returned. And the next day ensued a Debate in the House concerning Supplies; Some would Contribute presently, Others demurred, as disliking the Enterprize in hand, and inclining more to Sir Robert Mansfield's Project, hitherto concealed, which was also approved by the Lord Chichester, but rejected by the Council of War. Finally, The Major part agreed not to give, and growing incensed against the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Admiral (as chief Opposer of Mansfield's Plot) began to think of revetting him of his Admiralty, and other Offices, and Revenues; and to demand an Account of those publike Moneys wherewith he had been intreated. All which they conclude, to couch into an humble Remonstrance: to prevent which, the King cetermined to dissolve the Parliament, and accordingly the Usher of the black Rod was sent from the House of Lords with that Message to the Commons, who were then resolved into a Grand Committee, and understanding the Kings Mind, caused the Speaker then in the Chair to keep his Seat, while they agreed upon a Message of Thanks to his Majesty for his gracious Answer to their Petition for Religion, Agion, and for his care of their Health, in giving them leave to depart this dangerous time of Sickness; And upon a dutiful Declaration of their Affection and Loyalty, and purpose to supply him in a Parliamentary way, in fitting and convenient time.

The Grounds of the Spanish War were these; 1. The recovery of the Palatinate. 2. A fear of the subversion of our civil Estate: Upon which Considerations, a Resolution pass'd the Council, for the Fleet to put speedily to Sea, and to conserve strict Amity, with France, Denmark, and the United Provinces: with these last the King had entered a League, Offensive and Defensive, against the House of Austria, and promised to assist them in soliciting other Princes to the like confederation; upon Condition, that they should bear a fourth part of the Charge of the Fleet. Now were the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland dispatched to the Hague; who, meeting with the Ambassadors of France and Denmark, concluded a League for restoring the Liberties of Germany; the two last being no further Impowred from their Superiors.

Since in this History we meet with frequent mention of the Palatinate, which had no small Influence upon the most weighty Transactions of this Nation, by reason of the great Zeal which the King of England had for the Restitution of Prince Frederick, ally'd to him by Marriage; it will very much conduce to the better understanding of several Passages which herein often occur, to know the Original Causes and Grounds of that War, which, to be brief, thus hapned.

The Hussites of Bohemia (for so those of the Reformation were call'd from John Huss, one of the first of those that preach among them a Defection from Romish Superstition) were desirous to build them a Church for the free exercise of their Religion, of which they layd the Foundation, at a Town call'd Brunaw, and began another at Clistergrave; hereat the Emperour Matthias taking distast, in regard these places were not under the Jurisdiction of any of the Reformed States, but belong'd, one of them to the Abbot of Brunaw, the other to the Archbishop of Prague; sent an Express to the Promoters of this Work to desist; which they refusing, and still going on in their intended Design, they were forcibly interrupted by the Emperours Order, their new-reared Walls raz'd to the ground, and divers of the Townsmen of Brunaw committed to Prison, for contempt of the Imperial Orders. This was haينously resented by the principal men, and gave occasion of great Upstarts; for the people, gathering together into a numerous Company, demanding their just Privileges, and the Liberty of their Imprison'd Citizens, made toward the Tower of Prague, where divers of the Emperours chief Ministers of State were sitting in Council; Adam a Sternbergh, D. Burgrave of the Kingdom, William Slabata, President of the Bohemian Chamber, Jornslans Borzita, Count Martinitz, Baro Popelias, great Prior of St. Maries, and Philip Fabricius the Secretary: to these the People made their Complaint, and urg'd the Concession of their Demands; but not satisfied with the Answers they receiv'd, and still continuing Importunate, the Matter at length came to that height of provocation, that they seiz'd upon three of the Councillors (those that were most violent in opposing their Demands), and threw them out of the highest Window of the Tower, banish'd and proscrib'd the Jesuits, set the Imprison'd Brunawians at liberty, and created thirty Directors, or Administrators of the Affairs of the Kingdom. The Emperour having sought in vain by fair means to allay these Commotions, dispatch'd Letters immediately to Maximilian, Duke of Bavaria, John George, Duke of Saxony, and the rest of the Electors; Also to the Free Cities, and to all his Friends and Allies, to stir them up against the Bohemian Confederates, and sent himself against them a considerable Army, under Henry, Count Tampier, and Charles Longuevall, Count Buquoy, with other Forces, from Albert, Governour of the Low-Countries, under the Command of Henry Julius of Lauenburg, Balthazar Marrada, Commander of Malta, Count Busheim, Colatzen, and others.

In the midst of these Warlike Preparations, the Emperour Matthias dying without Issue, his Cousin Ferdinand the Second, who had before been Crown'd King of Bohemia and Hungary, was by common consent of the Electors chosen to the Empire; which he no sooner attained, but he prosecuted the War begun by his Predecessor; nor were the Bohemians backward in getting together of a powerful Army, whereof their principall Leaders were Ernst, Count Mansfield, and Henry Matthien, Count de la Tour; to whom were joyn'd the Moravians, and Silesians; Pilsa was taken by Mansfield, and the Count de la Tour having won Lipnit, Olmutz, and other Towns of Moravia, invaded lower Austria, and brought his Army to the very Walls of Vienna; but he was soon call'd away by the Directors to defend Bohemia from the Inroads of Buquoy, by whom Mansfield, as he was going to the Assistance of de la Tour, was met with, and absolutely Defeated, he himself having much ado to escape. In the mean time, the Reformed States and Directors at Prague, renouncing all Obedience to the Emperour Ferdinand their King, as not having allowed of his Election; consulted what Prince they should make choice of to offer the Kingdom of Bohemia unto, and at length they resolv'd upon Prince Frederick, Elector Palatine of the Rhene, who Married Elizabeth, the Daughter of King James of Great Britain. Frederick was easily perswaded to accept of the Kingdom, and was created supreme Captain of the Evangelick Union; but long he enjoy'd not these new conferred Honours; for not only all Bohemia was suddenly reduc'd to the Emperours Obedience by that memorable Battell at Prague, in which the Princes of the Union were overthrown by John Tserclaz, Count of Tilly, but also his own Territory of the Palatinate was subdued by the Marquess of Spinola, sent for out of the Low Countries, and conferr'd upon the Duke of Bavaria, together with the Electoral Dignity. For the restitution of this Prince, not only the King of England, and the States of Holland, earnestly laboured by frequent Embassies to the Emperour, but Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, made it one of his chief chief Pretences for the Invasion of Germany; of his success wherein, we shall hereafter have occasion to make mention in this History: and also Christiern King of Denmark took up Arms, though with less Fortune than was hoped for in the same Cause. This was that Grand Business which was made by King James, one of the main Conditions of the Match with Spain; and the not performance of which, was the cause of the breaking off that Match: and this was that in which his Son King Charles was so earnest and sollicitous, that his continual craving of Supplies from the Parliament very much laid open his Necessities, and the lowliness of his Exchequer, and was in all probability the very original Source of those Misfortunes and Calamities that afterwards befell him.

Soon after the dissolution of the Parliament, the King set forth a Proclamation, Commanding the return, by a prefixed time, of all Children of Noble-men, and others of his Subjects, as had been sent to be Educated in Seminaries and Schools where the Popish Religion was profest and taught: That none who had received Orders from the See of Rome, should presume to confer Orders, or exercise Ecclesiastical Functions, in any of his Dominions. Also, that the Statute should be put in execution for the departure of Priests and Jesuits out of his Dominions. Moreover his Majesty, by the advice of his Privy-Council, straightly commanded all those of his Subjects, that were under the pay of the Emperor, the King of Spain, and the Arch-Dutchess, to return speedily to their Native Countries, to be employed as occasion should serve.

The Act of Subsidies being prevented by the dissolution of the Parliament; the King necessitated to take up Money upon Loan, of such persons as were of Ability to lend, directed his Letters to the Lord-Lieutenants of the several Counties; To return the Names of those Men whom they thought most sufficient, the Uses of their Habitations, and what Sums each of them might be judged able to lend. And to those person, whose Names were returned by the Lord-Lieutenants, Letters were issued forth in the Kings Name, under the Privy-Seal, by the Lord Controller of his Majesties Household, in manner and form following.

HAVING observed in the Presidents and Customs of former times, that all the Kings and Queens of this Realm, upon extraordinary Occasions, have used either to resort to those Contributions which arise from the generality of Subjects, or to the private helps of some well affected in particular, by way of Loan. In the former of which Courses, as we have no doubt in the Love and Affection of our People, when they shall again assemble in Parliament; So for the present we are informed to proceed in the latter Course, for Supply of some Portions of Treasure, for divers publick Services, which without manifold Inconveniences to Us and our Kingdoms cannot be defer'd. And therefore, this being the first time that we have required any thing in this kind, we doubt not, but we shall receive such a Testimony of good Affection from you, amongst other of our Subjects, and that with such Alacrity and Readiness as may make the same so much the more acceptable, especially since we require but that Sum, which few Men would deny a Friend, and have a Mind Resolved to expose all our Earthly Fortune for preservation of the General. The Sum which we require of you by these Presents, is, — which we do promise in the Name of Us, our Heirs, and Successors, to repay to you, or your Assigns, within eighteen Months after the payment thereof unto the Collector: The Person whom we have appointed, is, — to whose hands we do require you to send it within twelve days after that you have received this Privy Seal; which, together with the Collectors Acquittance, shall be sufficient Warrant to the Officers of our Receipt, for the re-payment thereof at the time limited.

The Collectors of this Loan were ordered to pay the Sums received into the Exchequer, and to return the Names of such as went about to delay, or excuse the payment of the Sums required.

Upon

UPON the Eighth of October, the Fleet set to Sea (under the Command of Edward Cecil, Vicount Wimbleton, second Son to Thomas Earl of Exeter, General for Land-War, and the Earl of Essex Vice-Admiral at Sea) and were encountered with so violent a Storm, that the greatest part of the Navy, which in all made up eighty Ships (some Dutch) was dissipated and scattered for seven days together; and a gallant Ship, called the Long Robert of Ipswich, with one hundred and seventy persons in it, were utterly lost; the rest meeting again at the Southern Cape, where they consulted to long about the place of Landing, that the whole Coast Alarm'd by their discovery, had opportunity to prepare for Defence, and render their Shoaring much more difficult and dangerous. The Earl of Essex, as we have said, was Vice-Admiral; who out of a desire to equal his Fathers Glory gotten at Cadix, insisted earnestly upon the assailing of those Ships which lay in that Harbour: But Portugal Castle adjoining, must first be won, before any good could be done; wherefore twenty English Ships, and five Dutch, were ordered to advance against it, which with much ado they did, and came off again, after they had, to no purpose, spent two thousand great Shot upon it. This not succeeding, the General resolved to try what might be done by Land; to which Sir John Burroughs, a Veteran Commander, was sent with a select Regiment of Foot to force it: against him some Spanish Forces, which were come thither for the defence of that part of the Countrey, drew up; in which Engagement, they were so foyled by the English, that those within the Castle despairing of their own ability to hold out, hung out a white Flag, and after a short Parley resigned the Fort, with fifteen Barrels of Powder, and eight Pieces of Ordnance. And now the Earl of Essex's Design, of firing the Ships in the Harbour, began to appear more feasible; and Sir Samuel Argall was sent to manage that Business, and the Land-men were ordered to come a shoar to refresh themselves, and to take in fresh Water, and forage the Countreys, and to guard those who were otherwise employed. Here the Spaniards might have made good work with them; for they finding the Cellars well provided of that Wine, which was more rare with them in their own Countrey, congratulated their own Felicities with such large Carowtes of Sack, as if the least Intelligence had been stirring, they might have been easily surprized; which the General fearing, speedily re-embarked his drunken Souldiers, and put to Sea again in quest of the Plate-Fleet, then expected from the West-Indies. Argall's purpose of firing the Ships was also frustrated, by drawing up the best of them under the Port-Royal, and sinking others in the Channel for obstruction.

Twenty dayes they resolved to ply about the Southern Cape, in hopes of employting something upon the Plate-Fleet; but the Contagion encreasing, made such a Massacre among them, that they soon wanted Hail-men for the Sails. And whereas some Ships had a greater number of infected persons than others had: to remedy this, a most preposterous course was taken, that every Ship should entertain by lot two sick, in exchange for so many sound; which propagated the Pestilence, and enforced the General to an untimely return homewards but four dayes before the Plate-Fleet came. Vicount Wimbleton was presently examined about the whole, and prohibited the Kings presence for many Months after; whereof he complains to the Duke (lately returned from his Negotiation at the Hague) Apologizing for himself, and accusing the Stubbornness of others; particularly the Earl of Essex, who might (if he would) have destroyed the Spanish Ships.

Sir Robert Mansel, a stout and expert Sea-man, was the man generally lookt upon as fittest to have Commanded in this Expedition; in which, his being neglected, was a thing that gave much discontent to the Marriners: and both that and other miscarriages in this Design were imputed to the Dukes ill management of Affairs; of which, what the common Censure was, appears by this following Letter of the Lord Cromwell to the Duke himself.

THEY offer to lay Wagers the Fleet goes not this Year; And that of necessity a Parliament must be: which when it comes, sure it will much discontent you. It is wondered at, that since the King did give such great Gifts to the Dutchess of Chevreux, and those that then went, how now a small Sum in the Parliament should be called for at such an unreasonable time: and let the Parliament sit when it will, begin they will where they ended. They say, the Lords of the Council knew nothing of Count Mansfields Journey, or this Fleet, which discontents even the best sort, if not all. They say, it is a very great Burthen your Grace takes upon you, since none knows any thing but you: It is conceived, that not letting others bear part of the Burthen you now bear, it may ruine you (which Heaven forbid.) Much discourse there is of your Lordship here, and there, as I passed home, and back; and nothing is more wondered at, than that one grave man is not known to have your Ear, except my good and noble Lord Conway. All men say, if you go not with the Fleet, you will suffer in it; because if it prosper, it will be thought no Act of Yours; and if it succeed ill, they say, it might have been better, had not You guided the King. They say, Your Undertakings in the Kingdom will much prejudice Your Grace; And if God bless You not in goodness, so as to accept kindly what in Duty and Love I here offer, questionless my freedom in letting You know the Discourse of the World, may much prejudice me; but if I must lose Your Favour, I had rather lose it for striving to do You good, in letting You know the talk of the wicked world, than for any thing else: So much I heartily desire Your Prosperitie, and to see You trample the ignorant Multitude under foot.

All

All I have said is the Discourse of the World; and when I am able to judge of Actions, I will freely tell your Lordship my mind: which when it shall not always incline to serve You may all noble I thought for sake me.

THE Coronation now drew on, which was to be on the second of February: at what time the King, passed not in usual State through the Streets to the Tower, but went by Water from White-Hall to Westminster, for fear of the danger of popular Concourse, by reason that although the Plague was indeed decreased, yet some Dregs of it still remained. The Bishop of Lincoln, as Dean of Westminster, should have performed a main part of this Ceremony, but he being then under displeasure, Doctor Laud, Bishop of St. Davids, supplied his place; and the old Form of Prayer, heretofore laid aside, ever since the time of Henry the Sixth, was again resumed; Viz.

Let him obtain Favour for this People, like Aaron in the Tabernacle, Elizeus in the Waters, Zacharias in the Temple, give him Peters Key, and Pauls Doctrine.

The Ceremony of the Coronation was thus ordered; As the King went from Westminster-Hall toward the Abbey, there went first before, the Aldermen of the City of London, usher'd by a Herald; next the Knights of the Bath in their Robes, each of them attended by his Squire and Page: after them the Judges, the Serjeants at Law, the Kings Attorney-General, and the Masters of Request; then the Privy-Councillors, and the chief Officers of the Kings Household; next the Barons in their Parliament Robes, with Swords by their sides, and bare headed; after the Barons came the Bishops also bare headed, in their Scarlet Gowns and Lawn Sleeves; next them the Viscounts and Earles in their Coronation Robes, and Coronetted Caps; in the last place went the Officers of State for the day, viz. The Lord Privy Seal, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Earl of Dorset carrying the first Sword, the Earl of Essex the second Sword, the Earl of Kent the third; the Spurs were carried by the Earl of Montgomery; the Globe with the Cross on it, by the Earl of Sussex; the Golden Cup and Plate for the Communion, by the Bishops of London and Winchester: the Scepter was carried by the Earl of Rutland; the Sword of State naked by the Marquess of Hamilton; the Crown by the Earl of Pembroke: among the Serjeants at Arms, went the Lord Mayor in a Crimson Velvet Gown, each of them carrying a short Scepter: next, immediately before the King, went the Earl of Arundel, as Earl-Marshal of England, and the Duke of Buckingham as Lord High-Constable for that day. The King entered into the Abbey-Church, at the West-Gate, under a rich Canopy of State, carried by the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, and was himself supported on the one hand by Doctor Neil, Bishop of Durham: on other hand by Doctor Lake Bishop of Bath and Wells: His Train, which contained six Yards of Purple-Velvet, was held up by the Lord Compton, Master of the Robes, and the Lord Viscount Doncaster, Master of the Wardrobe: He was met by Bishop Laud, (who supplied the Deans place) and the Prebends of Westminster, in their rich Copes; who delivered into his Hands the Staff of King Edward the Confessor, with which he walked up to the THRONE, which was framed from the Quire to the Altar. There were appointed for the King three Chairs: 1. The Chair of Repose. 2. The ancient Chair of Coronation. 3. The Chair of State, which was placed upon a square Ascent of six Steps. The King, after he had Reposed himself a while, was by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury presented bare headed to the Lords and Commons, East, West, North, South; of whom the Arch-Bishop demanded, If they consented to the Coronation of King Charles their lawful Sovereign? To which, after they had express their readiness, by an Acclamation made four several times, the King heretook himself again to his Chair of Repose, during the time of Sermon; which ended, the King, going to the Communion Table, and kneeling down, the Arch-Bishop askt his Majesty, If he was willing to take the Oath usually taken by his Predecessors? To which he made Answer, That he was willing; arose, and went to the Altar, where several Interrogations were tendered to him by the Arch-Bishop; to each of which distinctly, the King gave his Affirmative Answer.

Archbishop; SIR, Will you grant and keep, and by your Oath confirm to the People of England, the Laws and Customs to them granted by the Kings of England, your lawful and Religious Predecessors; And namely, The Laws, Customs, and Franchises granted to the Clergy, by the Glorious King St. Edward your Predecessor, according to the Laws of God, the true Profession of the Gospel established in this Kingdom, agreeable to the Prerogative of the Kings thereof, and the ancient Customs of the Realm?

KING, I grant and promise to keep them.

Archbishop,

Archbishop, SIR, Will you keep Peace and godly Agreement (according to your power) both to God, the holy Church, the Clergy, and the People?

KING, I will keep it.

A. SIR, Will you to your power, cause Law, Justice, and Discretion, to Mercy and Truth, to be executed to your Judgment?

K. I will.

A. SIR, Will you grant to hold and keep the Laws and rightful Customes, which the Commonalty of this your Kingdom have? And will you defend and uphold them to the honour of God, so much as in you lyeth?

K. I grant and promise so to do.

C Then one of the Bishops, with a loud Voice before the People, read to the King this following Admonition.

Our Lord and King, We beseech you to pardon, and to grant, and preserve unto us, and to the Churches committed to your Charge, all Canonical Priviledges, and to do Law and Justice; And that you would protect and defend us, as every good King to his Kingdoms ought to be PROTECTOR, and DEFENDER of the Bishops, and the Churches under their Government.

The King answereth with a willing and devout Heart.

I promise and grant my Pardon; and that I will preserve and maintain to You, and the Churches committed to your Charge, All Canonical Priviledges, and due Law and Justice: And that I will be your PROTECTOR and DEFENDER to my power, by the Assistance of God, as every good King in his Kingdom in right ought to Protect and Defend the Bishops and Churches under their Government.

Then the King arising was led to the Communion Table, where laying his Hand upon the BIBLE, &c, in the sight of all the People, made a Solemn Oath (to observe the Premises) which was as followeth;

The Things which I have here promised, I shall perform and keep; So help me God, and the Contents of this Book.

Afterwards his Robes being taken off, and offered at the Altar, the King stood for a while stripped to his Doublet and Hose, of white Sattin; then led by the Arch-Bishop, and the Bishop of St. Davids, He was placed in the Chair of Coronation, having a close Canopy spread over him, and while the Arch-Bishop Anointed his Head, Shoulders, Arms, and Hands, with a costly Ointment, the Quire sung an Anthem of these words;

Zadock the Priest Anointed King Solomon. —

Thence in his Doublet and Hose, with a white Coif on his Head, he was led back again to the Communion-Table, where Doctor Laud, the Bishop of St. Davids, who supplied the Dean of Westminsters place, Vested him with the ancient Habillments ments of King Edward the Confessor, and conducting him back to the Chair of Coronation, presented him with King Edward's Crown, which the Archbishop put upon his Head, and in the mean time the Quire sung this Anthem;

After which, the Earls and Viscounts put on their Coronetted Caps of Crimson Velvet; then every Bishop came severally to the King, and gave him their Benediction, and kneeling from his Chair, bowed to each of them apart. Next King Edward's Sword was put about him, which he took off himself, and offer'd at the Communion-Table, with two Swords more, in relation to Ireland and Scotland: His Spurs were put on by the Duke of Buckingham, as Master of the Horse; which done, he offer'd first Gold and Silver, then Bread and Wine, to be used at the Communion.

Thus completely Crown'd, the King was conducted by the Nobility to the THRONE, where he receiv'd the Oath of Homage, (the Quire, in the mean time, singing TE DEUM) from the Duke of Buckingham, as Lord High-Constable for that Day, who also swore the rest of the Nobility at the Kings Knee, to be Homagers to his Majesty; then the Earls and Barons laid their Hands upon the Crown, as it was upon the Kings Head, making a solemn Protestation, to spend their Blood, to maintain it to him, and his Posterity: the Bishops took no Oath, but kneeling down, the King kissed each of them; then the King taking out of his Bosom a Scroll of Parchment, the Effect of which was, A Promise of Pardon, under his Broad Seal, to all that accept it; gave the Scroll to the Lord-Keeper, who read it four times, East, West, North, and South. From the Throne, the King went to the Communion-Table, and after Prayers had been read by the Archbishop, the Nicene Creed sung by the Quire; and the Epistle and Gospel read by the Bishops of Landaff, and Norwich; his Majesty receiv'd the Communion, the Bread from the Archbishop, the Wine from the Bishop of St. Davids: And at the same time, GLORIA PATRI was sung: which being ended, the Archbishop reading certain Prayers, concluded the Ceremony. After which, the King dis-robed himself in King Edwards Chappel, and came forth in a short Robe of red Velvet, lin'd with Ermins, and a lesser Crown upon his Head, set with precious Stones, and taking Barge with all his Train of Nobles, at Westminster-Stairs, He returned to White-Hall.

Great Forces had been lately raised both for Sea and Land; for whose better Disciplining, an hundred and fifty old Souldiers were commanded home from the Netherlands; by whose Industry, the Forces were brought into some good Order, against the sitting of the ensuing Parliament, which Assembled the sixth of February: And Sir Henne Finch was Speaker of the House of Commons; who having made his Excuses, such as are usual upon the like occasions, address'd himself in Speech to the King.

In which,

First, He humbly gave Thanks to his Majesty, for his Favour towards him, in approving the Choice which the House had made of him for their Speaker. Next, he express'd himself in the praise of Monarchy in general; but much more largely, and particularly, of the Happiness of this Nation under the present King, and his Government; speaking also against the Pride and Tyranny of the Spanish Monarchy, and the unjust Invasion of the Palatinate. Lastly, He crav'd leave of his Majesty, to present him these four Petitions, in behalf of the whole House.

I. That they, and their necessary Attendants, might be free both in their persons and goods, from all Arrests and Troubles, according to their ancient Priviledges.

II. That his Majesty would vouchsafe them liberty and freedom of Speech, so long as nothing should be therein contained, contrary to their Duty and Loyalty.

III. That when important Occasions requir'd, He would grant them free Access to His Royal Person.

IV. That their Proceedings might be free from mis-constructions, and receive a favourable interpretation at his hands.

The

The first thing done in this Convention, was, The rendering of thanks to the King for his gracious Answer to their late Petition for Religion. Next they fell into Debate of publick Grievances; The mis-carrying of the Fleet to Cadiz: The evill Counsellors about the King: Mis-employment of the Kings Revenue: An Account of the Subsidies, and three Fifteens, granted in the twenty first of King James; and in the Committee for Grievances these four Heads were delivered.

Proceedings in Parliament

Four Heads delivered in the Committee for Grievances.

I. The State of the King in the constant Revenue of the Crown.

Wherein they considered how much it was abated, from what it had been formerly, by Gifts of Lands, Ex mero motu; by large Grants of Pensions, by encrease of Household, and of Purveyors, by his Majesties Embassies, by treble encrease of the privy Purse, by double encrease of the Treasury of the Chamber, and great Wardrobe.

II. The Condition of the Subject in his Freedom.

Wherein were considered the bringing in of new Impositions; the multiplying of Monopolies, and selling them by Grants; the levying of Tonnage and Poundage without any Act of Parliament; and the mis-employment or wast of the Treasure.

C III. The cause of the Nations good Success in former times.

Whereby it was fear'd, Victorious, and Renown'd abroad, which, they judg'd, was to be attributed to the Wisdom and Gravity of Council, who order'd nothing but by publick Debate; from whence there arose a readiness in the People to assist their Sovereign in Purse and Person.

IV. The present Condition of the Nation.

Wherein was represented the loss of its wonted Reputation, through the ill success at Algier, in the Palatinate, in Count Mansfields Expedition, and at Cadiz: and this was imputed to the want of such Councils as were heretofore us'd, for as much as men through a diffidence in the success, were backward to adventure either their Persons, or Purse.

In the Committee concerning Religion, and the growth of Popery, Mr. Richard Mountague two Books: Viz. His Answer to the Romish Gagger, and his Appeal to Caesar; were again brought into question, and several Articles exhibited against him, whereby he was tax'd of divers passages in the aforesaid Books, tending to the encouragement of Popery, and the drawing away of his Majesties Subjects from the true Religion establish'd, unto Error and Superstition; with other passages dishonourable to the late King, and full of injurious and railing Language to other persons: As also, that he endeavour'd to raise Factions in the Common-wealth, by casting the scandalous Name of Puritans, upon such of his Majesties Subjects as conform'd themselves to the Doctrine of the Church of England: whereupon the House of Commons gave their Censure, That he ought to be brought to exemplary punishment, and to have his Books burnt: Nor do we find, that he ever made any Defence, or Answer to these Articles that were brought against him. It is observable, that a little before the meeting of the Parliament, Doctor Laud understanding from the Duke, that the King intended to leave Mr. Mountague to a Tryall, was heard to utter these words, I seem to see a Cloud arising and threatening the Church of England, God in his mercy dissipate it. Nor long after, the Commons sending for the Earl of Totnes, the Lords, Vere, Brook, and Grandison, Sir Robert Mansell, and Sir John Oyle, who were of the Council of War, that sat upon the Affairs of the Palatinate, question'd them concerning the management of that business; but the rest of them making their severall excuses, Sir Robert Mansell was he only who declared himself ready to render a clear account of it.

Mr. Richard Mountague's Gagger & Appeal to Caesar, again question'd.

The Palatinate Affairs call'd into question.

Complaint was also made in the House of severall persons; who by reason of some late created Dignities in Scotland and Ireland, claimed Precedency of the Peers of England: To this, Redress was promised, wherewith the House of Lords were for the present satisfied, though soon after much more dissatisfied by another Occurrent: The Lord Mairavers, eldest Son and Heir to the Earl of Arundell, had married the eldest Daughter of the late Duke of Lennox, contrary to the Kings mind, who intended her for the Lord Lorne, Argyle's Heir: The King hereat offended, commits the Earl of Arundell to the Tower, which caused a Petition from the Peers; wherein they pleaded, That no Peer sitting in Parliament, is to be imprison'd without order from the House of Lords, unless for Felony, Treason, or denial of Security for the Peace. This was disputed for the space of two Months, and then the Earl set at liberty.

Complaint of the Scotch and Irish Nobility, for claiming Precedency of the Peers of England. Mairavers marries the Duke of Lennox's eldest Daughter. The Earl of Arundell committed to the Tower.

The Commons were busied in the mean time, about searching the Signet Office, for the Original of a Letter under the Signet, written to the Mayor of York, for reprieving certain Jesuits, Priests, and other Recufants, and reported by Mr. Pim, Chair-man to the Committee for Religion; but their proceedings were interrupted by a Message from the King, brought by Sir Richard Wilson Chancellor of the Exchequer, demanding supply for the English and Irish Forces. This was so dis-relished, that Mr. Clement Cook, one of the Commons, openly protested, That it was better to die by a Foreign Enemy, Sir Rich. Wilson sent by the King to demand supply for the English and Irish Forces.

Sir Henne Finch his Speech to the King.

Enemy, than to be destroyed at home; whom Doctor Turner, a Physician, seconded with these fix Quarries.

Six Queries
by Dr. Turner thereupon.

1. Whether the King hath not lost the Regality of the Narrow Seas, since the Duke became Admirall?

2. Whether his going as Admirall in this last Fleet, was not the cause of his ill Success, for the Fleet was lately returned again without any considerable performance?

3. Whether the Kings Revenue hath not been impaired by his immense Liberality?

4. Whether he hath not ingrossed all Offices, and preferred his Kindred to unfit Places?

5. Whether he hath not made Sale of places of Judicature?

6. Whether Retusants have not dependance upon his Mother and Father-in-law?

The King offended.

These Expressions so Irritated the King, that he sent immediatly Sir Richard Weston to the House of Commons, to require satisfaction. Immediately upon the Kings Message, Doctor Turner made Speech in his Vindication, and to explain himself, alleading;

Dr. Turner's Vindication.

That what he had said, was for the generall good of the Common-wealth, and not reflecting upon any one in particular. That to accuse upon common Fame, he thought to be a Parliamentary way, and warranted by the Canons of the Church, and the Imperiall Laws, and by ancient Presidents; the Duke of Suffolk in King Henry the Sixth's time, having been accused upon common Fame. He added moreover, that Mr. Chancellor himself had presented the common Undertakers upon particular Fame, and that he knew no reason, why he himself might not in that place have as ample a Priviledge.

Sir William Walter delivers his Sense of the Grievances in Parliament.

And the Debate of that matter being put off to another day, he in the mean time writ a Letter to the Speaker, to excuse his absence, by reason of his Indisposition of Body, and to signifie his desire of putting himself wholly upon the Judgment and Censure of the Parliament.

Sir William Walter delivering his Sense to the House concerning the Grievances, said, That the true Cause of them was for that (as was said of Lewis the Eleventh of France) All the Kings Council ride upon one Horse. Wherefore his Majesty was to be advised, as Moses was by Jethro, to make choice of Counsellors, to assist him, that should be thus qualified;

1. Noble, and not Upstarts and of a Nights growth.

2. Men of Courage, such as would execute their own places, and not commit them to undefending Deputies.

3. Fearing God, not inclining to false Worship, or halting between two Opinions.

4. Dealing truly, not given to flattery, or fawning Courtship, but such as might be safely trusted by the King and Kingdome.

5. Having Covetousness, and not such as liv'd upon other mens Ruines, or that would take Bribes, or sell places in Church or Common-wealth, or about the King.

6. To be Many, in the multitude of Counsellors, there being safety.

7. To judge of small matters, as well as great. (the greatest being to be refer'd to the King) much lets any one Counsellor alone to take upon him the whole management of a Business.

8. Elders, not young and unexperient'd men, through whole rash and unadvised proceedings, great Designs many times miscarry.

In this Debate he was seconded by Sir John Eliot, who represented to the House, The present State of the Kingdom, the great dishonour the King and Kingdome had sustained in several miscarriages, occasion'd through the ill management of things by these in highest trust.

He also cited two Presidents, the first in the sixteenth year of Henry the Third, when the Parliament denied the Subsidies that were demanded by the King, untill such time as the great Officers were examined, and Hugo de Burgo found guilty of Corruption was displac'd. The second in the tenth year of Richard the Second, when supply was requir'd, and the Commons complaining, That the Earl of Suffolk, then over-ruled all, returned answer, That they could not give. Notwithstanding the heat of these Debates, the Commons taking into Consideration the Kings necessities, voted three Subsidies, and Three Fifteens, and that the Act should be brought in as soon as the Grievances, that should be presented to the King, were answered by him.

They also took again into consideration, the business concerning the Duke of Buckingham, and the mis-employment of the Revenue, and ordered that the Duke should again have notice of their Intentions, to proceed therein. But the King, not perceiving them to make such haste, as he expected, to answer his last Message, summons both Houses together, and signifies his Resentments to them by the Lord Keeper Coventry, complaining of them for unpunishing Mr. Cook, and Doctor Turner, and for searching his Signet Office: He also justified the the Duke to have acted nothing of publique employment, without his speciall Warrant, wherefore he forbid them to use any more disquisition of that nature, which he took upon as libelling against his own Government. Lastly, he came to the business of Supply, wherein he blamed them for being too sparing, and for not ordering the Bill not to be brought in, till their Grievances were heard and answered, which he would not admit of. To all these Points, their final Answer was expected by Saturday next. This was the substance of the Lord Keepers Speech: Which being ended, the King said; He must withall put them in mind, that his Father, moved by their Council, and won by their perswasions, brake the Treaties. In those perswasions, he was their Instrument towards his Father, and was glad to be instrumental in any thing, which might please the whole Body of the Realm; nor was there any then in greater favour with them, than the Duke, whom now they so traduced: But now finding him so sure intangled in War, as he had no honourable and safe Retreat, they made his Necessity their Priviledge, and for what Rate they please upon their Supplies, a Practice not very obliging towards Kings. And whereas Mr. Cook told them, it was better to die by a Forraign Enemy, then to be destroyed at home: Indeed, he thought it more honourable for a King to be invaded, and almost destroyed by a Forraign Enemy, than to be despised at home. At a Conference of both Houses, in the Painted-Chamber, the Duke of Buckingham was commanded by the King, to explain something in his, and the Lord Keepers Speech, that might be subject to mis-understanding; which the Duke accordingly did; and afterwards rendered an Account at large of his Negotiation in the Low-Countries. As soon as the Duke had ended his Speech, the Lord Conway, Chief Secretary of State, in farther justification of the Duke, and to clear him from the opinion of having unskillfully, and without Council, expended the Treasure, discouraged particularly of the Treaty of Denmark, of the Project of Count Mansfield, of the Treaties with France, and the Business of the Navie, and averr'd, that they were not done by single Council, since King James himself commanded it; and then he gave in a punctual Account of the several Sums disbursed for the War.

It was now the year 1626. and the second year of his Majesties Reign; when the Commons, in Answer to the Kings last Speech, presented him with a Remonstrance to this purpose.

That they gratefully received his Majesties Expressions of Affection to his People and Parliament.

That they had taken Mr. Cooks, and Doctor Turners words into their consideration, and might have given a good account thereof by this time, if his Majesties Message had not interrupted them.

That they had the Presidents of former Parliaments, for searching the Letters of his Majesty, and his Secretary of State, the Signet Office, and other Records, upon the like occasions.

That it was the unquestionable Priviledge of Parliaments, to complain of any Persons of any Degree; and their Proceedings, in relation to the Duke, should not prejudice either Crown or Kingdom.

That they were willing to supply his Necessities liberally and faithfully; if Additions might be made of other things importing his Service, then in consultation amongst them.

The Kings Answer was short.

That He would have them, in the first place, consult about Matters of the greatest Importance; and that they should have time enough for other things afterwards.

The Earl of Bristol having been refer'd to be examined by a Committee of Lords, appointed by the King, touching his Negotiation in Spain; and upon consultation of the Business, having been committed to Prison, prohibited access to his Majesty, and continued under restraint, ever since his return out of Spain, received a Letter from the Lord Conway; wherein, in order to his release, he propounded to him from his Majesty this choice; whether he would choose to sit still without being question'd for any Errors past in his Negotiation in Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late Gracious Pardon, whereof he might take the Benefit; Or whether, being contented to waive the advantage of that Pardon, he would, for the clearing of his innocency (of which he and his Friends were so confident) put himself into a legal way of Examination for the Tryal thereof.

The Parliaments Remonstrance to the King concerning the words spoken by Mr. Cook, and Dr. Turner.

In answer to which, he wrote back to the Lord Conway;

That whereas now his Proposition was, whether he would choose to sit still without being farther question'd, &c. His Lordship might remember, that in a former Letter he propos'd, whether he desir'd to rest in the security he was in, and to acknowledge the gracious favour of his Majesty that now is, who had been pleas'd not to question his actions; Torish, said he, that your Lordship had more clearly explain'd the sense of the former Letter; but conferring both together, and gathering the meanings, by making the latter an explanation of the former, I return unto your Lordship this direct Answer; That I do most humbly acknowledge and accept of his Majesties Grace and Favour, and shall not wave any thing that shall come to me by the Pardon of 21 Jacobi Regis, or by the Pardon of his present Majesties Coronation.

At the same time, the Earl Petitioned the House of Lords, to intercede with his Majesty, That whereas, being a Peer of this Realm, he had not received a Summons from Parliament, he might enjoy the Liberty of a Subject, and the benefit of his Peerage, after two years restraint, without being brought to a Tryal; and that if any Charge were brought in against him, he might be tryed by Parliament. Hereupon the Earl of Hereford reported from the Committee of Priviledges, to which the Business was refer'd, that it would be requisite for their Lordships, to beseech his Majesty to grant a Writ of Summons to the Earl of Bristol: Which when it was brought to him, there came along with it a Letter from the Lord Keeper, signifying unto him;

That though his Majesty had given way to the awarding of the Writ; yet notwithstanding his pleasure was, That his Lordship should continue still under the same restraint as he did before, and that his personal attendance was to be forborn.

This Letter, with his own Answer to it, the Earl of Bristol sent to the House of Lords, together with a Petition, wherein he express'd himself;

That though he should ever obey the least intimation of his Majesties pleasure: yet he humbly offer'd in their Lordships wise Consideration, as too high a point for him, how far this might trench upon the Liberty and Safety of the Peers, and the Authority of their Letters-Patents, to be in this sort discharged by a Letter missive of any Subject without the Kings Hand; and besought them that he might be heard, both as to the point of his wrongful restraint, and of what he had to say against the Duke.

The King much incens'd at this Petition, sent a Message to the House of Lords, by the Lord Keeper, by which he signified his resentment of it, as void of duty and respect to his Majesty; and that it was his Royal Pleasure, that the Earl might be sent for as a Delinquent, to answer in the House his offences, and his scandalizing the Duke of Buckingham, immediately; and his Majesty by reflection. The Earl being brought to the Lords Bar, and ready to be impeach'd of High Treason by the Attorney-General, besought their Lordships; That as he was a Freeman, and Peer of the Realm unattainted, and had something to say of high Consequence for his Majesties service, he might have liberty to speak: Which having obtained, I accuse, said he, that man, the Duke of Buckingham of High-Treason. This resolute proceeding of the Earl, moved the Attorney-General to hasten the Charge against him; which was drawn up into eleven Articles, to this effect.

That falsely and trayterously he inform'd the late King by sundry Letters, That the Emperour and King of Spain, would really make restitution of the Dominions and Dignity of the Count Elector Palatine; and that the King of Spain did really intend the Marriage between his now Majesty, then Prince of Wales, and Donna Maria the Infanta of Spain; whereas neither by the Emperour the said Restitution, nor by the King of Spain the said Marriage, was ever really intended.

II. That having received Directions to put the King of Spain to a speedy and punctual Answer, touching the aforesaid Treaties; he nevertheless continued them upon Generalities, without pressing the King of Spain to particular Conclusions.

III. That

III. That he did many times, both by Word and Letters, extoll the Greatnesse and Power of the King of Spain; to the intent, that he might retard the late Kings Resolutions, of declaring himself an Enemy to the King of Spain.

IV. That being told, upon his dispatch out of this Realm, that there was little probability of the Success of these Treaties; he reply'd, He cared not what the Success thereof would be; for he would be careful to pursue his Instructions; and howsoever the Business went, he would make his Fortunes thereby.

V. That to advance the Romish Religion, during the time aforesaid, he often by Letters perswaded his late Majesty to set at liberty the Priests and Jesuits, and to grant all Papists a toleration of their Religion.

VI. That by his false Informations and Intelligences given to the late King, and the Prince, his now Majesty, they were put into hopes, and by long delays into jealousies, concerning the said Treaties, that there was not that sincerity in them which they expected: Whereupon the said Prince, his now Majesty, intending either to conclude the Treaty, or discover the feigned Intentions of the Emperour, and King of Spain, was forced to undertake a long and dangerous Journey, to the hazard of his own person, and in Him, of the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom.

VII. That at the Prince his first coming into Spain, the Earl asked of the Prince for what end he came thither; who, not conceiving his meaning, answered, You know as well as I. Upon which he reply'd; Sir, Give me leave to tell you, they say here in Madrid, that you intend to change your Religion: And added, If you will trust me with so great a Secret, I will endeavour to carry it the secretest way I can. At which the Prince being mov'd, told him, He wonder'd what he had ever found in him, that he should think him so base, as for a wife to change his Religion. To which the Earl desiring his Pardon, return'd, It was but out of his desire to serve him.

VIII. That at another Conference, he trayterously endeavour'd to perswade him to turn Romish Catholique, using this Argument, That the State of England never did, nor could possibly do any great thing, but when Obedient to the Pope of Rome.

IX. That upon an Overture of Marriage between the Prince Palatine, and the Emperour's Daughter, and his being brought up in the Emperour's Court; upon which consideration he should be restor'd to the Palatinate: When mention was made, of the danger of changing his Religion, the Earl said, That without some such great Action, the Peace of Christendom could never be procur'd.

X. That at the Prince his departure out of Spain, the Powers of Desponsories being left with the Earl of Bristol, an Express was soon after sent him by the late King, not to deliver them, until a full Conclusion were made concerning the Palatinate: Nevertheless, contrary to his Duty and Allegiance, he set so short a day for the Desponsories, without any Assurance, or so much as treating of those things to which he was restrained, That if extraordinary diligence, with good success in the Journey, had not concurr'd, the Prince's hands might have been bound up, and yet he neither sure of a Wife, nor the Prince Palatine of Restitution.

XI. Lastly, That in a high and contemptuous manner, he had prefer'd a scandalous Petition to this Honourable House; in one Article whereof, he gave his now Majesty the Lie, by denying, and offering to falsifie what his now Majesty had affirm'd.

He petitioned the House of Lords about his liberty, and that he might be heard against the Duke of Buckingham.

The King displeas'd with the Earl of Bristol's Petition.

Articles against the Earl of Bristol.

Upon this Impeachment, the Earl affirm'd, that at his importunity the late King promised that he should be heard before himself; and for the Kings Promise, he vouched the Lord Chamberlain for a Witness: I pray God, said he, that Promise did him no hurt, for he shortly dyed after. Then he put the House in mind of his Petition, and desir'd, that before he were impeach'd, they would receive his Charge against the Duke, and the Lord Conway: So having presented his Articles, he withdrew; and it was resolv'd upon the question by the House of Lords; that the Articles against the Duke, and the Lord Conway, should immediately be read: Being afterwards called to the Lords Bar, concerning his Articles against the Duke, he made a long Narration, touching the Proceedings of the Duke toward him: Which was,

The Earl of
tion to the Lord, concerning the Dukes proceedings towards him.

That he, conceiving himself bound not to conceal, for any earthly respect whatsoever, the true State of Affairs, wrote several Letters to his late Majesty, in which he faithfully gave his Opinion, that the Distaste between the Duke of Buckingham, and the King of Spain's Ministers, would, if his wisdom prevented it not, utterly overthrow all his Affairs: Of which Letters, the Duke coming to the knowledge, and fearing least at the Earls return, his Misdemeanours in Spain should come to be discovered, laboured by all means possible, that his Access to his Majesty might be obstructed, and having in vain solicited the Marquess of Hamilton, and the Lord Chamberlain, to that purpose, he so contrived the matter, that at the Earls landing at Dover, a Letter was delivered him from the Lord Conway, commanding him, in his Majesties Name, to retire himself to his House, and not to come to Court, till he had answered such Questions, as should be propounded to him by certain Lords of the Council at his Majesties Appointment: This was done, as supposing that if his Arrest had been deferr'd, till he had come to London, he would have easily gotten access to the Kings presence. Upon his frequent importunity to the King, that he might be brought to a Hearing, he still received a serious Promise, confirm'd at last with an Oath, That as soon as he should have answer'd to certain Questions that were to be propounded to him by the Commissioners, he should be admitted. These Questions he earnestly urg'd might be sent him, and that speedily; which was likewise promis'd. He added, That he was dealt with by one Mr. Clark, to acknowledge certain Propositions, that were sent him from the Duke; which he refusing, the Duke grew more and more incens'd against him, and his Interrogatories, before the Commissioners, were by many Artifices still delay'd from time to time, untill the Dukes turn was serv'd, in detaining him from the Kings presence, and then the said Questions were never more heard of. Also, upon the Earls sending of his Answer to all the Commissioners, they having declar'd themselves satisfied; and being resolv'd to clear him, were never permitted more to meet. Afterwards the Duke sent him again four or five Propositions, and promis'd, that upon his acknowledgment of them, he would employ his power with the King and Prince, that he might be again received into their Grace and Favour; but those were so unjust, that instead of an acknowledgment, he sent him an Answer, which though it satisfied not the Duke, yet his late Majesty was pleas'd to say in the Dukes presence, 'Twere to be accounted a Tyrant, to enjoin an innocent man to confess faults, of which he was not guilty; and sent him word, that he would hear him, concerning the Duke of Buckingham, as well as the Duke concerning him; and this hapned but a little before his Majesties sickness. Upon his now Majesties coming to the Crown, he in an humble Letter implor'd his Grace and Goodness, but was still kept in disfavour with him, through the means and instigation of the said Duke.

The Earl having thus declar'd his mind, concerning these Particulars, and again put them in remembrance of his Cause, presented to them in his late Petition, he withdrew, and remained in the Custody of Mr. Maxwell the Gentleman Usher.

The twelve Articles which the Earl of Bristol prefer'd against the Duke of Buckingham, were these.

The Earl of Bristol's Articles against the Duke of Buckingham.

- I. That the Duke did secretly conspire with the Conde of Gondamar, Ambassador of Spain, before the said Ambassadors last return into Spain, 1622. to carry his Majesty, then Prince, into Spain; to the end, he might be enforced, and infanced in the Romish Religion; and thereby have perverted the Prince, and subverted the true Religion established in England.
- II. That Mr. Porter was made acquainted therewith, and sent into Spain, and such Message framed at his return, as might serve for a good ground to set on foot the Conspiracy, which was done accordingly; and thereby both King and Prince highly abused.
- III. That

1626.

III. The Duke at his arrival in Spain, Nourished the Spanish Ministers, not only in the Belief of his own being Popishly given, by absenting himself from all Exercises of our Religion (then constantly used in the Earl of Bristol's House), and conforming himself to please the Spaniard, by keeping to and adoring their Sacraments, but gave them hope also of the Princes Conversion, which caused them to propound worse conditions for Religion, than had been formerly Settled and Signed by the Earl of Bristol, and Sir Walter Aston.

IV. That the Duke did many times, in the presence of the Earl of Bristol, move his Majesty, at the Instance of the Conde of Gondamar, to write a Letter to the Pope; which the Earl utterly dissuaded; and that, although during the Earls abode in England, he hindered the writing any such Letter; yet the Duke, after the Earls return, procured it to be written.

V. That the Pope being informed of the Dukes Inclination in point of Religion, sent him a Particular Bull in Parchment, therein perswading him to pervert his Majesty.

VI. That the Duke in Spain, did abuse the King of Spain, and his Ministers so, as they would not admit of a Reconciliation with him: Whereupon, seeing the Match would be to his disadvantage, he endeavoured to break it; not for any Service to this Kingdom, nor dislike of it in itself; nor for that he found (as since he hath pretended) that the Spaniard did not really intend it, but out of his Particular Ends and Indignation.

VII. That he intended to cross the Match, and make use of Letters of his Majesty, then private, to his own ends, and not to what they were intended; as also concealed many things of great Importance from his late Majesty, thereby overthrowing his Majesties Purpose, and advancing his own Ends.

VIII. That, For the aforesaid ends, he hath abused both Houses of Parliament by a Sinister relation of the Carriage of Affairs, as shall be made appear in every particular of that Relation.

IX. That he employed his Power with the King of Spain, for the procurement of Favours and Offices, which he bestowed upon unworthy Persons, for Recompense and Hire of his Lust: Which is a great infamy and dishonour to our Nation; that a Duke, a Privy Counsellor, and Ambassador, Eminent in his Majesties Favour, and solely intrusted with the Person of the Prince, should leave behind him, in a Forrein Court, so much Scandal by his ill behaviour.

X. That he hath been a great part the Cause of the Ruine of the Prince Palatine, and his Estate; in so much as those Affairs concern this Kingdom.

XI. That he hath in his Relation to both Houses of Parliament, wronged the Earl of Bristol in his Honour, by many Sinister Aspersions.

XII. Lastly, That the Earl of Bristol did reveal to his late Majesty, both by Word and Letter, in what sort the Duke had mis-demeaned himself, and abused his Trust: And the King by several wayes sent him word, he should rest Assured, That he would hear the said Earl in due time; and that four dayes before his Sickness, he signified to the Earl, that he would hear him against the Duke, as well as he had heard the Duke against him; And not long after the King dyed, having been much vexed and pressed with the said Duke.

Besides these Articles against the Duke, the Earl of Bristol, exhibited Eleven others against the Lord Conway, which were to this Effect.

His Articles against the Lord Conway.

“1. That the Lord Conway stuck not to send him word, that if Business could not be accommodated between him and the Duke, he must declare himself for the Duke; so that, being so great a Servant of the Dukes, he was unfit to be a Judge in any thing that concerned the Duke or the Earl.

“2. That he acknowledg'd himself, under his own Hand, a Secretary of the Duke of Buckingham's creation; and began his Letters to him, in this form, Most Gracious Patron.

“3. That as a Creature of the said Duke, he had been the Instrument of keeping the Earl from the Kings presence, and that the Warrants for his Imprisonment were only under his own hand.

“4. That he had procur'd his restraint upon undue Grounds, and had continued it for a years space, by misinforming the King; and when it appear'd that his Late Majesty had freely granted the Earl his Liberty, he reply'd, that, That Liberty expir'd with the Kings Death.

“5. That the Earl desiring the Lord Conway to move the King for Leave to see his Mother, who lay sick; he after long delays having spoken with the Duke, gave him a Negative Answer in the Kings Name; of which his Majesty being inform'd, and very much displeas'd at it, granted free Leave; but the Lord Conway sent him certain Limitations which were never express'd by his Majesty.

“6. That he would not deliver any Message from the said Earl to the King (although it was so order'd by his Majesty), without first acquainting the Duke, and receiving his Directions.

“7. That he perceiving that the Earl was like to be cleared concerning those Interrogatories, which the Commissioners, appointed by his Majesty to search into his Proceedings and Employment, were to propound to him, never moved for any farther meeting, whereby the said Earls troubles have been kept on foot to this present day.

“8. That there being some few questions to the Twenty Interrogatories, which when the Earl should have answered, his Majesty solemnly swore, That he should be Admitted to his Presence; the Lord Conway, notwithstanding that he acknowledg'd under his Hand, that he had receiv'd directions from his Majesty to send those Articles, and was often Solicited thereunto, would yet never send them.

“9. That the Earl being set Free by his Late Majesty, and having his Writ of Parliament sent him, without any Prohibition, was wish'd by his now Majesty to make some Excuse for the present, which he did, and moved he might have a Letter under the Kings Hand, to warrant his absence; but under colour of this Letter of Leave, the Lord Conway sent a Letter from his Majesty, absolutely forbidding his coming to Parliament, and therein likewise inserted a Clause, that the Earl should remain restrain'd as he did in the time of his late Majesty.

“10. That the Lord Conway, knowing that the Match for the Marrying of the King of Bohemia's Eldest Son with the Emperours Daughter, and his being bred up in the Emperours Court, was allowed and propounded by his Late Majesty; hath yet suffered it to be Charged as a Crime against the Earl of Bristol, both in the Twentieth Interrogatory, and his Majesties last Letter, that he should consent to the Breeding of the said young Prince in the Emperours Court, as if it had tended to the perverting of his Religion, when as he knew there was an express Clause that provided to the contrary.

11. That

The Lord Keepers Message from the King to the House of Lords, concerning the Earls Articles against the Duke.

“That the Lord Conway hath been the Cause of all the Earl of Bristol's Troubles, by his dubious and Intrapping dispatches, which contained no such directions as he Alleg'd were given, and wherein he pretended the Earl had failed.

“The House not judging it reasonable that the Earl should be again committed to the Tower, suffered him to remain with the Usher of the Black-Rod, and order'd, that the Kings Charge against the Earl should be heard, before the Earls Charge against the Duke, of which the King, in a Message delivered by the Lord Keeper to the House of Lords, observ'd, that many of the Articles were such, as he himself was able to say more of his own knowledge, than any man, touching the Dukes sincere Carriage in them; and that one of them, concerning the Narrative made in Parliament, in the 21. of King James, trencheth as far upon himself as the Duke, for that his Majesty went as far as the Duke in that Declaration, and that all of them have been clos'd in the Earls own Breast now for these two years, contrary to his Duty, if he had known any Crime of that Nature against the Duke, and that now he vents it by way of Recrimination against the Duke, whom he knows to be a principal Witness to prove his Majesties Charge; and therefore his Majesty gave the House thanks, that they gave no way to the Earl of Bristol's unreasonable Motion, of putting the Duke under the same Restraint as they had put the Earl. There being an endeavour to take the Earls Cause out of the House, and to proceed by way of Indictment in the Kings Bench; the Lords gave their Reasons why they could not give way to that manner of Proceeding, in respect of these dangerous Inconveniences that would follow.

1. He could have no Council.
2. He could use no Witnesses against the King.
3. He could not know what the Evidences against him would be in a convenient time, to prepare for his Defence.
4. The Liberties of the House would be thereby infring'd.
5. The Earl being indicted, it would not be in their Power to keep him from Arraignment, and so he might be disabled to make good his Charge against the Duke; and therefore it was judg'd the most Proper and most Legal way of Proceeding; First, To have the Charge deliver'd into the House in Writing, and the Earls to set down his Answer to it in Writing, and that the Witnesses might be Examind, and Evidence on both sides heard; and if upon full hearing, the House should find it to be Treason, then to proceed by way of Indictment; if doubtful in Point of Law, to have the Opinion of the Judges to clear it; if doubtful in matter of Fact, then to refer it to a Regal Fair.

Reasons why
the Lords could not give way to an Indictment against the Earl at the Kings Bench.

Soon after the Charge was given in against the Earl of Bristol, who having his Answer ready to deliver to their Lordships, crav'd their Attention to some things which he intended to speak by way of Introduction: in which Speech he gave a full Account, Of his being brought up in the Protestant Religion, Of his constant adhering to it, and strict profession of it, during the time that he travell'd into France and Italy: Of his Behaviour, when he came first to be receiv'd into his Majesties Domestick Service, at which time none of the Kings Servants frequented Sermons more, or oftner receiv'd the holy Sacrament: Of his avowing and asserting the Protestant Cause, when he was sent Embassadour into Spain, about the Treatise of Marriage, and the Faithful Service he did the King, his Master, in that Embassie; and how that when he was sent for over into England, the Conde de Olivares, advertis'd him what was plotted against him here, and perswaded him in the Presence of Sir Walter Aston, to stay there in respect of the Danger, making great Offers of Honour and Preferment, which, relying upon his Innocence and integrity, he refus'd, and came over.

Then the Earl gave in his Answer to each Particular Article of the Impeachment.

“1. What was Charg'd against him in the first Article, His dealing unfaithfully in the Business of the Palatinate, he utterly denied, producing Letters from the Queen of Bohemia, from the Duke of Buckingham, and from King James himself; in each of which his good Services as to that particular were acknowledg'd, and very well accepted of: he also clear'd himself touching the Match, proving, that it was really intended by the King of Spain.

“2. His continuing the Treatise upon Generalities, Charg'd against him in the second Article, he also deny'd.

“3. Nor did he ever, as he said, dissuade his Majesty from taking Arms against Spain; as the Third Article infers: But only advis'd, that all fitting Preparation for War might be made.

4. That he doubted of the probability of the Match he granted, and said, that he always wish'd and advis'd a Protestant Match: he farther acknowledg'd, that he might say, He would get his Instructions perfect; but for the other clause of the Fourth Article, which tax'd him of saying, He would make his Fortunes thereby; he affirm'd, it was impossible for him to hold so mean and unworthy a Discourse.

5. He said, he was so far from moving his Majesty to set Priests at Liberty, and grant Papists a Toleration, that though his Majesty was engaged by the Treaty at Madrid, and his Promise to Conde Gondomar, to do many things in favour of the Papists; yet he the said Earl would not condescend hereunto de bene esse, as may appear by his Letters to Mr. Secretary Calvert.

6. That the Assurances he gave his Majesty concerning the Treaties, were no other than what were given by the Emperour and the King of Spain; and that it was neither those Assurances, nor the jealousies of Spain, but other Motives that were the original cause of the Prince, his now Majesties said Journey.

7. And 8. His words never tended to the perswading of the Prince to change his Religion, as the Seventh and Eighth Articles imply, and therewith produc'd a Letter of his to his M. that now is, wherein he gave his advice chiefly for a Match with a Protestant Princess; but if a Catholick, he inclin'd rather to Spain than France; but as to the first, he only told his Majesty, that the general Opinion of that Court was, That the intention of his coming thither, was to be a Roman Catholick: As to the Second, that upon occasion of a Letter, putting his Majesty in mind of the great Actions of his Royal Predecessours in the Holy War, the Earl believeth he might say by way of Discourse, that in regard of the difference of Religion, it was of more difficulty to undertake such great Actions, now than in former Ages.

9. That he deliver'd not his Opinion concerning the Marriage of the Prince Palatine Son with the Emperours Daughter, and his Education in the Emperours Court, otherwise then by way of discourse, and that with regard had to his being bred up in his own Religion. And to shew that King James himself was not averse to it, he produced a Letter of his to his Son in Law to that effect.

10. That his forwardness to consummate the Match, was in respect of a War-rant under his Late Majesties Hand, his Commission under the great Seal, positive order from his Majesty by Letters, since it was agreed by Capitulation to be so many days after the dispensation arriv'd; the Proxies were left to that end in his Hands, and renewed after his Majesties return into England.

11. Last'y, Touching his Petition, he hop'd to justify the Contents of it in such sort that it should not displease his Majesty, nor deserve that expression which was used in the Charge.

While these two Peers were thus contesting, the House of Commons had time to frame their Impeachment against the Duke; as hoping that this, joyned with the Earls, might give him a total Rout: It was therefore presented to the Lords on the Eighth of May, and the Cause managed by Master Glanvil, Master Herbert, Master Selden, Master Pim, Master Mansford, Master Skerland; to whom was added Sir Dudley Diggs, as Prolocutor, and Sir John Elliot brought up the Rear. Sir Dudley Diggs, in his Prologue, after a Complaint made against the Dukes ill ordering the Martial Affairs, gave the Lords a general account of the Impeachment.

First, That the Duke had ingrossed, Bought, and Sold the greatest Offices of the Kingdom.

Secondly, That he had by back-ways and by-ways procured to himself and others the chiefest Honours, which ought to have been the Rewards of Vertue.

Thirdly, That he had unworthily promoted his own Kindred, to the great Charge and Burden of the Crown.

Lastly, That he had cast unjust aspersions upon the Late King, for excuse of his own Exorbitances. After the Prologue, the Commons presented their Accusation, which we refer to the Dukes Answer, a Month after: But whilst the Commons dealt with the Lords, for the removing the Duke from his Place and Council; during his Impeachment, Sir Dudley Diggs, and Sir John Elliot, were committed to the Tower, (yet soon after released,) the Judges giving in their Verdict, That

That the whole House was arrested in their Persons, and the Commons remonstrating thereupon, The Duke being sensible of the number of his Adversaries, even in the House of Lords, perswaded the King, by his Patent to create three of his confederates Barons, to wit, the Lord Manderhill, was created Baron Kimbolton, Grandison Baron Imbercourt, and Calton Baron Tregate, and so having augmented the Number of his Friends, he presents his Defence to the Lords, and forbore the House, in the mean time while his Cause might be determined, which (had he not been well back'd) might have gone hard with him, as we may see by the Commons Impeachment against him for Misdemeanors, Misprisions, Offences, Crimes, and other Matters comprised in those Thirteen Articles following, the Dukes Answer to each particular being adjoyn'd.

First, That he the said Duke, being young and unexperienced, hath of late years, with exorbitant ambition and for his own advantage, procured and ingrossed into his own hands, severall great Offices, both to the Danger of the State, and prejudice of that Service which should have been performed in them, and to the Discouragement of others, who are thereby precluded from such Hopes as their Vertues, Abilities, and publique Employments might otherwise have obtained.

Articles of the House of Commons against the Duke of Buckingham; With the Duke's Reply to them.

Reply, That his late Majesty did of his own Royall motion bestow them upon him, and he hopeth, and conceiveth, he may without Blame receive what his Bountifull Master conferreth upon him, if the Common-Wealth doth not suffer thereby. Nor is it without President, that men Eminent in the esteem of their Sovereign, have held as great and as many Offices as himself, but if it shall be proved, that he falsly or corruptly hath executed those Offices, he is and will be ready to resign them with his Life and Fortunes to his Majesties Dispose.

Secondly, That in the 16 year of the Reign of the late King, he did give and pay to the then Earl of Nottingham, for the Office of Great Admirall of England, and Ireland, and of the Principality of Wales, and Generall Governour of the Seas, and Ships of the said Kingdoms, and for the Surrender of the said Offices, to the intent, the said Duke might obtain them to his own use, the Sum of 8000 l. and did also procure for the said Surrender from the Late Kings, an Annuity of 1000 l. per annum, payable to the said Earl; for which Considerations, the said Earl Surrendered the said Office, with his Letters Patents, unto the late King, who granted them to the said Duke for his Life, which is an Offence contrary to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, those Offices so highly concerning the Administration and Execution of Justice.

Reply, That the Earl of Nottingham, then Lord Admiral, being grown much in years, and finding himself not so fit nor able to perform what appertained to his Place; as formerly, became an earnest Suitor to his late Majesty, to permit him to surrender up his Office; who, at length, being overcome by the Earl's many Sollicitations, condescended thereunto; and his late Majesty, at the entreaty of others, without the Duke's Privacy, was also perswaded to confer it upon the Duke much against his will; he being no way experienced in those Affairs; So that the Earl did freely Surrender, and the Duke accept the Grant of the said Office without any the least Contract or Proviso. But true it is, that his late Majesty Out of his Royall Bounty, did grant to the said Earl a Pension of 1000 l. per annum; as a recompence for his former Service to the Crown; and also the Duke himself did freely and voluntarily, with his late Majesties approbation, as an Argument of his Honourable respects to so noble a Predecessor, send the Earl Three thousand Pounds, which he hopeth is not blame-worthy in him.

Thirdly, That he the said Duke, in the 22. year of the late King, did give and pay unto Edward Lord Zouch, for the Offices of the Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Constable of Dover Castle, the Sum of One Thousand Pounds; and granted also an Annuity of 500 l. per annum, during his Life; and that for the consideration aforesaid, the said Lord Zouch did Surrender his Offices, and Letters Patents, to the late King, who granted them to the said Duke for his life; which Offices (so highly concerning the administration of Justice) the Duke hath ever since held against the Laws of the Land.

Reply,

" Reply, That the Lord Zouch, being grown in years, and unfit to manage the Office of the Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Constable of Dover Castle, which are indeed both but one; discovered a willingness to surrender it, and made severall offers thereof to the Duke of Richmond; who at last contracted with the said Lord Zouch, for his surrender, for the consideration of one Thousand pounds in money, and five hundred pounds per annum; and the said Duke of Richmond being prevented by Death, his late Majesty directed the Duke of Buckingham, to go through with the Lord Zouch for it, upon the same terms; which he was the willingest to do, by reason he had found by experience, that the Kings Service suffered much through the Emulation, dissension and contention, arising between those two Officers: and he hopeth this Act of his, in acquiring this Office, accompanied with such circumstances, the King also being both privy and directing, will receive a favourable construction, especially, considering he was altogether unacquainted with any Law to the contrary.

Fourthly, That he hath neglected the just execution of those his Offices, and violated the trust reposed in, and committed to him by them; inasmuch as through his neglect, the Trade of this Kingdom hath been of late much decayed, and the Seas ingominously infected with Pyrats and Enemies, to the great loss both of Ships and Goods, and imminent Danger of this Kingdom.

" Reply, That the Loss happening to the Kings Subjects by Pyrats and Enemies, hath not proceeded through the Dukes default, as is suggested; but because those Pyrats Ships are built of a mould as fit for flight as for fight; being far too nimble for the Kings Ships. To prevent which inconvenience for the time to come, there is present order taken for the building of Ships of the same shape with those of Dunkirk: And for the Pyrats of Sally, That provision is taken either to restrain by Treaty, or to repress them by Force, as will give good Satisfaction; and this will clearly appear upon proof.

Fifthly, That whereas about Michaelmas last, a Ship called the St. Peter of New-haven, laden with divers Merchants Jewels and Commodities to the value of 40000*l*, or thereabout, for the proper account of Monsieur de Villeurs, then Governour of New-haven, was taken by the Ships of his Majesties late Fleet, and brought into the Port of Plymouth, as a prize, upon probability that the said Ship or Goods belonged to the Subjects of the King of Spain. Whereupon there was an Arrest of two English Ships at New-haven in the Kingdom of France: after which intimation was given to the Advocate in the chief Court of Admiralty, from his Majesty, by Secretary Cook, for the freeing and discharging the said Ship and Goods, and thereupon by Commission under Seal, the said Ship and Goods were released. The said Duke, notwithstanding any such Order, and Decree, detained still to his own use, the Gold, Silver, and Pearls, Jewels and other Commodities so taken out of the said Ship, and unjustly caused the said Ship to be arrested again, In contempt of the Lawes of this Land, and to the prejudice of Trade.

" Reply, That complaint being made on the behalf of some French men at the Councell Table, concerning the St. Peter, and some other ships; his Majesty then present did order, That she and all other should be released, as were found to belong to any Prince or State in Amity with him, provided, they were not fraudulently coloured: And accordingly this Ship was by Sentence in the Admiralty discharged, but within few dayes after, new Information came to the Lord Admirall, That this Ship was laden by the Subjects of the King of Spain in Spain, that the Admirante so waited her beyond the North Cape; And that Witnesses were ready to attest as much: Upon which the Duke acquainted his Majesty therewith, and by his command made stay of this ship, as he was assured (by the opinion of the King, and five other Advocates) he might do: and command was given to the Kings Advocate, to hasten the Examination of Witnesses, in pursuance of the new information. But the French Merchants, impatient of delays, which the producing many Witnesses would occasion, complained

" complained again to the Councell Board, and obtained an Order from thence, for the delivery of the said Ship and Goods upon security; which security was once offered, but after retracted: yet upon the consideration of the testimonies produced, the Kings Advocate informing the Duke, That the proof came short for that Ship, The Duke did instantly give order for her final discharge, and that all her Goods should be re-imbarked to the Owners; which was done accordingly.

Sixthly, That the East-India Merchants in the 21 of the late King's Reign, preparing to set forth four great Ships richly laden in their usuall course of Trade; the Duke moved the Lords then assembled in Parliament, to know, whether he should make stay of those Ships for the Service of the States? which Motion being approved by the Lords, the Duke accordingly did stay those Ships, and after procured a Joyned Action to be entered in the Court of Admiralty, in the Name of the late King, and himself, as Lord Admirall, against 15000*l*. pretended to be Pyratically taken by some Captains of the said Merchants Ships, and in the hands of the said Captains; and accordingly an Attachment was served upon the said Merchants: Whereupon the said Merchants being urged to bring in the 15000*l*. or to go to Prison, made new sure to the Duke for the release of their Ships; who pretending that the Parliament must be moved therein, the Merchants much perplexed, and considering they should lose much by unlading their Ships, and the loss of their Voyage, resolved to tender to the said Duke 10000*l*. for his unjust demand; who by colour of his Office, extorted, and extraited from them the said 10000*l*. and upon receipt thereof, and not before, released the said Ships.

" Reply, That the Motion in Parliament about the stay of the East-India Ships, was only upon apprehension, that they might be serviceable for the defence of the Realm. That the Action entered in the Court of Admiralty against the East-India Company, was not after (as is suggested) but divers Months before that Motion in Parliament, yea, before the Parliament began. That the Composition (mentioned in this Article) was not moved by the Duke, but made by the late King; and that the Company without any Menaces or Compulsion, agreed to the Composition, as willing to give so much, rather then to abide the hazard of the Suit. That of the said Sums, all but 200*l*. was employed by his late Majesties Officers for the benefit of the Navy. And lastly, That those Ships were not discharged upon payment of the said sum of 10000*l*. but upon an Accommodation allowed, that they should prepare other Ships for his Majesty's Service; whilst they went on their Voyage; which accordingly they did.

Seventhly, That the Duke being great Admirall of England, did by colour of the said Office procure one of the principall Ships of the Navy-Royall, called the Vant-guard, and five other Merchants Ships of great burthen, to be conveyed over, with all their Ordnance, Ammunition, and Apparel, into the Kingdom of France; and did compell the said Masters and Owners of the said Ships, to deliver the said Ships into the possession and Command of the French King and his Ministers, without either sufficient security for their re-delivery, or necessary Caution in that behalf, contrary to the duty of his Office, and to the apparent weakning of the Navall strength of this Kingdom.

" Reply, That those ships were lent to the French King without his privy. That when he knew thereof, he did what appertained to his Office; that he did not by Menace, nor any undue practice by himself, or any other, deliver those ships into the hands of the French. That what Error hath since happened, was not in the intencion any way injurious to the State, nor prejudiciall to the interest of any private man.

Eighthly, That the Duke knowing that the said Ships were intended to be employed against the Rochellers and the Protestants elsewhere, did compell them as aforesaid, to be delivered to the French King and his Ministers, to the end, that they might be employed against those of the reformed Religion; contrary to the intencion of our Sovereign Lord

Lord the King, and to his former promise at Oxford, and to the great scandall of our Nation.

“ Reply, That understanding a discovery, that those Ships should be employed against Rochell, he endeavoured to divert the course of such Employment: and whereas it is alledged, that he promised at Oxford that those Ships should not be so employed, he under Favour faith, he was mis-understood; for he only said, that the event would shew it, being confident in the promises of the French King, and that he would have really performed what was agreed upon.

Ninthly, That he hath enforced some who were rich (though unwilling) to purchase Honours; As the Lord Roberts Baron of Truro, who was by Menaces wrought to pay the sum of 10000 l. to the said Duke, and to his use, for his said Barony.

“ Reply, He denieth any such Compulsion of the Lord Roberts to buy his Honour; and that he can prove, that as the said Lord did then obtain it by the solicitations of others, so was he willing formerly to have given a great sum for it.

Tenthly, That in the eighteenth year of the late King, he did procure of the late King the Office of High Treasurer of England, to the Viscount Mandevill, now Earl of Manchester; for which Office he received of the said Viscount to his own use, the sum of 20000 l. of money; and also did procure in the twentieth year of the late King, the Office of Master of the Wards and Liveries for Sir Lionell Cranfield, afterwards Earl of Middlesex; and as a Reward for the said procurement, he had to his own use, of the said Sir Lionell Cranfield, the sum of 6000 l. contrary to the Dignity of his late Majesty.

“ Reply, That he had not, nor did receive any penny of the said Sums to his own use. That the Lord Mandevill was made Lord Treasurer by his late Majesty, without any Contract for it; and though his Majesty did after borrow of the said Lord 20000 l. yet was it upon Proviso of repayment, for which the Duke at first past his word, and after entred him security by Land, which stood engaged untill his late Majesty, during the Duke's being in Spain, gave the Lord satisfaction by Land in Fee-farm, of a considerable value; whereupon the Duke's security was returned back: And that the 6000 l. disbursed by the Earl of Middlesex, was bestowed upon Sir Henry Mildmay by his late Majesty, (without the Duke's privacy) who had and enjoyed it all entire.

Eleventhly, That he hath procured divers Honours for his Kindred and Allies, to the prejudice of the ancient Nobility, and disabling the Crown from rewarding extraordinary Vertues in future times.

“ Reply, That he believeth, he were rather worthily to be condemned in the opinion of all generous minds, if being in such Favour with his Majesty, he had minded only his own Advancement, and had neglected those whom the Law of Nature had obliged him to hold most dear.

Twelfthly, That he procured and obtained of the late King divers Mannors, parcels of the Revenues of the Crown, to an exceeding great value, and hath received, and (to his own use) disbursed, great Sums of money that did properly belong unto the late King; and the better to colour his doings, hath obtained severall privy Seals from his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, warranting the payment of great Sums of money by him, as if such Sums were directed for the secret Service of the State; when as they were disposed of to his own use: and hath gotten into his hands great Sums, which were intended by the late King for the furnishing and victualling of the Navy-Royall, to the exceeding diminution of the Revenues of the Crown, to the abusing and deceiving of his late, and now Majesty, and detriment of the whole Kingdome.

“ Reply,

“ Reply, That he doth humbly, and with all thankfulness, acknowledge his late Majesties bountiful hand to him, and shall be ready to render back into the hands of his now Majesty, whatsoever he hath received together with his Life; to do him service: but for the value suggested in the Charge, he saith, there is a great mistake in the Calculation, as he shall make evident in a Schedule annexed, to which he referreth himself: Nor did he obtain the same by any undue solicitation or practice, nor yet a Release for any Sums so received; but having several times, and upon several occasions, disposed divers Sums of his late, and now Majesty, by their private Directions, he hath Released thereof for his Discharge, which was honourable in them to grant, and not unfit for him to desire, and accept, for his future Indemnity.

Lastly, That he, being a sworn Servant of the late King, did cause and provide certain Plaisters and Potions for his late Majesty in his last sickness, without the privy of his Majesties Physicians; and that although those Plaisters and Potions formerly applied, produced such ill Effects, as many of his sworn Physicians did disallow, as prejudicial to his Majesties health; yet nevertheless did the Duke apply them again to his Majesty: whereupon great Distempers, and dangerous Symptomes appeared in him; which the Physicians imputed to those Administrations of the Duke, whereof his late Majesty also complained; which was an Offence and Misdemeanour of so high a Nature, as may be called an Act of transcendent presumption. And the said Commons by Protestation, suing to themselves the liberties of exhibiting hereafter any other Accusation or Impediment against the Duke; and also of replying unto what the Duke shall answer unto the said Articles; do pray, that the said Duke may be put to answer all and every the Premises; and that such Proceeding, Examinations, Tryals, and Judgments, may be upon every of them had, as is agreeable to Law and Justice.

“ Reply, That his late Majesty being sick of an Ague, a Disease out of which the Duke recovered not long before, asked the Duke what he found most advantageous to his health; the Duke replied, A Plaister, and Posset-drink, administered unto him by the Earl of Warwick's Physician: Whereupon the King much desired the Plaister and Posset-drink to be sent for; and the Duke delaying it, he commanded a Servant of the Dukes to go for it, against the Dukes earnest request, he humbly craving his Majesty not to make use of it, without the advice of his own Physicians, and experiment upon others; which the King said he would do; and in confidence thereof, the Duke left him, and went to London. And in the mean time, he being absent, the said Plaister and Posset-drink were brought; and at the Dukes return, his Majesty commanded the Duke to give him the Posset-drink, which he did, the Physicians then present, not seeming to dislike it; afterward, the Kings health declining, and the Duke hearing a Rumour, as if his Physick had done his Majesty hurt, and that he had administered Physick without advice; the Duke acquainted the King therewith, who with much discontent replied; They are worse then Devils that say so.

Upon occasion of the Dukes Impeachment, this following Paper was secretly conveyed to the Kings Hands.

That the great opposition against the Duke, was stirred and maintained by such as seek the destruction of this free Monarchy, because they find it not ripe to attempt against the King himself, they endeavour it through the sides of the Duke; the persons agreeing in this onemischief, are of divers sorts and humours.

1. Medling and busy persons, who love popular speeches.
2. Covetous Landlords, Inclosers, Depopulators, &c. who being of the Parliament, ease themselves of Subsidies, and lay it on the true Commons, and cry out the Grievances are caused by the Duke.
3. Recusants, who hate the Duke, because of the breach of the Spanish March.
4. Persons indebted, who by Priviledge of Parliament avoid payment.
5. Puritans and Sectaries, Haters of Government, who would have the Kings Power extinguish in matters Ecclesiastical, and limited in Civil.
6. Male-contented, who look upon the Duke with an evil Eye, because they themselves are not preferred.

A Paper conveyed into the Kings Hands, upon occasion of the Dukes Impeachment.

7. Lawyers, who are very fit in Parliaments to second any Complaint against both Church and King, and all his Servants; with their Customs, Records Statutes, and Precedents.

8. Merchants and Citizens, who deceive the King of Customs.

9. Innovators, Plebeicola. That since the time of Henry the 6, these Parliamentary Discouragements were never suffer'd, as being certain Symptoms of subsequent Rebellions, Civil Wars, and the dethroning of Kings, no one Patriot daring to oppose them, least he incur the Reputation of a Coward in his Countries Cause; Kings therefore have ever strengthened themselves with some Favourite, as whom he might better trust than many of the Nobility tainted with this desire of Oligarchy. It behoveth, without doubt, his Majesty to uphold the Duke against them, who if he be but de-courted, it will be the very Corner-stone of that Work, which they intend to lay, for the demolishing of this Monarchy; for if they prevail with this, they have hatched a thousand other Demands to pull the Feathers of Royalty. They will appoint him Counsellors, Servants, Alliances, Limits of Expences, and account of his Revenue: Chiefly, if they can, they will now dazzle him in the beginning of his Reign. Several things, though Actions of the King, are laid as Aspersions upon the Duke, who if he suffer in obeying his Sovereign, the next Attempt will be to call the King to account for any thing he undertakes, which doth not succeed according to all mens expectation and desire.

If it please his Majesty to remove and set aside all these disadvantages, he shall find the Charge against the Duke, very empty and of small moment; All that hath been by the Parliament objected against him, except two or three things that may receive an Answer, being pardon'd at the Kings Coronation, which benefit every poor Subject enjoyeth.

The Apology of Sir Dudley Diggs, and other Members imprisoned in the Tower, about certain words spoken in the House.

Sir Dudley Diggs, as soon as he was released out of the Tower, had somewhat to do to clear himself of certain words, which he was charg'd to have uttered at a Conference; namely, That speaking of the Plaster applied to the late King, he said, That he forbore to speak farther, in regard of the Kings Honour. But after his own solemn Protestation, and that of 36 Lords, that no such words were spoken, the King remained satisfied.

Sir John Elliot also made his Apology, in reference to several sharp Expressions against the Duke, of which he was taxed in a Speech by the Vice-Chamberlain Sir Dudley Carlton, as his comparing him to a strange Beast, when speaking of the plurality of his great and different Offices, he used the word Stellionatus, from a certain discoloured Beast called Stellio; that he used the phrase, That man, which was to be esteemed a great Indignity. That he compared him to Sejanus, &c. After he had explained his meaning in each of these Expressions; the House resolved upon the Question, That in any thing that had proceeded from him, he had not gone beyond the Commission given him. The like Vote they passed for Sir Dudley Diggs, and the rest of those that managed that Conference.

In the mean time, that the Duke stood impeached in Parliament, the Earl of Suffolk dying, and the Chancellorship of Cambridge becoming void by his death; The University understanding it was the Kings pleasure, that the Duke of Buckingham should be chosen Chancellor in his Room, were studious to shew themselves compliant with his Majesties desire in that Election, especially Mr. Maw, the Master of Trinity Colledge, who by his own power and interest, procur'd 43 Votes for the Duke; but there wanted not a strong and resolute party who opposed this Election, and made choice of the Lord Thomas Howard, second Son to the Earl of Suffolk deceased, inasmuch, that the Duke carry'd it only by five Voyces, there being a hundred and eight for him, and a hundred and three for the Lord Howard, who sent a Letter of acknowledgment to Mr. Granado Chester, (who, having some dependence upon him, was the principal Stickler in his behalf) desiring him to impart his thanks to his Friends in the University, who had been ready to give their suffrage for him. The House of Commons thinking it not fit that the Chancellorship of Cambridge, should be conferr'd upon a person that stood publickly charg'd with high Misdemeanours, were about to have signified by Letter to the University, their dislike of that Election; and the rather, for that in the manner of it, there were many Passages in contempt of the House. The King hearing of this their intention, forbade them by Sir Richard Weston, the sending of any such Letter; saying,

That

The Duke of Buckingham chosen Chancellor of Cambridge.

That if any thing in the manner of the Election, were done in contempt of the House, they might inquire after it, and punish the Offenders; but for the Election it self, his Majesty did avow it, and resolv'd to maintain the Universities, against any that should go about to infringe their Liberties; nor had he ever heard, that upon Accusation onely, a man should lose his good Opinion in the World.

Presently after he writ a Letter, in approbation of the foresaid Election: The Duke also sent a Letter of acknowledgment to the University, in which he exprest his high resentment of the honour that was done him in that Choice; and how happy he esteem'd himself, in being thought well of by men of their Profession and Merit; and promis'd to employ his utmost endeavours, for the maintaining of the Charters and Immunities of the University in general, and for advancing Students of Merit and Learning in particular.

About this time, the King earnestly pressed the House of Commons again by their Speaker Sir Henage Finch, about a speedy Supply; letting them know,

That if they did not pass the Bill of Subsidy by the end of the Week following, it would enforce him to take other Resolutions; and if by their denial, or delay, any thing of ill consequence should fall out, either at home or abroad, he called God and Man to witness, that he had done his part to prevent it; by calling his People together, to advise with him, whose sitting, if they dispatch'd this according to his desire, he resolv'd to continue for the dispatch of other Affairs; and after their Recess, to bring them again together the next winter.

The Commons before they sent their Answer to the Kings Majesty, first drew up a Petition to his Majesty;

That he would be pleas'd to remove from all places of Trust and Authority, all such persons, as were either Popish Recusants, or according to direction of former Acts of State, justly to be suspected. And therewithall they sent a large Scrowl, containing the Names of all such Noble-men, and others, as remain'd in places of high Trust in the several Counties of England.

The King presseth the Parliament for Supply.

The Duke of Buckingham having given in his Answer to the late Articles against him into the Lords House, moved their Lordships to send to the Commons for a speedy Reply; whereupon the Commons also desired to have a Copy of his Answer. But the Duke fearing the issue of this Business, humbly applyed himself unto the Lords, whom he intreated to allow him the benefit of the free and general Pardon, granted by King James in Parliament, in the 21 year of his Reign; together with that of the present King at his Coronation. Upon the 14th of June, the Parliament had drawn up another Declaration of Grievances against the Duke, whom they resolv'd utterly to overthrow, though against the Kings Inclination; who thereat incens'd, the very next day dissolved them, and committed the Earl of Bristol to the Tower; sending forth also a Proclamation for burning of all Copies of the afore-mentioned Declaration of the Commons. To shew the manner and sort of the Kings dissolving the Parliament; I have thought it not amiss to insert the Kings Commission under the Great Seal, to that intent, which ran thus;

The Parliament being resolved to prosecute the Duke, is dissolved by the King.

Presently after the King set forth a Declaration, in which he made known the Grounds and Reasons of his dissolving this and the former Parliament. Also by the instance and advice of his Council, taking into consideration the present necessity of his Majesties Affairs, he resolv'd to take some speedy course to advance the impair'd Revenue of the Crown: Whereupon he first declares, That all men of what quality soever, should for two years space, upon pain of high Displeasure, forbear to sollicite any Suit for any thing prohibited in the Book of Bonny, published in King James his time. Next, speciall care was taken by the Council, for the levying of Customs and Imposts, upon such Merchandizes as were Imported and Exported, as being a thing intended to have been sealed by the two last Parliaments, but was prevented by their suddain Dissolution: and because the Forfeitures arising to the Crown by the execution of the Laws against Priests and Recusants, had been corruptly extorted and misemploy'd, by inferior Officers; a Commission under the Great Seal was directed to the Archbishop of York, Sir John Savile, Sir Henry Slingsby, and others, to compound with the said Recusants for Leases of their Lands and Tenements, for Forfeitures due since the tenth year of King James, and Sir John Savile was appointed Receiver of such sums of Money as should be paid upon these Leases. Also Privy-Seals were issued out, and Benevolence proposed; especially the Nobility were incited by the King, to contribute liberally upon the present juncture of urgent Affairs; and the sum required, was to be according to the proportion of the four Subsidies; and three Fifteens intended to have been given by the Parliament. Likewise a Proclamation was set forth, shewing the Kings Intention to make his Revenue certain, by granting his Lands as well held by Copy, as otherwise, to be held in Fee-Farm. The several Maritime Counties and Port-Towns were order'd by the Council, to set out Ships for the guarding of the Coasts against the Attempts of Spain and Flanders; in particular, the City of London was charged with twenty of the best Ships upon the River, with all manner of Tackle and Ammunition, and Victuals for three Months; the City hereupon petition'd for an abatement unto ten Ships, and two Pinnaces; and the Ports of Pool, Lime, and Weymouth, presented an Excuse in behalf of themselves, and the County, alledging the Case to be without President: To these the Council answer'd, That State occasions in times of extraordinary danger, were not to be disputed by ordinary Presidents: To the City, alledging disability, they answer, That the Charge imposed on them, exceeded not the value of many of their private Estates; They therefore requir'd Conformity, without any excuse, or disputing of the Case. To the Lords Lieutenants of the severall Counties, Commissions were sent to Muster those that were apt for War, and to Array and Arm them, according to their severall degrees and faculties: And for the securing of the Coasts, divers of the Kings Ships were employ'd in the River Elbe, to prevent the furnishing of Spain from those parts with Materials for Shipping: A Royal Fleet was also preparing to be set out, under the Command of the Lord Willoughby of Parham, and the Design given out to be for Bahary.

About this time, there came to the Court of England, the News of a great Overthrow given by Count Tilly to the King of Denmark, who had taken up Armes against the Emperour in the Cause of the Prince Elektor Palatine; upon which, the King began presently to advise with his Council about some speedy, and more effectual Course for the supplying him with Money, then had yet been taken; and upon Consultation, a general Loan was Resolv'd upon, as the most convenient way (since the present state of things admitted nor of the way of Parliament); and forthwith Commissioners being appointed, had private Instructions given them, how to behave themselves in the management of the business: As,

1. That for a good example to others, they should themselves lend his Majesty the several sums required.
2. To go according to the Rates at which People were Assessed in the Book of the last Subsidy.
3. To stir up every man to a chearful lending, by declaring the unavoidable necessity of taking this Course, and using other the most prevalent Arguments they could devise; As the Honour of the Nation, the defence of true Religion, the safety of Prince and People.
4. That they appoint the dayes of payment to be within fourteen dayes.
5. That they treat with every one apart, and not in the hearing of others.
6. That they begin with such as are likely to shew best Examples.
7. That they endeavour to discover, whether any by under-hand persuasions, or otherwise, go about to hinder the good Intentions of others; and if any such be found, to certify their Names, Qualities, and Habitations to the Council.
8. That they signify his Majesties Pleasure to remit, upon the lending of these sums, whatsoever hath been desired upon the late Benevolence, or privy-Seals.
9. That they admit of no Suit to be made, or Reasons to be given, for the abating of any sum.
10. That upon their Faith and Allegiance to his Majesty, they keep these Instructions secret to themselves, and not disclose them to any others.

That which made this Loan the more unwelcome, was, For that at the same time the Souldiers return'd from Calice, were Billied in several parts, and their Quarters to be discharg'd by Money rais'd out of the Countries.

Sir Randolph Crew, for shewing himself backward and cold in promoting this Business of the Loan, Several wayes resolv'd on for the advancing of the Kings Revenue.

News brought to the Court of the King of Denmark's Overthrow.

A Commission granted by the Kings for the raising of a general Loan.

Sir Nitholas Hyde advanced to the Office of Lord Chief Justice; in the room of Sir Randolph Crew displaced; 1626.

Sir John Lamb and Dr. Sibthorp Inform against the Bishop of Lincoln at the Council-Table.

The Occasion of a new War begun between England and France.

John was displaced from his Office of Lord Chief Justice, and Sir Nicholas Hyde advanced to the same. The Bishop of Lincoln also had an Information preferred against him at the Council-Table by Sir John Lamb, and Doctor Sibthorp; for publicly speaking certain words concerning the Lord, in disadvantage of the King and his Government, and for favouring that sort of men call'd Parliaments, and Non-conformists; and afterwards for the same things, an Information was given in against him at the Star-Chamber; not long before which, Bishop Lamb hearing that the said Bishop Williams endeavoured to regain the favour of the Duke, dream'd the same Night, that he receiv'd this News: That the Bishop of Lincoln came with Iron Chains, but returned freed from them: That he leaped upon a Horse, departed, and he could not overtake him. This was by him interpreted, to betoken that which afterwards fell out concerning the Bishop of Lincoln taking Arms for the Parliament in Wales, and his being at liberty, when he himself was imprison'd. Besides the cause of the Prince Palatine, there were other important Reasons of State, which exacted these great Supplies of money, the chief whereof was a War now Commencing with France upon this occasion:

Lewis the Thirteenth, King of France, had borrowed of his Brother-in-law, the King of England, the Ship, called the Vaunt-guard, and six Merchants Ships, in pursuance of a Design against Italy, and the Valtoline; but with this Condition, They should not be employed against the Rockellers, between whom, and the French King, an Accord had been lately made by Mediation of the English Ambassadors. Monsieur de Soubise the Stairarch, having gotten together a scattered number of small Ships, took advantage of the French Armies Advance towards Italy, and brake the Agreement unawares; surprizing the Isle of Rhe, and some Ships in the Harbour, and had also taken Port Lewis, if not prevented by the Duke of Vendosme. Lewis (conceiving their Infidelity, turns his whole Design for the Valtoline upon Rockell, and with the seven English Ships under Admiral Pemington, and twenty Dutch under Admiral Hallstein, and the French Navy conducted by Momoraney, brake furiously in upon Soubise, forceth him from his fastness, Reprizeth sundry Ships, and chaseth him to the Isle of Oleron. The King revented this Action of the French King as a Violation of his Royal Parol, and therefore sent him an expostulatory Message, requiring his Reason for his mis-employing of his Ships, and speedy Restitution of them. And when Lewis deferred to give satisfaction of these Particulars, the King sent here a rich Ship of New-haven, and the French King Arrested the Goods of the English Merchants in France; to the value of three hundred thousand pounds: but a length at Reconciliation was made, and the French had their Goods re-imbarked to them; and on the other side, the English Ships and Goods were released. Thus all was calm again for the present, untill the insolent Deportment of the Queens French Attendants produced a new Rupture; her Priest and Confessor had imposed upon her to go bare-foot, to spin, to wait upon her Servants at their ordinary rapists, and to trace on foot in the Mire, on a rainy Morning, from Somerset-house to St. James, (himself riding by her in the Coach) and to finish her progress as far as Tyburn-Gallies; to offer up her Prayers for the Souls of Jesuits, by them stiled Martyrs, formerly executed there for Treason.

The Bishop of Meins had shewed himself too busie, in contesting with the Earl of Holland, about the Queens Dowry-Mahners, to the disgrace of the King, who had conferred that Secretaryship upon the Earl: And the Lady St. George had been proved to have raised suspicion in the young Queen, of the Kings dis-affection to her, and over-much Favour to the English Ladies; and that through a causeless taking distast at a Repulse, from riding in the Coach with both their Majesties, Ladies of greater Eminency worthy claiming Preferment. These, and many other Arrogancies, had been justly laid to the Charge of the Queens French Domesticks, which appearing altogether inolevable, the King thought good to discharge them all, and paying them all their Dues, with large Rewards, the whole amounting to twenty thousand pounds, and eight hundred pounds sterling, Commanded them all Home to their own Country; where making their Complaint to the French King, they induced him to send over an Ambassador on purpose to Demand their Restitution; whose Negotiation yet proved ineffectual; by reason that the Parliament of Rouen had in the mean time Arrested the English Wine-Merchants Ships at Bly Castle, upon the Gironde: a thing so ill resented by his Majesty, That he resolved upon Hostility with France.

In the mean time, the Protestants Affairs in Germany were at a low Ebb, and danger from thence seemed to threaten us at our own Homes, which appeared also the more Portentous to us; for that about the same time, our Fleet under the Command of the Lord Willoughby, and the Earl of Down, which had been sent out to the Aid of the Rockellers, had met with so terrible a Storm, as they were all scattered, and found much difficulty to gain safe Harbour.

This Grand Assesment of the Loan, meeting with such Opposition from People of all sorts of degrees; those of lower Rank were order'd to appear in the Military Yard, near St. Martins in the Fields, before the Lieutenant of the Tower, to be by him there lifted for Souldiers; it being thought fit, that those who refus'd to assist with their Purse in the Common Defence, should be forc'd to serve in their Persons: Those of higher Quality were bound over by Recognizance to appear at the Council-Table, which accordingly they did, and several of them were committed close Prisoners to the Fleet, Marshalsea, Gate-house, and other Prisons; among these imprison'd Gentlemen, Sir John Elliot being one, sent a Petition to his Majesty, in which he quoted many Presidents of former Kings Reigns, to shew, that all manner of Aides, and Taxes never us'd to be levied, but by the general consent of the Nobility and Commons assembled in Parliament, and give other Reasons and Motives of this forbearance to contribute to the said Loan; Notwithstanding this Petition, he remained a Prisoner in the Gate-house, till the general Order of Discharge.

Sir Peter Hayman, upon the same occasion, being charg'd by the Lords of the Council, with Refractoriness and unwillingness to serve the King, was Commanded to go upon his Majesties Service into the Palestina; which Command, having first set his Estate in order, he obey'd.

It had been long since that George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, had been under a Cloud, and little say by at Court; but now at length an occasion hapned, which brought him into use; disfavoured with the King, which was this: Doctor Sibthorp, and Doctor Manning, two eminent Preachers at Court, having zealously preach'd up the Duty and Necessity of the Loan; the first affirming,

That the Prince hath Power to direct his Councils, and to make Laws; and that Subjects, if they cannot exhibit active Obedience, in case the thing commanded, should be against the Law of God, or of Nature, or were impossible, yet nevertheless they ought to yield a passive Obedience; and in all other cases they were bound to active Obedience.

The Second maintaining,

That the Kings Royal Command in imposing of Loans and Taxes, though without Common Consent in Parliament, doth oblige the Subjects Conscience, upon pain of Eternal Damnation.

These Sermons were entertain'd at Court with general Applause; that of Doctor Sibthorp, especially call'd Apostolick Obedience, which was licens'd and approv'd by the Bishop of London; also the King sent an express Command to Archbishop Abbot, to license this Sermon, which he refusing, was for a time suspended from his Archiepiscopal See; and a Commission was granted to the Bishops of London, Durham, Oxford, Bath and Wells, to execute for the present time that Jurisdiction.

The Archbishop, that the Truth and Reason of these things might be manifested to the World, set a large Narrative of them written with his own hand; wherein he declared, That being of fifty five years of Age when these things befell him, and having liv'd so long, for ought he knew, detain'd in a place of high Trust, he thought it fit, that the Reason of his removal should be understood, least it might turn to the scandal of his Person and Calling: That his absentsing himself from Court, and publick Services, however sinisterly interpreted by his Enemies, was occasion'd only through his indisposition of Body, and not any wilfull neglect, or Contumacy. That the Cause of the Dukes displeasure toward him, was not upon any just ground, but for being one that cared not to stoop to him, so as to become his Vassall. That it was the Dukes design to urge the licencing of this Book upon him, thereby to reduce him to this strait; that either by doing it he might discover a great deal of baseness and unworthiness, or by refusing, he might incur the Kings Indignation: Then he related by way of Dialogue, all the passages and discourses that hapned between Mr. William Murray of the Bed-Chamber, who was sent to him from the King, with his own Objections and Reasons why he could not license the Book. He gives a Character of Doctor Laud, then Bishop of Bath and Wells, who was employ'd to answer his Objections; brands him with an unworthy manner of life before his Rise, with Ambition and Ingratitude to his Benefactors: he repeats Doctor Lauds Answer, and shews the Invalidity of it; then he relates the discourse between him and Secretary Conway, who came to Croyden to him with a Message from the King, commanding his retirement to Canterbury. And lastly, He rehearsed the manner of the Dukes being first brought into Favour with King James, and how mainly Instrumental he was in that business, by the Power and Credit he had with Queen Anne; for which, he said, the Duke then profess'd himself infinitely obliged to him, and seriously promis'd to follow the wholesome Counsels which he gave him.

The Archbishop's Narrative, concerning the cause and manner of his suspension.

Of those Gentlemen that were in Custody for Refractoriness in the business of the Loan, five, Namely, Sir Thomas Darnell, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Corbet, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Richard Hambden, brought their Habeas Corpus, and came to their Tryal before Sir Nicholas Hyde, chief Justice; After the Cause had been argued between Sir Robert Heath, the Kings Attorney-general, and those that were Counsel for the Prisoners; as Serjeant Brampton for Sir John Heveningham, Mr. Selden for Sir Richard Hambden, Mr. Noy for Sir Walter Earl, and Mr. Calthrop for Sir John Corbet; the Lord chief Justice at last concluded, That since they were committed by the Kings Authority, the Court could not free them; so that for that time they were remanded, till such time as the Order came out for a general Release.

The five Gentlemen imprison'd about the Loan, have their Habeas Corpus granted, and are brought to their Tryal.

The Irish Papists now hoped to make their Markets, and therefore in lieu of some Favour to them in the penal Law, offered to furnish the King at their own Charge, with a constant Army of five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; and a large Contribution for the safe-guard of the the narrow Seas. This Motion was opposed in England by Sir John Savill, who put the State upon Collecting the Arrears of Recusants Thirds, due to the King by Law; and in Ireland, by the Lord Primate of Armagh, the Bishop of Derry, and divers others, who publicly protested against it, as a Course likely to preserve the Papists Interests, and to sink the Protestants; whereupon the Lord Deputy resorted to the Primare, and minds him, that as a privy Councillor, he was concerned to promote the Kings Affairs; and so moved him, to try how far he could prevail with the Protestants for some Competency to the Kings Necessities; which he did in a very Learned Speech, though the Success answered not his Expectation.

The Duke of Buckingham's Expedition to the Ile of Rhe.

It was now the third year of his Majesties Reign, when the action was agreed on; and though Money came not so plentifully as was hoped, yet the Duke of Buckingham, desirous to wipe away the Imputation of Negligence, in relation to his Admiralship, had, with much ado, completed his Naval Forces, consisting of six thousand Horse and Foot in ten Ships-Royal, and ninety Merchant-men; with which he sets sail from Portsmouth the twenty seventh of June, and publishes his Manifesto the twenty first of July following, declaring at large the Kings affection to the Reformed Churches in France, and his Displeasure at the last mis-employing of his Ships against the Rochellers. The first design of this Fleet was intended against Fort Lewis, wherein prevented by the Duke of Angoulême, they resolved upon the Ile of Rhe; twelve Ships therefore were sent to Guard the Entry of Port Breton, the rest sailed on to a Fort of the Ile of Rhe, called de la Prie, making their Approaches with their Cannon so near, that Monsieur Toras, Gouverneur of the Citadel of St. Martin, perceiving their Intention, sent out his Forces, to the number of One thousand, in seven parajons, Horse and Foot, to impede their coming on Shore: These were encountered by twelve Hundred English, whom Sir John Burrough, Sir Alexander Brett, Sir Edward Conway, and Sir Charles Rich, had landed by the advantage of their great Ordnance. The Fight was sharp and quick, wherein many brave Gentlemen lost their Lives on both sides; of the French, Monsieur Restingier, Brother to Toras, Chancelier Carpes, Naval, Talian, Montaine, Hensley, Boissone, Condanne; sundry Captains, Lieutenants, and Ensigns, most of the Officers of better Note wounded; of the English, Sir Thomas York, Sir William Elgden, Sir Thomas Thorne, Sir George Blundell, Cornway, Glin, Whaley, Powell, Woodhouse, Goring, &c. and a Kinsman of Sir George Blundell, with Monsieur de Blancard, Agent for the Duke of Rohan, and the Protestants; and of the wounded were, Rich, Conway, Hawke, Greenville, Abraham Rainford, Wellome, Thorp, Maryles, and Bennet: the Victory uncertain. The English General removes his Camp, to make good his Publication there in French of the Reasons of the War, and intrenching, dispatches Soubiz and Sir William Beecher to Rochell, who returned with five Hundred Foot, and found the Duke before St. Martins Castle (the Chief strength of the Island) notwithstanding the dissuasion of his Councill, who advised him first to attempt the other Castle called the Medo, which they might in all likelihood have carried, and would have proved an handsome and safe place of Retreat in their future Necessity. Buckingham falls to circumvallation, ording the Ships to encompass the Island without, to hinder all Provision on and Supply from Toras; by which means the besieged were for the space of two Months greatly distressed, in which time there hapned a hot Conflict between both Parties, and that with equal success; and by a Letter of Toras to Monsieur Bellimount, their extremity appears to be such, that (as he there says), The Mills could not long stand, all their Corn was spent, which enforced their Souldiers to feed on their store of Bisket, not lasting above ten days: hereupon the Duke of Buckingham summons Toras, who refusing to falsify his Trust, the English now strengthened with fresh Auxiliaries from England and Ireland, under the Command of Sir Ralph Bingle and Sir Pierce Crosby, set themselves to invent new sorts of Engines to batter the Citadel, all which were rendered fruitless by Wind and Waves. And now Abbot Marsilaine procures Monsieur Valin to undertake the conveying of twelve Pinnaces laden with Provision, to the Relief of Toras and his Souldiers, which he prosperously achieved, and at his Return carried back with him their sick and wounded, and Women, to the Duke of Orleans. In the mean time scarcity afflicts the English Camp, and Sir John Burroughs, viewing the Works, is shot through, whereof he shortly dies; the French King comes from Court to the Camp, and thence in ten dayes attempts to send over some Aids to the Castle, but the English Ships repelled them, and three daies after flew another Brother of Toras, and put to flight his Squadron: and now the Souldiers of the Castle were reduced to greater hardship then before; not being furnish'd with Bread for above four dayes; wherefore having no other way left, Toras resolved to win time by treating with the Duke of Buckingham about surrender, hoping in the interim to have some better News from his Associates, which accordingly fell out; for Monsieur Maupile, who with other Pilots, heretofore had sounded the selves, and designed the station for the Ships, contrived a way to bring them succour in despite of the English; it was in the Winter, the Nights long and dark, by which advantage he had opportunity to pass by them with a Fleet of 34 Sailer, 150 Mariners, 300 Souldiers, 160 of the chief Nobility, and many Noble Commanders, with great store of Viands, and other Provision, having before sent some dissembling Renegades to tell the English that he passed a contrary way: so that when the Duke of Buckingham expected a Surrender, they boldly shewed him their Rundlets of Wine, Turkeys, and Capons upon the heads of their Pikes and Spears.

The Duke hereat dismayed, spends the Night in Council, and determines with all speed to raise the siege, and begone; but the Rochellers Intreaties, and Dolbiers Arrival from England, with assurance of Auxiliaries, unhappily prevailed with him for a longer stay, during which, the fame of fresh Supplies to the Besiegers published over all France, to be coming under Command of the Earl of Holland, hastened the French to send forth another Fleet, consisting of fifteen good Ships, and Thirteen smaller Boats; part to St. Martins, and the rest to the Meadow Castle; besides seven others which got to the Meadow Fort by Bellamouns command: And now the French King resolves to dislodge the English, and dispatches over an Army of Four Thousand Foot, and two Hundred Horse, besides Volunteers, under the Command of the Marshal of Schomberg, with Marilane his Lievenant General, to whom came all the besieged and greatest part of the Islanders, being in all above Eleven Thousand men; after which another Army under Command of Bascompiere, and Halere, with Eight hundred of their Kings Lifeguard, a hundred and fifty of the Country thereabout, 30 of the Kings horse, and Three great brals Pieces, land at the Meadow Castle. Against these last, the Duke of Buckingham marches with five hundred Foot, and fourty horse; and forceth them to retreat to the Castle, and returning to his Camp, finds the Trenches possessed by another Party of the French Army; Stanley is ordered to beat them out again; which he doth by main Force, though not without loss; and the Lord Montjoy seized a small Troop of French: him they endeavoured to surprize with six horse in show; whom he chased so far, that he had almost come in danger of their Ambuscado. One dark night a party of English fell upon a party of French, and not well discerning one another, so mingled, that by mistake the English falling into the French Camp, became a prey to them: Nor did Warr only afflict the English, but also Sicknes and Wane, whereby their Souldiers and Seamen were generally enfeebled, which put the Duke upon his final Resolution of taking his Farewell of the Island, with one more assault to St. Martins Castle. Toras had intelligence of it, and therefore he managed his business accordingly, and gave them so hot a welcome, as, being oppressed and fell'd to the ground with shot, they dropt in heaps; and after a great loss received, the General commands a Retreat to be founded, and soon after demolishes his Works, fills his Ditches, and levels his Trenches, in order to his departure: Schomberg and Marilane pursue, hollowing to them in a Bravado, and brandishing their Swords drawn. The English thinking the Enemy would then have charged them, drew up in Batallia; but they, knowing what advantage the Way would shortly give them, made a halt, whereupon the Duke marches on in Military order until they came to the Village Carda, where they made another stand, and by an Ambuscado of Musqueteers placed behind the old Walls, Walks, Hedges, and Ditches, compelled the French to retreat; but the whole Army coming up, followed them slowly for 3. Miles; till they came to Anserine Causeway, which was so narrow, that they could only march six a breast, with Ditches on either side, mostly ending in Salt-pits: and now Schomberg, espying his expected opportunity, powred forth a great volley of shot against them, and then the English began to march as fast as possibly, but the Lord Montjoy's Troops, unable to endure the Charge of the French horse, turned tayl, and riding in amongst the other Ranks, put them into such a disorder, as enabled the French easily to break in upon them and rout them, with no small slaughter, overthrowing some into the Ditches, and Salt-pits, piercing others as they lay in the Dirt; nor was flight any whit more auspicious to them, for those who confusedly ran away, and casting away their arms, leaped into the water, were also cut off. Cunninghams horse fought it out nobly unto the last man. Montjoy was taken prisoner, and civilly used. The Reformadoes by uneven and turning paths, made their way to the further Bridge, with much danger, where joining with Conway, Crosby, Fryar, and Hackfoyl, and their forces, made good that Passage by repulse of the Enemy, and leaving a Guard of Musqueteers there all day, set the Bridge on Fire, and lodged that night stragglingly up and down; the next day, the Duke demanded and obtained the dead Bodies, and then went on board.

Great was this dayes Loss, viz, about fifty Officers, among whom were Sir William Cunningham, Sir Charles Rich, and Sir Alexander Brett, and near two Thousand common Souldiers slain, thirty Prisoners of Note, and forty four Colours, taken: of the French, not above three hundred lost. The Duke hoises sail, and meets the Earl of Holland with his unseasonable Recruits near the Western Coast of England; and at his return finding a favourable reception at the Kings hands, lodges the loss of the design upon the Earls not seconding the Expedition. But at Sea, things went somewhat better, where Captain Tretor in his return from Hambury, seized by Command a great French Ship at the Texell in Holland, named the Sanct Spirit, with twenty brals Culverines, two brals Semipalverins, two other brals Guns, sixteen large Iron Guns, and two lesser: in the Hold for Ballast, twelve great Guns, Arms for eleven hundred Souldiers, and eighteen barrels of Powder; and Sir John Penington, Vice-Admirall, took thirty four of their rich Merchant Men homewards bound, all which were safely brought unto England, to sweeten, though not counter-vail, the loss received. The poor remains of this Army, mostly Irish and Scots, and consequently rude and boisterous, were billeted in Villages, to the great disgust of the Country people.

The Kings Condition at this time was somewhat low, his Exchequer poor, and his Reputation impaired by the improperous enterprizes for the Assistance of the Rochellers; now more then ever distressed, his Confederates the King of Denmark vanquish'd by the Emperour, and the English Garrison of Strand reduced to great extremity; The causes of which Evils were gravely represented in Sir Robert Cottons Speech of Advice to certain Lords of the Council, when he was call'd to deliver his Opinion. Upon these and the like Considerations, it was resolv'd on by the Council, That a Parliament should be summon'd; and immediately Writs were Issued forth. Also a Commission pass'd under the Great Seal, to Levy Monies throughout the Nation by Impositions in nature of an Excise; and the Lord Treasurer was ordered to pay 30000 l. to Philip Burlemas, a Dutch Merchant, to be by him return'd over into the Low Countreies to Sir William Balfour, and

A Letter written by an English Jesuite, to the Father Rector at Brussels, discovering their secret designs against this Church and State.

The Parliament assembled.

A Letter directed to the House of Commons, call'd, A Speech without doors; laying open the Miscarriages of the Kingdom.

The Case of the Imprison'd Gentlemen Debated.

John Dalber, for the raising of a Thousand Horse, and hereupon there were strange suspicions and jealousies entertained by many men, as if the intent of raising these German Horse, had been to bring them over hither to enforce the payment of this Excise. There likewise began a Consultation about advancing of the King's Revenue, by levying of Ship-Money upon the Counties, but the Council thought fit not to go on with it, in regard of the approaching Parliament. Not long before the beginning of which Convention, there were apprehended a company of Jesuits in Clackenwell at a house designed for a Colledge of that Order; and among the rest of their Papers, there was found the Copy of a Letter, written to their Father Rector at Bruxells, wherein the Authour of it acquainted Father Rector with all the subtle Plots and Contrivances their Society had laid for the imbroyling this State, and for the erecting of an Universall Catholick Monarchy; and to this end he said they chiefly made use of Arminians and Projectours, and that both these Factions should co-operate to destroy the Parliament, and to introduce a new form of Government; that is to say, Oligarchy; and that their chief care was to stave off the Protestants for having any influence upon the Duke, lest they should negotiate a Reconciliation between him and the Parliament. Also, how that many times, to bring their purposes about, they took upon them the semblance of Paritans; With several other Machinations and Devices contained in the said Letter.

The 17th of March being come, the Parliament assembled, and, Sir John Finch chosen Speaker for the House of Commons, the King salutes them and tells them, That the greatness of the common danger was such as required a speedy supply, and therefore they may rest assured, that it was the principal cause of their Convocation, wherein he hoped they would shew themselves such true Patriots of the true Religion, the Lawes and Liberties of this State, and just Defence of their Friends and Allies, now in such hazard by Popish Enemies, as not to deceive his Expectations which were very great, though indeed somewhat nip'd by remembrance of the distractions of the last Meeting. After the King, the Lord Keeper addrest his Speech to them, wherein he enlarg'd himself upon all that the King had briefly intimated to them before, and earnestly press'd them to consider of some speedy way for the supplying of his Majesties necessities. No sooner was this Parliament met, but presently before any thing had been begun to be debated among them, there came a Letter directed to the Members of the House of Commons, concerning the Grievances and inconveniences of the State, from one who had been a Member of the former Parliament. This Letter was call'd, A Speech without doors; and first laid open the abuses of unlawfull Elections, when many times the Country by a threatening Letter from the Lord Lieutenant, was forc'd to choose only those whom he appointed, were the party never so ignorant or corrupt; the ill consequences of prohibiting freedom of speech, since there could be no redress of Enormities or Injuries, if Men might not dare to complain freely of them: nor could the truth of any passage or transaction be brought to light, if men were discourag'd from revealing the whole circumstance of what they knew. Next, it took notice of the several sorts of grievances, as well those which concern'd the Nation in generall, as in particular. As,

1. The attaining of Honours by base and mercenary ways, without any merit or vertue in the Person so advanc'd.
2. The ill carriage of the Wars, and the consuming of a Mass of Treasure to no purpose, which was caus'd by that sort of men which may be well term'd abusers of Princes, perswading them to War and to become Poor, when they might live in Peace and become Rich: and for this the Parliament had an unjust aspersions cast upon them, as if they had been a cause to draw his Majesty into a War, and had failed on their parts to contribute to it; the disorders and outrages committed by the Souldiers in the Country, when as there was no occasion, nor any Enemy appearing.

Lastly, It exposited them to manifest to the King their willing minds to repair and fit to Sea his Majesties Navy, which might be term'd the Walls of England, and to take it upon themselves, with the advice of experienced Men, to make them able and serviceable.

The first thing taken into consultation, was the opening of the Grievances of the Kingdom; and the first Grievance they debated on was, the Case of those Gentlemen, who, having refus'd the Leas, were notwithstanding their Habeas Corpus, commanded to Prison: This business took up a long and earnest debate; which was chiefly manag'd by Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Sir Edward Cook, and Sir Robert Phillips, all of them eagerly contending for the Liberties and Priviledges of the Subject, against the illegality (as they call'd it) of the Leas, and the imprisoning of men without alledging just cause: onely Sir John Cook, Secretary of State, argued for the King, and affirmed it to be more proper, that Supplies should be first taken into consideration, and afterwards the redress of Grievances: We should begin, said he, with the King, and not with our selves. Afterwards at another Debate, the Judges of the Kings Bench, Judge Whitlock, Judge Doddridge, and the Lord Chief Justice Hide being desired to declare themselves upon this business, spoke in justification of their proceedings upon the Habeas Corpus, and that if they had granted them Bail upon the Habeas Corpus, it must needs have reflected upon the King, as if he had unjustly imprison'd them: In conclusion, it was Resolv'd upon the Question no, man Gain saying; 1627.

1. That

1. That no Freeman ought to be restrain'd by the Command of the King or Privy Council, without some cause of the Commitment.
2. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus, ought to be granted upon request to every man that is restrain'd, though by the Command of the King, the Privy Council, or any other.
3. That if a Freeman be Imprison'd by the Command of the King, the Privy Council, or any other, and no cause of such Commitment express'd, and the same be return'd upon a Habeas Corpus granted for the said party, then he ought to be delivered or bailed.

The Parliament next proceeded to the drawing up of a Petition against Recusants.

1. That all Lawes and Statutes against Jesuits and Popish Priests be put in full power and execution.
2. That a strict course be taken for the discovery and apprehending of them.
3. That all Popish Recusants be prohibited from coming to Court, or within Ten miles of London.
4. That no Place of Trust or Authority should be committed to them; with other Particulars, to the like effect.

This Petition was solemnly presented from both Houses by the Lord Keeper to the King, who gave to every Article a positive and satisfactory Answer. There had lately been presented to the House of Commons by Secretary Cook, certain Propositions from the King touching Supplies, and the setting forth of Ships and Men for forraign Service; These Propositions after some little Consultation about them, were laid aside, and the Debate concerning Grievances resum'd, Sir Francis Seymour urg'd, That the late Supplies which had been given, had purchas'd nothing but dishonour; and that what the Subject gave, unless his Majesty employ'd Men of Integrity and Experience, would be but thrown into a bottomless bag. Sir Thomas Wentworth said, Unless we can be secur'd for our Liberties, we cannot give. But at length, after two other Messages from the King, Mr. Pym mov'd for a Five Subsidies quick dispatch, and presently Five Subsidies were granted: The granting of these five Subsidies gave the King such satisfaction therein, that he sent them word by Secretary Cook, That he would King deny them nothing of their Liberties which any of his Predecessors had granted. This encouraged them to fall afresh upon the Peoples Liberties, and Sir Edward Cook, Sir Dudley Diggs, Mr. Selden and Mr. Littleton, delivered the Opinion of the House to the Lords, where at first it found some opposition in consideration of the dependance of their Interests upon the Prerogative; which by this means would be too much invalidated: but at length it was carried by the Popular Party, the Opposites not daring to enter their Protestations upon Record, for fear of incurring the publique hatred.

Personall Liberty thus settled, and a Petition presented to the King against the billeting of Souldiers in the Countries (to which he promis'd an answer in convenient time) the House fall next (by the perswasion of Sir Edward Cook) upon that memorable Petition of Right, and having Magna Charta, and six other Statutes explanatory of it, on their side, delivered their Petition to the Lords; at which Conference, the Kings Council Sir Robert Heath Attorney-Generall, and Serjeant Ashley being permitted to argue against the Propositions that were tender'd by the Commons in order to this Petition of Right, Serjeant Ashley said, That they tended rather to an Anarchy than to a Monarchy; That if they be yielded to, it is to put a Sword into the Kings hand with one hand, and to take it out with the other; That they must allow the King to govern by Acts of State, otherwise he is a King without a Council, or; which is as bad, hath a Council without Power; That the Question is too high to be determin'd by Law, where the Conqueror or conquer'd will suffer irreparable loss. For these Expressions the Serjeant being call'd to the Bar by the Lords, and committed to custody, was driven at length to recant what he had said: At another Conference the Lords propounded their Addition to be made to the Petition of Right. We present this humble Petition to your Majesty, with the care not only of preserving our own Liberties, but with due regard to leave where that Sovereign Power, wherewith your Majesty is trust'd for the Protection, safety, and happiness of the People. But after that divers of the Commons had deliver'd their Opinions at large, why this Clause could not be added; the Lords concurr'd, That without any addition or preface, the Petition should be presented to the King: the Effect of which Petition was as followeth;

First, They do pray your most excellent Majesty, That no man hereafter be compelled compelled to make or yield any Gift, Loan, Benevolence, Tax, or such like Charge, without common consent by Act of Parliament; and that none be called to make answer, or to take such Oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise be molested, or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof.

Secondly, That no Freeman be taken, and imprisoned, or be diseised of his Freehold or liberty, or his free customs, or be out-lawed, or exiled, but by the lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Laws of the Land.

Thirdly, That your Majesty would be pleased to remove the Souldiers, and Marriners now Bilited in divers Counties, and that your People may not be so burthened in time to come.

Fourthly, That the late Commissions for proceeding by Martiall Law, may be revoked and annulled, and that hereafter no Commission of like nature may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever to be executed, left by colour of them, any of your Majesties Subjects be destroyed and put to death contrary to Law, and the Franchises of the Law.

All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent Majesty, as their Rights and Liberties, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; and that your Majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, That all Awards, Doings, or Proceedings, to the prejudice of your People, shall not be drawn hereafter into Consequence, and Example.

About the same time that the Addition which the Lords propounded was in Debate, there came a Letter from the King to the House of Lords; in which among other things,

He declar'd it to be his Royall Pleasure, which, God willing, he would ever continue and constantly maintain, That neither he, nor his Privy Councell should or would at any time hereafter command to Prison, or otherwise restrain the persons of any, for not lending Money; nor for any cause which in his Conscience did not concern the Publick good, nor would he be drawn to pretend any Cause, wherein his Judgment was not fully satisfied.

This, Sir Thomas Wentworth said, Was a Letter of Grace, but that the People were not to be satisfied but by a Parliamentary way; That the Debate would spend much time: That it was not directed to the House of Commons; And that the Petition it self would redress all mistakes.

Nor did the frequent Messages of the King for the expediting of those Subsidies lately granted, take any effect untill this great Debate was ended. After the Petition of Right was presented to the King, presently this Answer was return'd;

The King willeth that Right be done, according to the Laws and Customs of the Realm, and that the Statutes be put in due execution, that his Subjects may have no cause to complain of any Wrong or Oppressions, contrary to their just Rights and Liberties: To the preservation whereof, he holds himself in Conscience as well obliged, as to that of his Prerogative.

There had been lately a Charge brought in by Mr. Rous, against Doctor Edward Manning, in reference to certain Sermons before mentioned; which the House of Commons taking into Consideration, drew up a Declaration against him, shewing, That in the foresaid Sermons, called Religion and Allegiance; he maintain'd, That the Kings Royall Command in imposing Loans, Taxes, and other Aides upon his People, though without consent in Parliament, did oblige them upon pain of eternall Damnation: That those of his Subjects who refus'd the Loan aforementioned, in such manner as is before recited, did therein offend the Laws of God, and were guilty of Rebellion and Disobedience: That Authority of Parliament was not necessary for the raising of Aides and Subsidies: That the proceedings of such Assemblies are not fit for the supply of the urgent Necessities of State.

This Declaration was presented to the Lords at a Conference, and Mr. Pym appointed to manage that Conference; whereupon he made a large Discourse upon each particular Article, aggravating the heinousness and danger of such Opinions, and the ill Consequences that would arise from the suffering and allowing them. Not long after, by consent of both Houses, Judgment

The Kings first Answer to the Petition of Right not satisfactory.

A Declaration drawn up by the Parliament against Dr. Manning, about two scandalous Sermons which he had formerly preach'd.

A passed against the Doctor, notwithstanding his solemn submission, made after a most humble manner; That he should be Imprison'd, Fin'd, disabled from ever having any Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and from preaching at Court: That he should be suspended from his Cure for three years, and that his Books should be burnt.

The Kings Answer to the Petition of Right being read in the House of Commons, was judged too scant, in respect of the time and pains that had been employed in the contriving of it: But that which brought a far greater Discontent among them, was a Message that came a while after from his Majesty; wherein, signifying the Resolution he held for the concluding of that present Session, he required them not to enter upon any new Business, which might spend greater time, or lay a Scandal on the Asperion upon the State-Government, or Ministers thereof: this sharp Message caused the House to turn into a Grand Committee, to consider what was fit to be done; and at last, upon their humble Petition, for a clear and satisfactory Answer to the Petition of Right, the King (manifesting to the World, how free and candid his Concessions were, in granting to his Subjects, whatever in reason they could desire) sent them a short, but full Answer in this form;

SOIT DROIT FAIT COME IL EST DESIRE.

This Answer was received with the general Acclamations of both Houses; and the Citizens for joy thereof made Bonfires, and rung their Bells; and the King, for further satisfaction, received into his favour, About the Archbishop of Canterbury, Williams Bishop of Lincoln, the Earl of Essex, Lincoln, Warwick, Bristol, and the Lord Say; all which had heretofore lain under a Cloud of the Kings displeasure: and suffered the Commission of Loan and Excize to be cancelled in his own presence; so that now there appeared not the least wrinkle of discontent on either side.

It was now the 4th year of his Majesties Reign, when the Parliament not well digesting their disappointment in their former Accusation of the Duke of Buckingham, drew up another Remonstrance against him, and Bishop Neal, and Bishop Land, which they presented, together with the Bill of Subsidies, to the King, in the Banqueting-house of Whitehall; to which he answered, That he expected not such a return for his favourable Answer to their Petition of Right; and as for their Grievances, he would take time to consider of them.

There having also been exhibited in the Star-Chamber, an Information against the Duke, for several Offences and Misdemeanours; an Order was made in that Court, that the said Bill or Information, and all Proceedings thereupon, should be forthwith taken from the File, according to the Kings express will and pleasure. Moreover, it having been given out by Mr. Christopher Eukner, a Member of the House of Commons, that the Duke at his Table should utter these words; Tush, it makes no matter what the Parliament doth, for without my leave and authority, they shall not be able to touch the hair of a Dog. He made a Protestation in the House of Lords, That he never had those words so much as in his thoughts; which Protestation, the Lords commanded to be entered upon Record. He also taxed one Mr. Melvin of certain Aspersions and Scandals of a high Nature, which he had cast upon him.

The Lords about this time, took offence at the Commons, for omitting their Names, which should have been expressed in these words; The Lords Spiritual and Temporal: which the Commons excused, as a thing not intended; and which, if their Lordships pleased to return the Bill, should be amended: But the King absolutely resolving to hold up the Duke, had framed to tart an Answer to the last Remonstrance, as provoked the Commons (so soon they had forgot his Majesties late Act of Grace,) to double upon him against Tonnage and Poundage; which being a matter of too great a value and consequence to be so hazarded, the King determin'd to prevent, by adjourning the Parliament unto the 20th of October, which he accordingly did. In this Session were enacted these Laws.

1. For further Reformation of divers Abuses committed on the Lords-Day, commonly called Sunday.
2. To restrain the passing or sending of any to be Popishly bred beyond the Seas.
3. For the better suppressing of unlicensed Alehouse-keepers.
4. For continuance of divers Statutes, and repeal of others.
5. For the establishing the Estates of the Tenants of Bramfield and Tate, in the County of Dorset, and of the Tenures, Rents, and Services thereupon reserved, according to a late Composition made for the same, with the King, then Prince of Wales.
6. For the confirmation of the Subsidies granted by the Clergy.
- And 7. For the grant of five intire Subsidies, granted by the Temporality.

About this time, or a little before, Doctor Lamb, a Favourite of the Dukes (who had been formerly twice Arraigned, once for Necromancy, and another time for a Rape) was killed in Leikbury, by the enraged Multitude, who hated him both for his own sake, and the Dukes, (whose Devil he was called) and flying at him, though guarded with four Constables, and their Retinues, struck him down, and grievously mawled him, beating out one of his eyes, and leaving him half dead on the place. He was from thence carryed to the Poultry-Counter, where he dies, pittyed of few, and loved of none, according to his own Prediction the year before.

Not long after him Doctor Prescot, that famous Preacher, departed this life, a man as famous for his goodness, as the other was infamous for his lewdness.

The Kings last Answer to the Petition of Right, which gives satisfaction.

The Parliament frame a Remonstrance against the Duke of Buckingham, Bishop Neal, and Bishop Land.

The Parliament adjourned.

Dr. Lamb set upon by the People, and killed.

This year Sir Charles Morgan, Commander of the English Forces under the King of Denmark in Germany, having a long time bravely defended Stood against the Imperialists, was necessitated to surrender it, upon Condition, that the Garrison Soldiers should never bear Arms against the Emperor, but at the Command of their own King.

This year Dr. Laud, Bishop of Bath and Wells, was advanced to the Bishoprick of London. Two Barons were also made, the Lord Weston Lord Treasurer of England, and the Lord Wentworth, Lord President of the North; the same, who afterwards succeeded Favourite in place of the Duke of Buckingham, whose end we now come to relate.

The Duke of Buckingham undertakes another Expedition to the Relief of Rochel.

During the last Session, the Earl of Denbigh as Admiral, conducted a Fleet of fifty Sail to the Relief of Rochel but was repelled with much loss; so that finding no hopes of prevailing, he made a speedy return to Plymouth. Hereupon another Expedition is agreed upon, and the whole Vacation was spent in equipping a more formidable Fleet, whereof the Duke himself intended to appear as General, hoping to repair his own, and his Brother-in-laws ill success, by notable performances; and such was the diligence of those employed about it, that a most considerable Armado was gotten together; to view which, the King and the Duke came down towards Portsmouth, and kept his Court within four miles of the Town. The Duke of Buckingham was very busie in hastning his Design, starting frequently with the Commissioners of Rochel and Sonbier (now once more shifted over into England) in order to his passage into France, which was yet anticipated by his passage into another World. For on the 23 of August, the Duke coming down the Stairs from his Upper-Chamber with Sir Thomas Fryar, to Breakfast in a lower Parlour (turning in at the foot of the Stairs in a narrow Entry) and at the Door embracing Fryar, was stabbed to the heart by one John Felton (a Lieutenant of Foot in Sir John Ramseys Regiment) with a back-blow of a Courel Knife, which, the Murderer flying, left sticking in his Body, till the Duke himself drag'd it out; whence issued such a stream and emission of Spirits, that instantly he expired; his Servants and Retainers pursued, and soon apprehended Felton, whom Stanford would have immediately slain, but others would have him reserved for publick Justice: in order whereunto, he was clapt into a small Centry-house upon the Wall, horribly laden with maniced Irons, neither to sit nor lye down, but to be cripled against the Wall; where being afterwards asked, What invited him to the Action? he boldly answered, He killed him for the Cause of God, and his Country: he had also tack'd a Paper in the Crown of his Hat, wherein he declared, that his onely motive to the Fact, was the late Remonstrance of the Commons against the Duke, and that he could not sacrifice his life in a nobler Cause, than by delivering his Country from so great an Enemy.

He is stab'd to death by Felton.

The Dukes Bowels were interred in Portsmouth, by his Sister the Countess of Denbigh, and a Memorial there erected for him; his Body was brought to York-house, where he lay some time in State, and was afterwards Intomb'd in St. Edwards Chappel: Felton was Arraigned and found Guilty at the Kings-Bench Bar, and hanged at Tyburn, and his Body sent to Portsmouth, and Gibbeted in Chains without the Town.

Concerning the Dukes untimely End (dying in his 36th year) there were several Prefages ventilated;

As first, that his Picture fell down in the High-Commission Chamber at Lambeth, on the same day that Lamb was slain.

And secondly, That the Lady Davies, who was reputed a great Prophetess, had in June foretold, that the Dukes fatal time would not come till August.

And thirdly, That one Mr. Tower, an Officer in the Customs-house, was charged by a Phantom, resembling the Dukes Father, to tell him, That if he changed not his courses, he would shortly become a great Fairing to the City of London; which afterwards was thought accomplished by his death, hapning the day before Bartholomew Fair.

The Earl of Lindsey sets sail towards Rochel.

In the eighth of September, the Fleet (much forwarded by the Kings presence) set sail under the Command of the Earl of Lindsey, an able Souldier, and came to the Bar of the Haven of Rochel, where he found a monstrous Work attempted and finished by Cardinal Richliem with Boome and Baracado and Traverse, cross the Channell 1400 yards, leaving a convenient space for the Flood and Ebb of Tides, (a thing not paralleled by any History) all which nothing danting the Admirals courage he made many brave ventures at it, passed the Out-Forts and Bulworks, even to the very mouth of the Bar, where unexpectedly the Wind turning cross, drove them dangerously foul upon each other. This ill success of the Fleet, made the Rochellers despair of further success; and that despair produced a speedy surrender; which the Earl of Lindsey perceiving, brought his Fleet safe home again.

He returns, without effecting any thing.

On the 20th of January, the Parliament assembled again, which should have met upon the 20th of October, but that upon occasion of some bad News brought to the King, during this Expedition, he re-adjourned them untill this time; in the mean time, the Merchants had refused to pay Tonnage and Poundage, whereupon their Goods were seized: Complaint whereof was made to the Parliament; the King therefore summons the Houses to his Banqueting-house at White-Hall, and requires them to pay their promised Bill, for clearing his former and future Actions, especially in this time of great Necessity, seeing Tonnage and Poundage was too precious a Jewel of his Crown to be so lightly forgotten.

The Commons (who were forward enough to lay hold of Occasions, to put off the Kings Requests) answered, That Gods Cause was to be preferred before the Kings, and therefore they would in the first place consult about Religion; and accordingly appointed two Committees, one for Religion,

Religion, and another for Civil Affairs; the proceedings of the first, we shall refer to a more proper and distinct place. The other brought in a Complaint, that the Petition of Right had been printed with the Kings first Answer, which had been excepted against; and not his last, which was taken as satisfactory. Another Complaint was upon the seizing of the Merchants Goods, who had refused to pay Tonnage and Poundage; one of whom was Mr. Rolles a Parliament man; to whom it is reported, that some of the Officers of the Customs-house should say, 'Though all the Parliament were in you, we would take your Goods.' Another was Mr. Richard Chambers, who was committed to Prison, for saying at the Council-Table, That such great Customs and Impositions were required from the Merchants in England, as were in no other place, and that they were more screw'd up, than under the Turk. Afterwards having a Form of Submission drawn up, and sent him from the Star-Chamber, where unto he was to subscribe his Name: He, instead of acknowledging it, underwrote these words; 'All the aforesaid Contents, I Richard Chambers, do utterly abhor and detest as most unjust and false, and never to death will acknowledge any part thereof; and cited also several places of Scripture, that condemn Oppression and Injustice.' For the first Complaint, the Printer was questioned, who transferred the fault to the Kings Attorney-Generals Order. For the later, Sir John Worshelm, Farmer of the Customs, Mr. Dawes and Mr. Carmarthen, his Assistants, were called to account, whom the King excused, as acting by his Command; which not being clear to the Parliament, they would have dealt with them as Delinquents; but that the King certified them by Secretary Cook, That in honour he could not, nor would give way thereto. This so incensed the Parliament, that immediately they adjourned for some dayes; and then meeting again, the King adjourned them till the first of March. Hereat Sir John Elliot stands up, and accuses the Lord Treasurer Weston, as an Enemy to the English Trade, which he desired to transfer to Foreigners; the end of whose Speech, was attended by a Message of longer Adjournment, till the Tenth of March. The Commons hereat intraged, check the Speaker, for admitting the Message; and bid Sir John to read his Remonstrance (the Speaker and Clerk refusing) which was to this effect, Complaint made about the seizing of the Merchants Goods, who refused to pay Tonnage and Poundage.

That they had considered of the Bill for Tonnage and Poundage; but being over-pressed with other Business, and that of itself so perplex, as would require much leisure to discharge, could not, at that time, finish it; this present Session moving hastily to an end; and lest his Majesty should hereafter, as he had done heretofore, incline to evil Spirits, or be abused to believe, that he might justly receive the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, (which they humbly declare to be against the Fundamental Law of the Nation, and contrary to the Kings late Answer to the Petition of Right) therefore they crave, that his Majesty would for the future forbear such Taxes, and not to take it ill, if his Subjects refuse, what is demanded by Arbitrary and unwarrantable Power.

A Report being made from the Committee of Pardons, concerning the Pardons obtained by Dr. Sibbop, Dr. Manwaring, Mr. Cofens, and Mr. Mountague; Mr. Oliver Cromwell (a fatal name in succeeding years, and beginning already to discover it self) one of that Committee, informing the House, that Dr. Neah, Bishop of Winchester, was the main Instrument, in procuring the Kings Hand to their Pardons; and that the said Bishop preferred Dr. Manwaring, notwithstanding that the last Parliaments Censure had disabled him from ever holding any Ecclesiastical Dignity, to a rich Living, and moreover, that he was a Countenancer, not onely of Arminianism, but of flat Popery: If these, said he, be the Steps to Church-Preferment, what may we expect?

The House having prepared their Remonstrance, concerning the Bill for Tonnage and Poundage, would have had the Speaker to put it to the Vote, Whether it should be presented to the King, or no; but he refused, and would have left the House, as he had been Ordered by the King: But Mr. Hollis would not suffer him to rise, till himself had read the Commons Protestation, digested into these three Articles;

The Commons prepare a Bill against Tonnage and Poundage.

First, whosoever shall bring in Innovation of Religion, or by Favour seek to introduce Popery, or Arminianism, or other Opinions, disagreeing from the true and Orthodox Church, shall be reputed a Capital Enemy to this Kingdom and Common-wealth.

Their Protestation read in the House by Mr. Hollis.

Secondly, whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking or levying of the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, or shall be an Actor or Instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed a Capital Enemy to the Common-wealth.

Thirdly, If any man shall yield voluntarily, or pay the same, not being granted by Parliament, he shall be reputed a Betrayer of the Liberties of England, and an Enemy to the Common-wealth. This was received with general applause of the Members; but not of the King; who presently sent for the Serjeant of the Mace; but he was not permitted to go out, Sir Miles Hobart, a Member, taking the Key of him, locks the Door.

The King now angry (as well he might, at so unwonted and bold a liberty, though proceeding from a Parliament) sends Maxwell Master of the Black-Rod to dissolve them, who being excluded, the King with his Pensioners and Guard, resolves upon forcing the entrance, which they undertaking suddenly avoided the House; and such was the end of this Parliament. In the mean time, there happened a lamentable Fire in the Strand, which consumed Vicomte Wimbertons house (at that time) the Lodging of the Dutch Ambassador; and not long after comes News of the Death of Frederique Henry, Eldest Son to the King of Bohemia, drowned in the Mere of Harlem; which put the Court all into Mourning.

Articles of Peace between England and France.

The King, after the dissolution of the Parliament, publishes a Declaration of the causes thereof, and then falls upon questioning the Refractory Members at the Council-Table; namely Mr. Hall, Sir John Elliot, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, Sir John Barrington, Mr. Selden, Mr. Sroun, Mr. Coriton, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Long, Mr. Kirton, all which were committed to several Prisons. The Marquis of Huntly hereditary Sheriff of a great part of Scotland, neglecting the Order of the Council at Edenborough, for the apprehending of certain Priests and Jesuits, who openly said Mass at Aberdeen, and committed other insolencies, was summoned to appear before the Council, together with the Earls of Arrol, Arhol, Nidesdale, and Abercon, who joyned with him in his Contempt; and upon both their refusals to appear, and their giving notice to the said Priests and Jesuits to escape, they were proclaimed Rebels to the King and Kingdom, and a strict course taken for the apprehending of them, whereupon they took their flight into England. This year Petrus Paulus Renbow, the famous Painter of Antwerp, Secretary to the Arch-Dutchess, was sent over Agent into England, to solicit a Peace with Spain, who it seems was at this time as so low an Ebbe, that Renbow posted him up at Rome in a Fryars Habit, together with Marforius; who, the question being ask'd, why he was painted in that Habit, answered, That it was, because he had lately taken three Vows upon him One of Poverty, ever since the Hollanders took the West-India Fleet. The other of Obedience, since the French made them quit Casal and Montferrat. And lastly, of Chastity, when the Conde de Olivares shall give him leave. This Peace was not concluded, till there came over another Ambassador more fully empowered. In the fifth year of his Majesties Reign, the Emperour sends over an Ambassador into England, and offers here, to the Queen of Bohemia, Thirty thousand pounds per annum, with convenience of Reception, within the Palatinate, upon condition, that her eldest Son living, should marry one of the Emperours Daughters; and be educated at that Imperial Court; which motion was magnanimously rejected. In Italy the Wars had been hot, to little purpose, with the loss of a Million of Mortals between France and Spain, about the Dukedom of Mantua, wherein at length Charles Confaga, Duke of Nevers, was invested. But the French having weakened themselves in this War, and gotten no great bargain by it, desired new Alliances, to attack the Spaniards and Austrians, and by the mediation of the Venitians, propos'd and conclude a Peace with England, upon these Articles.

First, That the two Kings shall renew former Alliance, inviolable, with free Commerce, and in this particular, such things may be propos'd, to add or diminish, as either part shall judge convenient.

Secondly, That for what is past, during the late difference, no satisfaction shall be demand'd on either side.

Thirdly, That the Articles of Marriage of the Queen of Great Britain, shall be confirm'd; and concerning her Domesticks, Expedients propos'd, to be added or diminished.

Fourthly, All former Alliances between the Crowns shall stand good, unless changed by this present Treaty.

Fifthly, The two Kings, being thus remitted to their former Affections, shall respectively correspond towards the Assistance of their Allies (so far as the condition of Affairs, and the general good shall permit) for procuring of the repose of the Troubles of Christendom.

Sixthly, That Ambassadors on either part be dispatched for Ratification; and Residents in either Court.

Seventhly, Touching Ships at Sea, with Letters of Marque on either side, that for two Months following, that shall not prejudice this Agreement; provided, either Prize be restor'd after that time, upon Demand.

Eighthly,

Eightly, That these Articles be joyntly signed the Fourteenth of this present April, and instantly then Consigned into the Hands of the Lords Ambassadors of Venice, to be delivered to each King, at a day prefix'd; all Acts of Hostility to cease, and to be Proclaim'd in both Kingdomes, the Twentieth of May following.

And shortly after, Sir Thomas Edmonds, Controler of the Kings House, was sent from England, and the Marquis of Chastellaneux from France, for the solemn Confirmation of the Articles by Oath. In the beginning of November, the Earls of Bedford, Somerset, and Clare, with some others, were Committed, upon Information given, That they had dispersed several Copies of a Book of Projects, instructing the King to augment his Revenues without the help of Parliaments: but they were cleared from that Suspicion by Sir David Fowles, who discover'd upon Oath, that it was contrived about sixteen years ago by Sir Robert Dudley, eldest Son to the late Earl of Leicester, then living at Florence, under the Title of Duke of Northumberland. On the first of January Don Carlo de Colomae came Ambassador from Spain to the late Earl of Leicester, to Treat of Peace between the two Crowns, and six days after had, his first Audience.

By the dissolving the last Parliament, the Popular Odium was more than ever stirr'd up against the Great and Powerful Ministers of State, as appear'd by certain invective Libells dispersed about; whereof there was one against Bishop Laud to this purpose:

Laud, Look to thyself, be assured thy life is sought: as Thou art the Fountain of Wickedness, Repent of thy monstrous Sin before thou be taken out of the World; and assure thy Self, neither God nor the World can endure such a vile Counsellor, or Whisperer. This Libell was found in the Dean of Pauls his Yard, with another more lets bitter against the Lord-Treasurer Weston: Others there were more zealous for the advancement of the Kings Prerogative, who considering how little Success his Affairs had by this and his two former Parliaments, advis'd his Majesty never for the future to Call any more Parliaments; and for the better carrying on of such a Design as this, the aforesaid Book of Projects was publish'd and dispers'd in several Places, containing, A Proposition address'd to the King, how he might so order the Matter, as not to be troubled for the future with the Impertinencies, as he call'd it, of Parliaments; Instanting the Example of Lewis the Eleventh of France, who pretending, that the third Estate, representing the Commons, did inroach too much upon the Clergy and Nobility, dissolv'd that Parliament of the three Estates, and never after had a free Election of the third Estate; but instead thereof, ordered an Assembly of certain Eminent Persons of his own Nomination, which is call'd L'Assemblée des Notables: The wayes propos'd for the avoiding this Impertinency of Parliaments were in brief these;

1. To have a Fortrefs in every considerable Town.
2. To cause high-ways to be made through such Towns.
3. To choose or the Government of the Fortresses of such Towns, no Inhabitants of the Place.
4. To let none pass through such Places without a Ticket.
5. To have the Names of all Lodgers taken by Inn-keepers.

6. To impose general Oath upon the Subjects, for the avoiding of all Rubs that might hinder the conclusion of these Business. Then for the encreasing of the Kings Revenue, the Advice was;

1. To demand Decima, or tenth part of mens Estates.
2. To buy all Lases upon the Crown-Lands.
3. To take the benefit of Salt into his own Hands.
4. To demand a Rate for Sealing the Weights every year.
5. To demand an Impost for Wools.
6. To put a Tax upon every Lawyers Fee.
7. To put a Tax upon Inns and Victualling-houses for a Licence.
8. To put a Tax upon all Cattel, Flesh, and Horses sold in the Market.
9. To put a Tax upon all Lands alienated.
10. To demand a Rate upon all Offices in his Majesties Grant.
11. To reduce his Majesties Household to Board-wages.
12. To demand a Rate or Licence to eat Lacticia, or White-meats, upon fasting dayes.
13. To take an Imposition upon the Catholics Lands.
14. At the Princes Marriage, to make Earls Principi, Barons Earls, two hundred of the richest men of England that were no Nobles Titulate; Gentlemen of low Quality Franklines, and rich Farmers Esquires; each paying for their Honours, according to their several Degrees.

Lastly, To prohibit costly and gorgeous Apparell to be worn by any, but Persons of considerable Quality, which would save the Gentry of the Kingdom much more money than what they were taxed could amount unto.

About this time, certain Gentlemen of the Temple attempting the rescue of one Bellingham, a Captain in the late Isle of Ré Expedition, who was Arrested in Fleetstreet, and divers of them in the Fray being wounded, and carried to Prison: The Business at length came to that height, and the Concourse of the Temples so far encreas'd, that they made a Barricado about St. Dunstons Church; and the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London coming against them with a Company of the Train-bands, they being about six hundred in number, made a bold Resistance, killed five, and wounded wounded near a hundred; Hereupon the Lord Chief Justice was sent for up to London, and an extraordinary Session kept at Guild-hall, for the Tryal of the chief Offenders, in which Captain Ashburn, and Captain Stamford being found Guilty, were Condemned, and Executed at Tyburn, notwithstanding, that for the saving of Stamford's life, great Intercession was made to the King, who answered, That since he had been formerly pardoned for a Murder, and had committed another, a course ought to be taken to prevent a third.

It was now the sixth year of his Majesties Reign, being the year 1630. which began with the death of William Harbut, Earl of Pembroke, a Person truly Generous and Heroick, a great Enemy to the Spaniard, and Disliker of forrein Men, Manners, and Modes; he died in the fiftieth year of his Age; after which, his Brother, the Earl of Montgomery, obtained of the King the disposition of his Council.

On the twenty ninth of May, the Queen was brought to Bed of a young Son, which was Baptized at St. James's, on the twenty seventh of June, and named Charles; reserv'd by Providence to Succeed his Father on the Throne of Great Britain, after the Miseries of a long and tedious Exile from his Native Country, and rightful Inheritance; unto which, nevertheless He comes to be at length happily Restor'd with the general Consent and Acclamation of the whole Realm: His Godfathers were the King of France, and Prince Elector, represented by the Duke of Lenox, and the Marquis of Hamilton; and his Godmother was the Queen-Mother of France, represented by the Dutches of Richmond. It is observed, that at his Nativity, at London, was seen a Star about Noon-time; which, that it portended something more than ordinary, the extraordinary Passages, things, rather then rely upon the Predictions of Astrologers, which are at the best but Conjectures. In the mean time, the Affairs of Germany did necessarily require a general Diet to be kept at Ratisbone, whither the Prince Elector was invited, to put in his Plea for his Restoration to the Palatinate; whereupon he sends his Agent thither, and procures our King to send Sir Robert Ashley, ther as Ambassador to the Emperour in his behalf; who having received fair Respects from the Emperour and States, at length returned reinfected: About this time, Doctor Leighton was sentenced in the Star-Chamber to have his Body whipt, his Forehead stigmatiz'd, his Ears cropt, and his Nose slit, for exhorting the late Parliament to smite the Bishops under the fifth Rib; and for calling the Queen, the Daughter of Heth, a Canaanite, and Idolatress, in his Book call'd Sions Plea, which was accordingly inflicted.

Don Carlo de Colona had so effectually plyed his Business, that in November a Peace was concluded between England and Spain, upon the same Articles that had been agreed upon between King James and Philip the Third; and the Spaniard to use all his Interest in the Emperour, for the Prince Electors Restitution. The Peace was Proclaimed on the twenty seventh of November: And now the old Prerogative Statute for Knighthood comes in place; whereby those who had Estates of forty pounds per annum, were summoned to appear a little before Christmas, to be Knighted; and upon default, to be fined: By which means, about one hundred thousand pounds were brought into the Exchequer.

In Ireland, the Romish Catholics upon St. Stephens Day, while the Lords Justices were at Church in Dublin, took the boldness to Celebrate Mass, of which the Lords Justices having speedy Notice, sent the Archbishop of Dublin, the Mayor, Sheriffs, and Recorder, to apprehend them; their Crucifixes and Paraments of the Altar were taken away, and the Priests delivered into the Custody of the Pursevants; Also eight Popish Aldermen were clapt up in Prison, for not assisting the Mayor. A Company of People gathered together in a Tumult, and refused the Priests out of the Pursevants hands; but the Guard being sent among them, forc'd them to deliver them up again. Upon Information sent to the King and Council of this Riot and Insolency, fifteen Houses were by a special Order from the Council seized upon to his Majesties use, and the Priests and Fryars so far molested and prosecuted, that two of them hang'd themselves: nor were the Catholics in England and Ireland free from Jars among themselves, there jarring a notable Contest between the Jesuits and secular Priests, upon occasion of the Usurpation of one Richard Smith, who in the year 1625, having been sent into England by Pope Urban the Eighth, to reside as chief Superintendent of his Emisaries here, under the Title of Bishop of Chalcodon; took upon him so far, as that he challeng'd to himself the sole Authority of approving such regular Priests as were to be standing Confessors: This the Jesuits judg'd to be so great an Intrenchment upon their Jurisdiction, that they contriv'd a Declaration against his pretended Authority, under the Names of the most Noble and Eminent Catholics, which they presented to the Spanish Ambassador, just upon the time of his departure out of England for Spain; and by all other ways they could invent, to prosecute the Bishop, that he was forced to make his Escape into France.

This year Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, made his famous Irruption into Germany (being invited by the Protestant Princes, who were headed by the Duke of Saxony:) To his aid, his Majesty sends over the Marquis of Hamilton, with three hundred thousand Dollars, and an Army of six thousand Foot; the greatest part whereof perished in that War, and Hamilton himself returned in-glorious, and stained with suspicion of Treason, as being said to have designed by this Expedition to endear himself to the Scottish Officers, and by their help hereafter to make himself King of of Scotland; the truth whereof was offered to be evidenced by the Lord Rey and Uchiltry, and Major Borthwick; against his Engines Ramsey and Meldram. Some two years ago, the Fort Keck upon the River of Canada, in the North-part of America, had been taken and Garrison'd by Captain Kirk, it being a great Staple for Bevers and Otters; The King of France therefore detains four hundred thousand Crowns, part of the Queens Portion, whereupon a greater Breach was likely to ensue; but this year put an end to the difference, the Fort was delivered, and the Money paid.

The Earl of Essex having many years ago Marri'd the Lady Frances Howard, and upon her Complaint of his Insufficiency for Conjugal Duties; which the business being brought to a full Tryal, was evidence'd by the Verdict of a Jury of Midwives, and the Earls own Confession; That he never could, and believ'd never should carnally know her: Sentence of Divorce having been pronounc'd by the Bishops between him and his Lady, (who afterwards marri'd the Earl of Somerset) and ratified by a Commission under the Great Seal; the Earl of Essex betook himself to Fortitude, and won the Reputation of a Souldier, willing also to approve himself as much Man as Souldier, and as true a Son of Venus as of Mars; he return'd into England, and married Elizabeth, the Daughter of Sir William Paulet, a Wiltshire Knight: But long this new Marriage had not been consummated, ere the objecting the same Cause of Complaint against him as his former Lady had done; and having been taken over free in the bestowing of her Favours upon one Mr. Udal, the Earl was easily induc'd to consent to a Diffarreation as well with this as his former Lady.

In the seventh year of his Majesties Reign, being the year 1631. Mervin, Lord Audley, was Arraigned for Rape and Sodomy before his Peers, upon the Petition of his own Son and Heir; where divers unnatural and bestial Actions being prov'd against him, he receiv'd his Sentence to be hang'd; but had the rigour of his Sentence remitted by Favour, and was beheaded at Tower-hill the 14th of May. He was of Noble Extraction bred up a Protestant, but after turned Papiſt, for more liberty in Evil.

And so pleased himself with his Enormities, that he impudently said in presence of some Lords; As others had their several Delights, some in one thing, some in another; so his whole Delight was in damning Souls, by enticing men to such Acts as might surely effect it.

A little while after this, Sir Giles Allington, who had married with his own Niece, was Convented before a Court of eight Bishops, and four other Commissioners, by whom he was fined 12000 l. to the King, and forced to give Bond of 20000 l. never to co-habit, or to come in private with his said Niece; to be Imprison'd, or put in sufficient Bail, till they have both done Penance at St. Pauls Cross, London, or great St. Maries at Cambridge, at the day assigned.

About this time, the King of Sweden won the memorable Battle of Lypsick, and grew so considerable, that the King thought him the likeliest man to restore his Brother to his Principality; and so sends an Ambassador to him, to Congratulate his Success, and to mediate the Palgrave's Restitution with the Swede, (who now had gotten the greatest part of the Palatinate in his Hands); which he seem'd willing to grant, but upon such hard Conditions as were dishonourable both to the King and the Prince, and so ended this year; nothing memorable hapning at Court, save only the Birth of the Princess Mary, upon the fourth of November: And the Difference between Donalld Lord Rey, and David Ramsey; the last whereof was tax'd for Hamiltons Insultment, in that forementioned Design in Germany, and the former his Accuser: But Ramsey denying what he was Charg'd with, they were admitted to a Tryal by Combate, which was order'd after this manner;

“ Upon the day appointed, which was the twenty eighth of November, they were to appear in the Painted Chamber, before Robert, Earl of Lindsey, Lord High-Constable for the time being, Thomas Earl of Arundell, Earl-Marshal of England, the Earls of Pembroke, Dorset, Carlisle, the Vicounts, Wimbeldon, Falkland, with other Earls and Lords: At the upper end, four Foot high, was erected a Bench for the Constable, Marshal, and Lords Assistant; under them was plac'd a square Table, with Seats about it, for the Heralds and Serjants at Armes: just under the upper Bench sat Doctor Dethick the Register, and over against him Doctor Duck, the Kings Advocate for the Marshals Court; the Earl-Marshal bearing a Truncheon of Gold tip'd with black, and Usher'd by nine Heralds, and three Serjants at Armes, conducted the High-Constable into the Court, together with Sir William Seager, one of the Kings of Armes, and presented the Constable with his Commission, which was deliver'd to the Register to read; the effect whereof was,

That his Majesty being inform'd by Donalld Lord Rey, of divers Treasons plotted against him by David Ramsey Esquire, the one accusing, the other denying; doth therefore fore Authorise the said Robert Barty Earl of Lindsey, to call unto him Thomas Earl A of Arundel, Earl-Marshall; and with him such other Peers as he thought fit to hold a Marshalls Court, for the sifting out the truth between the said Parties.

Then the King of Arms deliver'd to the Countable his silver Verge, headed with a Crown of Gold; then the Herald receiving a Key from the Earl-Marshall, went and Usher'd in the Appellant, who was attir'd in black Velvet, trim'd with silver Buttons, his Sword hanging in a silver embroider'd Belt, and accompanied with his Sureties, Sir Peerce Crosby, Sir Walter Crosby, Sir William Forbiez, Sir Robert Gordon, and Sir William Evers: The Defendant likewise in Scarlet, lac'd with silver Lace, and lin'd with Sky-colour'd Plush, but unarm'd, was Usher'd in by another Herald. The Earl-Marshall told them the substance of the Commission, the Power and Legality of the Court; and that to prevent any Combate, he hop'd the truth would be brought to light; after the Earl-Marshall, the Kings Advocate spake to the same purpose, in justification of the warrantableness of the Court, and brought many Precedents of Tryal by Combate in cases of the like nature: Afterwards the Appellant was order'd to deliver in his Charge against the Defendant, which he did by Bill: This Charge imported certain words spoken by Ramsey to the Lord Rey, when they were together in the Low-Countries, against the State and Church of England; and, That he was privy, as he himself boasted, to a design of the Marquis of Hamilton, to convert those Forces which the King had promis'd him for foreign Service (with the Wine-Customs of Scotland for their Maintenance) against England; that their Friends in Scotland had provided Arms and Ammunition, and more were expelled from Sweden, and other parts, and that he himself was earnestly solicited by Ramsey, and Alexander Hamilton, to combine with them in this their Design. And added, that if Ramsey would deny it, he was a Villain and a Traytor, which he would prove, and therewith cast him his Glove: Ramsey on the other side deny'd all, and said, Rey was a Lyar, and a barbarous Villain, and threw down his Glove, protesting to Gar him to dye for it, if he had him in a convenient place; Then Rey temperately demanding an Answer to his Bill, Ramsey alledg'd the impossibility of the Charge, since there were but six thousand raw Souldiers expelled, and that the Marquis was not so weak, as to think, that if with those Forces he could surprize the King, That he could also secure himself against his Children and Kindred. But being told by the Earl-Marshall, that he must answer the Bill according to form of Law; He acknowledg'd the substance of the Discourse alledg'd by Rey, with the circumstances of time and place, but deny'd that any Treason was intended, or utter'd: then the Court was Adjourn'd till the fifth of December; at which time the two Adversaries entered again, Rey habited as formerly, Ramsey in a Suit of black Satin: he presented his Answer in writing; wherein having mention'd the six thousand men under the Marquis of Hamiltons Command, to be employ'd in the King of Swedens Service, he confess'd, That speaking in general of Matters amiss in England; Rey answer'd, God amend all; to whom Ramsey reply'd, By God Donnold we must help him to amend all; and to all other things he utterly gives his denial, and craves revenge upon Reys person by Dint of Sword. Both Parties having Counsel assign'd them, Doctor Eden who was Counsel for Ramsey affirm'd, That the Defendant might according to Law decline the Combate:

1. Because no man can be charged as a Traytor by one that is guilty in his own particular.
2. Because of the doubtfulness and uncertainty of the Charge.
3. Because the Appellant refers the Combate to the last, in case the charge cannot be prov'd by any other ways; but the Defendant saith, That though in Law he might, yet in Honour, and for the justifying of his Innocence, he will not decline the Combate.

Time being given to Rey for his Replication, he appears at the day appointed clad as before; Ramsey also appears habited in an Ash-colour'd Sute, and Scarlet Cloak, both overlay'd with silver and sky-colour'd Lace; the Sute opened with Scarlet, the Cloak lined with Ash-colour'd Velvet: The Appellant presented his Replication to the High-Constables, wherein he aver'd, That the Defendant had cunningly over-slept a part of the Charge; then he repeated the several parts of the Charge, and the strength of them, with the Defendants defects in not clearing the chief Points: Ramsey's Ramsey's Counsel urg'd against the Replication, and the Lord Reys Intention therein to have recourse to Proofs: Whereas, said he, This Court of Honour and Chivalry was appeal'd unto for the hazarding of their persons by Combate, which intends a Tryall without proof. Doctor Duck the Kings Advocate, and Doctor Reeves, who were Counsell for the Appellant, mov'd for the continuance of the Replication; which was granted: and upon another appointed day, the Exceptions therunto were made by the opposite Party.

This the Council on both sides having argued for a long time Pro & Con, the Court Adjourn'd till another day, when no further proofs being brought, it was determin'd, that the Matter should be refer'd to the Kings Will and Pleasure; which was so far prevail'd upon by the great power the Marquis had with his Majesty, that after a greedy expectation in both Parties of the Result, his Favour was found chiefly to incline to Ramsey: Which as soon as it was known, the Lord Rey sufficiently satisfied in his mind to have done the duty of a faithful Subject, stay'd not long in the Kingdom, but forthwith betook himself to the Swedish Army, where he had a considerable Command. This Story we thought fit to set down the more at large, since it will give much light to the truth of the Scottish Affairs.

The King in his eighth year, sends Colonel Sanderson with two thousand men out of England, and a like number of Scots under Colonel Esly, to help the Muscovite in his Wars against Poland, who with an Army of an hundred and twenty thousand men, besieges Smolensko, during which, the two Colonels quarrell, and Esly basely murdering Sanderson, was committed to the Guard: so that the Scots and English having lost their Commanders, and being grown jealous of one another, were the less useful in that great Battell presently after ensuing, wherein the Muscovite received a shameful overthrow.

This year died five Noble Personages: First, Sigismund King of Poland. Secondly, Gustavus Adolphus King of Sweden, slain at the Battell of Lutzen. The third, Pappenheim, slain also at the same Battell. The fourth, Frederick King of Bohemia, and Prince Elector of the Rhine, who departed at Mantua, eight dayes after the recovery of his most considerable Town of Breuckendale. The fifth, Sophia Queen Dowager of Denmark, to condole whose death with the then King her Son, the Earl of Leicester was sent over; as also to demand one hundred and fifty thousand pounds (due by her death as a Portion to the Heirs of her Daughter Anne, late Queen of Great Britain) which was then promised, though never paid.

In Ireland things began to look troubled; the Protestants grumbling that the King should discharge the Papists from paying the State-penalty of twelve pence a Sunday, for absence from Church, whereby they were excessively encreased. These Distempers began to swell, which the King minding to allay, recalled the Lords Justices, who then had the Government of the Land, and sent Viscount Warrmorth thither as Lord Deputy, thinking that their humours would better settle and repose under a single Government.

The King, as soon as he was recovered of a fit of sickness, the small Pox, (which seiz'd on him the twenty second of December, but soon, and favourably left him) dispatcheth the Earl of Arundell to the Hague, to the Princess Elizabeth his Sister, to condole the death of her Husband, the Prince Elector Palatine, and to invite her and her Children over into England; but she returning thanks for the Complement and the Invitation, desir'd to be excus'd from the trouble of so tedious a Journey. The Cathedral Church of St. Paul having born the Shock of Times Injury for many for many Generations, and contracted the Decays and Ruines of Age, the King, desirous to provide so good a Work, as the repairing and re-embellishing of so stately a Monument, recommended to the Nobility and Gentry of the Kingdom, the raising among themselves a large Contribution towards it. This Motion, though many repin'd, was so far entertain'd by the Generality, that a considerable Sum was gathered, and the Work had a fair progress, till the coming on of the late Troubles put a stop and period to it. At the same time the Earl of Bedford obtained leave of the King to build up that part of the Suburbs of London, commonly called Covent-Garden, a place full of stately and proud Structures, and not inferior to many famous Cities: But while Buildings and publick Adornments went on in some places, lamentable Ruines and Devastations hapned in others; witness, that wide breach and discontinuance of Houles upon London Bridge, which is to be seen there at this day, caus'd by a violent and raging Fire.

In the Ninth year of King Charles's Reign, being 1633. Preparation was made for a Journey into Scotland, where his Presence had been humbly intreated for, to comfort them with his Court, and honour them with his Personall Coronation, which he now resolves upon; and May 13. sets forward, attended by the Earl of Northumberland, Arundell, Pembroke, Southampton, Salisbury, Carlisle, Holland, Monmouth, and Newcastle; the Bishop of London, Lord Treasurer, Secretary, Vice-Chamberlain, with many Gentlemen of Quality, and comes to Edinburgh the tenth of June, and eight dayes after is Solemnly Crowned there. As soon as that Celebrity was finished, he calls a Parliament, passes an Act of Ratification of the old Acts, notwithstanding some there were, who asserted, That by so doing meant a Confirmation of Episcopacy, and for that reason oppos'd opposed it, though in vain; and not long after became Heads of the Covenanters: But the King A having visited Falkland, Sterling, Dunfermling, and some other places, takes leave of Scotland, and comes home to Greenwich the twentieth day of July.

In this Scottish Parliament, that Nation discovered some Seeds of disaffection to the King, for his Renovation of things alienated from the Crown in his Fathers Minority, and for his Commission of Surrenders of Superiorities and Tithes; whereby Ministers and Land-Owners were freed from the Clientele and Vassalage of the Nobility and Laick Patrons: And the Lord London opposed the ratifying of an Act, formerly granting power to King James, and his Successors, to ordain Habits for the Clergy and Judges professing, and made a great stir before it could be carried on the King's side. And the Generality of the people (invited, no doubt, by the Great Ones of the Malignant Faction) deterred the Bishop of Dumblain, Dean of the Kings private Chapel, from observing his Orders there: for performing Prayers twice a day after the English manner, for receiving the monthly Communion on their Knees, and for Officiating on Sundays and Holydays in a Surplice.

A little before the Kings Journey into Scotland, his Majesty, willing, if it had been possible, to have spared this trouble, writ to a Lord of that Nation, to whose Custody the Crown of Scotland was entrusted, to bring it into England, that he might be Crowned here: But the Lord returned this Answer, That he durst not be so false to his Trust; but if his Majesty would be pleased to accept thereof in Scotland, he should find those his People ready to yield him the highest honour: but should be long defer that duty, they might perhaps be inclined to make choice of another King. A very peremptory answer (especially in the latter part thereof) for a Subject to send to his Prince.

In England about this time died George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, into whose place William Laud Bishop of London was elected.

The Birth of the Duke of York.

October the thirteenth, the Queen was delivered of her second Son, who was Baptized ten days after, and named James, and design'd Duke of York: And a little after, the young Prince Eliz by the Proxy of the Duke of Lennox, and the Earl of Dorset, was made Knight of the Garter.

On Candlemas Night the four Inns of Court united all together, to present the King and Queen with a stately Masque, which was attended with a Train of Christian Captives lately set at liberty, by Cidan King of Morocco, who had long kept them in slavery, and now presented to King Charles as a grateful acknowledgment for the Loan of a part of his Fleet, by whose assistance he had taken Sally, and destroyed that execrable Nest of Pirates. This Revell found such acceptance at Court, that it was again with much Applause exhibited a Fortnight after, when the King and Queen were magnificently entertained by the City at the House of Alderman Freeman, then Lord Mayor.

It was now the Year 1634. and the Tenth of his Majesties Reign, when the English Coasts being infested by Pirates, and the Fishing almost usurped and ingrossed by the Hollands, the design of Ship-Money was set on foot; for the King wanting money to regain his absolute Mastery of the British Seas, consulted about it with his Attorney-Generall Noy, who finds out of old Records an Ancient Precedent of raising a Tax upon the Nation, for setting forth a Navy in case of danger, by sole Authority of the King. This Tax brought into the Kings Coffers about twenty thousand pounds per menssem, which was raised by Writ, not without muttering both of Clergy and Laity: And soon after the Attorney having enabled the King to provide a Potent Armado, failed himself out of the narrow Seas of this life, into the Ocean of Eternity.

The Swedes did not lose their Hopes, although they lost their King, but having Crowned Christina, Gustavus Daughter, applied themselves to the prosecution of their German Quarrell, and send Ambassadors to all their Allies for Assistance, among whom, the Son of Axel Oxensterna, came into England with Credentials from his Queen and the Council, and was splendidly entertained by the King; but yet departed in some Disgust, because his Answer was not so satisfactory as he expected.

In reland the Lord Deputy called a Parliament about the business of supply for the Kings Necessities in relation to that Kingdom; which being urged home, and prudently managed, found answerable success.

There was also a Synod held there at the same time, in which a Canon was agreed upon, declaring the consent of that Church with the Church of England, in the profession of the same Christian Faith: which Canon was as followeth;

For the manifestation of our Agreement with the Church of England, in the Confession of the same Christian Faith and Doctrine of the Sacraments, We do receive and approve the Book of Articles of Religion agreed upon by the Archbishops and Bishops, and the whole Clergy in the whole Convocation holden at London, Anno Dom. 1562. For the avoiding of diversities of Opinions, and for the establishing of Consent touching true Religion; And therefore, if any hereafter shall affirm, that any of those Articles are in any part superfluous or erroneous, or such as he may not with a good Conscience subscribe unto, let him be Excommunicated, and not absolved before he make a publick Revocation of his Error.

A Parliament and Synod called in Ireland.

In Scotland Discontents began to arise, and out comes a Book, charging the King with indirect proceedings in the last Parliament, and a tendency to the Romish Belief; and to blow up under him Monsieur Montrieux to work upon the Discontents of that Nation. The Author of the aforementioned Book was inquired after, and found to be one William Hagge, abetted by the Lord Balmerino, the treacherous Son of a perfidious Father, who was thereupon (the other escaping) Arraigned, by his Peers, found guilty and sentenced to death, but pardoned by the King.

This year died Sir Richard Weston, Earl of Portland, Lord Treasurer, and Sir Edward Coke, formerly Queen Elizabeths Attorney-Generall, and Chief Justice of the Kings-Bench; but now out of favour, by reason of his too great freedom of speech. And in Scotland died the Earl of Kenoulde, succeeded Archbishop Spotswood of St. Andrews, aged about sixty years, one justly commended for three excellent Qualities, Learning, Moderation, and Wisdom.

This year was unfortunate to the Swedish Party in Germany, where Generall Arnhem was constrained to retire out of Bohemia into Saxony; the Town of Ratisbon was re-gained by the Imperialist, Generall Aldring slain at Lansbut, and the whole Swedish Army totally defeated by the King of Hungary, and the Cardinal Infante, at the famous Battell of Norlingen; after which ensued the Surrender of the Town, and the Conquest of the Dukedome of Wittenberg, whose Duke C by means of the French.

After the departure of Smith, the Bishop of Calcedon, out of England; Gregory Panzani, a Priest and Civilian, was sent hither by the Pope, with a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, to decide the difference between the Regular and the Secular Priests; this Panzani insinuating himself into the favour of the Lord Cottingham, and Secretary Windebank, seeks to discover by his Agents at Court, how far the Kings Mind might be wrought to a Toleration in matters of Conscience to the Romish Religion; as the giving way to a Nuncio from the Pope to the Queen, and the allowing of a Catholic Bishop for the English Nation to reside here, who should be no dependence between the Regulars and the Seculars, he returned home, and committed the transacting of the rest to Signior George Com, whom he left in his room.

It was now the Year 1635. when a gallant Fleet was set out, by the aide of Ship-money, forty Sails, under the Earl of Lindsey Admirall, and twenty others, under the Earl of Essex Vice-Admirall, who secured the Seas from Pirates formerly molesting, whereby our Commodities were safely transported, and the English Puissance rendered so considerable in the eyes of Foreign Princes, that the King of Spain thought it his safest course to entrust his Bullion in our Bottoms, which was Coynd in England, to the great benefit of the King's Mint, and of all the Merchants also, whose Commodities were exchanged thereby, and the rest of the money payed over by exchange to Flanders. At this time the French and Hollanders had confederated themselves to infect the Spaniards from before Dunkirk, and the Natives discontented by the Intolerances of the French, took up Arms against them, and joyned with the Spaniards to expell them out of the Country.

There was brought up to Court by the Earl of Arundell, as the Miracle and Rarity of these times, for the wonderful provexity of his Age, one Robert Parr, a Shropshire man, who had reacht almost his 160 year, and might in all likelihood have out-liv'd that time some years, had not the incommodiousness of so long a Journey to a man so aged, the removal of him from his own proper Sphere, the Country, and the change of his wonted course of Dyer, hastned on the period of his dayes.

Charles Prince Elector, finding small hopes of Restauration from the mediation of Neighbour States, came over into England to crave Assistance of the King, and was received with all the Caresses of Courtisie and Affection, and lodged in Prince Charles's Quarter at White-Hall: And soon after, Arrived his Brother Prince Rupert.

The twenty eighth of December, the Kings second Daughter was born, and on the fifth of January was Baptized, and named Elizabeth. To Congratulate the Queens happy Delivery, over comes an Ambassadour from Holland, who to work the more into favour, brought with him a Present of an immense value, a masse piece of Ambergreece, two fair, and almost transparent, China Pions, a rare Clock of excellent Art, being the Workmanship of Radolphus the Emperour, and four very admirable Pieces of Painting, the Originals of Tintoret and Titian, those admired ancient Artists. And now the King began to bethink himself of a new Treasurer, that Office having been managed by Commissioners, ever since the death of the Earl of Portland: but some differences arising between them, so incommodated the Kings Affairs, that he resolves again to put it into the hands of one; and so, March the sixth, commits the Staff of that Office to Doctor William Juxon, Bishop of London.

Now more then ever began to rise Divisions about Ecclesiasticall matters, which were mainly caused by the great offence and distast that was generally taken at the present Archbishop of Canterbury.

The death of the Lord Treasurer Weston, and Sir Edm. Coke.

The Swedish Success declining in Germany.

Panzani sent into England to decide the difference between the Jesuits and Secular Priests.

Differences in Religion, how occasioned.

Canterbury, his strict and zealous maintaining of certain Ceremonies of the Church, as the placing of the Communion-Table at the East-End of the Chancel, upon a Gradual Altar, in the manner of an Altar, with a Traverse of Rails before it, with other things formerly not so strictly insisted upon, and now vehemently oppos'd by many; who commonly went under the name of Puritans, and Non-conformists, whose over-nice scrupulosity in things indifferent, was judg'd too much inclining towards faction: Nor were there wanting some of the Episcopall Party, who assented by Writing, that the Communion-Table ought to stand, according to the Primitive example, in the Nave or middle of the Quire: To this purpose a Book was publish'd, written as some think, by the Bishop of Lincoln, though owned by another person.

Another Fleet set out under the Command of the Earl of Northumberland.

The Earl of Arundell sent Ambassador to Ferdinand the third, about the restitution of the Prince Palatine.

The King considering the good effects of his late Fleet, sets out another, consisting of three-score Sail of good Ship, under the Command of the Earl of Northumberland, in 1636, being the twelfth year of his Reign, who going Northwards, scoured the Seas of the Dutch Busses, seizing some, sinking others, and enforcing the rest to fly; so reducing them all to a precarious Condition, of entreating the favour of fishing by the Kings Commission; which he was the readier to incline them, because he looked upon them as the likeliest means of his Nephew's Re-induction, which he so passionately desired; that understanding that an Imperial Dyer was indicted at Rheims, September the sixteenth, for the Electing a King of the Romans, he dispatch'd thither, the Earl of Arundell, as Ambassador to the new Emperor (who had lately succeeded his Father by the name of Ferdinand the Third). The Earl arriving at the Imperial Court, presented his Masters Request in behalf of the Prince Elector; and was answered, That he might be considered for holding the Lower Palatinate, but as for the other, it was in the power of the Bavarian, and therefore it would concern the Ambassador to treat with him, and with the Emperor's Deputies. Some of them were well inclined toward the Palgrave; but others were so hot against him, that they could hardly refrain from offensive Contumelies: And the Bavarian said plainly, That what he had won by the Sword, he would hold by the same as long as he was able. The Earl foreseeing what small success his Negotiation was like to have, would not mispend his own time, and his Majesties Money in the Treaty, but hastened away, and that (the more to shew his Indignation) without taking any leave, having before sent the King an account of his Transactions: nor could he be perswaded to stay one month longer, by all the Intreaties of the Spanish and Polish Ambassadors, whom the Emperor sent after him to appease him with promises of better effects, if he would return: but home he comes and finds the King so angry, at his being neglected, that he resolv'd to shew the like contempt to the Emperor's Agent, which came over to palliate the business, and to propose some terms of Accommodation. But though the Prince Elector's hopes seem'd now to be dash'd, yet another occasion of reviving them, seem'd to present it self; namely, an Overture of a Marriage between his Sister and the King of Poland, which was almost effected by the Legation of Prince Radzivil here in England, and consented unto by the Polish Peers and People, but obstructed by the Clergy, who pitch'd upon Cecilia, second Sister to the Emperor, and made up the Match between her and their King, leaving the poor Palgrave in his former state of desperation.

The Judges Debate about Ship-money. The Birth of the Lady Anne.

Master Hamden of Buckinghamshire, and divers other Gentlemen of Quality, had refused to pay the Tax of Ship-money, whereupon this Michaelmas Term, the King refers the Cause to the Censure of Twelve Judges, Brampton, Finch, Davenport, Denham, Hutton, Jones, Crook, Trevor, Vernon, Berkeley, Crawly, Weston; all which, except Hutton and Crook, gave Judgment against Hamden and his Associates, and subscribed their Names to be Inrolled in all Courts at Westminster-Hall. This year, March the seventeenth, the Princess Anne, the Kings third Daughter, was born.

Dr. Bastwick, Mr. Pryn, and Mr. Burton, are Condemned.

In the Year 1637, being the thirteenth year of the Kings Reign, a heavy Censure was pass'd upon Doctor Bastwick, Mr. Pryn, and Mr. Burton, for writing Books against Episcopall Government and Bishops; all three were sentenced five thousand pounds Fine to the King, to lose their Ears in the Pillory, and to be imprisoned. The Papists also suffered at this time under a severe Animadversion, it being observed, that they made numerous resorts to private Conventicles, the houses of Foreign Ambassadors, and especially to the old Chappell at Somerset-House; to whom Mr. Walter Mountague, Sir Toby Mathews, and the Queens Officers, were most notorious.

June the twenty sixth, Charles Prince Elector, and his Brother Prince Rupert departed for Holland, upon a design of effecting somewhat in reference to the recovery of their Patrimony, and the next year by assistance of the Kings Puse and Credit, with the Prince of Orange, and some of the States, gathered together a considerable beginning of an Army, with which, and the hopes of encreasing in their Advance, and entrance into their own Country, they march'd into Westphalia, and besieged Lemgo; but Count Hatzfeldt, one of the Emperours Generals, having notice of it, came suddenly upon them, and brought them to a necessity of a Battell, wherein they lost two thousand, and Prince Rupert, and the Lord Craven were taken Prisoners, the Elector himself hardly escaping by flight to the Hague.

Williams

A Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, comes now to his second Declaration, for his first was in the Kings first year, when the Great Seal was taken from him, and given to the Lord Coventry; this he so deeply resented, that he set himself to meditate revenge, and under-hand sowed all malevolent and popular disaffections; till at last, being narrowly watch'd he was found to vent some dishonourable Speeches of the King, for which he was put into a Bill in Star-Chamber, where after some years Hesitation, he was committed upon those words; and further for indirect practices used for his Purgation: (For one Priden, the main man that witnessed for him, being charged by an Order of the Justices at Lincoln, with a Ballad laid to him by Elizabeth Hudson; he, fearing least his Witness should be made invalid by this disgrace, procured by means of his two Agents, Towel and Owen, the Order to be repealed, and the Child to be Fathered upon one Boon, and Priden acquitted) and was therefore this year sentenced ten thousand pounds Fine to the King, Imprisonment in the Tower during pleasure, Suspension Ab officio & Beneficiis, and to be referred to the High-Commission, for what concerned that Court.

Scotland was now the Scene of Action, for the King pursuing what his Father had formerly designed, desirous that there might be an Uniformity in Religion between the two Nations, thought fit to injoin that people the use of the English Liturgie, and Sacerdotal Habilliments, beginning at his own Chappel; and this year it was to be proclaimed, to be used in all Churches, and the Bishops were well contented therewith, but not the Ministers of the Kirk; and the People generally so enraged at it, that when the Dean of Edinburgh so attired, began to read the Common-Prayer in St. Giles Church, July 13. therein countenanced by the Council, Bishops, Lords, and Magistrates; the Women first, and meaner men, with cursing and clapping their hands, and such like Actions, raised such a Hubbub, that nothing could be heard, save their Noise; the Bishop of Edinburgh who was to preach that day, steps up into the Pulpit, and reproves them for their irreverent behaviour in the Church, but was assailed (by them now more furious) with a whole shower of Stones, Sears, Sools Cudgels, and what ever came next to hand, to the great hazard of his life, the Archbishop of St. Andrews Lord Chancellor offering to interpose, had been as rudely handled, if he had not called down from the Gallery the Provost and Bayliffs, and other civil Magistrates, who with much ado excluded the Tumultuants, and to the Dean proceeded in his reading of the Service-Book, not without molestation by the Multitude abroad; and this hapned in other Churches also: But in the Afternoon such Order was taken, that it was then read with less disturbance; and the Magistrates seem'd so offended at these proceedings, that making enquiry after, and finding out some of the principal Actors, they inflicted punishment (though not very severe) upon them, and encouraged the Ministry to read the Book by an Act Obligatory, for their safeguard and maintenance. Thus all seem'd appeas'd, hush'd, and quiet for the present, until October following, when Harvest and Vacation taking end together, there was such a confluence of persons of all sorts, from all parts of the Kingdom to Edinburgh, as put the Council into a just fear of an Insurrection: To prevent which, they issued out these three Proclamations the 17th of that Month.

First, That no Church-Matters should be resolved; but that all Persons depart home; unless they shew some cause to the Council, upon pain of Rebellion.

Secondly, For removing the Session (or Term) from Edinburgh to Lithgow for the present, and afterwards the succeeding Sessions to Dundee, still further pleasure.

Thirdly, For calling in, and burning a Seditious Book; Entitled, A Dispute against the English Popish Convention, obtruded upon the Kirk of Scotland.

But all this had so little prevalence upon the people, that the next day the Bishop of Galloway pass'd to the Council-Chamber, was by them pursued thither, and assaulted in the very Council-House; and being difficultly drawn in from their Rage, the House was immediately better, and his person demand'd with such outrage, as necessarily call'd to his Succour the Earl of Traquair, and Winton, who forced their passage in, with much trouble, and little profit; for the Multitude encreasing, encompassed the House, that they were forced to require Aid of the Provost and City-Council; who being in the like condition, were glad to preserve themselves by subscribing:

First, To joyn in opposition to the Service-Book, and in positioning to that purpose. Secondly, To restore Ramsey and Rollock, two silenced Ministers, and Henderson a silenced Reader. This being related to the Council, the two afore-mentioned Earls went in person to the Town-house, where they found the Liar roar somewhat moderated by the Concessions of the Magistrates; but returning by the great Street, they were furiously assaulted; and Traquair Lord Treasurer was trodden under foot, his Hat, Cloak, and White Wand taken away, and himself haled to the Council-House.

And to the Lords weighing their own Danger, sent privately to some Noblemen and Gentlemen (who were disaffected to the Service-Book, and then assembled on behalf of the Common-Cause against it) by whom they and the Bishop of Galloway were guarded thence through the Crowd, to their several Lodgings.

And now thinking themselves safe, they make Proclamation, for breaking up all Conventions, and keeping the peace; but instead of Obedience to it, they are re-encountred with two Petitions. The first, from the medley of Men, Women, and Children. The second, in the Name of the Noblemen, Gentry, Ministry, and Burgeses; both against the Service-Book, and Canons: and these were sent to the King; who displeased thereat, adjourned the Term to Sterling, and published a Proclamation, forbidding, upon the extreamest penalty, such Tumultuous Refracts. Against this the Earl of Hume, the Lord Lindsay, and divers others made Protestation; and agreeable to it, erect four Tables, one of the Nobility, another of the Gentry, a third of the Barons, and a fourth of the Ministers; all to prepare and digest Propositions for the general Table, which was formed of severall Commissioners choise: from the rest.

The Scots enter into a Solemn League and Covenant, to maintain their Religion.

The Marquis of Hamilton procures the Office of High-Commissioner for the Scottish Affairs.

In the Year 1638, the generall Table entred into a solemn Covenant to preserve their Religion there profess'd, and resolved to maintain it, sent for Generall Lesly, and other Commanders and Officers from beyond the Seas, and provided themselves with Arms and Ammunition, whilst Hamilton, who was delegated High-Commissioner to pacifie these Distempers, under-hand fomented them, trifling away the time for almost the space of a year, with Declarations, Proclamations, Messages and Letters. Nor was it a small advantage to the Covenanters, that the Countess of Roxborough, Lady of the Bed-Chamber, and Governess to the Princess Mary, and in great Favour with the Queen, was a great Well-willer to their Designs, and did continually give her Husband, and he to them, Intelligence of the Court-Designs.

Hamilton having lost the Scottish Army for the Svedes Aide, and perceiving his Design that way frustrate, falls upon new Ones, cunningly induces the Duke of Lenox to favour him, and partly by his means and advice to the King, had procured to himself the Office of High-Commissioner for the Scottish Affairs; although the King was advised by the Earl of Sterling, Secretary of State, the Bishops of Refs, and Breken, Privy Counsellors, Sir Robert Spotswood, Lord President of the Colledge of Justice, and Sir John Hay, Master of the Rolls, rather to make choice of Marquis Hume, a known Enemy of the Covenanters; whereas Hamilton was suspected to hold correspondence with them. When he was come to Dalkieith (impowred with a Commission to use the utmost of his Interest for the settling of Peace) he abode there many dayes before the confederate Lords would take any notice of it (the Business being to managed, that they should shew him a seeming disrespect at his first coming), and then he had an Invitation to Edenborough; which he accepted. The first thing he did, was to expostulate with them concerning their late Actions, and what they would further have? To which they plainly answered him, That nothing but a General Assembly and Parliament would satisfie them, and that they had not any wayes turned from their Loyalty, so needed not return to it; and that they would rather renounce their Baptism, then their Covenant; and so doubled their Guards.

From Edenborough the Marquis removes to Dalkieith, and there publishes the Kings Declaration, for relieving of their Grievances, and professing his Majesties forwardness for maintaining the Religion there profess'd, and his resolution not to press the Service-Book and Canons upon them, but in a legall way of proceeding, and his Order given for the discharge of all Acts and Commissions concerning them: But this would not please, so he sends into England, and obtains leave from the King to recall the Terms to Edenborough, and to commit the publick Affairs to the secret Council: Which Grants, drew a Letter of Thanks from the Covenanters, who were hereby encouraged to demand Sir Robert Spotswood, the President of the Council, and Sir John Hay, Master of the Rolls, to be removed out of the Session, Proteſting, in case of denyall, to account all Acts to be null, if they two were present. But here they suffered a Repulse, and the Marquis leaving them jarring, comes privately to the King, and presently returns again: And treating with the Covenanters, after long disputation concerning the Condition of the Members of their Assembly, at length contracts all his Propositions into these two:

First, If the Lords and the rest will undertake for themselves, and the rest, That no Laity shall have Votes in choosing the Ministry, to be sent from the severall Presbyteries to the General Assembly, nor none else but the Ministry of the same Presbytery.
Secondly, If they will undertake that the Assembly shall not go about to determine of things established by Act of Parliament, otherways then by Remonstrance to the Parliament, leaving the determining of things Ecclesiasticall to the General Assembly, and things settled by Acts of Parliament, to the Parliament.

Then I will presently Indict a generall Assembly, and promise upon my Honour, immediately after to call a Parliament.

The Covenanters flew high, and threatned, that if they could have an Assembly upon no other Terms than these, they would call one themselves; wherefore to stop their impetuous Current, the Marquis makes another Journey to the King, and so works upon him and his Council, (not so well vers'd in the Scottish Affairs) that the whole unlimited management of the Business is committed to him, to order things as he should see most convenient; with which Authority he comes back to the Confederates, and finds them over-forward to order their own Election of Assembly-Members, which he puts a stop to for the present, by acquainting them with a Declaration, that he had procured from the King in their Favour to this purpose;

That

A That he did discharge the Service book, Book of Canons, and High-Commission; and also, That he did annul and rescind all Acts for establishing of them, and did discharge all persons from urging the practice of the Five Articles of Perth (so difficultly by King James obtained in Parliament); that all persons whomsoever shall be liable to the Censure of Parliament, General Assembly, or any other Judicatories, competent to the nature of the Offence: That no other Oath be Administered for the free entry of Ministers, then that which is contained in the Act of Parliament: That the ancient Confession of Faith, and Band annexed, should be subscribed and received, as in the Fathers time: That a General Assembly be holden at Glasgow, the 21 of November, 1638, and in the Parliament at Edenburgh the 15th of May, 1639. all former Offences pardoned; and a Generall Fast appointed.

B This Declaration being published, the Marquis and Council subscribed the Covenanters Confession of Faith; then followed the Proclamation for the General Assembly and Parliament: And lastly, an Act of the Council, for a general Subscription to the said Confession; and a Commission sent to those who were to take the Subscriptions. Yet something still remained matter for a new Protestation, which was read by one Johnson; wherein the people were moved to consider with whom they were to deal, and Exceptions made against Bishops, and Bishops Voting in the Assembly.

The next thing was to proceed in the electing Commissioners for the Assembly; where having fitted themselves, not without some brawling between the Presbyters, and the Lay-Elders, they move the Commissioner to cite the Arch-Bishops and Bishops to appear there as guilty persons; which he refusing, they presented a Bill of Complaint against them to the Presbytery at Edenborough, who accordingly warned them to appear at the next General Assembly.

Upon the Meeting of this Synod, the first thing that was done, after the reading of the Marquis's Commission, was the putting in of the Bishops Protestation against the Assembly, which the Covenanters vouchsafed not to read; and Hamilton seemingly incited, hastily enters a Protestation against their Refusal; and then Alexander Henderson was chosen Moderator.

And lastly, they presumed to prohibit six Lords of the Kings Privy-Council (though by him nominated) to be Assessors at their Assembly: But the King having an inkling of their proceedings, as to Bishops, and other Matters; and doubting the Event, ordered his Commissioner to dissolve the Assembly, which was accordingly done upon November the 29th; and the Covenanters after their usual mode, instantly set forth their Protestation against it; and withall, declared six former Meetings (obstructive to their wayes) to be void and of none effect, and soon after abolished Episcopacy; and Hamilton returning to England, prepared for War, as knowing that the King was determined to maintain the Bishops, and to call them to an account for all their late Transactions.

Cardinal Richelieu, whose Plot it was to raise the Fortunes of France, by the Dissentions of her Neighbours, puts in for his share, and sends over one Chamberlain, his Chaplain and Almoner to encrease the difference, and to widen the Orifice of the now gaping Wound, by promising them Assistance from his Master, the ancient Confederare of that Kingdom: Whereupon, a Letter was sent to the King of France, to implore his Aid, in these terms;

SIR,

Y Our Majesty being the Refuge and Sanctuary of afflicted Princes and States, we have found it necessary to send this Gentleman, Mr. Colvil, to represent unto your Majesty, the Candor and Ingenuity, as well of our Actions and Proceedings, as of our Intentions, which we desire to be Engraven and written to the whole World, with a Beam of the Sun, as well as to your Majesty. We therefore most humbly beseech you, Sir, to give Faith and Credit to him, and to all that he shall say on our part, touching Us, and our Affairs, being almost assured, Sir, of an Assistance, according to your wonted Clemency heretofore, and always shewed to this Nation, which will not yield the Glory to any other whatsoever, to be eternally--- your Majesties most humble, most obedient, and most affectionate Servants,

He obtains from the King a Declaration, in favour of Covenanters.

The Covenanters except, and declare against Bishops.

The General Assembly meets, and what was there acted

The Assembly dissolved by the Kings Order.

Cardinal Richelieu sends over his Almoner to foment the differences in Scotland.

A Letter sent by the Scots to the King of France, to implore his Assistance.

The Queen-Mother came into England, where she was honourably entertained by the King her Son-in-law, for the time she staid here, which was not long; nor was her presence very grateful to the people, as being by some judged ominous, and of evil tendency, where ever she resided; but they must be very blameless, that can escape the popular Censure.

The Scots by this time had gotten together a competent Army, and were upon their March, when the King having also prepared his Forces, committed them to the charge of the Earl of Arundel, as General; the Earl of Essex as Lieutenant-General of the Foot, and the Earl of Holland of the Horse; and a considerable Fleet under the Command of Marquess Hamilton: And upon 27th of February, put forth a Declaration, wherein the Scots were charged to have dispersed seditious Pamphlets against Regal Authority, and for inciting several persons against the King, by the private Meetings of their Agents at London, and other places, for their Protestations against his Commands, for executing their own Tables, Councils, and Committees, by their own Authority, and for refusing the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, because they had taken their Covenant. And lastly, That he was resolved to maintain Episcopacy there: In rejoinder to this, March the 22th, is published an Ordinance of their General Assembly, seeking to excuse themselves of what the King declared against them, and cursing themselves, if they meant any harm to England, concluding their Wars to be merely defensive, and grounded upon the Law, Natural and Civil.

H: marcheth in person into the North against them;

It was now the year 1639, at the 15th year of his Majesties Reign, the King set forward with his Army, March the 27th, and next Month comes to York, and the Month following to Barwick, where both Armies had an interview: In this mean time, Hamilton Anchors his Fleet in the Frith of Edenborough, receives a Visit from his Mother, a rigid Covenantar; who in the War (like a Virago) rid about the Army with Pistols at her Saddle-bow, to testify her zeal to the Cause; and the Scots themselves were heard to say, That the Son of so good a Mother would do them no hurt, as indeed he did not; for having loyted there some time, as soon as he understood of the Treaty of Pacification at Barwick, he gets on Land, and posits thither immediately, to be present at it, to carry on something there, which might serve his own Interest.

While the King staid in York, the Earl of Roxborough, and Traquair, came thither under pretence of Treating: But it appearing, that their main purpose was to tamper with the English Lords, and to take off the Edge of their Animosities against the Scots, (by telling them, that the Scots Ruine would enable the King to be more Imperious, even to the English, then they would be well able to bear) they were both committed, yet soon after released and dismissed, having done their principal Business, and taken order for the mutual Intelligence and Correspondency with the English Lords; so that when they came to Barwick, it was evident, that they had no mind to fight, although every way superior to the Scottish Army: The English were Encamped near Barwick, and the Scots at Dunfrow, when by the mediation of some, a Treaty was begun, which ended in a short-lived Peace upon these Articles, on the Kings part.

He comes to an Agreement with the Scots.

First, That his Majesty confirm, what his Commissioner promised in his Name.

Secondly, That a General Assembly be indited to be kept at Edenborough, August the sixth; and a Parliament at Edenborough, August the tenth.

And lastly, That upon their disbanding of their Forces, dissolving and discharging all their pretended Tables and Conventicles, and restoring to the King all his Castles, Forts, and Ammunition, as also his Royal Honours; and to every one of his good Subjects their Liberties, Lands, Houses, Goods, and Means whatsoever, taken and detained since the late pretended General Assembly, the King will presently thereafter recall his Fleet, and retire his Forces, and cause Restitution of their Ships and Goods, since the aforesaid time: This the King to do by Declaration, On the Scots Part, the Articles were;

First, The Forces of Scotland to be disbanded within eight and forty hours, after Publication of the Kings Declaration.

Secondly, They to render up, after the said Publication, all Castles, Forts, Ammunition, of all sorts, so soon as the King shall send to receive them.

Thirdly, They to hold no Meetings, Treatings, nor Consultations, but such as are warranted by Act of Parliament.

Fourthly, They to desist from all Fortifications, but such as were permitted at the Kings pleasure.

Fifthly, They to restore to all the Kings Subjects, all their Liberties, Lands, Houses, Goods, and means, taken, or detained from them, since the second of February last. Upon the eighteenth of June, the Kings Declaration was signed, and the Scots Articles.

The

The Kings Declaration was no sooner published, but the Covenanters produce another Protestation for adhering to their late Assembly at Glasgow; for adhering to their Covenant; and for prohibiting all Members of the Colledge of Justice from attending the Session or Term: And toward the latter end of July, the King, who had intended to be present at their general Assembly, now finding the Scots not punctual in the Performance of their Articles, and perceiving that they intended to fall upon those things which would prove distasteful to him; he therefore thinking he could better bear their Proceedings at a distance, plays him home to England, and upon the Sixth of August the Assembly meets at Edenborough, and sits till the 24th. and abolishes Episcopacy, take End, and the Parliament (prorogued to August the last) begin and spend their first four days in debating the election of the Lords of the Articles. And having at last agreed among themselves touching that Particular, they formed these Demands to be made to the King.

First, That Coin be not medled with, but by Advice of Parliament.

Secondly, No Stranger to command, or to inhabit in any Castles of the Kings, but by their Advice.

Thirdly, No Honour to be granted to any Stranger, but such as have a Competency of Land-Rent in Scotland.

Fourthly, No Commissioner, or Justiciary, or Lieutenantcy, but for a limited time; and next they Protest against Precedency of the Lord Treasurer, and Lord Privy Seal, as not warranted by a Positive Law.

These things coming to the knowledge of the King, together with a Pamphlet prevaricating the Conditions of the late Treaty, their Letters to the King of France for Aid, their Provisions for Armes, their levying Taxes of ten Marks per Centum, and continuing their Officers and Fortifications, induced him, by his Commissioner the Earl of Traquair, to Command the Adjournment of their Parliament untill the second of June next, upon pain of Treason: against which Command, the Covenanters declare, and send a Remonstrance to the King by the Earl of Dunfermling, and the Lord Lowdown, who coming without Warrant from the Kings Commissioner Traquair, were sent back without Audience, after them comes Traquair himself, and he and Hamilton consult together privately about representing the Matter to the Council; which began a debate, whether or not the Presence of the King were expedient for their Reduction; this was carried on both Sides with Arguments of Policy, and at length Resolved in the Negative, That they were not to be reduced to their Duty, but by force of Armes; and soon after this Dunfermling, and Lowdown return from Scotland in the quality of Commissioners, and with them Sir William Douglas and Mr. Robert Barkley, who after a long Speech for the Justification of the Scottish Transactions, desired, That the King would ratify and confirm their Proceedings, and that their Parliament might Proceed to determine of all Articles (or Bills) brought to them, to the establishing of Religion and Peace; but instead of an Answer to their Requests, the King charged them with the afore-mentioned Pamphlet (which he had caused to be burnt by the hands of the Hangman,) to which they made no Answer: but afterward the State of Scotland, in their Grand Declaration, excuse it, as related to them by their Commissioners, as being the chiefest cause of the Pacification, and the only Lenitive which made the People digest his Majesties Declaration. As for the Letter to the French King, the Original of it came to the Kings Hands, and the Character was found to be the Lord Lowdowns; who was thereupon committed for a short time, but Released upon the mediation of Marquis Hamilton, and then he and Dunfermling presented their Remonstrance to the King, and Traquair, comes also to give an Account of all before the whole Body of the Council; where things were handled with so much Acrimony, that both Parties were thereby exasperated into a greater dislike of one another.

During these Jarrs and Discontents between his Majesty and the Covenanters, about the middle of July, the Prince Electour (who the year before had lost both his Army, and his Hopes in West-Phalia) came over again into England; for Duke Bernard of Saxon-Weimer, a Commander very eminent in the German Wars, and a great Stickler against the Emperour, died about this time; and the Prince of Orange cancelled the Passgrave to go into England to his Uncle the King, and to procure from him that Assistance and Countenancing, which might get him the Command of that Dukes Army: but the King had his Hands full of Scottish Troubles, and therefore advised him to apply himself to the King of France, and to that end, deals with the French Ambassador here residing, to persuade his Majesty to joyn in League with him: Richelieu, the Grand Director of the Gallick Affairs, bore no great good will to the King of England upon the Ile of Rhe account; and, consequently disaffected toward his Nephew, sets some of his Engines on work, to persuade the Prince to pass through France, disguised, to the Swedish Army; which he imprudently attempted, but was discovered all the way by the great Respect shewed to him from the English Fleet as he passed near them, and from the Ship which landed him at Boullen; from whence he went to Paris, and thence to Lions, where he was seized, (and denying himself) as dealing perfidiously in a time of Treaty, was committed to a Guard of Horse and Foot for the present.

This year was remarkable for the great Sea-fight between the Spaniards and Hollanders in the Downes. Don Antonio D'Oquendo conducted a Fleet of near Seventy Sail, with about Twenty Five Thousand Men to be Landed at Dunkirk for a Recruit for Flanders. These met with the Dutch Vice-Admiral in the way with Seventeen Sail of good Men of War; by whom they were forced to an Engagement upon the Seventh of September, in which the Hollander coming by the worst, with the loss of two Ships sunk, got to Wind-ward, going along with them towards Dunkirk continually firing their Ordnance upon them, to give warning to Pantrumpe, the Dutch Admiral, who lay before the Town. The Admiral hears the Reports, and comes up with ten Ships; and, joining Forces with the Vice-Admiral, Encounters the Spaniard in a sharp Fight between Dover and Calais for almost half a day, having much the better, taking two Gallions, and forcing the rest (forely shattered) on the English Coast near Dover, and so bore off towards France, till they might Consult what was next to be done. The Spanish Resident desired the King to Protect them from the Hollander for two Tides, that they might have convenience to get back to Spain: but the King, in Amity with both, would not meddle in the business; but enjoined those English who had agreed privately to transport their Souldiers and Treasure to Dunkirk, to desist from any such Enterprises, by reason of the Dutch Ambassadors Complaint, and gave Order, that no Spaniard should be suffered to pass unlicensed beyond Gravefend; and so the Spaniards, being left to his own wits, took Advantage of the Night, and by a Stratagem conveyed to Dunkirk fourteen Ships, with four thousand Men, and four hundred thousand pounds. But the King, unwilling to have them engage in his Seas, desired the Spanish Admiral, by the Earl of Arundell, to retreat upon the first fair Wind: but the Wind continuing contrary, longer than ordinary, held them there so long, that the Hollander (who waited his coming out) now increasing by daily Supplies (to the number of a hundred complex Ships,) resolved to fall upon them, as they did, upon the eleventh of October, charging them with Cannon and Fire-ships, in such furious manner, as they, unable to endure the Shot, cut their Cables, and twenty three of them ran ashore, whereof two were perished; one of which was a great Gallion of two and fifty brass pieces of Ordnance, commanded by the Vice-Admiral of Gallicia don Andrea de Castro; the Spaniards of the rest fled to Land, leaving their Ships to be man'd by the English for safeguard from the Dutch. Admiral Oquendo and Lopez of Portugal, with thirty Ships went to Sea, keeping in close order, till they were covered with a great Fogge; by advantage of which, the Dutch interposed between the Admirals and their Fleet, and fired the Admiral of Portugal, besides other Damage; which Oquendo perceiving (the Foggs then clearing up) he with some few other Ships bent their course to Dunkirk. Of these thirty, eleven were taken and sent into Holland; three perished upon the Coast of France, one near Dover, and five sunk in the Fight. What the design of this Spanish Fleet was, remains yet in uncertainty: various Designs were differently passed upon it; For five and twenty thousand Men to be imbarqued for a Recruit, seemed to most men unlikely, and the Refusal of the Admiral of Naples to shew his Commission, when required by the King, was very suspicious; and, That the Dunkirks should a while dispute the Reception of those four thousand which were conveyed thither, did cause no little wonder; inasmuch that many there were, who judged the principal Design of this Fleet to be against our King; for distempers beginning to arise about this time in England and Ireland as well as in Spain, it was not altogether improbable that the Spaniards might have had those Correspondences in some one of those Countries, which should have furnished them at their Landing (wheresoever it was to have been) with Armes and Ammunition, whereof they stood in so great need in the time of their fighting with the Dutch, that five and twenty Ships were able to deal with their whole Armado of near seventy Sail: However it was, the Kings Reputation was hereby greatly impaired, for suffering the Hollanders to fall upon the Spaniards in his Seas; and the Hollanders doubting that he might relent the affront offered to him in that Action, were willing to keep him so busied, that he should not have opportunity of revenge, and to that end, accommodated the Scots with all manner of warlike Provision.

This year died Sir Thomas Coventry on the tenth of January; he was Privy-Councellour to the King, and had been Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England for the space of fifteen years, who deceased with the greater Commendation, by reason of the eminent delinquency of his two immediate Antecessors, the Viscount St. Albans, and the Bishop of Lincoln; and to him succeeded Sir John Finch.

One Bagshaw, a Reader of the Middle-Temple, was about this time silenced for speaking too boldly against Prelacy; and was therefore shrewdly Checkt by the Lord Keeper Finch, and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and forced for a while to abstain himself from London. The Scott Commissioners having delivered their Message, return Home to Edenborough November the 19, the same Night that a great part of the Castle Walls fell down, being the just Anniversary of the Kings Birth day. For the Reparation of them, the King sent the Lord Esirich, Collonell Ruther, and others; who were resisted by the Covenanters, because they thought not the Lord Esirich to be a fit Governour of the Castle, as the King had designed him. The Kings Anger was now grown to the height, and therefore he Resolves since fair means avail'd but little, to bring them to Reason by force of Armes; and to that end, Considers of raising Men and Money to bring them into Order: a secret Cabinet Councell is call'd, consisting of but three; these three were the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Hamilton (who drove designs by himself); amongst these it was agreed, That a Parliament must be called in England, and another in Ireland, for the Kings Supply: but because the King feared that the Parliament would be tedious in their debate, before they would agree upon any Subsidies for him, it was Resolved, That the Lords should for the present subscribe some Loans; the Lord Lieutenant subscribed 20000 l. the Duke of Richmond as much; Hamilton kept his Moneys for other ends, and therefore pretended poverty; most of the Lords, Judges, Officers, and Dependants of Courts of Judicature, and generally the greatest part of the Gentry, even the Recusants, contributed according to their abilities. About this time the

A Scott perceiving what a Storm was like to fall upon them, made preparation for defence, and to that end, entertained Treaties with several foreign Princes and States; as Denmark, Sweden, Holland, and Poland; and as for the Jesuits, they thought it would be no venial Sin if they thought not have a hand in fomenting the differences; to which end, Cow, the Popes Agent and Chamberlain, Richliens Chaplain, Sir Toby Matthews, a Jesuited Priest of the Order of Politicians, Captain Read, and one Maxwell, a couple of Scots, bestir themselves very diligently, to re-inforce the fence of every injury, and to excite the People to believe that the King chiefly aimed at a Tyrannical subjugation of them to his own arbitrary will. These their Practices were discovered by Andreas Habernsfield, a Nobleman of Bohemia, then become Physician to the Kings Sister, the Palgrave Relict, who made it also apparent, that many of the Nobility of England, and chief Favorites at Court (among whom were the Earl and Countess of Arundell, Secretary Windebank, and Endymion Porter;) were acquainted, and consenting with their Transactions. Con did directly imitate the ways of his Predecessor, Richard Smith, the titular Bishop of Chalcedon; who did (all his Successors) Banzani, Con, and Rosetti; this Con had formerly offered in the Popes name a Cardinals Cap to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

April the 13, in the year 1640. and the 16 of the Kings Reign, the Parliament Assembled, and Mr. John Glanvill was Speaker of the House of Commons: In this Parliament the Earl of Strafford was greatly honoured, being led into the House of Lords by two Peers, in honour of his good Service in Ireland, in obtaining the Grant of four Subsidies, to maintain ten thousand Foot and sixteen hundred Horse; and this for a Pattern to England. And that England might the more Cheerfully write after the Irish Copy, the King sends to the Parliament, to tell them, That if they would supply him with a sufficiency, for the suppressing of the Scottish Insolencies, he would acquit his Claim of Ship-Moneys, and give satisfaction to their just Demands. By these Proposals the Parliament perceived the extremity of the Kings Exigences, and therefore they would be first satisfied in these three Points.

First, For clearing the Properties of the Subject.

Secondly, For establishing true Religion.

Thirdly, For Priviledges of Parliament; But while they were debating whether the Kings Supplies or the Subjects Sufferings should be first considered, and things were brought to a hopeful posture, Secretary Vane (spoils all, either purposely, or fortuitously, by telling them, that the King demanded twelve Subsidies, whereas he required but six; and hereby put them into such a heat against the King, and rendered things so desperate, that the King, by advice of his Junto, dissolved the Parliament May the fifth, after two and twenty days Session: nor was this only the Advice of the Junto, but also of the Privy Council, who were ascertained, that the Animofities of the Commons were so great, as they intended that very day to have Voted against the War with Scotland; whereby the King would have been left in a worse case than he was before their sitting.

About this time the Convocation of Bishops sat with Commission to act, propose, deliberate, and conclude such Cannons and Constitutions, as they conceived conducive to the peace of the Church; amongst other things, they imposed that Oath known by the name of &c. as an Anti-Covenant to that of the Scots.

This was the main Business of the Convocation, which ended May the 29. The Archbishop by his zealous Proceeding against Non-conformists, and such as went by the name of Puritans, and by his strict injunction of the Observance of Ecclesiastical Ceremonies, especially by re-inforcing such old Ceremonies as had not been of late much observ'd; incurred a great deal of hatred from the common men, especially the Londoners, who had a particular distaste against him, for his severe animadversion upon Barton, Primm, and Bashwick; to that May the 9th. a Paper

The Earl of Haddington and others slain by an accident.

The Lords Petition the King to call a Parliament.

a Paper was posted upon the Old Exchange, exhorting Apprentices to rise and sack his House at Lambeth next Monday, which they were the more forward to do; because it was rumor'd, that he was a prime instigator of the King to dissolve the Parliament; but he had notice of their intent, and provided against their coming: On Monday following, in the dead of the Night, five hundred of them beset his House, striving to force their Entrance, yet were repulsed, and glad to depart, having in some measure vented their anger against him, in words, and in breaking his Glasse Windows. The next day many of them upon inquiry were apprehended and imprisoned, but three dayes after forcibly rescued from thence by their Companions, who broke open the Prison doors; for which one of their Ringleaders was hanged, drawn, and quartered, and his Limbs set upon London Bridge.

The King grew daily more and more offended at the Scots, and calls a select Juncto to consult about them, where the Earl of Strafford delivered his mind in such terms, as afterward were made use of among other things to his destruction; War was Resolved upon, and Money to be procured either by fair means or foul. The City of London was invited to a Loan, but refused, and pleaded poverty, being, as it seemed, distast'd that the Star-Chamber had sentenced their Plantation of London-Derry in Ireland, to be forfeited for some alleged Misdemeanours, and the Undertakers Fined; yet the Citizens were content to offer an ample sum towards the building of a magnificent Palace for the Kings Court in St. James's Park, according to Inigo Jones's Modell, but it took not effect. The Gentry Contributed pretty freely, so that with their Aids the regal Army was compleated, and the King himself was Generalissimo, the Earl of Northumberland General, and the Earl of Strafford Lieutenant General; Northumberland falls Sick, and therefore the King takes the Command upon himself, and sends away part of the Army, Horse and Foot, under the Lord Conway into the North. July the 20, the Queen was delivered of a Son, who was Christned Henry, after created Duke of Gloucester; And August the 20, the King with the rest of the Army sets out of London, and comes to North-Alorton. In the mean time the Lord Conway had but ill success; he had drawn about 1200 Horse, and 3000 Foot, to secure the Passes upon the River Tyne, near New-born; Thither was the Scottish Army advanced with their General Lesly, better provided than the time before. August the 27, Lesly desires leave of Conway for his whole Army to pass to the King with their Petition, but is denied; three hundred Scottish Horse attempted to cross the River, and are repelled by the shot of the English Musketeers, who were placed under the shadow of the Breft-work; Lesly makes a large Requisition for that, by playing upon them with his nine Pieces of Ordnance, which he had placed on the other side of River, and blinded them with the Buishes; The English Infantry terrified with the unexpected Charge of the Cannon (for they were mostly raw Souldiers) forsook their Posts, cast down their Arms, and fled; Lesly comes on with his Horse, and Charges Commissary-General Wilmore, who with the Cavalry stood stoutly to it, till over-born with Multitude and Cannon, they were put to a disorderly Retreat: the Lord Conway seeing both Horse and Foot worsted, hasts to the King, to carry him the unwelcome News of the defeat; and Sir Jacob Ashley, Governour of New-Castle, knowing the Place not tenable, deserted it, sinking the Ordnance in the River, and so both New-Castle and Durham came shortly into the Scots Hands. Now comes Strafford, with whom the King Retreats to York, and stay's there, while the Earl (who now had the Command of the Army) Charges the whole Miscarriage upon Conway, and he as stoutly denies it.

In Scotland, the Earl of Haddington, who commanded the Forces in Louthian and Merse, having recovered from the Souldiers of Berwick Garrison, the pieces of Ordnance (which Lesly had left behind him at Dunfer) and brought them to Duglass, was the next day slain with twenty more Knights and Gentlemen in the midst of his Court by the Stones that flew from the Vault near adjoining; which was then blown up with the Magazine that lay in it.

The King had formerly declared the Scots to be Rebels and Traytors by Proclamation, and commanded that Publick Prayers should be put up against them in all Churches: but at this time is contented to Treat with them, and to that end, receives from them a Petition flust with Complaint of their Grievances; to which he answers by his Secretary of Scotland, the Earl of Lamerick, That he expects their particular Demands, and them he receives within three days, all tending to requiring a Parliament to be called in England, without which, there could be no satisfactory Redress for them: They had likewise published a little before their Marching into England a Declaration, called, The Intensions of the Army, viz. Not to lay down Armes till the Reformed Religion were settled in both Nations upon sure Grounds, and the Causes and Abettors of their present Troubles (viz. the Archbishop and Lord Deputy) brought to Publick Justice, and that in Parliament. Conformably to this, twelve English Peers, Bedford, Hertford, Essex, Warwick, Mulgrave, Brilston, Rutlingbrook, Say and Seal, Mandavill, Edward Howard, Brook, Paget, drew up a Petition to the King, and had it delivered: After which, others of the like Nature were brought from the Londoners, and other Parts of the Kingdom; all consenting most harmoniously in this, That nothing could relieve the Pressures of this Kingdom, but a Parliament. To this the King in part consents, giving hopes also of further satisfaction ere long, and for the present summons the Lords to appear at York the 24 of September, which they did: and on the first day of their Meeting, it was Agreed, That a Parliament should be called, to convene November the Third, and then, for relief of the North, sorely suffering under Lesly's Army (Durham Bishoprick being then taxed 350 l. and Northumberland

A Northumberland 300 l. per diem) it was resolved, that a Treaty should be set on foot, and so Sixteen English Lords, viz. Earls, Bedford, Berkshire, Hertford, Salisbury, Essex, Holland, Bristol, Warwick; Barons, Mandevill, Howard, Paget, Paulet, Savile, Broke, Dunsmore, Wharton, should meet with so many Scots Lords, the place York: but that was refused, as not safe enough for the Scots Commissioners, by reason of the pience of the Lord Deputy, who had proclaimed them Traytors in Ireland, and was now in great Authority, as having the Chief Command of the Kings Army, a Capitall Enemy of their Nation, and against whom they had matter of high Complaint: hereupon it was concluded, that the Treaty should be held at Rippon.

The first thing that was here proposed, was a Cessation, but the Scots thought other things were to be considered of in the first place; for as they would Obey the King in his late Command which he had laid upon them, To advance no further; so neither would they Return, until they had obtained the Effects of their Errand, and therefore they required to know:

First, How their Army should be maintained till the Treaty was ended, and Peace secured. Secondly, That, if more Commissioners be required, then a safe Convey be granted for them. Thirdly, A safe Convey for all Letters between Them and the Parliament.

And Fourthly, That, for the Benefit of both Kingdoms, there may be a free Commerce, and that the Common Trade of New-Castle be not hindered, but especially for Victuals.

These Articles were at length agreed unto, although the first did seem both unreasonable and dishonourable to the English Nation; and indeed the Earl of Strafford was so offended thereat, that he craved leave of the King to give them Battell, and was willing to undertake (as he wrote to the Archbishop of Canterbury) upon the Perill of his head, with his Army of English Grashoppers, to beat those Sons of Bitches home again: for so much superiour were the Scots then accounted to the English, as to matter of Souldiery: And, upon the 16 of October, the English Commanders, (some through Fear, some through Favour, and others out of a Politicall Maxime not to strive against the Stream) consended to these ensuing Articles; which were afterwards produced, and then Signed by the King himself.

First, That there be a Cessation of Arms, both by Sea and Land, from this Present.

Secondly, That all acts of Hostility do henceforth cease.

Thirdly, That both Parties shall peaceably return during the Treaty, whatsoever they possess at the time of the Cessation.

Fourthly, That all such persons who lived in any of his Majesties Forts beyond the River of Tweed, shall not exempt their Lands which lye within the Counties of Northumberland and the Bishoprick, from such Contributions as shall be laid upon them for the payment of Eight hundred and Fifty pounds per diem.

Fifthly, That none of the Kings Forces upon the other side of Tweed shall give any Impediment to such Contributions as are already allowed for the Competency of the Scottish Army, and shall fetch no Victuals, nor forage out of their Bounds, except that which the Inhabitants and Owners thereof shall bring voluntarily unto them, and that any Restraints or Detention of Victuals, Cartell, or Forage, which shall be made by the Scots within those Bounds for their Maintenance shall be no Breach.

Sixthly, That no Recruit shall be brought into either Armies, from the time of the Cessation, and during the Treaty.

Seventhly, That the Contribution of Eight hundred and fifty pounds per diem, shall be only raised out of the Counties of Northumberland, Bishoprick, Town of New-Castle, Cumberland, and Westmerland: and that the not Payment thereof shall be no Breach of the Treaty, but the Counties and Towns shall be left to the Scots Power to raise the same, but not to exceed the Sum agreed upon, unless it be for charges of driving, to be set by a praiser of the Forrage.

Eighthly, That the River of Tweed shall be the Bounds of Both Armies, (excepting alwaies the Town and Castle of Storkton, and the Village of Egslyss) and the Counties of Northumberland and Bishoprick be the Limits within which the Scottish Army is to reside, having liberty for them to send such Convoys as shall be necessary for the gathering up only of the Contribution, which shall be unpaid by the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland.

A Treaty agreed upon between the Scots and English.

The Articles of Agreement.

• Ninthly, That if any Person commit any private Insolence, it shall be no breach of our Treaty, if upon Complaint made by either Party, Reparation and Punishment be granted.

• Tenthly, If Victuall be desired upon the Price which shall be agreed upon, and Ready money offered for the same, and refused, it shall be no Breach of Cessation to take such Victualls paying such Prices.

• Eleventhly, No new Fortification to be made during the Treaty, against either Party.

• Twelfthly, That the Subjects of both Kingdoms may in their Trade of Commerce freely pass to and fro without any Stay at all: but it is Particularly Provided, That no Member of either Army, pass without a formall Pass under the hands of the Generall, or of him that Commands in Chief.

This Treaty of Rippon was but previous to another Treaty of greater Importance to be had at London for a Generall concluding and making up all Differences between the King and his Subjects of Scotland. The Earl of Strafford is here censured for Impudence either in not foreseeing, or else in not preventing that Danger then hanging over his head by the Scots Commissioners Treating at London in the time of a Parliament, and that at such time as he lay under the hatred of the Citizens in generall, and likewise of the greatest and most prevalent part of the Members for he knew that the Scots were resolv'd to make it one of their chief Errands to put up a Complaint against him; nor could he be ignorant of what kind Acceptance such an Accusation would find amongst Persons so disaffected towards him: From all which, he might have secured himself, had he either returned to his Government in Ireland, or transported himself for Refuge to some other Foreign Land: Not to speak of his neglect of timely exhibiting those Articles which he had in a readinesse against his chief Accuser Pym, for holding correspondence with the Scotch Covenanters, whereby he should have prevented his Advancers by beginning with them first.

During this Treaty at Rippon, James Earl of Montrose made severall applications to the King by Letters, testifying his Faith and Loyalty to him, and his Dislike of the Scottish Proceedings: But those his Letters were said to have been secretly taken out of the Kings Pockets, and copied out and conveyed to the Covenanters by the means of Hamilton, who also hath been generally believ'd to have been the cause of his first Confederating himself with them, by perswading him, (at such time as he came out of France, where he had been Captain of the Scots Guard) that the King had intent of reducing Scotland into a Province under England, and of Oppressing this Nation: And to colour his Design the better, he is said to have induced the King to shew him an unkind disrespect when he came to kiss his Hands. The Covenanters thus by the discovery of these Letters, understanding his mind, were not wanting to themselves, but used all convenient means to render the Earl odious to the People, and so unserviceable to the King. And before this time, the Kings Secrets had been discovered through the rifling of his Pockets by his corrupted Bed-Chamber men; and now the Peoples Desires were to receive satisfaction by the Convening of a Parliament which was summoned to meet at Westminster, by a fatal oversight of the King (in the Judgment of many men) who had sufficient Presidents from the Histories of former times, to have caused them to have met at York, or some other place in the North, more near the Scene of Action, and that Danger which was the Occasion of their Assembling; but this was not all the Error, to Westminster he calls them, near London, whose Citizens he had found by experience to be disgusted for the most part, both at him, and his Favourites: And moreover, the Scots Commissioners must come thither, and at such a season have an Opportunity put into their Hands, to work upon the discontented Humours of the Londoners.

A Parliament again assembled.

Tuesday, November the third, the Parliament met: Which day was look'd upon by the Bishop of Canturbury as a fatal day for summoning of Parliaments, in reference to Church Affairs, having provid' so in the 20th year of Henry the Eighth; whereupon he advis'd the King for luck's sake, to put off their Sitting for two or three dayes; but his Majestie not minding any such observation of dayes, made no account of it. There was chosen for Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. William Lenthall, one of the Benchers and Readers of Lincolns-Inne (this is that long Parliament so much talked of); the King comes to them and tells them, That the Scottish Troubles were the Causes of their present Meeting, and therefore requires them to consider of the most expedient means for the casting them out; and then promises them, That he will heartily and clearly concur with them for the satisfying their just Grievances: After that, he propounds to them his want of money for the maintaining of his Army, and how dishonourable it would be to the English Nation, if his Army should be disbanded, before the Scots were put out of the Kingdom; and that they would take into Consideration the Oppression of the Northern Counties by the Scots, Scots, during the time of Treaty, and withall find out some means for Redress. And so concluded his Speech, with desire that all reciprocal suspition might be removed.

That the King should call the Scots Rebels, was ill resented by many: Whereupon he took occasion to tell them, That he must needs call them Rebels, so long as they have an Army that do invade England.

The first Week was wholly taken up with sending Committees for Grievances, and in receiving Petitions, partly from Counties concerning Exorbitancies of Church and State; and partly from some private persons who had felt the Lash of the Star-Chamber, Council-Table, and High-Commission Court: Monopolies were Voted down. And more than that, all such Members as had received any benefit by them, were Ejected out of the House. A Proceeding judg'd by some to be an Innovation, and without President.

Monopolies Voted down.

November the tenth, Complaint was made in the House of Lords, That Sir William Beecher Clerk of the Council, had violated their Privileges, in searching the Earl of Warwicks, and the Lord Brook's Studies, Cabinets, and Pockets, upon the breaking up of the last Parliament: Whereupon he was committed to the Fleet-Prison, notwithstanding his alledging the Command of the Secretary of State for his so doing.

The Earl of Strafford is now in his Wane, him the Commons are resolv'd to Charge through and through with their Accusations; and Mr. Pym is sent to the House of Lords with an Impeachment of High-Treason against him; upon which he is Sequestred from the House, and also his intimate Friend Sir George Ratliff, is sent for out of Ireland, by a Serjeant at Arms. Strafford is committed to the Usher of the Black Rod, in order to his ensuing Tryall; yet obtains the Assignment of Council, and a Solicitor for the better managing of his Defence. In the mean time, the Bishop of Lincoln is set free from the Tower, and for a while becomes the great Favourite of both Houses of Parliament; and Mr. Prim and Mr. Burton are conducted into London, in great State and Triumph, and upon the third of December presented their Petition against their Prosecutors, to the House of Commons.

The Earl of Strafford Impeached of High-Treason, and Committed.

The Bishop of Lincoln released.

Pym and Burton brought to London in Triumph. Justice Howard stabb'd in Westminster-Hall.

But the Papists began to fear a Cloud, for Justice Howard was to deliver up a Catalogue of all Recusants within the Liberties of Westminster; to prevent which, he was stabbed by one Mr. John James in Westminster-Hall: for which Fact, the Assailant was Imprisoned in the Gate-house, in order to a more severe punishment.

But Sir Francis Windbank, Secretary of State, fearing to be called to an Account by the Parliament, for reprieving Jesuits and Priests, which he knew would be produced against him, if not worse matters, warily shifted over Sea into France.

December the seventh, the House of Commons Voted the Assessment of Ship-money, together with the Opinions of the Judges, and the Writs for it, and the Judgment of the Exchequer against Mr. Hamden, to be all illegal: and the Arguments of the two Justices, Crook, and Hutton, for the illegality thereof, to be Printed. As for the other eight Justices, a Committee was appointed to draw up a Charge of High-Treason against them, and to begin with the Lord-Keeper Finch.

December the eleventh, Alderman Pennington, with some hundreds at his Heels, presented to the House of Commons a Petition from the Citizens of London (subscribed by fifteen thousand) against the present Church Discipline, and Ceremonies, but that was for the time laid aside, and the Parliament animated by the Congruity of the peoples Inclinations, took the late Convocation and Canons into Debate; and upon the fifteenth of December Voted,

The Citizens present a Petition against Church-Ceremonies.

That the Clergy in a Synod, or Convocation, hath no power to make Canons, Constitutions, or Laws, to bind either Laity, or Clergy, without a Parliament. And next day it was Voted, That the Canons are against the Fundamental Laws of this Realm, against the Kings Prerogative, Property of the Subject, the Right of Parliaments, and do tend to Faction, and Sedition.

The Earl of Strafford had already felt some Blows of the Parliaments Displeasure, the Archbishop of Canturbury turn is next, against whom a Committee is ordered to draw up a Charge, as principal Framer of the Canons, and for other Delinquencies. This Impeachment was brought up to the House by Mr. Holles, and seconded with another from the Scots Commissioners; upon which he was committed to the Black Rod, and ten Weeks after Voted guilty of High-Treason, and sent to the Tower.

The Archbishop of Canturbury committed to the Black Rod.

The Scots also prefer a Charge against the Earl of Strafford (then in durance), and desired Justice upon them both, as the great Incendiaries and Disturbers of the Church and State: And Sir George Ratliff, the Earls truly Achanis, was encountered with this Impeachment.

First, That he had conspired and joyned with the Earl of Strafford, to bring into Ireland an Arbitrary Government, and to subvert the Fundamental Laws.

Articles against Sir George Ratliff.

Secondly, To bring an Army from Ireland, to subdue the Subjects of England.

Thirdly, That he animated the Earl to use Regall Power, and to deprive the Subjects of their Liberties and Properties.

Fourthly, That he conspired with the Earl in taking out, Fourty thousand pounds out of the Exchequer in Ireland, wherewith they bought Tobacco, and converted the same profit to their own uses.

Fifthly, As also, in countenancing Papists, and building Monasteries, to alienate the Affections of the Irish Subjects from the subjection of England.

Sixthly, In drawing the Subjects of Scotland from the King.

Seventhly,

Seventhly, That to preserve himself and the said Earl, he had laboured to subvert the Liberties and Privileges of Parliament in Ieland.

The Lord Keeper Finch was now the next man that should fall under their Censure, and therefore prepares to be before-hand with a set Speech in his own Vindication, and Courts them highly; but it would not avail, for even that very day he was Voiced a Traytor, upon these Accusments:

First, For refusing to read the Remonstrance against the Lord Treasurer Weston, 4 Car. when the Parliament desired it.

Secondly, For soliciting, perswading, and threatening the Judges to deliver up their Opinions for levying of Ship-money.

Thirdly, For severall illegal Actions in Forrest-matters.

Fourthly, For ill Offices done, in moving the King to dissolve the late Parliament; and causing his Majesties Declaration thereupon to be set forth. Next day he was accused before the Lords, but he wisely foresaw the Storm, and withdrew himself to the Harbour of Holland.

He flies over into Holland.

The Parliament having now removed their Enemies, and encreasing in Reputation, and sensible of their own Power, were modelling a Bill for a Triennial Parliament; for the promoting of which, Petitions came thick and threefold, one whereof, subscribed with above eight hundred Presbyters, was directly against Episcopacy; which the King took notice of, and doubting the Parliaments forwardness to entertain it, he calls both Houses together the three and twentieth of January, and tells them of their slow proceedings, and inconveniencies thereby, in maintaining two Armies in the Kingdome. After which, he told them of two Rocks which he would have them to avoid; the one concerning the Hierarchy of Bishops, which he was willing to reform, but not to alter: the other concerning frequent Parliaments, which he liked well, but not to give his Power to Sheriffs and Constables.

The Parliament expostulate with the King about the reviving of one Goodman a Priest.

About this time one Goodman a Priest having been condemned at the Sessions at London, was revivied by the King; upon which both Houses petitioned to be informed who were the Instruments of it: and receiving an unsatisfactory Answer, they Remonstrated against the Toleration of Papists, and the Pope's Nuncio Rosetti, and this Goodman, who they desired might be left to the Justice of the Law. The King makes answer, That the encrease of Popery and Papists in his Dominions, is extremely against his mind, and that he would use all possible means for the restraining of it.

As for the Pope's Nuncio Rosetti, he hath no Commission but only to preserve Correspondence between the Queen and the Pope, which was allowed her by the Articles of Marriage; notwithstanding he hath prevailed with her for his removal; and is content to remit the particular Cause of Goodman to both Houses.

Lords appointed to Treat with the Scots Commissioners, in order to a full Pacification.

Five Months had the Scots been quartered in England, during which, a Cessation had been concluded at Rippon, but the plenary Pacification was reserved for London; in pursuance of which, the former Lords (who treated at Rippon,) or any ten of them, were impowered, November the 23<sup>d</sup>, to Treat with the Scots Commissioners, being the Earls of Rothes, and Dunferling, the Lord Lowdon, Sir Patrick Hepburn, Sir William Douglas, William Drummond, John Smith Bayliff of Edinburgh, Alexander Wodderburn, Hugh Kennedy, Alexander Henderson, and Archibald Johnson, or any seven of them, to consider of their Demands.

The Commissioners are on both parties; the Demands of the Scots, and the Answer thereto were as followeth. The Scots demand:

The Scots Demands, with the Answers to each Demand.

First, That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to Command, that the Acts of the late Parliament may be published in his Highnesses Name as our Sovereign Lord, with the consent of the Estates of Parliament, Convened by his Majesties Authority.

To this it is answered and agreed the 30. of December. 1640. That forasmuch as the King's Majesty in the humble desire of his Subjects, did call and Convoke a Parliament to be holden at Edinburgh the second of June 1640. wherein certain Acts were made and agreed upon, which Acts his Majesty is pleased to publish in his own Name, with the Consent of the Estates: and therefore commands that the said Acts, bearing date the second day of June 1640. be published with the Acts to be made in the next Session of this Parliament; and that all the said Acts, as well of the precedent as of the next Session, to be holden, have in all time coming the strength of the Laws, and to be obeyed by all the Subjects of the Kingdome of Scotland.

Secondly, That the Castle of Edinburgh, and other strengths of the Kingdom, should with the Advice of the States of Parliament, according to their first Foundation, be furnished and used for defence and security of the Kingdome.

(Answer) It is agreed unto.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, That all Scottish men, within his Majesties Dominions of England and Ireland, may be freed from Censure for subscribing the Covenant, and be no more pressed with Oaths and Subscriptions, unwarranted by their Laws; and contrary to the National Oath and Covenant approved by his Majesty.

Answer, It is agreed December the 8. 1640. That all those who in his Majesties Dominions of England and Ireland, have been imprisoned or censured any way for subscribing of the Covenant, or for refusing to take any other Oath contrary to the same, shall be freed of these Censures, and shall be fully restored to their Liberties, Estates, and Possessions; and for time coming that the Subjects of Scotland, as Subjects of Scotland, shall not be constrained to any Oath, contrary to the Laws of that Kingdome, and the Religion there established; but such of the Kingdome of Scotland, as shall transport themselves into the Kingdome of England, or Ireland, and there be seiled Inhabitants, either by way of having Inheritance, or Freehold, or by way of seiled Trades, shall be subject to the Laws of England; or Ireland, and to the Oaths established by the Laws and Acts of Parliament in the said Kingdome respectively, wherein they live. And the English and Irish shall have the like Privileges in Scotland.

Fourthly, That his Majesty would be pleased to declare, That whosoever shall be found upon Tryal and Examination, by the Estates of either of the two Parliaments (they judging against the persons subject to their own Authority) to have been the Authors and Causers of the late and present Troubles and Combinations, whether by labouring to make and foment Division between the King and his People, or between the two Nations, or any other ways shall be liable to Censure of the said Parliaments respectively.

Answer, It is answered, Decemb. 11. 1640. That his Majesty believeth he hath no such about him; therefore concerning that Point, he can make no other Declaration, than that he is just, and that all his Courts of Justice are to be free and open to all men. Our Parliament in this Kingdome is now sitting, and the current Parliament of Scotland, near approaching the time of their Meeting: In either of which respectively, he doth not prohibit the Estates to proceed in trying and judging of whosoever his Subjects. And whereas it was further demanded, that none after the Sentence of the Parliament should have Access to his Majesty, or be maintained, or enjoy Places, or Offices, and have Credit or Authority, so inform or advise his Majesty. It is declared in his Majesties Name, Decemb. 30. 1640. That he will not employ any person or persons, in any Office or Place, that shall be judged incapable by Sentence of Parliament; nor will he make use of their Service, without the consent of Parliament, or grant them Access to his Person.

Fifthly, That their Ships and Goods, and all Damages thereof may be restored.

Answer, It is agreed January the 7. 1640. That all Ships taken and said, should be reciprocally restored on both sides. And that the Scottish Commissioners having informed, that about eight Ships of Scotland are yet staid in Ports, and are like to suffer much loss, if they shall not be delivered into some hands, who may have care of them: It is agreed, that Warrants shall be presently granted, for delivery of all their Ships; And that four thousand pounds be presently advanced for Calking, Sails, Cordage, and other Necessaries, for helping the present setting forth of the said Ships.

Sixthly, They desire from the Justice and the Kindness of the Kingdome of England, Reparations concerning the Losses, which the Kingdome of Scotland hath sustained, and the vast Charges they have been put unto, by occasion of the late Troubles.

Answer, That this House thinks fit, that a friendly Assistance and Relief shall be given towards supply of the loss of the Scots: And that the Parliament did declare, That they did conceive that the sum of three hundred thousand pounds is a fit proportion for this friendly Assistance and Relief, formerly thought fit to be given, towards supply of the loss and necessities of their Brethren of Scotland; and that the Houses would in due time, take into consideration the manner how, and the time when the same shall be raised.

Seventhly, That as his Majesty hath appointed the Acts of the late Parliament, wherein all such Declarations, Proclamations, Books, Libels, and Pamphlets, that have been made, written, and published, against his loyal and dutiful Subjects of Scotland, are recalled; and ordered to be suppressed, recalled, and forbidden in England and Ireland; and that the Loyalty, Integrity, and Faithfulness nefs of his Majesties Subjects of Scotland, towards his Majesties Royal Person and Government, may at the closing of this Treaty of Peace, and at the time of Publick Thanksgiving for the same, be made known in all places, and all Parishes of his Majesties Dominions.

Answer, It is agreed upon the tenth of February, 1640. That all Declarations, Proclamations, Acts, Books, Libels and Pamphlets, that have been made and published against the Loyalty and Obedience of his Majesties Subjects of Scotland, shall be recalled, suppressed, and forbidden in England and Ireland; and it is to be reciprocal in Scotland, if any such have been made or published there, in prejudice of his Majesties Honour: And this upon diligent enquiry to be done, by Authority of Parliament next sitting in Scotland, of which the Commissioners of Scotland do promise to have an especial care And we do also agree, That when it shall please Almighty God to grant an happy Close of this Treaty of Peace, the Loyalty of his Majesties Subjects of Scotland shall be made known at the time of publick Thanksgiving in all places, and particularly in the Parishes-Churches of his Majesties Dominions.

That all Monuments, Tokens, and Shews of Hostility, upon the Borders of the two Kingdoms, may be taken away; That not only the Garisons of Barnwick, and Carlisle, may be removed, but that the Works may be slighted, and the places dismantled.

Answer, The House of Commons concur with their Lordships, That when a Peace shall be established, all things reciprocally be reduced in the terms they were before the Treaty. And do agree with their Lordships, that the Scottish Commissioners, shall set down all their particular Heads and Demands as once together, that so their eight Articles which they propound for establishing a Peace, may with all speed be concluded; that being done, this House shall willingly concur with their Lordships, to settle all things for their just satisfaction.

After which, the Scots brought in their 15 remaining Heads to their eight Demands, all for Privileges to their own Nation; and presented their great Account, which was five hundred, and fourteen thousand one hundred twenty and eight pounds, nine shillings, besides the loss of their Nation, to four hundred and forty thousand pounds. This Reckoning startled the English Commissioners, until the Scots told them, they did not give in that Account, with an intent to demand a total Reparation of their Charges and Losses; but were content, in some measure, to bear a Reckoning, hoping for the rest from the Justice and Kindness of England.

Some of the Commons allowed of their Demands; but Sir Benjamin Rudyerd was of another mind, and judged them altogether unreasonable, they being wholly contradictory to their own Remonstrance at their first coming in: wherein they professed, That they would take nothing of the English, but for Money or Security, whereas they had been hitherto defrauded, to the great impoverishing of Northumberland, Newcastle, and the Bishoprick of Durham; which places would not recover what they lost in the space of 20 years. That the English had formerly established the Scots Reformation, and yet bore their own Charges; Whereas the Scots presumed to require a greater Sum, than ever was given to the King.

Many thought that Sir Benjamins Arguments were compleat and weighty; howsoever, Monies were raised for the present by way of Loan from the City of London, (for supply of both the Northern Armies) as once before this Parliament had done.

Some Overtures had been made by the Dutch Ambassadour, of a Match between William the young Prince of Orange, and the Princess Mary, the Kings eldest Daughter, which he well liked, and communicated it to the Parliament, with whom it found a general and unanimous Reception, in regard of the Alliance to be thereupon concluded with the Prince his Father; and the United Provinces, being of the same Protestant Religion with England; and so it was soon concluded.

But presently after four Members of the Commons delivered a Message to the Lords, of a Popish Design, of levying an Army of fifteen thousand in Leicestershire, and eight thousand in Ireland; the main Promoters whereof were the Earls of Strafford and Worcester; and Sir Robert Barkley, one of the Ship-money Judges, was accused in February of High-Treason, and committed Prisoner to the Black-Rod.

The Bill for a Triennial Parliament (which by a witty mistake was by one called the Tyrannical Parliament) was now perfected, and had passed both Houses, and nothing wanted to the Confirmation, but the Kings Assent, which was also granted upon the sixteenth of February; And the King, to let them know what value he put upon this his great Favour, told them, That hitherto they had gone on in those things which concerned Themselves; and now he looked that they should proceed to those things which did concern Him: And then he signed the Bill of Subsidies, and gave them such universal Content, that Sir Edward Lintson Lord-Keeper, was ordered

A Match proposed between the Prince of Orange, and the Lady Mary, approved by the Parliament.

The King gives his assent to the Bill for a Triennial Parliament.

A ordered to return the humble Thanks of both Houses to his Majesty at White-Hall, with Bonfires, and Bells ringing throughout the City, as formerly at the granting of the Petition of Right.

February the twenty sixth, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury was accused of High-Treason by the Commons, whereupon he was ordered to the Tower; but upon humble Suit, respited till the first of March; in the mean time, to be under the Black-Rod. And now Episcopacy it self was called in question; and although the Lord Digby made a witty and weighty Speech in defence of it, and the Arch-Bishop of Armagh being by them consulted about that and the Liturgy, had delivered his Judgment for the Moderation and Emendation, not Extirpation of them: yet the Wings of Episcopacy were awredly clipped; for the Commons, March the tenth, Voted, That no Bishop shall have any Vote in Parliament, nor any Judicial Power in the Star-Chamber, nor bear any sway in Temporal Affairs; and that no Clergy-man shall be in Commission of Peace.

The Earl of *Strafford*s Tryal was next; which after various Debates was agreed to be tried in Westminster-Hall, on Monday the two and twentieth of March: the King, Queen, and Prince present; and the Commons to be present as a Committee, at the managing of their Accusation: The Earl of Arundel was Lord High-Steward, and the Earl of Lindsey Lord High-Constable: The Earl of Strafford (though he had but short warning yet) had gotten his Defence ready against the time: The Accusation was managed by Mr. Pym; the Articles and Replies were as followeth:

The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury accused by the Commons of High-Treason, and ordered to the Tower. Bishops Votes in Parliament voided down.

The Earl of Strafford brought to his Tryal, The Articles against him, with his Reply to each.

The first Article was not insisted upon.

Secondly, That shortly after the obtaining of a Commission, dated the One and Twentieth of March, in the Eighth Year of his now Majesties Reign (to wit) the last Day of August then next following; he the said Earl, to bring his Majesties Liege-people into a dislike of his Majesty, and of his Government, and to terrifie the Justices of the Peace from executing the Laws: (He the said Earl, being then President of the Kings Council in the Northern-parts of England, and Justice of Peace) did publicly, at the Assizes held for the County of York, in and upon the said last day of August, declare and publish, before the People there attending for the Administration of Justice according to the Law, and in the presence of the Justices sitting, That some of the Justices were all for Law, but they should find, that the Kings little Finger should be heavier, then the Loyns of the Law.

Testified by Sir David Fowles, and others.

Reply, That Sir David Fowles was his profest Enemy; that his words were, clearly inverted; that his Expression was, That the little Finger of the Law (if not moderated by the Kings Gracious Clemency) was heavier then the Kings Loyns. That these were his words, he verified;

First, By the occasion of them, they being spoken to some whom Favour had then enlarged from Imprisonment at York, as a Motive of their Thankfulness to his Majesty.

Secondly, By Sir William Pennyman, a Member of the House, who was then present, and heard these words: which Sir William declaring to be true, the House of Commons required Justice of the Lords against him, because he had Voted the Articles as a Member of the House: Whereupon Sir William wept.

Thirdly, That the Realm of Ireland, having been time out of mind annexed to the Imperial Crown of this his Majesties Realm of England, and Governed by the same Laws: The said Earl being Lord-Deputy of that Realm, to bring his Majesties Liege-people of that Kingdom likewise into dislike of his Majesties Government, and intending the Subversion of the Fundamental Laws, and seised Government of that Realm, and the Distraction of his Majesties Liege-people, there, did upon the Thirtieth day of September, in the Eleventh Year of his Majesties now Reign, in the City of Dublin, (the chief City of that Kingdom, where his Majesties Privy-Council, and Courts of Justice, do ordinarily reside; and whither the Nobility and Gentry of that Realm do usually resort for Justice) in publick Speech, before divers of the Nobility and Gentry, and before the Mayor, Aldermen, and Recorder, and many Citizens of Dublin, and other of his Majesties Liege-people, declare and publish, That Ireland was a Conquered Nation, and that the King might do with them what he pleased. And speaking of the Charters of the former Kings of England made to that City; He further said, That their Charters were nothing worth, and did bind the King no further then he pleased.

Reply, That if he had been over liberal of his Tongue for want of Discretion, yet could not his words amount to Treason, unless they had been revealed within fourteen days, as he was informed. As to the Charge, he said, True it is, he said Ireland was a Conquered Nation, which no man can deny, and that the King is the Law-giver, in Matters not determined by Acts of Parliament, he conceived all Loyal Subjects would grant.

Fourthly, That Richard Earl of Cork, having sued out Processes in Court of Law, for recovery of his Possessions from which he was put, by colour of an Order made by the said Earl of Strafford, and the Council-Table, of the said Realm of Ireland: The said Earl of Strafford upon a Paper-Petition, without legal proceedings, did the twentieth day of February, in the eleventh year of his now Majesties Reign, threaten the said Earl of Cork (being then a Peer of the said Realm) to imprison him, unless he would surcease his Suit; and said, That he would have neither Law, nor Lawyers, dispute or question any of his Orders. And the twentieth of March, in the said eleventh year, the said Earl of Strafford speaking of an Order of the said Council-Table of that Realm, made in the time of King James, which concerned a Lease which he the said Earl of Cork claimed in certain Rectories, or Tithes, which he the said Earl of Cork alleadged to be of no force, said, That he would make the said Earl, and all Ireland know, so long as he had the Government there, any Act of State there made, or to be made, should be as binding to the Subjects of that Kingdom, as an Act of Parliament: And did question the said Earl of Cork in the Castle-Chamber, upon pretence of breach of the said Order of Council-Table; and did sundry other times, and upon sundry other occasions, by his words and speeches, arrogate to himself a Power above the Fundamental Laws and established Government of that Kingdom, and scorned the said Lawes and established Government.

Reply, It were hard measure for a man to lose his Honour and his Life, for an hasty word, or because he is no wiser than God hath made him: As for the words, he confessed them to be true, and thought he said no more then what became him, considering how much his Majesties Honour was concerned in him; that if a portionable Obedience was not as well due to Acts of State, as to Acts of Parliament, in vain did Councils sit. And that he had done no more, than what former Deputies had done, and than what was agreeable to his Instructions for the Council-Table, which he produced. And if those words were Treason, they should have been revealed within fourteen dayes.

Fifthly, That according to such his Declarations and Speeches, the said Earl of Strafford did use and exercise a power, above, and against, and to the Subversion of the Fundamental Laws, and established Government of the said Realm of Ireland, extending such his Power, to the Goods, Free-holds, Inheritances, Liberties, and Lives, of his Majesties Subjects of the said Realm, viz. The said Earl of Strafford, the twelfth Day of December, Anno Dom. 1635. in the time of full Peace, did in the said Realm of Ireland, give, and procure to be given against the Lord Mount Norris (then, and yet a Peer of Ireland, and then Vice-Treasurer, and Receiver-General of the Realm of Ireland, and one of the principal Secretaries of State, and Keeper of the Privy-Signet of the said Kingdom) a Sentence of Death, by a Council of war, called together by the said Earl of Strafford, without any Warrant or Authority of Law, or Offence, deserving any such punishment. And he the said Earl did also at Dublin, within the said Realm of Ireland, in the Month of March, in the fourteenth year of his Majesties Reign, without any legal or due proceedings, or Tryal, give, or cause to be given, a Sentence of Death, against one of his Majesties Subjects, whose Name is yet unknown, and caused him to be put to death, in Execution of the said Sentence.

Reply

Reply, That there was then a standing Army in Ireland, and Armies cannot be Governed, but by Martial Law; That it hath been put in constant practice with former Deputies; That had the Sentence been given unjustly by him, the Crime could amount but to Felony at the most, for which he hoped he might as well expect pardon from his Majesty, as the Lord Conmy and Sir Jacob Astly had, for doing the like in the late Northern Army. That he neither gave Sentence, nor procured it against the Lord Mount Norris, but only desired Justice against the Lord for some Affront done to him, as he was Deputy of Ireland. That he the said Lord was judged by a Council of War, wherein he sat bare all the time, and gave no suffrage against him: That also to evidence himself a Party, he caused his Brother, Sir George Wentworth, in regard of the nearness of Blood, to decline all acting in the Process. Lastly, Though the Lord Mount Norris justly deserved to dye, yet he obtained his Pardon from the King.

Sixthly, That he the said Earl of Strafford, without any legal Proceedings, and upon a Paper-petition of Richard Rolstone, did cause the said Lord Mount Norris to be disseised, and put out of possession of his Freehold and Inheritance of his Mannor of Tymore, in the County of Armagh, in the Kingdom of Ireland, the said Lord Mount Norris having been two years before in quiet possession thereof.

Reply, That he conceived the Lord Mount Norris was legally divested of his Possessions, there being a Suir long depending in Chancery, and the Plaintiff complaining of delay; he upon the Complainants Petition, called unto him the Master of the Rolls, Lord Chancellor, and Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; and upon Proofs in Chancery, Decreed for the Plaintiff: Wherein he said, he did no more than what other Deputies had done before him.

Seventhly, The said Earl of Strafford in the Term of Holy Trinity, in the thirteenth year of his now Majesties Reign, did cause a Case, commonly called, the Case of Tenures, upon defective Titles, to be made and drawn up without any Jury, or Tryal, or other legal Process, and without the consent of Parties; and did then procure the Judges of the said Realm of Ireland, to deliver their Opinions and Resolutions to that Case, and by colour of such Opinions, did without any legal proceedings, cause Thomas Lord Dillon, a Peer of the said Realm of Ireland, to be put out of Possession of divers Lands and Tenements, being his Freeholds, in the County of Mago and Roscomer, in the said Kingdom; and divers others of his Majesties Subjects to be also put out of Possession, and disseised of their Freeholds, by colour of the same Resolution, without legal Proceedings, whereby many hundreds of his Majesties Subjects were undone, and their Families utterly ruined.

Reply, That the Lord Dillon, with others, producing his Patent according to Proclamation, on the behalf of his Majesty; the said Patent was questionable, upon which, a Case was drawn, and argued by Council, and the Judges declared their Opinions: But the Lord Dillon, or any other, was not bound thereby, nor put out of their Possessions, but might have traversed the Office; or otherwise have legally proceeded, notwithstanding the said Opinion.

Eighthly, That he the said Earl of Strafford, upon a Petition exhibited in October, 1635. by Thomas Hibbotts against Dame Mary Hibbotts widow, to him the said Earl of Strafford, recommended the said Petition to the Council-Table of Ireland, where the most part of the Council gave their Vote and Opinion for the said Lady; but the said Earl finding fault herewith, caused an Order to be entred against the said Lady, and threatened her, That if she refused to submit thereunto, he would imprison her, and fine her five hundred pounds. That if she continued obstinate, he would continue her Imprisonment, and double her Fine every Month by Month; whereupon she was enforced to relinquish her Estate in the Land questioned in the said Petition, which shortly was conveyed to Sir Robert Mercedith, to the use of the said Earl of Strafford. And the said Earl in like manner did imprison divers others of his Majesties Subjects, upon pretence of disobedience to his Orders and Decrees, and other illegal Commands by him made for pretended Debts, Titles

Titles of Land, and other Causes, in an arbitrary and extrajudicial Course, upon Paper-petitions to him, preferred, and no other cause legally depending.

Reply, That true it is, he had Voted against the Lady Hibbotts, and he had reason to do so; the said Lady being discovered, by Fraud and Circumvention, to have bargained for Lands of a great Value, for a small Sum: And he denied that the said Lands were, after sold to his use, or that the major part of the Council-board Voted for the Lady; the contrary appearing, by the Sentence under the hand of the Clerk of the Council; which being true, he might well threaten her with Commitment, in case she disobeyed the said Order. Lastly, Were it true, that he were Criminal therein, yet were the Offence but a Misdemeanour, no Treason.

Ninthly, That he the said Earl of Strafford, the sixteenth day of February, in the year of his now Majesties Reign, assuming to himself a power above and against Law, took upon him by a general Warrant under his hand, to give power to the Lord Bishop of Down, and Conner his Chancellor, or Chancellors, and to their several Officers to be appointed, to Attach and Arrest the Bodies of all such of the meaner and poorer sort, who after Citation, should either refuse to appear before them, or appearing, should omit, or deny to perform, or undergo all lawful Decrees, Sentences, and Orders issued, imposed, or given out against them; and them to commit and keep in the next Goal, untill they should either perform such Sentences, or put in sufficient Bail, to shew some reason before the Council-Table of such their contempt and neglect: And the said Earl, the day and year last mentioned, signed and issued a Warrant to that effect, and made the like Warrant to send all other Bishops and their Chancellors in the said Realm of Ireland, to the same effect.

Reply, That such Writs had been usually granted by former Deputies to Bishops in Ireland; nevertheless, being not fully satisfied with the convenience thereof, he was sparing in granting of them, untill being informed, that divers in the Diocese of Down were somewhat refractory, he granted Warrants to that Bishops; and hearing of some Disorders in the Execution, he called them in again.

Tenthly, That the said Earl of Strafford being Lord Lieutenant, or Deputy of Ireland, procured the Customes of the Merchandize exported out of, and imported into that Realm, to be farmed to his own use. And in the ninth year of his now Majesties Reign, he having then Interest in the said Customs (to advance his own Gain and Lucre) he did cause and procure the Native Commodities of Ireland, to be rated in the Book of Rates for the Customes (according to which the Customes were usually gathered) at far greater value and prizes than in truth they were worth; (that is to say) Every Hide at twenty shillings, which in truth was worth but five; every Stone of wooll at thirteen shillings four pence, though the same ordinarily were worth but five shillings, at the utmost but nine shillings; by which means, the Custome which before was but a twentieth part of the true value of the Commodity, was enhanced sometimes to a fifth part, and sometimes to a third part of the true value, to the great Oppression of the Subjects, and delay of Merchandize.

Reply, That his Interests in the Customes of Ireland, accrued to him by the Assignment of a Lease from the Dutchess of Buckingham; That the Book of Rates by which the Customes were gathered, was the same which was established by the Lord Deputy Faulkland in 1628. Some years before he was employed thither. That as he hath been just and faithful to his Master the King, by encreasing his Revenue, so hath he also much bettered the Trade and Shipping.

Eleventhly, That he the said Earl in the ninth year of his now Majesties Reign, did by his own Will and Pleasure, and for his own Lucre, restrain the exportation of the Commodities of that Kingdom without his Licence; as namely, Pipe-staves, and other Commodities, and then raised great sums of Money for licensing of Exportation of those Commodities, modities, and dispensation of the said Restraints imposed on them, by which means, the Pipe-staves were raised from four pounds ten shillings or five pounds per thousand, to ten pounds, and sometimes eleven pounds per thousand; and other Commodities were enhanced in the like proportion, and by the same means, by him the said Earl.

Reply, That the Pipe-staves were prohibited in King James's time, and not exported, but by Licence, paying six shillings eight pence a thousand; and that he had not raised so much thereby to himself, as his Predecessors had done for such Licences.

Twelfthly, That the said Earl being Lord Deputy of Ireland, on the ninth day of January, in the thirteenth year of his Majesties Reign, did then under colour to regulate the Importation of Tobacco in the said Realm of Ireland, issue a Proclamation in his Majesties Name, prohibiting the Importation of Tobacco, without Licence of him and the Council there, from and after the first day of March, An. Dom. 1638. After which Restraint, the said Earl, notwithstanding the said Restraint, caused divers great quantities of Tobacco to be imported to his own use; and that if any Ship brought Tobacco into any Port there, the said Earl and his Agents used to buy the same to his own use, at their own price; and if the Owners refused to let them have the same at under values, then they were not permitted to vent the same: by which undue means, the said Earl having gotten the whole Trade of Tobacco into his own Hands, he sold it at great and excessive prizes, such as he list to impose for his own profit.

And the more to assure the said Monopoly of Tobacco, he the said Earl, on the twenty third day of February, in the thirteenth year aforesaid, did issue another Proclamation; Commanding, That none should put to sale any Tobacco by whole-Sale, from and after the last day of May then next following, but what should be made up into Rolls, and the same sealed with two Seals by himself appointed, one at each end of the Roll: And such as was not sealed, to be seized, and appointed six pence the pound for a Reward to such persons as should seize the same; and the Persons in whose Custody the unsealed Tobacco should be found, to be committed to Goal; which last Proclamation was covered by a pretence of the restraining of the Sale of unwholsome Tobacco, but it was truly to advance the said Monopoly: Which Proclamation the said Earl did rigorously put in execution, by seizing the Goods, Fining, Imprisoning, Whipping, and putting the Offenders against the same Proclamation on the Pillory; as namely, Barnaby Hubbard, Edward Coven, John Tumen, and divers others; and made the Officers of State, and Justices of Peace, and other Officers to serve him, in compassing and executing these unjust and undue Courses. By which Cruelties, and unjust Monopolies, the said Earl raised 100000 l. per annum Gain to himself: And he the said Earl, though he enhanced the Customes, where it concerned the Merchants in general, yet drew down the Impost formerly taken on Tobacco, from six pence the pound, to three pence the pound; it being for his own profit so to do. And the said Earl by the same, and other rigorous and undue means, raised several other Monopolies, and unlawful Exactions for his own Gain; Viz. On Starch, Iron, Pots, Glasses, Tobacco-pipes, and several other Commodities.

Reply, That before his time the King had but 10 or 20 l. per annum, for that Custome, which now yieldeth 20000 l. for the Proclamation, it was not set out by his means principally, or for his private Benefit, but by consent of the whole Council. And this he conceives cannot be made Treason, were all the Articles granted; but only a Monopoly, for which he was to be Fined.

Thirteenthly, That Flax being one of the principal and Native Commodities of that Kingdom of Ireland, the said Earl having got great quantities thereof into his Hands, and growing on his own Lands, did issue out several Proclamations; Viz. One dated the one and twentieth day of May, in the eleventh year of his Majesties Reign, and the other dated the one and twentieth day of January in the same year, thereby prescribing and enjoying the working of Flax into Tearn and Thread, and the ordering of the same in such wayes, wherein the Natives of that Kingdom were unpractised, and unskillful. Which Proclamations so issued, were by his Commands and Warrants to his Majesties Justices of the Peace, and other Officers, and by other rigorous means, put in Execution, and the Flax wrought and ordered in other manner than as the said Proclamation prescribed, was seized, and employed to the use of him and his Agents. And thereby the said Earl endeavoured to gain, and did gain in effect, the sole sale of that Native Commodity.

Reply, That he did endeavour to advance the Manufacture of Linnen, rather than of Woollen, because the last would be the greater Detriment to England. That the Primate of Ireland, the Archbishop of Dublin, Chancellor Loftus, and the Lord Mount Norris, all of the Council, and Subscribers of the Proclamation were as lyable to the Charge as himself. That the reducing of that Nation, by Orders of the Council-board, to the English Customs, from their Savage Usages, as drawing Horses by their Tayles, &c. had been of former practice. That the Project was of so ill Avail to him, as he was the worse for the Manufacture thirty thousand pounds at least, by the Loom he had set up at his own Charge.

The Fourteenth Article was not urged.

Fifteenthly, That he the said Earl of Strafford traiterously and wickedly devised and contrived by force of Armes, in a War-like manner, to subdue the Subjects of the said Realm of Ireland, to bring them under tyrannical Power and will; and in pursuance of his wicked and traiterous Purposes aforesaid, the said Earl of Strafford in the eighth year of his Majesties Reign, did by his own Authority, without any Warrant, or colour of Law, Tax and Impose great sums of Money upon the Towns of Baltemore, Bandenbridge, Talow, and divers other Towns and Places in the said Realm of Ireland, and did cause the same to be levied upon the Inhabitants of those Towns, by Troops of Souldiers with Force and Armes, in a War-like manner. And on the ninth day of March, in the twelfth year of his now Majesties Reign, traiterously did give Authority unto Robert Savill, a Sergeant at Armes, and to the Captains of the Companies of Souldiers in several parts of that Realm, to send such numbers of Souldiers to lye on the Lands and Houses of such as would not conform to his Orders, untill they should render Obedience unto the said Orders and Warrants, and after such Submission (and not before) the said Souldiers to return to their Garrisons. And did also issue the like Warrants unto divers others, which Warrants were in War-like manner, with Force and Armes, put in Execution accordingly; and by such War-like means did force divers of his Majesties Subjects of that Realm to submit themselves to his unlawful Commands. And in the said twelfth year of his Majesties Reign, the said Earl of Strafford did traiterously cause certain Troops of Horse and Foot Armed, in War-like manner, and in War-like Array, with Force and Armes, to expel Richard Butler from the Possession of Castle-cumber, in the Territory of Idough, in the said Realm of Ireland; and did likewise in like War-like manner, expel divers of his Majesties Subjects from their Houses, Families, and Possessions; as namely, Edward Brenman, Owen Oberman, Patrick Oberman, Sir Cyprian Horsfield, and divers others, to the number of about an hundred Families, and took and imprisoned them and their wives, and carried them Prisoners to Dublin, and there detained them, untill they did yield up, surrender, and release their respective Estates and Rights. And he the said Earl in like War-like manner hath, during his Government of the said Kingdom of Ireland, subdued divers others of his Majesties Subjects to his will, and thereby, and by the means aforesaid, hath levied War within the said Realm against his Majesty, and his Liege-people of that Kingdom.

Testified, Serjeant Savil.

Reply, That nothing hath been more ordinary in Ireland, then for the Governours to put all manner of Sentences in execution by the help of Souldiers; that Grandison, Falkland, Chichester, and other Deputies, frequently did it: (Sir Arthur Teningham to this Point deposed, That in Falkland's time he knew twenty Souldiers assailed upon one man, for refusing to pay sixteen shillings;) That his Instructions for executing his Commission, were the same with those formerly given to the Lord Falkland, and that in both there is express Warrant for it. That no Testimony produced against him, doth evidently prove he gave any Warrant to that effect, and that Serjeant Savil shewed only a Copy of a Warrant, not the Original it self, which he conceived could not make Faith in case of Life and Death 1640.

Death, in that High-Court, especially it being not averred upon Oath to agree with the Original, which should be upon Record. That he conceived, he was for an Irish Custome to be tryed by the Peers of that Kingdom.

Sixteenthly, That he the said Earl of Strafford, the two and twentieth of February, in the seventh year of his now Majesties Reign, intending to oppress the said Subjects of Ireland, did make a Proposition, and obtained from his Majesty an Allowance, That no Complaint of Injustice, or Oppression done in Ireland, should be received into England against any, unless it first appeared, that the Party made first his Addresses to him the said Earl: And the said Earl having by such usurped tyrannicall and exorbitant Power, expressed in the former Articles, destroyed the Peers, and other Subjects of that Kingdom of Ireland, in their Lives, Consciences, Lands, Liberties, and Estates; the said Earl to the intent the better to maintain and strengthen his Power, and to bring the People into disaffection of his Majesty as aforesaid, did use his Majesties Name in the Execution of his said Power. And to prevent the Subjects of that Realm of all means of Complaints to his Majesty, and of Redress against him and his Agents, did issue a Proclamation, bearing date the 17 day of September, in the eleventh year of his Majesties Reign; thereby commanding all the Nobility, Undertakers, and others, who held Estates and Offices in the said Kingdom (except such as were employed in his Majesties Service, or attending in England by his speciall Command), to make their personall Residence in the said Kingdom of Ireland, and not to depart thence without Licence of himself. And the said Earl hath since issued other Proclamations to the same purpose, by means whereof, the said Subjects of the said Realm are restrained from seeking Relief against the Oppressions of the said Earl, without his Licence: Which Proclamation, the said Earl hath by severall rigorous wayes, as by Fine, Imprisonment, and otherwise, put in Execution on his Majesties Subjects; as namely, one Parry, and others, who came over only to complain of the Exorbitancies and Oppressions of the said Earl.

Testified by the Earl of Desmond, the Lord Roch, Marcartee, and Parry.

Reply, That the Deputy Falkland had set out the same Proclamation, That the same Restraint was contained in the Statute of 25 Henry 6. upon which the Proclamation was founded. That he had the Kings express Warrant for the Proclamation. That he had also power to do it by the Commission granted him; and that the Lords of the Council, and their Justices, not only yielded, but pressed him unto it. That it was done upon just Cause, for had the Ports been open, divers would have taken Liberty to go to Spain, Down, Reimes, or St. Omers; which might have proved of mischievous Consequence to the State: That the Earl of Desmond stood, at the time of his Restraint, charged with Treason before the Council of Ireland, for practising against the Life of one Sir Valentine Coke. That the Lord Roch was then a Prisoner for Debt in the Castle of Dublin, and therefore incapable of a Licence. That Parry was not Fined for not coming without Licence, but for severall Contempts against the Council-board in Ireland, and that in his Sentence he had but only a Casting Voyce, as the Lord-keeper in the Star-Chamber.

The seventeenth and eighteenth Articles were not insisted on.

Nineteenthly, That the said Earl having Taxed and Levied the said Impositions, and raised the said Monopolies, and committed the said Oppressions in his Majesties Name, and as by his Majesties Royall Command, he the said Earl, in May, the fifteenth year of his Majesties Reign, did of his own Authority contrive and frame a new and ununsual Oath, by the Purport whereof, among many other things, the Party taking the said Oath, was to swear, That he would not Protest against any of his Majesties Royall Commands, but submit themselves in all Obedience thereunto. Which Oath he so contrived, to enforce the same on the Subjects of the Scottish Nation inhabiting in Ireland, and out of a hatred to the said Nation, and to put them to a Discontent with his Majesty and his Government there, and compelled divers of his Majesties said Subjects there to

to take the said Oath, some he grievously Fined and Imprisoned, and others he destroyed, A and Exiled; and namely, the tenth of October, Anno Dom. 1639. he Fined Henry Steward and his wife, who refused to take the said Oath, five thousand pounds apiece, and their two Daughters, and James Gray three thousand pounds apiece, and Imprisoned them for not paying the said Fines: The said Henry Steward, wife, and Daughters, and James Gray, being the Kings Liege-people of the Scottish Nation, and divers others he used in the like manner. And the said Earl upon that Occasion did Declare, That the said Oath did not only oblige them in point of Allegiance to his Majesty, and acknowledgment of his Supremacy only, but to the Ceremonies and Government of the Church established, or to be established by his Majesties Royall Authority; and said, That the Refusers to obey, he would prosecute to the Blood.

Reply, That the Oath was not violently enjoined by him upon the Irish Scots, but framed in compliance with their own express Petition, which Petition is owned in the Proclamation as the main Impulsive to it. That the same Oath not long after was prescribed by the Council of England. That he had a Letter under his Majesties own hand, ordering it to be prescribed as a Touch-stone of their Fidelity. As to the greatness of the Fine imposed upon Steward, and others, he conceived it was not more then the hainousness of their Offence deserved; yet had they Petitioned, and submitted the next day, that would wholly have been remitted.

Twentiethly, That the said Earl in the fifteenth and sixteenth Years of his Majesties Reign, and divers years past, Laboured and endeavoured to leget in his Majesty an ill Opinion of his Subjects, namely those of the Scottish Nation; and divers and sundry times, and especially since the Pacification made by his Majesty with his said Subjects of Scotland in Summer, in the fifteenth Year of his Majesties Reign, he the said Earl did labour and endeavour to perswade, incite, and provoke his Majesty to an Offensive War, against his said Subjects of the Scottish Nation. And the said Earl by his Counsell, Actions, and Endeavours, hath been, and is a chief Incendiary of the War and Discord between his Majesty and his Subjects of England, and the said Subjects of Scotland; and hath declared, and advised his Majesty, That the Demands made by the Scots in this Parliament, were a sufficient cause of War against them: The said Earl having formerly expressed the height and rancour of his Mind towards his Subjects of the Scottish Nation; Viz. The tenth day of October, in the fifteenth year of his Majesties Reign, he said, That the Nation of the Scots were Rebels and Traytors: And he being then about to come into England, he then further said, That if it pleased his Master (meaning his Majesty) to send him back again, he would root out of the said Kingdome (meaning the Kingdome of Ireland) the Scottish Nation both Root and Branch. Some Lords, and others, who had taken the said Oath in the precedent Article, only excepted. And the said Earl hath caused divers of the said Ships and Goods of the Scots to be slayed, seised, and molested, to the intent to set on the said War.

Reply, That he called all the Scottish Nation Traytors, and Rebels, no one proof is produced; and though he is hasty in Speech, yet was he never so defective of his Reason, as to speak so like a Mad-man; for he knew well his Majesty was a Native of that Kingdome, and was confident many of that Nation were of as Heroick Spirits, and as Faithfull and Loyall Subjects as any the King had. As to the other words of his rooting out the Scots Root and Branch, he conceives a short Reply may serve, they being proved by a single Testimony only, which can make no sufficient Faith in cause of Life. Again, the Witness was very much mistaken, if not worse, for he deposeth that these words were spoken the tenth day of October in Ireland, whereas he was able to evidence, he was at that time in England, and had been so near a Month before.

The One and Twentieth and Two and Twentieth Articles were not urged.

Three

Three and twentiethly, That upon the 13 day of April last, the Parliament of England met, and the Commons House (then being the Representative Body of all the Commons in the Kingdome) did according to the Trust reposed in them, enter into Debate and Consideration of the great Grievances of this Kingdome, both in respect of Religion, and the publick Liberties of the Kingdome: and his Majesty referring chiefly to the said Earl of Strafford, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, the ordering and disposing of all Matters concerning the Parliament; He the said Earl of Strafford, with the Assistance of the said Archbishop, did procure his Majesty, by sundry Speeches and Messages, to urge the said Commons House, to enter into some Resolution for his Majesties supply for Maintenance of his war against his Subjects of Scotland; before any course was taken for the relief of the great and pressing Grievances wherewith this Kingdome was then afflicted: Whereupon, a Demand was then made from his Majesty of twelve Subsidies, for the releafe of Ship-money only. And while the said Commons then Assembled (with expression of great Affection to his Majesty, and to his Service) were in Debate and Consideration of some Supply, before Resolution by them made: He the said Earl of Strafford, with the help and assistance of the said Archbishop, did procure his Majesty to dissolve the last Parliament, upon the fifth day of May last; and upon the same day, he the said Earl of Strafford did treacherously, falsely, and maliciously, endeavour to incense his Majesty against his Loving and Faithfull Subjects, who had been Members of the House of Commons, by telling his Majesty they had denied to supply him. And afterward upon the same, did treacherously and wickedly Counsell and Advise his Majesty to this effect; Viz. That having tryed the Affections of his People, he was loose and absolved from all Rules of Government, and was to do every thing that Power would admit; and that his Majesty had tryed all ways, and was refused, and should be acquitted both of God and Man; that he had an Army in Ireland, (meaning the Army above mentioned, consisting of Papists, his Dependents, as is aforesaid) which he might employ to reduce this Kingdome to Obedience.

Reply, That he was not the principal Cause of Dissolving the last Parliament; for before he came to the Council-Table, it was Voted by the Lords to demand Twelve Subsidies, and that Sir Henry Vane was ordered to demand no less; but he coming in the Interim, he perswades the Lords to Vote it again, Declaring to his Majesty (then present) and them, the danger of the Breach of Parliament: Whereupon it was again Voted, That if the Parliament would not grant Twelve Subsidies, Sir Henry would descend to Eight, and rather than fail, to Six. But Sir Henry not observing his Instructions, demanded Twelve only, without abatement, or going lower; that the height of this Demand, urged the Parliament to deny; and their Denial moved his Majesty to dissolve the Parliament: so that the chief occasion of the Breach thereof, was, as he conceived, Sir Henry Vane. He confesseth, that at the Council-Table he advised the King to an offensive War against the Scots; but it was not untill all fair means to prevent a War had been first attempted. Again, Others were as much for a Defensive War, and it might be as free to Vote one, or the other. Lastly, Votes at a Council-Board are but bare Opinions; and Opinions, if pertinaciously maintained, may make an Heretick, but never can a Traytor. And to Sir Henry Vane's Deposition, he said, It was only a single Testimony, and contradicted by four Lords of the Junto Tables Depositions; Viz. The Earl of Northumberland, the Marquess of Hamilton, the Bishop of London, and Lord Cottington, who all affirmed, That there was no question made of this Kingdome, which was then in Obedience, but of Scotland that was in Rebellion. And Sir Henry Vane being twice examined upon Oath, could not remember whether he said this, or that Kingdome; and the Notes after offered for more proof, were but the same thing, and added nothing to the Evidence to make it a double Testimony, or to make a Privy Councillor's Opinion, in a Debate at Council, High-Treason.

The Four and twentieth Article was not urged.

Five and twentiethly, That not long after the Dissolution of the last Parliament, (Viz. in the Months of May, and June) he the said Earl of Strafford did advise the King

King to go on rigorously in levying of the Ship-money, and did procure the Sheriffs of severall Counties to be sent for for not levying the Ship-money, divers of which were threatened by him to be sued in the Star-Chamber; and afterwards by his advice were sued in the Star-Chamber for not levying the same; and divers of his Majesties loving Subjects were sent for and imprisoned by his Advice, about that and other illegall Payments. And a great Loan of an hundred thousand pounds was demanded of the City of London: and the Lord Mayor, and the Aldermen, and the Sheriffs of the said City, were often sent for by his Advice to the Council-Table, to give an Account of their Proceedings, in raising of Ship-money, and furthering of that Loan; and were required to certify the Names of such Inhabitants of the said City as were fit to lend: which they with much Humility refusing to do, he the said Earl of Strafford did use these, or the like Speeches; Viz. That they deserved to be put to Fine and Ransome, and that no good would be done with them, till an Example were made of them, and that they were laid by the Heels, and some of the Aldermen were hanged up.

Reply, That there was a present Necessity for money, that all the Council-board had Voted with, yea, before him. That there was then a Sentence in Star-Chamber upon the Opinion of all the Judges, for the Legality of the Tax of Ship-money, and he thought he might advise the King to take what the Judges had declared was by Law his own. He confessed, that upon refusal of so just a Service, the better to quicken the Citizens to the payment of Ship-money, he said, They deserved to be Fined; Which words might perhaps be incircumspectly delivered, but (conceives) cannot amount to Treason, especially when no ill consequence followed upon them: and it would render men in a sad Condition, if for every hasty Word, or Opinion given in Council, they should be sentenced as Traytors. But that he said, It were well for the Kings Service, if some of the Aldermen were hanged up, he utterly denieth. Nor is it proved by any, but Alderman Garway, who is at best but a single Testimony, and therefore of no sufficient Evidence in case of Life.

Six and twentiethly, That he the said Earl of Strafford, by his wicked Counsell having brought his Majesty into excessive Charges, without any just Cause; did in the Month of July last (for the support of the said great Charges) Counsell and Approve dangerous and wicked Projects; Viz. To seize upon the Bullion, and the Money in the Mint: And to imbase his Majesties Coyne with the Mixtures of Brass. And accordingly he procured 130000 l. which was then in the Mint, and belonging to divers Merchants, Strangers, and Others, to be seized on, and stayed to his Majesties use. And when divers Merchants of London, Owners of the said Bullion, came to his House, to let him understand the great Mischief that Course would produce here, and in other Parts, what Prejudice it would be to the Kingdome by discrediting the Mint, and hindring the Importation of Bullion: He the said Earl told them, That the City of London dealt undutifully and unthankfully with his Majesty, and that they were more ready to help the Rebels, then to help his Majesty; and that if any Hurt came to them, they might thank themselves; and that it was the Course of other Princes to make use of such Monies to serve their Occasions. And when in the same Month of July, the Officers of his Majesties Mint came to him, and gave him divers Reasons against the Imbasing of the said Monies. He told them, That the French King did use to send Commissaries of Horse, with Commission to search into mens Estates, and to peruse their Accounts, that so they may know what to levy of them by force, which they did accordingly levy: And turning to the Lord Corrington then present, said, That this was a Point worthy his Lordships Consideration.

Reply, That he expected some Proofs to Evidence the two first Particulars; but hears of none. For the following Words, he confessed, probably they might escape the Door of his Lips; Nor did he think it much amiss, considering their present posture, to call that Faction, Rebels. As for the last words objected against him in that Article, he said, That being in Conference with some of the Londoners, there came to his Hands at that instant a Letter from the Earl of Leicester, then in Paris, wherein were the Gazets enclosed, relating, that the Cardinal

Cardinal had given order to levy money by Souldiers; this he only told the Lord Corrington standing by, but made not the least Application thereof to the English Affairs.

Seven and twentiethly, That in, or about the Month of August last, he was made Lieutenant-General of all his Majesties Forces in the Northern-parts against the Scots; and being at York, did in the Month of September, by his own Authority, and without any lawful Warrant, impose a Tax on his Majesties Subjects in the County of York, of 8 d. per diem, for maintenance of every Souldier of the Trained-Bands of that County; which Sums of Money he caused to be levied by force. And to the end to compel his Majesties Subjects out of Fear and Terror, to yield to the payment of the same: He did declare, that he would commit them that refused the Payment thereof, and the Souldiers should be satisfied out of their Estates, and they that refused it, were in very little better condition than of High-Treason.

Reply, That at his Majesties coming to York, it was thought necessary, in regard the Enemy was upon the Borders, to keep the Trained-Bands on foot for Defence of the County; and therefore the King directed him to write to the Freeholders in Yorkshire, to declare what they would do for their own Defence. That they freely offered a Months Pay, nor did any man grudge against it. Again, it was twice propounded to the great Council of Peers at York, that the King approved it as a just and necessary Act, and none of the Council contracted it, which he conceived seemed a tacite Allowance of it. That though his Majesty had not given him special Order therein, nor the County had desired it, yet he conceived he had Power enough to impose that Tax, by vertue of his Commission. But he never said, that the Refusers should be guilty of little less than High-Treason, which being proved by Sir William Ingram, he was but a single Testimony, and one who had formerly mistaken himself in what he had deposed.

Eight and twentiethly, That in the Months of September and October last, he the said Earl of Strafford, being certified of the Scottish Army coming into the Kingdome: And he the said Earl of Strafford, being Lieutenant of his Majesties Army, did not provide for the Defence of the Town of Newcastle, as he ought to have done, but suffered the Town to be taken, so he might the more incense the English against the Scots, and for the more wicked purpose, and out of a malicious Desire to engage the Kingdoms of England and Scotland in a National and bloody war. He did write to the Lord Conway the General of the Horse, and under the said Earls Command, that he should fight with the Scottish Army, and the passage over the Tyne, which he should follow, notwithstanding that the Lord Conway had formerly by Letters informed him the said Earl, that his Majesties Army, under his Command, was not ordered to encounter the Scots, which Advice he did not comply to, till the Day of his Place, being his Majesties Army then under his Command, appeared at Bangor and Lifford.

Reply, That he admitted how in the third Article he being charged as an Incendiary against the Scots, is now in this Article made their Confederate, by betraying Newcastle into their hands. But to answer more particularly, he said, That Newcastle was taken the 24 of August, ten or twelve thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, under the Command of the Lord Conway and Sir Jacob Astley, and that Sir Jacob had written to him concerning the Town of Newcastle, that it was fortified, which also was under his particular Care, and for the passage over the River of Tyne, his Majesty sent special Directions to the Lord Conway to ferry over, and therefore that Lord is more (as he conceives) responsible for that Betraying, than himself.

Ninth and twentiethly, That in the 7th of the said Majesties Reign: The Commons were resolved to procure him to the utmost, and therefore had procured the Parliament of Ireland to be called, that so they might the more incense the English against the Scots, and for the more wicked purpose, and out of a malicious Desire to engage the Kingdoms of England and Scotland in a National and bloody war. He did write to the Lord Conway the General of the Horse, and under the said Earls Command, that he should fight with the Scottish Army, and the passage over the Tyne, which he should follow, notwithstanding that the Lord Conway had formerly by Letters informed him the said Earl, that his Majesties Army, under his Command, was not ordered to encounter the Scots, which Advice he did not comply to, till the Day of his Place, being his Majesties Army then under his Command, appeared at Bangor and Lifford.

The other Articles against him, with his Answers.

His Reply to Secretary Vane's Accusation.

He hath Council assigned him.

First, That he had withdrawn four and twenty thousand pounds, and sent from the Exchequer in Ireland, and converted them to his own use.

Secondly, That in the beginning of his Government, the Garrisons of Ireland had been maintained by the English Treasury.

Thirdly, That he had advanced Popish and Infamous Persons as the Bishop of Waterford, and others, to the prime Rooms in the Church of Ireland.

To which he gave these Answers:

First, That England was indebted to Ireland so much, which he took up upon his own Credit, and paid it in again, producing the Kings Authority and Letter for the same.

Secondly, That the Garrisons had been for many years sent to England, which he found, and had so improved the Kings Revenue there, that they were not burthenous at all.

Thirdly, That he never preferred any, but whom he conceived conscientious and honest, not being able to prophesie of mens future Conditions: And as for the Bishop of Waterford, he had satisfied the Law.

But besides all these, there were produced by Mr. Pym certain Notes which had been taken by Sir Henry Vane, being thought fit to be admitted into a Court of select Councillors, whom the King had chosen to consult about his second Expedition against the Scots: which Notes (to take off the Odium from himself) were pretended to have been surreptitiously taken out of his Chamber by his Son young Sir Henry, and communicated to Mr. Pym, out of which it was alleged against the Earl of Strafford, that he had then given the King Advice, to borrow of the City an hundred thousand pounds, to levy Ship money more grievously, and that his Majesty having tried the Affections of his People, was absolved and loosed from all Rules of Government, and might do what he would, and having an Army in Ireland, might employ it for the reducing of his Kingdoms, which he was sure could not hold out five Months, and London being full of the Nobility, the Commission of Array was to be put on, and all Opposers thereof to smart for it.

The Earl replied, That he conceived it lawful for a Privy Councillor, to have freedom of Voting with others, and as to the matter of the English Army, he thought that the single Testimony of one man (Secretary Vane) was not of validity in Law in a Cause of Death, much less in Life and Death, and that the position of Secretary Vane was dubious, as appeared at his several Examinations, and that there were present at the Debate but eight Privy Councillors, whereof two were not to be produced, and four others declared upon their Oaths, that they never heard him speak those words, or any like them. And lastly, That if he had spoken them (which he never granted nor) that the word (Army) could not imply England (the Debate being concerning Ireland) and there being no least intention of Landing the Irish Army in England. And lastly, concluded his Defence, with telling the Lords, that he was accused as guilty of Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the Fundamental Laws of the Land; but it seemed strange to him, that this should be Treason together, which was not Treason in any part. And lastly, Desired the Lords to consider how their own Privileges, and other Ministers of State, would suffer by his Condemnation. The Commons must now justify their Charge by Law; to which end they produced the Statute annexed to the Statute of 25 of Edward the Third, the words were these, That if any particular Treason could not be tried, therefore what the Parliament should declare to be Treason in time to come, should be punished as Treason. And thus the Statute was to be the Ground-work of the Bill of Attainder.

The Statute being put upon a Point of Law, moved for Council, which after three days canvassing, was granted to him; And April the 17, the Earl by his Council (which were Mr. Lane the Prince's Attorney, Mr. Gifford Recorder of the Court of Common Pleas, and Mr. Lightfoot) answered, That the Statute which they cited, was but a Declaration, and a penal Law, and would neither bind the King, nor his Successors, and his Successors, and that the Statute was repealed by a Statute of Parliament, made in the first of Henry the Fourth, and so the Bill of Attainder, without pressing any time of meeting for the Commons fell to speaking their Bill of Attainder, and April the 19, Voted the Earl guilty of High Treason.

The Commons petition against Papiests. With the Kings Answer.

upon Evidence of Secretary Vane, and his Notes. And upon the 25 day of the same Month, they read the Bill engrossed, and after that went to the Poll, and carried that way, notwithstanding the dissenting of the Lord Digby, and divers others; and that very Afternoon transmitted the Bill to the Lords, to whom it seemed so perplex a Business, that the Commons were fain to send Mr. St. John, the Kings Solicitor, to confer with them about it, who gave them such satisfaction, that thence forward they shewed greater propensity to the Earls Condemnation.

In the mean time, the Commons petitioned the King;

- First, For removing of all Papiests from Court.
- Secondly, For disarming of them generally throughout the Kingdom.
- Thirdly, For disbanding the Irish Army.

The Kings Answer was;

First, They all knew what Legal Trust the Crown hath in that particular, therefore he shall not need to say any thing, to assure them that he shall use it so, as there shall be no just Cause of Scandal.

As for the second, He is content it shall be done by Law.

And for the last, He had entered into Consultation about it, finding many difficulties therein; and doth so wish the disbanding of all Armies, as he did conjure them speedily and heartily to join with him in disbanding those two here, Scots and English.

It will not be amiss here, to set down a Copy of the Bill of Attainder, which was read in presence of the Earl at the Bar.

Whereas the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses, of the House of Commons, in this present Parliament Assembled, have in the Name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, impeached Thomas Earl of Strafford, of High Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the ancient Fundamental Laws and Government of his Majesties Realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government against Law, in the said Kingdoms; and for exercising a tyrannous and exorbitant Power over, and against the Laws of the said Kingdoms, over the Liberties, Estates, and Laws of his Majesties Subjects; And likewise for having by his own Authority, commanded the laying and assessing of Soldiers upon his Majesties Subjects in Ireland, against their consent, to compell them to obey his unlawful Commands and Orders, made upon Paper-Petitions, in Causes between Party and Party, which accordingly was executed upon divers of his Majesties Subjects in a Warlike manner, within the said Realm of Ireland; and in so doing, did levy War against the Kings Majesty, and his Liegepeople in that Kingdom.

And also, for that he upon the unhappy Dissolution of the last Parliament, did slander the House of Commons to his Majesty, and did counsel and advise his Majesty, that he was loosed and absolved from Rules of Government, and that he had an Army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this Kingdom; For which he deserves to undergo the pains and Forfeitures of High Treason.

And the said Earl had been also an Incendiary of the Wars, between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland: All which Offences, have been sufficiently proved against the said Earl upon his Impeachment.

Be it therefore Enacted by the Kings most Excellent Majesty, and by the Lords and Commons, in this present Parliament Assembled, and by Authority of the same, That the said Earl of Strafford, for the heinous Crimes and Offences aforesaid, stand and be adjudged and attainted of High Treason, and shall suffer such pain of Death, and incur the Forfeitures of his Goods and Chattels, Lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments, and Estate of Freehold, or Inheritance, in the said Kingdoms of England and Ireland, which the said Earl, or any other to his Use, or in Trust for him, have, or had at the day of the first sitting of this present Parliament, or at any time since.

Provided, That no Judge, or Judges, Justice, or Justices whatsoever, shall ad- judge, or interpret any Act, or Thing to be Treason; nor hear, nor determine any Treason for in any other manner then he, or they should, or ought to have done before the making of this Act, and as if this Act had never been had or made, preserving a ways unto all and singular Persons and Bodies Politick and Corporate, their Heirs and Successors (others than the said Earls and his Heirs, and such as claim by, from, or under him) all such Right, Title, and Interest, of, in, and to all and singular such of the said Lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments, as he, they, or any of them had, before the first day of this present Parliament, any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

Provided, that the passing of this present Act, and his Majesties Assent thereunto, shall not be any determination of this present Sessions of Parliament, and all Bills and Matters whatsoever depending in Parliament, and not fully Enacted and determined, And all Statutes and Acts of Parliament, which have their continuance until the end of this present Session of Parliament, shall remain, continue, and be in force, as if this Act had not been.

The King fearing the Conclusion, and willing to do some good Office to the Lord Lieutenant, calls both Houses together, May the first, and makes a Speech to them, telling them,

That he had been present at the hearing of that great Cause; and that in his Conscience positively, he could not condemn him of High-Treason; And yet could not clear him of Misdemeanors; but hoped a way might be found out to satisfy Justice, and their Fear, without oppressing his Conscience. And so dismissed them with their great Discontent.

May the second, the Prince of Orange (who had tarried here ever since the 20th of April) married the Princess Mary at White-Hall, with all the Solemnities appertaining to that Ceremony.

The Parliament had taken offence at the Kings last Speech in Defence of the Earl of Strafford, and this Dislike was now propagated so far, that May the Third, the Citizens, to the number of five thousand, most armed with Swords, Cudgels, and Staves, came thronging down to Westminster, crying out for Justice against the Earl of Strafford, specially applying themselves to the Earl of Manchester then Lord Chamberlain, by whose persuasions and promises their Heat was somewhat stayed. But yet they posted upon the Gate of Westminster a Catalogue of Names of those who would have acquitted the Earl, and these they styled Straffordians.

The Parliament upon Information given, that some Endeavours were used to breed a Dislike of their Proceedings in the English Northern Army, framed and took a National Protestation to maintain and defend with Life, Power, and Estate, the true Reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the Doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish Innovations: this was ordered to be printed and dispersed over all England.

May the fifth, the Lords certified the Commons, that they thought it the safest course to lay aside the Bill of Attainder, because it brought the King in for Judge; And the next day they fell upon the several Articles of his Impeachment, and voted the Earl guilty of High-Treason upon two of them, viz. the Fifteenth, for levying of Monies in Ireland by force in a Warlike manner; And the Nineteenth, for imposing an Oath upon the Subjects in Ireland.

The House of Commons had been busy about a Bill, for the Continuation of the Parliament, which by this time was completed; and being approved by the Lords, was tendered to the King to be signed together with the Bill of Attainder; who answered, That on Monday following he would satisfy them. Sunday following, the King spent the whole day in Consultation about the Earl of Straffords Case, with the Judges, and Bishops. The Judges told him, that in point of Law, (according to the Oath made by Sir Henry Vane of the Earls Advice, to raise Horse to awe this Nation) the Earl was guilty of Treason; but when he would have had them descend to the particulars of this Accusation, he found them shy in it; and all that he could get from them was, that upon the whole matter he was guilty. In the Evening, the five Bishops of Armagh, London, Durham, Lincoln, and Carlisle, were called in to the King, to satisfy his Conscience about the thing; all which agreed, that the King might shew mercy without any scruple, and that he could not condemn the Earl, if he did not conceive him guilty: And this as to matter of Fact; but as for matter of Law, he was to rest in the Opinion of the Judges.

At the Close of this Conference it was observed, that the Bishop of Lincoln conveyed a Paper into the Kings Hands, which what it did contain the rest knew not; but some have since believed it to be the Paper-promise which the King had formerly passed under his Hand to the Earl, to save him by his Prerogative; for Bishop Williams was observed to tamper with the Lieutenant of the Tower, and some other Persons, about the Earl;

That

That they should tell the Lordships, that the King did believe him guilty of High Treason; but yet he bound by his Conscience, from condemning him by a Promise made to him, (which indeed the King, in his former Speech, had made to the Commons) to hold his Life upon no other Merit then a bare Promise; and thus the King drew back to about the King from his Promise by Letter, and to part with the Earl, who was then delivered into his most Dangerous and Closest Enemy, the Bishop of London, by whom it was delivered to the King.

Monday the sixth, the King attended the Earl of Strafford, the Lord Chief Justice, the Lord Treasurer, and others, for the passing of the two Bills, the one for the continuation of the Parliament, and the other for the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford; and the same Day he sent Sir William Brouncker, Secretary of State, to acquaint the Earl with what was done, and the Kings intention, whereat he was greatly astonished, but the next Day the King being troubled with the Earl, who had written with his own Hands, and sent it by his own僕人, to the King, telling them, that whereas Justice had been satisfied in his Conscience, that he was not guilty of High Treason, yet he was now bound by his Promise, to condemn him; and that he might be desired to fulfill the Natural Court of Law, to release him from his Imprisonment, (requested by a Publick Act, provided however, that he should not be allowed to leave the Tower, but should be kept in Prison till Saturday; but nothing could be obtained in Favour of him, so that this, Thus the Lords said their purpose, was not to be done, but that the King should be desired to release him, and if himself had made any Provision for them, that the same should be done.

The Design he laid to have been laid for the Earls Delivery, as that Captain Bullock should have been received into the Tower with a Hundred Men, for the better Securing that place; as was pretended, but indeed to have conveyed the Earl into some habitable Region; for which purpose, his Brothers Ship was then in Readiness, not far off. As also that the Lord Deputy had agreed to give his Daughter in Marriage, with Twenty Thousand Pounds Portion, to Sir William Brouncker Son, upon Condition, That he being then Lieutenant of the Tower, would assent to his Escape: But Bullock, being Opposed by Sir William, and all other, endeavours proving fruitless, May the Twelfth, the Earl of Strafford was conveyed from the Tower, by a Guard, consisting of the Trained Bands, Matchless Men, Sheriff Officers, Wardens of the Tower; before him, went his Gentleman-Usher bare-headed, then followed he himself, with the Arch-Bishop of Armagh, and others. As he went to the place of his Execution, passing by the Arch-Bishop of Cambray, Lodging, and spying him in the Window, he called to him for his Prayers, and his blessing; but the Bishop at the sight of him in that Condition was so Dismaid, that for a good while he could not recollect himself; but being told of it, and reprehended by his Friends, as one who had shewed him if Guilty of an undecent Pusillanimity, he Replyed, That he could not but when that bitter Cup should come to his turn, he should taste it with a most Christian Courage.

The Earl being come to the Scaffold, Addressed his Speech to the Arch-Bishop of Armagh to

That he was come to pay the last Debt he owed to Sin, with a good hope of rising again to himself; that he died willingly, forgave all, and submitted to Justice; but promised himself to give us to the Matter for which he died: He wished all Prosperity to the King and People, and acquitted him from the Guile of his Death, as having acted therein otherwise then as constrained; Advised his Adversaries to Repent of their violent Proceeding against him, with all telling them, that he thought it a strange way to write to the King, the Reformation and Settlement of the Kingdom; however he wished, that the Church of England, for whose Happiness he Prayed, and so Concluded that his last Speech, with increasing the Standers by, To pray for him: After he had ended, he knelt down to Prayer, and then rising up again, he took his last Leave of all his Friends, and particularly of his Brother Sir George Wentworth, by whom he left his Love to his Wife, and his Blessing to his Children, with a most strict Instruction to his only Son William Wentworth, Never to meddle with the Patrimony of the Church. And then giving the Token to the Executioner, had his Head severed from his Body at the first stroke. After his Death, this Petition of his was found directed to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, wherein he thank't them for their good will to his Children, manifested in their fore-mentioned Answer to the Kings Letter.

The Humble Petition of Thomas late Earl of Strafford, Sheweth,

The Copy of his Petition to the Lords.

THAT seeing it is the good Will and Pleasure of God, that your Petitioner is shortly to pay that Duty which we all owe to our frail Nature; he shall in all Christian Patience and Charity conform and submit himself to your Justice, in the Comfortable Assurance of the great Hope laid up for us in the Mercy and Merits of our Saviour, blessed for Ever. Only he humbly craves to return your Lordships most humble Thanks, for your noble Compassion toward those innocent Children, who now with his late Blessing, he must commit to the Protection of Almighty God, beseeching your Lordships to finish your Pious Intentions towards them: and Desiring that the Reward thereof may be fulfilled in you by him that is able to give above all that we are able either to ask or think.

Wherein I trust the Honourable House of Commons will afford their Christian Assistance, and for beseeching your Lordships Charity to forgive all his Omissions and Infirmities; he doth very heartily and truly recommend your Lordships to the Mercies of your Heavenly Father, and that for his goodness may perfect you in every good Work.

This was the end of that great and able Minister of State, who is reported, when he heard the King had signed the Bill of Attainder, to have lift up his Eyes to Heaven, and clapping his Hand upon his Heart, to have Grieved out (perhaps in imitation of Cardinal Wolsey's Complaint) Put not your Trust in Princes, nor in the Sons of Men; For in them is no Salvation. And certainly he had heard measure to be made Guilty of High-Treason, by a Bill fram'd on purpose to that Effect, without former President, inasmuch, that the manner of his Condemnation hath given the apparent Suspicion of design upon his Life: and that which renders the Matter the more strange is, that from the Supreme Court of Judicature, which is call'd together for the rectifying of Law and Justice, an Act should proceed of the Justice, whereof so little satisfaction was given to the World: For as for his Majesty's Consent, it is most certain, That it was in a manner Extorted, and, as it were, by a fatal Necessity and Constraint.

The Death of this powerful Man so started the other great Officers of State, that hoping for more security in retirements, many of them resigned their Places; the Lord Cottington, Master of the Wards, to the Lord Say; and Bishop Juxon, Lord Treasurer, to five Commissioners; the Earl of Leicester was made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and Marquis Hertford was made Governor of the Prince, and the Earl of Essex Lord Chamberlain of the Kings House-hold instead of the Earls of Newcastle and Pembroke.

In the mean time Discontents arose between the Parliament and the English Army in the North, and that upon this occasion. The Chief Commanders and Field Officers being at Whitehall, and Members of either Houses, Sir Jacob Ashley had the Command of the Army. It was Voted the Nineteenth of June, That the Scots should receive one hundred thousand Pounds (of their three hundred thousand Pounds) at Midsummer next, 1642, and the rest at Midsummer 1643, but they pretending present Wants, required by Writing Twenty-Five Thousand Pounds (Ten Thousand Pounds more then was in readiness for them); whereupon the Parliament deducted Ten Thousand Pounds (out of the Fifty Thousand Pounds which was designed for the English Army) to be sent unto them, to the great Discontent of the Lord Percy, Commissary General of the North, and Colonel Ashburnham (Officers of the English Army, and then Members of the House) to that William openly said, That if such Papers of the Scots could produce Monies, he doubted not but the Officers of the English Army would soon do the like: but notwithstanding the Parliament continued in their Resolutions, and the English Army thinking themselves neglected, constantly affirmed, That the Parliament had disobliged them. The forenamed Officers combining together, and swearing mutual Secrecy, made up a kind of a Juncto among themselves, drawing up a Petition to King and Parliament.

First, For Money for the Army.

Secondly, For not Disbanding before the Scots.

Thirdly, For preserving Bishops Votes and Functions.

And fourthly, For settling the Kings Revenue.

The Army, whose Minds and Affections were not Different from this Juncto, Met at Burrough Bridge, and drew up a Petitionary Letter to this Effect.

That all good men ought to thank God, for directing the Kings Heart to satisfy the Desires of his Parliament, by delivering up into their Hands the chiefest of his Councillours and Servants, and many other things, to gratify them, never done by any of his Ancestors; by Petition of Right,

Triennial

A Triennial Parliament, and such like; yet that some turbulent Spirits, backt by rude and tumultuous Mechanics, seemed not to be satisfied without the total subversion of the Government of State, &c. That therefore the Army, so orderly Governed, though without Martial Law, no Payment, and few Officers, might be called to attend the safety of the King's Person, and Parliaments Security, or that both Armies should be Disbanded for the Ease of the Kingdom; with a desire, to procure the Officers Hands therunto, the chief Actors, Sir James Ashley, Sir John Corbett, Sir Faulk Hunkes, Colonel Vavasor, Chudleigh, William Legg, Oudal, and others, were all examined about it: but none suffered for it: Jermin was thought to have had a hand in this Business, but he was conveyed over Sea.

The payment of Tunnage and Poundage had been stomached ever since the year 1628. (at what time a sharp Remonstrance was drawn up against it) but now the King, at the Request of the House of Commons, was content to relinquish his Claim to it, and after that, passed the Three Bills, the one for Imposing the Tax of Poll-Money upon the People; and the other two for Putting down the Courts of the Star-Chamber and High-Commission; the first he did willingly, the other two not without such reluctance, as produced some dayes delay.

The Queen-Mother of France having stay'd here in England as long as she conveniently could, takes Leave, and is conveyed over into Holland by the Earl of Arundell; who being a Roman Catholic, and finding his own Country too hot for such, procured himself that Employment, together with leave to remain beyond Seas during his own Pleasure; from Holland, they came at length to Callen in Germany, where both the Earl, and that unfortunate aged Princess ended their Lives.

This year the King, with consent of Parliament, published a Manifesto in favour of the Prince Electour Palatine Cause, and entrusted it to his Ambassadour Sir Thomas Roe, whom he sent over into Germany to assist his Nephew at the Diet of Ratisbon.

And now comes the times for the Delivery of the Northern Counties, the Parliament agreeing to Disband both Armies there; wherefore in February it was Agreed, That the Scots Ships taken since that War should be restored, and Four thousand Pounds given towards a Supply of the Loffes and Necessities of their Dear (or rather Dear) Brethren of Scotland; for all which the Scots return Thanks, but especially for the Honour and Title of Brethren which the Parliament had given them; notwithstanding all this Gate taken such Occasions intervened, that they stay'd in England till there was an Agreement to them of an Hundred and Twenty Thousand Pounds over and above the foresaid sum; and then, August the sixth, both Armies were Disbanded, but the Scots better payed, and for present they escaped (as we say) Scotfree; but afterwards they made Amends for all and payed a sufficient Reckoning.

During the twenty eighth last past, Doctor Wren, Bishop of Ely, and Dean of the Kings Chappell, had been Charged with Treasonable Misdemeanours in his Diocess; And July the fifth, his Charge was perfected against him by the Committee; and reported to the House of Commons, who thereupon Voted him unworthy and unfit to hold or exercise any Office or Dignity in the Church or Common-Wealth; and moreover, desired the Lords to joyn with them, to Request the King for his Removal from his Service, and so he was Committed to the Tower; and the five Ship-Money Judges, Judge Bramston, Baron Treasurer, Baron Wylton, Baron Davenport, and Judge Crawley, were now Questioned for their several Opinions about that Business, but to Judge Barkly, Charge was laid High-Treason.

About this time Sir Robert Harlow was Employed by the House of Commons for the putting down and defacing all scandalous Pictures, Croffes and Figure; within the Churches, and upon Signs and Sign-posts: A worthy Reformation!

Peace being made with the Scots, the King resolved to ingratiate himself with that Nation, and (if possible) to make himself some Friends there; which might be useful to him, in case a Breach should happen at home; and therefore gave notice to the Houses of his Intention to Journey to Scotland, and to set out upon the tenth of August, which he did, having first passed the Bill for Knight-hood, and free-making of Salt-Peter and Gunpowder, and for the Earl of Essex to be General of all his Forces on this side Trent, with Power to raise Souldiers in case of Necessity; but Pembroke and Salisbury could not obtain their desired Places of high Steward and Treasurer. And because the great Affairs of State necessarily required to speedily a passing of some Bills, as would no admit of tarrying his Return; he therefore Committed the Lord Keeper, the Lord Privy Seal, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earls of Lindsey, Essex, Dorset, and Bath, to sign Bills in his Absence. The day before his Journey, the Parliament was taken up with such important Business, that they were Necessitated to sit all Sunday from Morning to Night; but to shew that they meant it not for a President, they published in Print, That for many urgent Occasions they thought it Necessary to sit, and did declare so much, that no inferior Court or Council, or any person, may draw this into Example, for their Encouragement in neglecting the due observation of the Sabbath; and then adjourned till the twentieth of October, appointing a Committee of fifty Commons.

This year was unlucky to the King, for in it were the seeds of our unparrelled intestine War sown; and the Irish Rebellion commenced, though designed some years before, as we shall come to relate.

Sir William Parsons and Sir John Berkeley had been made Lords Justices of Ireland, upon the Imprisonment of the Earl of Strafford, late Lord Lieutenant; and the Death of Mr. Wandesford his Deputy.

A bloody Re-
forth in Ireland.

These applied themselves to give contentment to the Irish by all gentle means, incouraging the Parliament then sitting there, to increase the Redrawing of their Grievances, and particularly they granted the Subsidies from Forty Thousand Pounds (as they were in Stafford's time) to Twelve Thousand Pounds; and also were content by Act of Parliament, to settle all Estates of Land in the Kingdom, which had been quietly enjoyed for the space of sixteen years; and to resignish certain the English and Title which the King had to the four Counties in Connacht; and some other Territories in Monaghan, and the County of Clare; Acting wholly by advice of the Council, without admitting any Papers, Petitions, or Bills in civil Causes. But the Irish plainly shewed by their subsequent courses, the baseness and Turbulence of their Natures, which were not to be gained upon by sweetness and Lenity; for towards the latter end of October, they had concerted themselves to suddenly, and so handled their Matters, that all was ready to burst into a flame; and they had almost made themselves Masters of the greatest part of the Kingdom before the Lords Justices were aware of it. And the Castle of Dublin it self should have been seized upon, on the twenty third of October, 1641, upon which day this Horrid Rebellion broke forth. Sir William Coole had before suspected some such thing, and therefore had written to the Lords Justices, certifying the great reform made to Sir Phelim O'Neale in the County of Tirone, and to the Lord Mac Guire in the County of Foranagha, and that Mac Guire had been frequently with the English Catholics of the English pale, and was ever busied in Letters and Dispatches. The same Sir William also acquainted the Lords Justices, October the 1. of the Design to Murder the Lords Justices and Council of Ireland, and thereof the Protestants there, to seize upon the Castle and City of Dublin, and then upon all the other places of strength in the Kingdom.

But this Intelligence came not to their Hands, not any other, till the Evening of the day of Rebellion. That day the Conspirators met at Dublin in the Eden-Tavern, where they consulted about their Plot, and that Heildis upon their knees to the good Success of it; but while they were so Jovial and Confident, Owen O'Conally, a Gentleman of a meek Irish Family, but a Royalist to Sir John Clonworthy, discovers their Rebellion to the Lord Justice Parsons about nine of the Clock at Night, but in such a broken manner, that little could be gathered out of his Relation; whereupon he was sent back to learn from Mac Mahon (with whom he had been before) something further about it; where he so played his part, that he returns (though with a great deal of Hazard) with sufficient Instructions: but the double diligence of the Watch had like to have marred all, for Conally was coming back, they seized him, and would have lodged him in the Prison that Night, had he not been rescued by one of the Lord Justice Parsons servants, who was purposely sent out to what might be the Reason of his carrying longer than his prefixed time.

Being admitted into the presence of the Lord Justice, and Sir Thomas Rotham, and Sir Robert Meredith (for the Lord Justice Parsons after he had heard his first News, had ordered strong Guards in every Corner, and had sent for the two last, who were Members of the Council to see him at the Lord Justice Parsons House) he gave in this Account upon Oath.

O'Conally's relation concerning the Plot.

That being at Monimore, in the County of Londonderry, on Thursday last, he received a Letter from Colonel Hugh Oge Mac Mahon, desiring him to come to Connacht, in the County of Monaghan, and to be with him on Wednesday or Thursday last. Whereupon he, this Examinant, came to Connacht on Wednesday night last, and finding the said Hugh come to Dublin, followed him thither. He came about six of the Clock in the Evening, and forthwith went to the Lodging of the said Hugh, to the House near the Boat Oxman Town, and there he found the said Hugh, and came with the said Hugh into the Town, near the Pillory, to the Lodging of the Lord Mac Guire, where they found not the Lord within, and there they drank a Cup of Beer, and then went back again to the said Hugh his Lodging. He saith, That at the Lord Mac Guire his Lodging, the said Hugh told him, That there were, and would be this Night great numbers of Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Irish Papists from all the parts of the Kingdom in this Town, who with himself had determined to take the Castle of Dublin, and possess themselves of all his Majesty's Ammunition there to Morrow Morning, being Saturday; and that they intended first to batter the Chimnies of the said Town, and if the City would not yield, then to batter down the Houses, and to cut off all the Protestants that would not join with them. He further saith, That the said Hugh then told him, That the Irish had prepared Men in all parts of the Kingdom, to destroy all the English inhabiting there to Morrow Morning by ten of the Clock; and that in all the Sea-Ports, and other Towns in the Kingdom, all the Protestants should be killed this Night, and that all the Posts that could be, could not prevent it: And further saith, That he moved the said Hugh to forbear executing of that Business, and to discover it to the State, for the saving of his own Estate; who said he could not help it. But said, That they did owe their Allegiance to the King, and would pay him all his Rights, but that they did this for the tyrannical Government that was over them, and to imitate Scotland, who got a Privilege by that course.

Mac Guire, and
said op.

And he further saith, When he was with the said Hugh in his Lodging the second time, the said Hugh swore that he should not go out of his Lodging that Night, but told him, that he should go with him the next morning to the Castle; and said, If this matter were discovered, some body should dye for it. Whereupon this Examinant feigned some necessity for his Easement, went down out of the Chamber, and left his Sword in Pawn; and the said Hugh sent his Man down with him; and when this Examinant came down into the Yard, and found an opportunity, he this Examinant leaped over a Wall and two Pales, and so came to the Lord Justice Parsons.

This was a seasonable Discovery; for the greatest part of the Conspirators were then gotten into the City, and should have had for their assistance Twenty from each County in Ireland; and all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdom that were Papists were engaged in the Plot; so now it was high time for the Lords Justices to look about them, whereupon they set a Watch privately upon the Lodgings of Mac Guire and Mac Mahon, and sat up all that Night in Consultation, and early the next Morning came to them several others of the Privy Council. The first thing was to seize upon Mac Mahon and his Man; Hugh without much difficulty acknowledged the whole matter; telling them, That upon that very day all the Forts and strong places in Ireland would be taken, and that it was impossible to be prevented; and however they used him now in their Power, his Blood would be revenged.

Then order was taken for apprehending the Lord Mac Guire and others then in the City; to the number of Thirty, the rest being befriended by the Citizens, escaped over the River, among whom were Hugh Birn, and Roger More, and Plunket, and Fox. The next day the Lords Justices and Council (who had for better Security removed into the Castle) proclaimed the Discovery of this Notorious Plot, requiring all good Subjects to prepare for Defence, and give them Advertisement of all Passages happening in their respective Counties, and to take care that no Levies be made under pretence of foreign Service, nor any suffered to March upon any such Account. And to close the day, the Lord Blaney comes to Dublin, and brings News that the Rebels were already risen in Monaghan, and had surprized his House with his Wife and Children; and next day Sir Arthur Teringham gives them Notice of the taking of the Nemry; after which, Messengers upon Messengers bring Relations of the increase of the Rebels in Ulster, and their horrible Massacres of the English in all Places where they came. Dublin it self began now to tremble for fear of them, which was increased by false Rumours spread abroad, (some through mistakes, others on purpose,) of their Multitudes and near Approaches to the City; the Council therefore first makes Sir Francis Willoughby Governour of the Castle, and then took into their Consideration how they were provided of Money, Arms, and Munition: For the first, it was soon found that there was no Money in the Exchequer; but for Arms and Munition, the Stores were indifferently furnished at this time, there being Arms near for Ten Thousand men, Fifteen Hundred Barrells of Powder, with Match and Lead proportionably, besides several Pieces of Artillery of divers sorts.

The whole standing Army in Ireland consisting onely of 41 Companies of Foot, each Company containing 44 Souldiers; and 14 Troops of Horse, each Troop containing Fifty eight Troopers, only the Lord Lieutenant and the Earl of Ormond had one hundred and seventeen apiece. The Forces were so dispersed up and down the Land in Garrisons so remote from one another, that it was impossible to draw a considerable number together without apparent danger of their being intercepted by the Rebels before they could unite with one another. Yet invincible necessity forced the Council to send for some Companies and Troops to march up from their several Quarters, to the Defence of the City of Dublin. And having to done, then sent away Dispatches to the King (then in Scotland) by Sir Henry Spotswood; and to the Lord Lieutenant then in London, by Owen O'Conally; certifying them of the Rebellion and ill state of the Kingdom, and that they depended on the assistance of God and the old English Pale, and of help from England; and how they were necessitated to prorogue the Parliament, and Adjourn the Term. They also requested, that Owen O'Conally might be nobly Rewarded for his faithful Service in discovering the Plot.

The Earl of Ormond lying at his House at Carick, was sent for with all hast to repair to Dublin with his Troop and the Viscounts of Clandeboy and Ardes, and Sir William Stewart, and Sir Robert Stewart, and other Gentlemen of Quality in the North, had Commissions sent them by Sea for raising the Scots there inhabiting, with Power either to destroy the Enemy, or receive them to Mercy.

The Lords of the English Pale at the Council Board made great Protestations of their Faith and Loyalty to the King, and of what they would do for him in this War: yet some of them being Papists, came thither two or three dayes after, and told the Lords Justices and the Council, That they thought those words in the late Proclamation of the Discovery, Viz. That Conspiracy of evil affected Irish Papists, did reflect upon them: wherefore they required that those Words might be better explained for their Satisfaction, and that by Proclamation, Which was accordingly done, to remove all pretence of Quarrell.

The Chief Heads of this Rebellion.

All Ulster (except the Cities London-Derry and Coleraine; and the Town and Castle of Eniskillen) was by this time gotten into the hands of the Rebels, whose chief Commanders were these; Sir Phelim O Neale (the chief of that Sect, and nearest Heir of the late rebellious Earl of Tyrone,) Turbott O Neale his Brother, Rommy Mac Guire Brother to the Lord Mac Guire, Phil-Tyrone, Turbott O Neale his Brother, Sir Cahir Mac Gormley, Cahir Mac Briam, and Mac Mahon, Sir Philip O Neale was Generalissimo, a Man of the same parts with Phocas the Tyrannicall Emperor of Constantinople, neither Valiant nor Merciful, a bloody minded man, and false of his word; for whosoever yielded to him though upon promise of fair quarter, were surely murdered in cold blood. With the Scotch Planters he colluded, till the English were extirpated out of the Province, and then marched towards their chief Plantation near Lisnagarry, and utterly destroyed it. He had left sufficient Forces to fall upon Dandalka in the County of Louth with the Pale, and took it; yet long they stayed not there, but pierced further into Louth, coming within seven Miles of Tredagh.

The Lord Moore keeps Tredagh against the Rebels.

Here was the first Check given to the Rebels; hitherto all places had yielded to them, and so might Tredagh have been compelled to have done, had not the Lord Viscount Moore (hearing of the News of the Surprissal of his Sister the Lady Blaney and her Children) retired thither for safety with his Troop of Horse, and two Companies of Foot at midnight. Being there, he joynts in Council with the Major, to prevent Mischief both from abroad and within; for even there also was Danger; for besides sundry ill affected Persons in the Town, Sir John Nettleton who commanded one of the fore-named Companies, had a Design to begin a Mutiny that Night he was to be upon the Watch; but was prevented by his Lordships Prudence. The old Pieces were drawn out and scowred, and planted at several Gates, and four others were heaved out of a Marchants Ship of the Harbour, with some Powder. The Lord Moore makes a Journey to Dublin, where he declares the weak Condition of the Town, and the disloyalty of the Inhabitants, to the Lords Justices: Whereupon it was resolved, That a Regiment should be raised for the relief of the Town: In the mean time the place was greatly distressed by the Rebels, who after taking of Ardee, Droghda, and other Holds thereabouts, were come nearer unto it.

A Solemn Fast is therfore kept, after which some Forces make a stout Salley upon a party of the Rebels whom they routed; and brought away with them many Plundered Goods and Cows, with two hundred and eighty prisoners; and made a Shift to defend themselves till Sir Henry Tichborne came from Dublin with a Commission to be Governour of the Town, who brought with him an Hundred Horse and a Thousand Foot, which had been raised there at the instance of the Lord Moore, and that by a happy Opportunity of the Vice-Treasurers having Three Thousand pounds in readines in his hands at that time, which was to have been sent over into England for the satisfaction of a Publick Engagement there: And soon after this, the State added three Companies of Foot more, so that besides the Town Arms, they were compleat (the Lord Moors Forces being reckoned in) Fifteen hundred Foot, and a hundred and sixty Horse, which was but cold comfort to Sir Phelim O Neale and his Complices. The Rebels were at first so confident of Success, that they had framed a Declaration, which should have been published after they had done the Work: In it, after a great Profession of their constant Allegiance to the King and his Successors, they fall foul upon the Parliament of England; which, as they said, had designed the Ruine both of the King and them.

First, Of the King, by drawing his Prerogative out of his hand.
Secondly, Of the Irish, by plotting to extinguish their Religion, Jew, and to raze the Name of Catholics and Irish out of the whole Kingdome, by sending over the Scottish Army into Ireland; wherupon they the said Irish resolved to perfect the Advancement of Truth and Safety of their Country, and to favour the Regaining of his Majesties Prerogative. This Declaration was found in Tredagh dropped in the Street in the Night-time.

At Dublin the Lords Justices and Councell gave a Commission to Sir Charles Coote, to raise a compleat Regiment of a Thousand Men, which in a short time they did; the greatest part of them were Those who came up from the North stripped and spoiled by the Rebels, and lifted themselves out of a desire of Revenge.

November the fifth, the Lords and Councell of Ireland sent their second Letter to the King in Scotland, and to the Parliament and Councell and Lord Lieutenant in England; so that now both King and Parliament had received two Dispatches from them concerning the Originall and Growth of this Rebellion.

The first arrived at London the last of October, and was that evening delivered, and next Morning were conducted down from the House of Lords to the House of Commons by the Lord Keeper, the Lord Privy Seal, Lord high Chamberlain, Lord Admirall, Lord Marshall, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Bath, Earl of Dorset, Earl of Leicester, Earl of Holland, Earl of Berke, Earl of Bristol, Lord Vicount Sny, Lord Mandevill, Lord Goring, Lord Wilmot, all of them being of the Kings Privy Councill. Chaires were provided for these Lords to sit while the Letters were read, and then giving what Information they could concerning the Irish Affairs, they departed, leaving the Commons to consider further of them, who instantly Ordered,

That the House be presently resolved into a Committee, to take into Consideration the matter offered concerning the Rebellion in Ireland: As likewise, To provide for the safety of the Kingdome of England. And then falling into a serious Debate, Voted,

The Parliament
take Care to send over Money and men into Ireland.

1642.

That Fifty thousand Pounds be forthwith provided.
That the Lords be moved, that Members of both Houses may declare to the City of London that they have received Fifty thousand pounds to be bestowed by Act of Parliament.
That a Committee of both Houses consider of the affairs of Ireland.
That Owen O Connally, the Defender, shall have Fifty thousand pounds presently, and two hundred pounds per annum for his Life, and provision of Land of inheritance of a greater Estate.
That the Persons of all Papists of Quality in England be secured.
That no Person (except such as shall be in Ireland without a Certificate from the said Committee) shall be admitted into England.

To all which the Lords Consented.

Then the House of Commons Voted, Twenty thousand pounds for present supply, to be delivered in manner of Ships for supplying the Sea-Coasts of Ireland.
That Sir John Nettleton, and Sir Philip O Neale, and other Rebels, be forthwith raised for Ireland, and Officers to be appointed over them.
That Negotiations of Rebels be forthwith sent to West, Chertsey, to be sent to Dublin, as occasion shall require.
That the Lord Justices in Castle do forthwith sit over to Knock-Fergus in Ireland.
That the King Councill consider of a provision for Rewards to such as shall do service in Ireland, and for a Reward to such Rebels as shall submit within a time, and of a Sum of Money for Rewards to bring in the Heads of the principal Rebels.
That Letters be sent to the Lords Justices there.
That the Committee do consider (both And in what manner, to make use of Scotland here).
And a Bill to be prepared for Pressing of Soldiers for Ireland.
An Ordinance passed, For the better supply of Ireland, to raise Three thousand more Militia Foot, and the hundred Horse, and not to press our dear brethren of Scotland further then for the Irish and not to pass from Scotland to the North of Ireland; And Arms to be delivered out by the Master of the Ordnance out of the store for Ireland for Eight thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse.

This was the Effect of the first Letter.

Upon which the Parliament Voted Two hundred thousand pounds, and passed the following Ordinance:
The Lords and Commons in this present Parliament Assembled, having a due regard to the good affections of the City of London, expressed upon sumary occasions, by the Advancing and Lending of great Sums of Money for the Service of the Common Wealth; and particularly the Sum of 20000 L. Lent for the Irish Affairs, and the Sum of 50000 L. more Lent by the said City, unto the Lords attending his Majesty in the Northern parts, before the beginning of this present Parliament, which are not yett payed, or otherwise paid, shall be fully furnished and repayed unto the said City of London, with interest of 8 L. per Cent. for one year, out of such monies as are or shall be raised by authority of Parliament. And for that purpose, an Act of Parliament to be passed with all expedition, Provided always, That this present Ordinance shall not in any wise be prejudiciall to any Members of the said House of Commons, who have formerly Lent any Sums of Money to this Parliament, nor to the Northern Counties, nor to any persons, whatsoever, to whom both Houses of Parliament, or the said House of Commons have formerly Ordered the payment of any Sums of Money, nor any Security given to them, before the making of this Ordinance.

In which the Lords Justices and Councill were very careful about Visiting the Castle of Dublin, and issued out Commissions of Martiall Law to take all persons of Quality, though Papists, delivering them Arms and Ammunition, as the Lord Vicount Goring, and others, whom they would not trust to suspect, hoping thereby to oblige them to be faithful: yet in vain, for they appeared afterwards not only actual Abettors of the Rebellion, but also Principall Officers of it. Yet were they for the present impowred, to use Fire and Sword for the destruction of of the Rebels and their Adherents, and also to preserve the Lives of any of them, and to receive any of them into his Majesty's Mercy and Favour.

Dublin it self was about this time endangered, by reason that Four hundred Irish Soldiers, under the Command of Colonel John Barry, lay imbarqued within the Harbour of Dublin, under pretence of setting sail for the King of Spain's Service. These Men should have been assistant at the Surprizall of the City and Cattle; which failing, they still continued hovering there, to the great Terror of the Protestants within the City; and their Vignalls being now sent, they desired leave to land, to get Provision; which was at length granted to them, but both they and all other suspected persons were forbidden to come to Dublin, or continue there without just and necessary Cause. The City by this time was indifferently well strengthened with the Regiments of Sir Charles Coote and the Lord Lambert, and the Troops of the Earl of Ormonde, Sir Thomas Lucas, Captain Armstrong, and Captain Turner. and care was taken for the raising of a Regiment which was to be Commanded by Colonel Cranford a Scottish-man who was recommended to them by the Prince Electour.

The Parliament of Ireland

sently adjourn.

The private defence of the Popish Lords.

November the 17. the Parliament of Ireland sat, and made a Prohibition against the Catholics; whom the Popish Members would not endure to sit. Rebels; scarcely giving way, that they should be called ill affected to the Peace, and men who traytelously and Rebeliously had raised Arms. And it was ordered, they should be treated with but their growing proud with their Northern Successes, contemptuously tore the Order and better of the Parliament, and sent back a most insolent Answer; and after two dayes Session, this Parliament was Adjourned.

The Lord Dillon of Castle, and the Lord Ruff had been deputed by the Parliament Lords to carry over to the King their Advice concerning the readiest means for Quenching the Irish Flames. They had also some other Instructions (more private) from the Popish Lords to Negotiate the stopping of those Forces which were to be sent out of England; In their Passage a Storm took them, and drove them into Scotland, from whence they posted towards London. But for all their Cunning and Spectious Artifice, the Parliament had gotten some intelling of their Treachery, and therefore caused their Papers to be seized at Dover, and their Persons to be committed; yet afterwards (dissension arising between the King and Parliament) they found means to escape, and with one Burk who came over for the same purpose followed the Court at York; where insinuating into the Kings Favour, they perswaded him to hope for great matters from the Irish, and to think better of them.

The Lords Justices send an account of the Irish Affairs to the Earl of Leicesters, Lord Deputy, with his Answer.

The Earl of Leicester, as we have elsewhere said, was after Strafford's death made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; To him the Lords Justices and Council having lately made Sir Charles Coote Governor of Dublin, send now more particular account of the Irish Affairs: Who Adverseth them, that he had acquainted the King at Edinburgh with all their Dispatches, and that the Parliament by order from the King had undertaken the Charge and Management of the War; and had appointed three several Ports of England, Viz. Bristol, West-Christen, and one other in Cumberland, for Magazines and Store-Houses for several parts of Ireland; and that they would hasten their Succours, and likewise intreat his Majesty to encourage all such as shall upon their own Charges advance any Forces for the Service, by rewarding them honourably with Lands of Inheritance; and that the Heads of the principal Traytors might be Prized.

The Earl of Ormonde is made Lieutenant General of the Forces there.

After this, the Lord Lieutenant, yet not willing to go to his Government in Ireland, Committed the Earl of Ormonde to be Lieutenant General of the Forces there; which Charge was committed to him by the King in Scotland; and for his greater Encouragement Twenty Thousand pounds were sent over to him.

The Lord
Moor's constancy exasperated the Rebels against him.

November the 21. Sir Henry Tichburn, Governor of Tredagh, sent an Express to Dublin, to give Notice that the Rebels were within sight of the Town, by whom he expected a present Siege. The Irish sent one Captain Stapley and the County Sheriff as Commissioners to Treat with the Town, as was pretended, but indeed to spy their Actions; yet were they received for protracting the time till Returns came from Dublin. Their coming to the Lord Moor, made large expressions of the Generall affection which the Catholics bore to him, Countessing him to retreat to his House Malleson, proffering to make him General of all Munster and Leinster, and to make him and his Tenants for all Damages received upon Condition that he would side with them; which yet he nobly refused, and having intelligence of the Treachery of some of the Lords of the Pale, prevented about a Thousand Arms in their way, which were directed to them by the Lords Justices, who were ignorant of their Projects, and Five hundred Arms which had been granted to the Lord Gormonston upon his Petition being way laid by the Enemy were returned by the Lord Malleson, and brought into Tredagh; with a Fortnight's pay for the Regiments; after which the Lord Moor came to Dublin, and offered to raise Six hundred men with Cloath and pay all Supplies from England; upon condition that Four Companies in Tredagh would be long to any certain Regiments, might be added to his, to complete the number of a Thou- sand.

These Passages of his so enraged the Rebels, that they presently sent a party of Thirteen hundred Foot to Malleson, who after a pretty tough Resistance from fifteen Troopers, and four, and twenty Musketeers, and the loss of a hundred and forty of their Men, mastered the House, which they plundered and defaced; to the loss of Two thousand pounds, murdered an Old Gentleman of Eighty years of Age and a blind Man, and stripped the Women and so departed. And when the Parliament sent to Treat with them, their Conditions were so high and insolent, as shewed that they

A. they had no thoughts of Peace, desiring among other things, That they might have a Deputy of their own Nation.

The Rumour of the O'Relys Rising in the County of Caran, and advancing towards Tredagh, joined with the consideration of Sir Henry Tichburns late Letters, so wrought upon the Council of Dublin, that the designed Supplies were halted, being six hundred Foot commanded by Major Rooper, and fifty Horse of the Earl of Ormonde's Troop, commanded by Sir Patrick Weames, who making less speed then was convenient, both mist the opportunity of meeting with Sir Henry Tichburn, (who was marched out of Tredagh to secure their march) and by reason of a Fog stumbled upon two thousand of the Enemy near Gillingston Bridge, whom they descreyed not till they were within Muskett shot. Sir Patrick Weames not trusting to the carriage of the new raised and inexperienced Foot, and perceiving the Enemies to be treble their number, wheeled about with his party of Horse, and came safe to Tredagh; but Major Rooper fought, and was overpowered, yet he and one Captain Moor escaped thither also with a hundred of their men. This Victory so much bragg'd of, was achieved by the Rebels, under the Conduct of Roger Moor, Hugh Birn, and Philip O'Rely upon the 29 of November.

Unto the Lords of the Pale had pretended great Loyalty and Affection to the Kings Service; but now they begin to shew themselves open Correspondents with the Irish, Gormonston summons the County to a General Meeting at Dulke, and after to the Hill of Crossly, where all the Lords and Gentry met to the number of a thousand, and spending two or three hours in Consultation, there came towards them Colonel Mahon, Philip O'Rely, Hugh Boy-Rich, Roger Moor, Hugh Birn, and Captain Ege, attended on with a Guard of Musketeers, who in the Names of the Northern Irish, entered into an Association with them, to live and die in the same Cause. And after this they met again at the Hill of Tredagh, where they deliberated about answering the Summons sent them from Dublin, for their appearance there. And thus was the Confederation perfected, which had been long hammered between the Lord Gormonston, and Roger Moor. The Northern Rebels encamped within the River of Boyne, and from all enterprize between Tredagh and Dublin; so that the City being greatly distressed, the Council assembled and sent to the Lords of the Pale, to desire them to repair thither, to confer about the present State of the Kingdom, and its safety. But the Lord of Gormonston, in the name of the rest, returns this Answer:

Answer.

That understanding Sir Charles Coote the Governour, had declared his Intention at the Council Board, to execute a general Massacre upon those of their Religion, they were constrained to stand upon their Guard, for they knew Sir Charles's mind, by his late Cruelties at Wicklow and Santry.

Indeed Sir Charles, about the time of Gillingston Fight, had marched into the County of Wicklow, against the Birnes and the Tooles (who had committed several Outrages upon the English Inhabitants, and possessed themselves of the chief Forts, and Places of strength thereabouts.) And cutting the Town of Wicklow, executed some few Men, and one Woman, for Murders proved upon them; and in his return, beat Luke Toole, who with a thousand Irish, would have intercepted him. And the Buifness of Santry was this;

The Officers of the Army were informed of a certain Robbery, committed by some of the Rebels within five miles of the City; and of the Murder of one Mr. Derrick Huberth a Dutch Merchant; whereupon two Officers, with forty Foot, were commanded out against those Rebels, having the Informer for their Guide, who led them directly to Santry, where finding some Strangers with Weapons, lodged in suspicious places, they flew out of them; and this was termed a Massacre.

The Lord Gormonston having sent in the fore-mentioned Answer to the Lords Justices, the General of the Pale assembled in Arms, and gathered great Numbers of Men unto them, the Command of whom was conferred upon Luke Nutterville, second Son to the Lord Nutterville, who presently quarters his Souldiers at Smorrah, within six miles of Dublin; the Lords of the Council issued out an Order, December 9. for their separating, with a Command, that Nine of the principal of them, should repair to them by Ten of the Clock the next day.

These Summons they not only refused to obey, but also threatened to come down and encamp at Clonsilla, a little Village standing upon the very Harbour of Dublin, most commodious for the blocking it up, and stopping all Relief from England from coming to that City. By these Actions, the incination of the Pale was manifested; so now the Maske is taken off. The Lord Gormonston is declared General of the Forces within the Pale, Hugh Birn Lieutenant-General, and the Earl of Fringale General of the Horse; and all things there tend to the forming of a considerable Army.

About the time of the Kings return from Scotland, the Lords Justices sent fresh Advertisements of their Condition, and of the daily increase of the Rebels, to the Lord-Lieutenant; with their Desire, That seeing Scotland had been lately in Arms, and consequently was well provided for War, Ten Thousand Men might be sent from thence to their Relief.

Which at length is resolved on.

The Supplies for Ireland hindered by the Differences that arose between King and Parliament.

Their Summons with the Governors Answer.

The Copy of an Oath taken by the Catholics.

Commissioners out of Scotland came to London, to treat with the Parliament about it, who made an Offer of Ten Thousand Men, upon condition of Thirty Thousand pounds advance Money. Ships for their Transportation, and a hundred Horse to be ready to join with every thousand Foot of theirs at their landing, and to obey the Order of the Scottish General.

These Propositions were readily assented unto by the House of Commons, and by them sent up to the House of Lords, who were content to agree to them; provided that the House of Commons would give Assurance for the lending over Ten Thousand English at the same time. This took up some Debate between the two Houses; but in conclusion, the Lords yielded to the Desires of the Commons; and great hopes there was, that Succour should have been seasonably sent into Ireland, when on a sudden all was dashed, by quarrels arising between King and Parliament about privileges. By these means, many who had hitherto kept themselves Neuters, were incouraged to declare for the Rebels; and about the middle of December, the whole Province of Munster revolted, and began to spoil the English; and although a party of them had been routed near Waterford by the Lord President, yet he having no other Forces at Command, than his own Troop, and some few Country Gentlemen that sided with him, was not able to hinder their joyning again in greater Bodies; so that now they grew more formidable, and made themselves Masters of all the Province, excepting only Cork, Longhall, Kingsale, and some few other places. Thus were the Rebels strengthened, by the accession of Leinster and Munster, and Dublin left greatly distressed. Luke Nelligan with his undisciplined Regiment, had removed his quarters from Swords to Ballyneary, near Dublin, and another party of them was come within two miles of it to Englas, with great boast and threats of what they would do: but Nelligan was beaten back to Swords by Sir Charles Coote, and the others were dislodged by Colonel Owsen. Yet the City continued slowly fortified and surrounded on every side by the Enemy; nor had they any considerable help from England, till the last day of December; and then Sir Simon Harcourt being by the Parliament assigned Governour of Dublin, arrived there with his Regiment. The Rebels Army consisted of 20000, besides straggling parties which infested the Country in all places where the English had any thing to do; and now they filled themselves the Catholic Army.

The main Body sits down before Tredagh, blocking it up on all sides: hereupon the Governor bestirs himself, increases the Fortifications of the Town, and to orders all things, that the Irish had little or no hope of taking it otherwise than by famishing: Long they staid not, before they had occasion to make trial of one anothers merities; for the Town having sent out some Carriages for Corn from the green Hills, half a mile off, three hundred and fifty Foot, and two Troops of Horse, were ordered to rally; but for the security of them; these were encountered in the middle way, by three thousand Irish; at whose sight and shout the Horse were so dismayed, that they instantly fell back to the Gates, leaving the Foot to shift for themselves, where they had all perished, but that the Governour Tichburn courageously led out a party himself to their succour, who had already stood two charges of the Enemy with great Resolution; and now the Governour coming on to their rescue, the Rebels betake themselves to their heels, with the loss of two hundred men, and the English had the chase for a mile or more within sight of the Town Walls, and took a competent Booty of Money, Cloths, and Arms.

After this, the Enemy sent Father Darcy a Fryer, lately a Prisoner, as their Ambassador to the Town, to require an absolute surrender of it: But the Governour told him, that they were better able to keep the Town, than the Country was to keep them; and that neither their Spirits, nor their Power, was so meane as to entertain so unworthy thoughts. With this Answer, the Fryer takes leave, leaving with them, for their greater Terror, the Copy of an Oath taken by the Lords of the Pale, and the rest of the Papists English and Irish.

I A. B. In the presence of Almighty God, and all the Angels and Saints in Heaven, Promise, Vow, Swear, and Protest, to maintain and defend, as far as I may, with my Life, Power, and Estate, the publick and true Exercise of the true Catholick Roman Religion, against all Persons that shall oppose the same.

I further Swear, That I will bear Faith and true Allegiance to our Sovereign Lord King Charles, his Heirs and Successors, and that I will defend him and them, as far as I may, with my Life, Power, and Estate, against all such Persons, as shall attempt any thing against their Royal Persons, Honours, Estates, and Dignities, and against all such as shall directly or indirectly endeavour to suppress their Royal Prerogatives, or do any Act or Acts contrary to Royal Government; As also the Power and Priviledges of Parliament, the lawful Right and Priviledges of the Subject;

and

and every person that makes that Vow, Oath, and Protestation, in whatsoever he shall do in the lawful pursuance of the same.

And to my power, as far as I may, I will oppose, and by all ways and means endeavour to bring to condign punishment, even to the loss of life, liberty, and Estate, all such as shall either by force or practice, Counsels, Plots, Conspiracies, or otherwise, do or attempt any thing to the contrary of any Article, Clause, or anything in this present Vow, Oath, and Protestation contained. So help me God.

This Oath of the Catholics induced the Governour and Council to fall upon a Protestation and Oath, to this effect.

Whereas we are beset with such who pretend their attempts, in taking of this Town, to be for the Advancement of his Majesties Service (which notwithstanding is but a pretext to delude the Vulgar) we the Governour and Captains, for the further Manifestation and Approbation of our Loyalty and Faith to his Majesty, by whose immediate Command we are charged for the Defence of his Royal Title in it, do likewise hereby unanimously make this following Protestation and Oath: To defend this Town, against all outward and inward Attempts whatsoever, for his Majesties Service: And to discover any Plot, Conspiracy, or Combination, which may or shall come to my knowledge from without or within, which may be any way intended to the prejudice of the whole Town, or Governours and Council: Nor consent, that the Town shall be given up upon any pretence or cause whatsoever, without the Consent of the Governour and Officers; or without special Command from his Majesty, or chief Governour or Governours of this Kingdom.

The Mayor and Aldermen of the Town refused this Oath, as fearing thereby to hazard the favour of fair quarter; and some of the Aldermens Wives hired a Boy to advertize the Enemy of an opportunity of coming unexpectedly upon the Town by night-time, by reason that the River Boyne was frozen hard enough for their passage; but the Enemies diffidence to the Womens Advice, and the suddain thawing of the River, was the cause that this Plot took no effect; and the Souldiers no whit daunted in their Resolutions, upon New-years day agreed amongst themselves, to beat up some quarters Northwards: But the Gates were so frozen, as not to be conveniently opened; yet one Company got over the Walls, killed fifteen Irish, and a Centinel, fired a Village, and returned; and a week after, a great party of three hundred Foot, and eighty Horse, made another successful Sally, killed an hundred, and forced as many into the River, where they were drowned, and among them Arie Ro Mac Mooghan a principal Ring-leader; and so returned safe, with the acquit of fifty Arms, some Cows, and other pillage. Yet these small GAMES, could not keep the Town from being in distress, Provision now growing short, and Souldiers and Townsmen beginning to droop in their Spirits: But just then, as it were at the last gasp, comes Relief to the Town in some small Vessels, laden with Biskets and Munition, which put the poor Belieged into such a fit of Jollity, as was like to have cost them dear. For the Souldiers out of joy gave themselves so liberally that night to drink strong Ale, which the Popish Aldermen, out of a Design invited them to, that Watches, Centinels, and all became less serviceable, in case of Invasion from the Enemy; who receiving Advice from their secret Friends within, took the offered opportunity, and early that morning made a Breach in the Wall, at which five hundred of the chief Commanders entered (who looked upon it as a great piece of Gallantry, nor doubting Success) these for an hour and half passed undeterred, till giving their accustomed Shout, as a Token to their Companies, the Governour himself perceived the danger, and hastning to his own Company, which then was the Main-Guard, and causing the Drums to beat, he put his Forces into as good a posture as the suddenness of the Alarm would permit; and so marching against the Enemy, gave so fierce a charge upon them, that they began presently to shrink: by this time, the Lord Moir came in with fifteen Horse, and assisted the Governour in chasing the Irish up the Hill.

The Protestation and Oath of the Governour and Council.

Some Women within give secret Intelligence to the Enemy.

The Souldiers make several Sallies out of the Town with success.

The Enemy make a strong Attempt upon the Town, but are repulsed.

Thus was the Town cleared, and the Irish who made rock-furd of their Enterprize, were repelled, With the loss of two hundred slain, and much a number taken, as glutted the Pillions.

The Besieged waxing more careful, now sent out an Ambuscade for more Requisition, and meditating Revenge upon the Irish for their late Attempt, made three several successful Sallies, in which they routed divers parties of the Enemy, brought in some Store of Corn, and other necessary Provisions, and other Prisoners and Appen, and some Pilgrims.

General O'Neal was come to the Siege from the North, and resolves upon storming the Town, but just the day before, being Sunday, two Windmills, the Suburbs, three Bridges, and a small lopy, arrived lately from Dublin within the Walls, bringing with them three hundred Prisoners, and a Prize taken from the Rebels laden with Herring, besides four Companies of Irish men sent for the completing of the Lord Moor's Regiment, so that now they feared not any undertakings of their Adversaries.

General O'Neal following O'Neal falls to storming, and having applied his Scaling Ladders to the Wall near St. Lawrence Gate, the Irish began to climb, and (the Centinel singing fife) got up to the Top, whence he knocked them down with the But-end of his Musket, and then calling for more help, they were glad to fly, leaving thirteen Scaling Ladders behind them.

The next thing done in Tredagh, was the publishing a Proclamation from the State, brought with the Relief from Dublin, wherein the Heads of the chief Rebels were priced, O'Neal at a thousand pounds, others at eight hundred, and others at four hundred pounds, each according to their quality.

Many sick were cured by the Rebels, for the redemption of the Lord Mac Guire, and the change of the Lady Blaney, and her Children and Sisters, and all their prisoners in Ulster, for him and two other prisoners, Dublin. But whether the Lords Justices, and Council, durst not take such perilous Dealers, or whatever was the matter, the money did not come to effect. The Prisoners which brought the Life Supply, were sent back again for more, yet left such Courage in the Rebels, that they would needs go out, and try the temper of their Enemies Weapons. Hereupon two hundred and twenty Foot, and an hundred and twenty Horse, issued out, and marched to Smiths-Town, burning Dunmurry in their way: Here they met with five Companies of the Irish, whom they charged and vanquished, killing three hundred, and taking two Colonels, and an hundred and sixty Cows, Preston himself being hard put to it by Sir Patrick Wynn, left his Baggage and good Horses, and fled; and here were Letters taken, by which divers Lords of the English Pale were discovered to be Traytors.

The Lord Moor and the Governour, finding the success of this Sally to be so good, made another with four Companies, and met with two Companies of the Rebels, routed them, slew thirteen, took a Captain of O'Neal's prisoners, compelled the rest to fly to Slane, took the Castle of Calpe, and put four and twenty therein to the Sword.

After this they made many other bold Attempts upon the Enemy; among which, that of the Lord Moors upon Mac Brian at Tallagh Hallon, deserves to be mentioned: He had but four hundred Foot, and eighty Horse, the Enemy thrice in number, yet wanting in valour what they exceeded in multitude, were easily put to flight, and Moyle Mac Moogham carried prisoner to Tredagh.

These and other fortunate Achievements, together with the great Store of Corn which they brought in daily, and fresh Provisions by Sea, so heartened the English, and amazed the Spirits of the Besiegers, that General O'Neal, despairing of taking the Town, privately raised his Siege, and retired to Dundalk; and then the Governour opened the Gates, and marched out, firing and pillaging round about where ever the Enemy had any thing to do. And thus was Tredagh delivered March the twentieth. After which the Market was abundantly increased (to the great satisfaction of the Souldiers) by the coming of the Country people with Provisions.

Lieutenant-General Ormond had now gotten together a considerable Army of three thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, with which he sets forward to find out the Enemy, burning the County of Meath, and to comes to Tredagh, the Irish dispersing all the way before him: There he calls a Council of War, where it was resolved, That the Rebels should be pursued and unknelt from their lurking Holes; but the Earl of Ormond's preference could not be spared so long from Dublin, wherefore he returns, and leaves the performance of that Exploit to the Lord Moor, and the Governour Tichburn.

The first of these marches out with a thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse, and finds the Enemy in two Divisions, near a Town called Abderde, each Division consisting of twelve hundred men: between these and the Town a party of Horse placed themselves, and another gets between them and a Bog, to hinder their escape that way: In the mean while, a Forlorn of an hundred scours the Ditches, beats out the Ambuscado which was laid for them; and then the English falling upon their Body, discomfit them, and kill four hundred.

And now these two noble Commanders bend themselves to the attempting of Dundalk, it self their Receptacle and Magazine, well fortified with double Walls, double Ditches, Marshes on the one side, and the Sea on the other. The cowardly Irish presently clasp up the Protestant prisoners close, meaning, if the Town came to hazard, to sacrifice all those poor Soules to their Revenge.

O'Neal comes to the Siege of Tredagh, which is relieved with Men and Provision from Dublin.

O'Neal storm the Town, but is beaten back with loss.

The Heads of the chief Rebels prized by Proclamation.

Several other successful Sallies upon the Enemy.

The Siege of Tredagh raised.

The Lord Moor defeats the Enemy near Abderde.

He and Tichburn besiege Dundalk.

The English come on, their forlorn gives fire at the Gate, yet could not enter till Lieutenant Colonel Waman with three hundred men pick-axed the Wall, and forced his passage through the breach, and made way for the Horse, and on they go; but coming against three brass Pieces, maintained by five hundred men, they were said to retire, and take another way; so firing the Houses about the Castle, by advantage of the (moak) got underfired under the Walls to the very Gate, which they blew open, and entered at it into the Castle, and made themselves Masters off; and leaving a sufficient number of Musqueteers to Man the Streets, drew up the Ordnance against the inner Gate, and discharged them in such a manner, that the Enemy astonished at their hardy Resolution, betook themselves to their heels, leaving their Guns laden.

General O'Neal seeing all in Confusion, steals away over the River, while Sir Henry Tichburne and the Lord Moor enter at several wayes, and take possession of the Town, with the death of an hundred Papists, and of their own side but fourteen, viz. Ensign Fortescue, eldest Son to Sir Faithful Fortescue, and three other Officers, and ten common Souldiers, all slain by shot from the Castle. O'Neal in his flight, out of Revenge, burns Bally Maccomilens, a Castle of the Lord Moors, who in requital for his Losses, and for his good Services, is by the Lords Justices Commissioned to be Governour of Dundalk. And thus the Protestants becoming Masters of the Field in those parts, the Action between Papists and Protestants in Ireland took end for this year.

During the Kings abode in Scotland, the two Marquisses of Hamilton and Argyle being informed that there were some Plots upon their Persons, for some dayes forbore their appearance in Parliament, and absented themselves from Edinburgh. This coming to the knowledge of the Parliament in England, wrought in them such Jealousies and Fears of the Kings Designs, that immediately the Committee, during the recess, and afterwards the Houses, took order for a Guard for the defence of London, Westminster, and the Parliament. In this discontented humour, the King finds appearance of satisfaction among them; that at his departure from them, it is said to have been their common expression, That he went a contented King from a contented People; but a very short time produced far other kind of Effects, than one would have thought should have proceeded from the satisfaction they pretended; his Majesty being return'd, the Citizens feast him Magnificently, and at Hampton Court are Banqueted by him, and divers Aldermen Knighted, but neither here likewise did this outward Calm and smooth aspect of Affairs long continue.

December the Second, the King Summons both Houses together, and tells them;

That he had tarried in Scotland longer than was expected, yet not fruitlessly; for he had given full satisfaction to that Nation, but cannot chuse but take notice of, and wonder at the unexpected Distractions which he finds at Home.

Lastly, He commends to them the State of Ireland, minds them of their slow-ness in sending Relief thither, and desires them to appoint a Committee to confer with two Scottish Commissioners, whom he had brought along with him to treat with the Parliament about transporting Auxiliaries out of Scotland, as was desired by the Lords Justices of Ireland.

The next thing the King did, was to publish a Proclamation for Obedience to the Laws (then in force) concerning Religion, and the performance of Divine Service, without Innovation or abolishing of Rites and Ceremonies.

Then he issues such a Command, That all Members of both Houses of Parliament should meet him at or before the Twentieth of January; and they accordingly meeting, upon the Fourteenth of December, he reminds them of the Irish Affairs, and Conjures them by all that is or can be dear to them or him, to hasten that Business with all possible Speed; by which, let the World Judge whether he were so great a Friend to the Rebels as some have say'd him; but withall he takes notice of a Bill for pressing Souldiers for Ireland, depending in the House of Lords; in Reference to which, because some Dispute had been started concerning Bounds of Prerogative therein, he was content for avoiding such Debates, that the Bill should pass, so it were with a Salvo Jure, both for King and People.

This provisionall Item caused a Conference between both Houses; wherein it was agreed, That a Petition should be presented to his Majesty, to acquaint him with the disgust of his Parliament, at the breach of their Privilege in taking notice of the forementioned Bill for impress, which he ought not to have done otherwise than by their Information; and for putting in that provisionall Clause of Salvo Jure: before it was presented; desiring to know the Names of those who had so unduly given him such Information, that they might be brought to condigne Punishment.

The Petition was presented by the King, yet they resolved not to dissent till they had obtained a satisfactory Answer, whereupon a select Committee was ordered to draw up another Petition and Remonstrance for the further prosecution of the Business. The Petition was thus presented by him.

Speech, and draw up a Petition and Remonstrance to be presented by him.

The Parliament enter into Jealousies of the Kings designs.

The Kings returns from Scotland.

He causeth the two Houses to appear before him, to consult about several Affairs.

The Parliament take exceptions at some things to the Kings Speech, and draw up a Petition and Remonstrance to be presented by him.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

Y Our Majesties most humble and Faithful Subjects, the Commons in this present Parliament, do with Joy acknowledge the Favour of God in your safe return into England, when the Dangers, and Distempers of the State have caused them to desire your Presence and Authority to your Parliament, for preventing of eminent Ruine and Destruction to your Kingdoms of England and Scotland, fomented by a Malignant Party, for alteration of Religion and Government; the increase of Popery by the practice of Jesuits, and other Engines and Factors of Rome, corrupting the Bishops and Privy Council. They being the cause of the late Scottish War, and the Irish Rebellion: now for prevention, they pray that your Majesty would concur with your Parliament, to deprive the Bishops of their Votes, To take away Oppression in Religion, Church Government, and Discipline: To purge your Councils of such as are Promoters of these Corruptions, and not alienate any Church Lands in Ireland, by reason of the Rebellion. And these being granted, they will make him happy.

After this comes out the Remonstrance very long, and prolix, setting down all the Mistakes and Misfortunes, and what they term'd Pressures, which had happened since the beginning of his Reign,

The Substance of the Parliaments Remonstrance.

First, The Root and Ground of these Dangers and Evils;
Secondly, Their Maturity and Ripeness;
Thirdly, The effectual means used for their extirpation, and the progress therein made;
Fourthly, The Obstructions and Oppositions interrupting; And Fifthly, The best means for removing these Obstacles, and for accomplishing the Parliaments good Intentions, for the restoring of this Nation to its ancient Repourne.

The Actors and Promoters of these Evils were described to be;

First, The Jesuit Papiſt;
Secondly, The Bishops and corrupted Clergy; And Thirdly, Interested Councillors and Courtiers.
The root of the Mischief was the Malignant Party, whose practices were branched into four particulars.

First, To foment Differences and Discontents between King and People about Prerogative and Privilege, for their own principal Advantages;
Secondly, To suppress the purity and power of Religion;
Thirdly, To unite and enjoy Papiſts, Arminians, and Libertines; and out of them all, to compass a Body sufficient for the carrying on of their Designs; And Fourthly, To elude the King to the Parliament by Slanders, and by putting him upon other ways of Supply than Parliamentary Subsidies; And that the ends of these Malignants were to subvert the fundamental Laws and Principles of Government.

Then the Remonstrance charges this Malignant Party more particularly, as main Causes of the dissolution of three several Parliaments, without Relief of Grievances, imprisoning and fining some of the Members; raising great sums of Money by Loan, Privy Seals, and Excise; and blaspheming the Position of Right.

Successless Attempts upon Spain and France, and Peace made with the former without consent of Parliament. The loss of Rebel, occasioned by the Loan of part of our Fleet to the French King. The deterring the Palgrave Cause: Charging the Kingdom with billeted Soldiers, and the carrying of German Home to inslave this Nation to Arbitrary Contributions.

And then the Remonstrance falls upon Scandalous Declarations published against the Parliament, injustice, oppression, violence, illegal enlargements of Forests, Coat and Conduct Money, corrupt Councils and Designs, Monopolies, and Misactions of Courts of Judicature, and Council Table; Then it charged the Bishops with many Enormities, particularly for contributing towards the raising of an Army, for the constraining of the Scott to a conformity with their Superstitious Ceremonies; And Lastly, mentions

What they had done for the Reformation of the said Abuses.

To their Petition, the King returns this Answer,

The Kings
Answer to the Petition.

That he knows not any wicked or malignant Persons whom he doth either Countenance or Employ;

That he would concur with his People in a Parliament any way against all Popish Designs, but would not consent to the depriving of the Bishops of their Votes in Parliament;

That he Judged the power of the Clergy sufficiently moderated by the taking away of the High-Commission Court, so needing no further abridgement.

That he was willing to concur with them for the removal of any innovations in Religion by a National Synod.

That he had no Councillors, or Ministers of State, whom he would not at any time expose to trial, and leave to the Law; but cannot agree that any others should have the Choice of them but himself.

That he concurs with them for the not altering the forfeited Lands in Ireland, but thinks it not seasonable to resolve before the Event of War be seen. And doubts not of their loyal Endeavours, for the support of his Royal Estate.

In Answer to the Remonstrance, the King issues out a Declaration to his Subjects, the Sum of which was,

His Answer to the Remonstrance.

That he thought he had given sufficient Satisfaction to his Peoples Fears and Jealousies concerning Religion, Liberty, and Civil Interests by the Bills which he had passed this Parliament, desiring that misunderstandings might be removed on either side, and that the bleeding Condition of Ireland might persuade them to Unity, for the Relief of that unhappy Kingdome.

Soon after this, happened the insolent Mutiny of the London Apprentices, who in a tumultuary manner resorted to White Hall and Westminster, to the great affrightment of the King, who thereupon commanded the Mayor and Common-Council to take order for a double Watch and Guard to keep the Diabolical Rabble in better order for the future, and especially the ensuing Christmas Holy-days.

The tumultuous Concourse of the London Apprentices.

December the Twenty Eighth, the Kings sends a Message to the House of Lords, to signify to them that he would raise ten thousand Volunteers for the Succour of Ireland, if the Commons would undertake to pay them; and upon New-year's day comes out a Proclamation of the Irish Rebellion, wherein the Irish (then in Armes) with all their Adherents and Abettors, were denounced Rebels and Traitors.

The Irish proclaimed Rebels and Traitors.

But two dayes after, the King upon Information given, that the Lord Kimbolton, and five Members of the House of Commons, viz. Mr. Hollis, Sir Arthur Hazelrig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Sturges, had designed a Correspondence with the Scots, and countenanced the late City Tumults; Ordered Sir William Killigrew and Sir William Fleming to Seal up their Trunks, Studies and Chambers; and to seize their persons; for the latter, they were prevented; for the Members having timely Notice of it, had conveyed themselves away; the former was done, and their Trunks and Papers seized. Against which the House the same day Voted;

The Kings proceedings against the five Members.

That if any Persons should attempt to seize the Persons or Papers of any Parliament men; such Members shall require the Aid of the Constable, to secure such Persons, till further order of the House; and that it is lawful for any Person to assist the said Members, and that the said Members may stand upon their Guard, and make resistance according to the Protestation, for Defence of the Privileges of Parliament.

The King upon this, sends these Articles against the five Members, and the Lord Kimbolton.

First, That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the Fundamental Laws and Government of this Kingdom, and deprive the King of his Legal Powers, and to place on Subjects an arbitrary and Tyrannical Power.

Secondly, That they have endeavoured by many foul Aspersions upon his Majesty and his Government, to alienate the Affections of his people, and to make his Majesty odious unto them.

Thirdly, That they have endeavoured to draw his Majesties late Army to Disobedience to his Majesties Commands, and to side with them in their traiterous Designs.

Fourthly, That they have traiterously invited and encouraged a Foreign Power to invade his Majesties Kingdom of England.

Fifthly, That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the very Rights and Being of Parliament.

Sixthly,

Sixthly, That for compleating of their traitorous Designs, they have endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the Parliament to join with them in their traitorous Designs, and to that end have actually raised and countenanced Tumults against the King and Parliament.

Seventhly, That they have traitorously conspired to levy, and actually have levied war against the King.

The King comes to the House of Commons with a company of armed Men, to Arrest the five Members.

The House very much distressed at this Act, adjourned, and publish a Declaration concerning it.

The next day the King attended with his Guard of Pensioners, and some Courtiers, almost five hundred, went to the House of Commons to Arrest the Five Members; at whose entrance the Speaker arises, and the King sits down, views the House round, and perceives that the Birds he looked for, were all flown; for, being forewarned, they had withdrawn themselves into London; hereupon he tells them, That he came to look for those Members whom he had accused of High-Treason, and was resolved to have them wheresoever he found them, and expected to have them sent to him as soon as they should come to the House; but would not have them think that this Act of his was any Violation of Parliament.

And so failing of his purpose, departed, leaving the House so extremely distast at his Proceeding, that the very next day, January the fifth, they Voted it a Breach of Privilege, and adjourned till Tuesday following, appointing in the mean time a Committee to sit at Guildhall, to consider of the most effectual means for their Vindication and Security, with power to advise with any person or persons, and to send for Parties, Witnesses, Papers and Records.

It was also Ordered, That the Committee for the Irish Affairs should meet in the same Place at what Time they should think best; and both Committees to report their Results to the House.

And then they publish their Declaration.

That whosoever shall arrest any Member of Parliament by Warrant from the King only, is Guilty of the Breach of Privileges of the Parliament; and likewise that all those who attended the King when he came to demand the Five Members, were guilty of a traitorous Design against the King and Parliament; That the Proclamation for apprehending and imprisoning the said Members, was false, scandalous, and illegal, and not of validity enough to hinder them from attending the House; and that the publishing of several Articles of High-Treason was a Breach of Privileges: wherefore they intreat his Majesty to discover the Names of those Informers and evil Counsellours, declaring all such Persons to be public Enemies to the State.

The Londoners throng to Westminister, with Petitions, and were very loud in their Tongues, bitterly inveighing against several Peers, whom they judged bad Advisers to the King; but more especially against the Bishops, whom some of them affronted going to and coming from the House, which put them into such a fright, that they sequestered themselves from the Parliament, and drew up an inconsiderate Protestation against all Laws, Votes, Resolutions, and Determinations, as in themselves null and of none effect, which had passed or should pass during the time of their forced absence, desiring that their Protestation might be entered by the Clerk of the House of Peers.

Twelve Bishops absent themselves from the House, and protest against their Actions.

They are charged with Treason, and committed, ten of them to the Tower, two to the Black Rod.

The Parliament Petition the King for a Guard. And are back out of the City.

This was signed by Twelve of them, and proved afterwards a vain Break-neck of Episcopacy in England; for presently upon it at a Conference between both Houses, it was agreed, That this Protestation of the twelve Bishops was extending to the deep trenching upon the fundamental Privileges and Being of Parliament.

And not long after they were accused of High-Treason, seized, and brought on their knees to the Lords Bar, Ten of them committed to the Tower, and the other Two in regard of their age, to the Black Rod.

The House of Commons, upon suspicion of some Designs upon their Persons, Petition the King for a Guard to be commanded by the Earl of Essex; which the King denied, as not willing to have them too strong; Yet promised to take such care for their Security from violence, as he would for the Preservation of Himself and Children.

But that Answer being unsatisfactory, the City join with them, and in their Common-Council drew up a Petition, wherein they Complain;

That the Trade of the City was decayed, to the utter Ruine of the Protestant Religion, and the Lives and Liberties of the Subjects; by the designs of Papists, Forraigners, and Drugg-masters, more particularly their fomenting the Irish Rebellion; by changing the Constable of the Tower, and making preparation there; by the fortifying of Whitehall, and his Majesties late Invasion of the House of Commons; whereupon they pray, That by the Parliaments advice the Protestants in Ireland may be relieved, the Tower be put in the hands of Persons of Trust, a Guard appointed for the safety of the Parliament, and that the Five Members may not be restrained, nor proceeded against, but by the Privileges of Parliament.

Before this, the King riding in his Coach into the City, Citizens by heaps flocked to his Coach side as he passed along the Street, beseeching him to agree with his Parliament, and not to violate their Privileges.

To their Petition the King returned Answer,

That he could not express a greater Sense of his Duty than he had done, that he was sorry to satisfy the City he had removed a worthy Person from the charge of the Tower, and that the late Petition had caused him to forsake White-Hall for the safety of his own Person.

That his going to the House of Commons was to apprehend those Five Members for Treason, to which the Privileges of Parliament could not extend, and that yet he would proceed against them no otherwise then Legally.

Soon after this, the County of Buckingham Petition the King for Mr. John Hampden their Knight of the Shire.

That he and the other Knights of the County, may enjoy their just Privileges.

And now such increase and numbers of ordinary people gathered together in a tumultuous manner about White-Hall and Westminster, that the King withdrawing their Lordships, and leaving some danger from them, thought good to retire to Hampton-Court, taking with him the Queen, Prince and Duke of York, where he had his Regime and Guard quickly increased by the Accession of divers of the Gentry. But the next day the Five Members were triumphantly guarded to Westminster by Water by a great number of Citizens and Sea-men, with Hundreds of Boats and Barges with Guns in them, Braving and Threatning as they passed by White-Hall; and making large Protestations at Westminster, of their constant Fidelity and Adherence to the Parliament.

The King now at Hampton-Court, gives the like Answer to the Buckingham Petition, as he had given to the City; but in the mean time, the Parliament receives information, that the Lord Digby, and Colonel Lunford were gathering some Troops of horse at Kingston, where the County Magazine was lodged: Whereupon they order, That the County Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, and the Trained Bands shall take care to secure the Counties and their Magazines, and to suppress all unlawful Assemblies: And so Lunford was apprehended and committed to the Tower, but Digby escaped over Sea. The Court removing now to Kingston, the Attorney General Sir Edward Herbert is summoned to appear at the Lords Bar, to answer concerning the Articles against the Five Members, where it had gone hard with him, if the King at his earnest Supplication had not taken him off by his Letter to the Lord Keeper Lincolne (who succeeded Finch) wherein he clears the Attorney General, and takes the whole business upon himself. Yet concludes, That finding cause wholly to desist from proceeding against the Persons accused, he had commanded his Attorney General to proceed no further therein, nor to produce nor discover any proof concerning the same. And so this Breach between King and Parliament was for a while stitched up.

January the 20. the King by a Message to the Parliament, propoeth unto them the Concernments of his own Just Rights and Regal Authority, advising them to digest into one Body all the Grievances of the Kingdom, and so send them to him; promising, that in his Favourable Assent to those Means which should be found most effectual for Redress, he would not only equall, but exceed the most Indulgent Princes.

The Scots having a fair Interest in their British Plantations in Ireland, offered to Transport two Thousand five hundred Soldiers thither: upon these Articles:

First, That Provisions of Munnals be presently sent to Carrick Fergus to be sold to the Scots Souldiers, answerable to their pay.

Secondly, To have Ships of Convoys.

Thirdly, They to have the Command of that Castle and Town, to remain there, or to enlarge their own Quarters into the Country.

Fourthly, That Match, Powder, and Ball be sent from hence; but what Arms, Ammunition, or Artillery shall go from Scotland with their Forces, the same shall be supplied into Scotland out of England.

Fifthly, That a part of the Brotherly Assistance (Thirty thousand Pounds) be advanced to them presently, which though in proportion came but to Seven thousand and five Hundred Pounds, yet they crave Ten thousand pounds for their Encouragement.

Sixthly, That their pay which was condescended to commence from the Eight of December last, may be advanced to the Eight of February next, when they hoped to March: And,

Seventhly,

The Kings Answer to the Petition.

The County of Buckingham Petition in behalf of Mr. Hampden.

The King removes to Hampton-Court.

Colonel Lunford apprehended for raising Forces at Kingston.

The Lord Digby escapes beyond Sea.

The Attorney General questioned by the Lords, but cleared by the King.

The Kings Message to the Parliament.

The Scots Proposals about sending over Soldiers to Ireland.

Seventhly, That all this may be done without prejudice to their Treaty, January the 4. Four and twentieth.

The Scots Commissioners mediate a Reconciliation between the King and Parliament.

The Commons Petition that the King should have the Militia put into their Hand: Which he denies.

These Propositions were accepted by the Houses, and at length consented to by the King, though at first he made some exceptions against the Third Article, as somewhat prejudicial to the Crown of England. And then the Scots Commissioners interposed Mediation between the King and Parliament, for reconciliation of those differences which were now grown up to some height between them; for which Mr. Pym was Ordered to return them the Thanks of the House.

The House of Commons gave the Lords to sayn with them in petitioning for the Militia, and the Command of the Tower; but they not complying, the Commons singly of themselves importune the King to put those things into the hands of the Parliament, as the only available means for the remoyall of their Fears and Jealousies.

But the King not willing to part with the Principall Jewells of his Crown, signified to them;

That he thought the Militia to be lawfully subject to no Command but his own, and therefore would not let it out of his hands. That he had preferred to the Lieutenancy of the Tower, a Person of known Fortune and unquestionable Reputation; and that he would prefer none but such to the Command of his Forts and Castles; yet would not intrust the power of conferring those Places and Dignities from himself, being derived to him from his Ancestors by the Fundamentall Laws of the Kingdome.

Yet would not the Commons desist, but again Petitioned, and were again refused. After this divers Petitions were delivered to the Parliament against the Votes of Popish Lords and Bishops in the House of Peers; as one from the County of Suffolk to the number of 1500; another from the Tradesmen about London to the number of 2000; and a Third from the City Dames; All which were bestowed. That the House of Commons had already endeavoured Relief from the Lords in their requests, and shall so continue, till redress be obtained; and accordingly they so managed the Business, that shortly after, the Lords passed the Bill for disabling all Persons in holy Orders to have any Place or Vote in Parliament, or to exercise any temporall Jurisdiction. But not to let the King take breath, they Petition him again for the Militia, and for the clearing of Kimbolton and the Five Members: By his Answer to both which, they perceived his resolution not to intrust the former out of himself, or otherwise to clear the latter, but inclusively by a general Pardon; which was refused.

The King sends for the Bails of Essex and Holland; but they refusing to come, are put out of their places at Court. The Lord Digby's Letters intercepted.

The King at Hampton-Court thought good to send for all his Domestick Servants of either House, but more particularly for the Bails of Essex and Holland; but they refused to come, excusing themselves with the necessity of performing their Duties in Parliament, and discharging the Trust reposed in them. For which those two Lords were put from their Places at Court, the one of Chamberlain of the Kings Household, the other of the Bed-Chamber.

The Lord Digby about this time sent three Letters from Middleburgh in Zealand, (where he was fled out of England) one to the Queen, and two others to Secretary Nicholls, and Sir Lewis Dives, signifying, That if the King would openly declare his Mind, and betake himself to some place of Security, that he might come freely to him, he doubted not but he should do him some acceptable Service. These Letters were intercepted by the Parliament, and by them after Perusal sent to the King, with their Intreaties to him, That he would perswade the Queen not to correspond with Digby or any others whom his Great Council had proclaimed Traytors.

There was a Rumour spread abroad, That the Parliament had an Intent to accuse the Queen of High Treason, as one that had so much power with the King as to misadvise him: This Report the Parliament excused as a publike Scandall upon them; which She in her mildly accepted, but yet provides against the Danger; and therefore, the King being now pressed by the States Ambassador, to send the Princess Mary into Holland to her late betrothed Spouse the young Prince of Orange, she takes this opportunity, and prevails with her Husband for leave to accompany her Daughter thither; and withall, carries with her all the Kings and her own Jewels, together with those which were intailed to the Crown; therewith, and some other assistance, to raise a Party sufficient to maintain the King and his Regalities against the Parliament.

The Queen accompanies the Princess Mary into Holland.

Mr. Pym complains of the flocking of Papists into Ireland.

In the mean time, Mr. Pym at a Conference complaining of the General flocking of Papists into Ireland; affirmed, That since the Lieutenant had ordered a stop upon the Ports against all Irish Papists, many of the chief Commanders, now in the head of the Rebels, had been Licensed to passe thither by his Majesties immediate Warrant.

The King was highly distressed at this Speech, which he signified to the House; who in their Answer to his Message, justified Mr. Pym's words to be the Sence of the House, and that they had yet

A yet in the Custody of the Lord Dillwyn, Sir George Hamilton, Colonel Butler, Brother to the Lord Ashburnham, now in Rebellion, and one of the Lord Newville Sons.

To which the King Replies;

That he thought Mr. Pym's Speech was not so well grounded as it ought to have been, and that the forementioned persons had their Passes granted before he knew of the Parliament's Order of Restraining; and therefore expected their Declaration for his Vindication from the same Calumnies of Conspiring or under-hand favouring that Ashburnham and Sir John Comers placed in his room.

For the next thing the Parliament did, was to move the King to the turning out of Sir John Bryan from his Lieutenancy of the Tower, in whose place Sir John Comers at their nomination succeeded; and to they proceed to the naming of fit persons for Trust of the Militia in the several Counties, and by Act of Parliament disable all Clergy-men for exercising temporall Jurisdiction. And then comes a Message to them from the King, wherein he offers by Proclamation to require all Statutes concerning Recusants to be put in Execution; That the Seven condemned Priests shall be banished, and all Romish Priests within Twenty dayes shall depart the Kingdome. That he refers the Consideration of Government and Liturgy of the Church wholly to the Houses. And offers himself in Person to the Irish War. But the Parliament were now busied about a Petition concerning the Vindication of their Five Members, wherein they desire the King to send them the Informers against the said Members, (or otherwise, to desert their prosecution,) would not suffice, because the whole Parliament was concerned in their Charge. And then they proceeded to ordain the power of the Militia for the Defence of the Parliament, Tower and City of London, under the Command of Sergeant Major Generall Skippon, an approved Commander, whose Valour and Conduct had been experimented in the Low-Country Wars. The King had deferred his Answer to their Petition (for the settling of the Trust of the Militia of the severall Counties according to their nomination) till his return from Dover, where he took leave of his Wife and Daughter (whom he had conducted thither,) and so returned to Greenwich. Thence he sends to Hampton-Court for his two eldest Sons to come to him; against the mind of the Parliament, who would have dissuaded him from it.

The Parliament moved place Major General Skippon over the City Militia.

And now the Parliament thought fit to consider of the reducing of Ireland, and Order;

First, That Two Millions and a half of those Acres to be Confiscate, of Rebels Lands in Four Provinces, may be allotted to such Persons as will disburse Money for managing that war, according to the rate of One thousand Acres in Ulster, two Hundred pounds in Connaght, three hundred pounds; in Munster, Four hundred and Fifty pounds; and in Lemster Six hundred pounds: and all this besides Bogs, Woods, and barren Mountains.

The Parliament considered of a way for the reducing of Ireland.

Secondly, That there be reserved a constant Rent to the Crown of England, out of each Acre thereof in Ulster one penny; Connaght one penny half penny; Munster two pence farthing; Lemster three pence.

Thirdly, That for erecting Mannors, creating Corporations, and regulating of Plantations, Commissioners shall be empowered by Parliament.

Fourthly, All undertakers to subscribe before severall dayes previous in reference to the distance of abode from London.

Fifthly, Their Monies to be payed into the Chamber of London at four payments, Viz. a Fourth part in ten dayes after subscribing, and the Third payment at three Months.

Sixthly, At subscribing to pay down the twentieth part of his totall Sum, and if he fail of his residue of the first fourth part within ten dayes, he shall forfeit the twentieth part of the totall deposited; and so much more of this fourth payment, to be added thereto, as shall make up the one fourth of the said first payment. And if he fail in any other of the three payments, he shall then forfeit his entire first fourth part, and all his Subscription to accrue to the common Benefit of the rest of the Undertakers. Which the King confirms, February 26.

And the Committee of the Irish Affairs issue out their Warrants to the severall Parishes for the sending a Certificate of what Sums of Money they collected, and for the bringing of the said Monies

The Parliament oppose the Kings Designs for the raising of a Guard, and seizing the Magazine of Hull. Sir Jo. Hotham is sent down to keep Hull for the Parliament.

The Parliament disallow of the Kings Intensions, to go in Person into Ireland.

The King demands entrance into Hull, and being denied, proclaims Sir John Hotham Traitor.

The King denies to sign the Bill for the Militia. The Parliament justifies Sir J. Hotham's keeping the King out of Hull.

The King summons the County of Yorkshire to his Assistance.

The Parliament, who did all along mistrust the Kings Journey Northwards, to be out of an Intention of seizing the Magazine at Hull, took upon them to oppose his purpose, not concealing their suspicion of his going about to raise an Army; and therefore very early the Magazine might be removed from thence to the Tower of London, as a place of more safety, and easier Transport for Ireland. And that the Reprieve for the six Priests in Newgate may be taken away, and they executed: And to make the suter Work, Sir John Hotham, a Member of the House of Commons, is sent down to take upon him the Government of that place, who coming thither, sooner than he was expected, excluded the Earl of Newcastle, to whom the King intended that Prefecture, where at he being irritated, sends a sharp expostulating Letter to them about it, to know the Reason why they should presume to make themselves their own Carvers, and to let things in such a manner without his privacy: yet in the end of it he leaves the six Priests to Justice, the time of their Reprieve being expired; but continues his Resolution for a Personal Voyage into Ireland. To put him off from which, they petition him not to hazard his own Person, whose Absence would greatly interrupt the proceedings of Parliament here. That they must suppress all Levies otherwise, rather, than they should advise and direct, and could not submit to any Commissioners, but such as should govern by Consent of Parliament, till his Return.

This was ill taken, and the King tells them; That though he regards them as his great Council, yet they must know, they were called together by his Writ and Authority, and not to command him, who was now Dejected of any Right he had before their Sitting; That their Reasons did not satisfy him, nor their Menacing Advice deter him from his settled Determinations. Which coming to the Knowledge of the Lords Justices, Barfons and Burleigh, and the Council of Ireland, they returned him their Humble Thanks, to the great Discontent of the Parliament.

The King encouraged by a Petition from the County of York, that the Magazine might not be removed from Hull, taking with him his Guard, mostly consisting of Lords and Gentlemen, came thither in person the twenty third of April, where he finds the Gates shut upon him, and the Bridges drawn up. But from the Wall Hotham appears, and upon his Knees, entrears his Majesty not to Command that, to which, without the Breach of his Trust, he could not yield Obedience: Whereupon the King finding his Entrance prevented, caused Hotham instantly to be proclaimed Traitor, and sent up to the Parliament to demand Justice against him; and commanded the Mayor and Fraternity of Kingston upon Hull; and the Garrison therein, not to adhere to Hotham; nor permit any part of that Ammunition to be removed without his Assent. Then approaching the Assault, he again demands Justice upon Hotham from the Parliament, and the delivery of the Town and Magazine; till both which be done he would intend no other Business. But receiving no Answer, Scouts are said to intercept Letters and Messengers between Hull and the Parliament, which they Voted to be a high Breach of their Privileges, and ordered the Sheriffs and Justices of the Counties of York and Lincoln, to suppress all Forces that should be levied against Hull.

The Bill of the Militia was now passed in Parliament, and presented to the King, who refused absolutely to sign it, because of some alterations in it, from what he had designed to be done by his Council.

The next thing by them done was, to answer the Kings Message concerning Hotham, whose Commission and Action they justified, as necessarily occasioned by the desperate Designs of Papists, and other Jealousies, grounded upon the Lord Digbys intercepted Letters, and the Suspitions of the coming of Captain Leg, the Earl of Newcastle, and the King himself to that Town; concluding it a Breach of Privilege, in proclaiming Hotham Traitor, without a Legal Form, and resolving to send a Committee of Lords and Commons to reside there, for the better securing Hull, and Him.

Hotham had already a thousand in Garrison; yet the Parliament doubting that Number would not be sufficient for the Defence of the Place, Au horise him to increase his Strength by the Counties Trained-Bands, or other Levies; whereupon he issues out his Warrants: In obedience to which, divers of them march thither with their Arms, some of whom he retains, others he dismisses and sends back: the King declares these proceedings of the Parliament, and Hotham, utterly illegal, and commands the High-Sheriffs, to take care that no Soldiers, or Trained-Bands, muster or march without his immediate Warrant.

And forthwith he summons the Knights and Gentry of the County of York, to whom he declares some Reasons, why it was necessary for him to increase his Guard, and thoroughly persuaded them of it, that they were willing to contribute their best Assistance thereunto; whereby the King had pretty well strengthened himself, and more had done, had not those Members of Parliament (who came with the last Message to the King to York, and did still reside there in Quality of a Committee) prevailed with some of the Free-holders to protest against it. And the Parliament declare, That the Subjects, unless bound to it by special Service, could not without Transgression of the Laws attend him at his pleasure; but if they did, were Disturbers of the Peace, and ought to be suppressed by the Sheriff, with the Power of the County.

In the mean time, Sir Thomas Gardner, who had been Recorder of London for six years, being Impeached by the Parliament, and in danger of Hanging, was glad to shift for himself, and by flight escaped to the King; who using all ways and means of his Prerogative, for adjourning the

The Parliament publish another Declaration.

Which is answered by the King.

The Kings Letter to the Council in Scotland. With their answer, persuading him to adhere to his Parliament.

The Parliament Protestation.

The Earl of Bristol labours to bring about an Accommodation between the King and Parliament.

Much clashing between the King and Parliament, by Declarations, Orders, and Counter-commands.

Divers of the Lords and Commons withdraw themselves to the King.

A next Term to York, was obstructed by the Parliament, who Voted it illegal, and forbade the Lord Keeper to issue out Writs, or Seal any Proclamations to that end.

About this time the Parliament began to put the people into a Military posture, requiring all persons in Authority, to put their late Ordinance of the Aditia in Execution, which the King by Edit forbids. But for the peoples satisfaction, the Parliament publish a scurrilous Declaration to the same effect, with their former Remonstrance; only one thing was added, viz. That the King at his being in Scotland, had countenanced the Irish in their Rebellious Designs, and that his Connivance was manifested by his tedious with-holding the Proclamation (whereby they were declared Traitors) till the second of January (being almost a quarter of a year after the breaking out of the Rebellion) and then had appointed but for ty Copies to be printed, and none of them to be published, without his pleasure signified; Whereas his Proclamations against the Scots had been dispersed throughout all the Kingdom, with publick Prayers and Execrations.

The King makes Answer speedily to it, not much differing from what he had said before; yet tells them, That as to the Business of the Irish, that his Council in Ireland had desired the Proclamation no sooner, nor to many Copies by twenty, as he had signed and sent them.

His Majesty had written a Letter to his Privy-Council in Scotland, to take away from them all Suspicion of those Imputations, so frequently laid to him at Home; as namely, to be Popishly affected, to be guilty of the Blood shed in Ireland, to bring in Foreign Forces, Wherewith they seemed to be to be satisfied, that they returned a most respectful Answer, and forthwith interposed their Mediation, to heal the Breach before it grew deeper; humbly desiring the King to hearken to his Parliament, as his greatest, his best, and most unparallelled Council; and discouraging Him from any personal Journey into Ireland: And with this Message was sent the Earl of London, Chancellor of Scotland; and after this, the Scots Petition to the Kings Privy-Council there, not to meddle with any Verbal, nor Real Engagement for the King against the Parliament of England.

Hereupon the English Parliament publish a Protestation, wherein they vindicate their own Proceedings, and declare the great Sense they had of the Affection of their Scottish Brethren, manifested unto them in so many particulars, and more especially in the late mentioned Petition.

The Earl of Bristol, an old experienced States-man, prudently fore-saw, that such unlucky Beginnings must necessarily come to no less than an unlucky Issue, and therefore was willing and ready to labour a timely Accommodation; and to that end, states the Case to the Lords, and lays down the Offers of the King on the one side, and the Professions of the Parliament on the other side; and shews them the Effects of a Civil War (then likely to ensue) by the Example of Germany; and the late Expensive Troubles with Scotland. And to he proceeds to propose some ways for prevention of the Dangers imminent.

First, A select Committee of Parliament, to state the Matters in Difference, with the most probable ways of reconciling them.

Secondly, To descend into the Particulars which may be expected, either in point of supporting the King, or relieving his People.

And lastly, How these Conditions agreed upon may be secured.

And to shew the Necessity of this Course, he turns up these Reasons; The deplorable Estate of Ireland; The Debts and Necessities of the Crown; The Distractions likely to produce Confusion of Religion, most dangerous and destructive to a State; besides the general Distraction of the subjects, who between Commands and Countermans, know not whom to obey.

This was admitted, as good and solid Reason; but Divine Justice would not so permit the Sins of the English Nation to go unpunished; and Bristols Speech, though well received, yet proved ineffectual.

In the mean time, the Kings Guard encreases at York, which the House Voted a preparation for War against the Parliament, a Breach of the Trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his Oath, and tending to the Dissolution of his Government; and that all such as serve him there, are Traitors to the Laws of the Kingdom, 1 Rich. 2. and 1 Hen. After this, the Parliament publish another Remonstrance or Declaration of the Kings Mis-actions, and their own Privileges, which the King answers, and they again Reply to: And receiving Answer from the King, they Ord in May the 28th, That all High-Sheriffs, Justices, &c. within an hundred and fifty miles of the City of York, do make stay of all Arms and Ammunition, that should be conveyed at any time to York; and that the person so conveying be apprehended: And likewise, that all Sheriffs within the Kingdom of England, and Dominion of Wales, shall by the Power of the Counties, suppress all Forces of Horse and Foot, coming together by the Kings Commission or Warrant; and all people, of what Rank soever, are to be aiding to their Suppression; and that this should be published in all Market-Towns and Churches. The King cries Quit with them, forbidding all his people belonging to the Trained Bands, or Militia of the Kingdom, to obey any Order or Ordinance of any of the Houses, according to a Statute 7 Ed. 1. And forthwith he requires all Ministers, Free-holders, Farmers, and substantial Copy-holders of the County of York, to meet at Hay-warth Moor near York, upon Friday n Whitsun-Week, by Nine in the Morning, to the Sheriff of the County of York, Which the Parliament declared to be against Law, and of none effect, and command all people to disobey it; for so doing, the Parliament will protect them.

Divers Members of the Commons, as well as of the Lords, disliked of those proceedings of Parliament, and therefore withdrew themselves to the King; which the House observing, Ordered, That all such as did not make their personal appearance by the 16th Day of June ensuing, should be Fined one hundred pounds towards the Irish Wars; such onely excepted, as were employed by the Parliament.

The Parliament declare against pawning the Crown Jewels.
XIX. Propositions sent from the Parliament to the King.

They knew that the Queen had pawned the Crown Jewels in Holland, for Money to be transported to the King; which to prevent him of, they Order, That whosoever hath, or shall pay, lend, send, or bring any Money in specie into this Kingdom, for, or upon those Jewels, or accept of any Bill hereafter, shall be an Enemy to the State.

June the second, the Parliament sent to the King Nineteen Propositions.

I. That all the Kings Privy-Council, great Officers, and Ministers of State, may be put out, excepting such as the Parliament shall approve; and that an Oath be tender'd them.

II. That all Affairs of State be managed by the Parliament, except such Matters as are transferred by them to the Privy-Council, and to be concluded by the major part of the Nobility under their Hands; the full number not to exceed five and twenty, nor to be under fifteen: If any Place fall void in the Interval of Parliament, then that the major part of the Council choose one to be confirmed at the next Session of Parliament.

III. That all the great Officers of the Kingdom, shall be chosen with Approbation of Parliament; and in the Interval, &c. as before said.

IV. That the Government and Education of the Kings Children, be by the Appointment of Parliament, &c. ut supra.

V. That their Marriages be Treated and concluded by Parliament, &c.

VI. That the Laws against Papists, Priests, and others, be executed, without Toleration or Dispensation, except by Parliament.

VII. That no Popish Lord or Peer have Vote in Parliament, and that their Children be Educated in the Protestant Faith.

VIII. That Church-Government be Reformed, as the Parliament shall Advise.

IX. That the Militia be settled, as the Parliament have Ordered, and that the King recall all his Declarations, published against their Ordinances therein.

X. That all Privy-Councillors and Judges, take an Oath for the maintenance of the Petition of Right, and other Statutes, which shall be made this Parliament, &c.

XI. That all Officers placed by Parliament hold their Places, Quam diu bene se gesserint.

XII. That all Members of Parliament put out, during this time, be restored again.

XIII. That the Justice of Parliament pass upon all Delinquents, and that they appear, or abide their Censure.

XIV. That the General Pardon pass with Exceptions, as the Parliament shall Advise.

XV. That all Forts and Castles of this Kingdom be disposed of by Parliament, ut supra.

XVI. That the King discharge all his Guards and Forces now in being, and not raise any other, but in case of Actual Rebellion.

XVII. That the King enter into strict Alliance with all Reformed States, for their Assistance, to recover the Rights of his Sister, and her Primogeniture, to those Dignities and Dominions which belong unto them.

XVIII. That the Lord Kimbolton, and the Five Members be cleared by Act of Parliament.

XIX. That no Peer hereafter to be made, shall sit in Parliament without their Consent.

These Propositions were by the King rejected, as inconsistent with his Majesty. So that now Men began to despair of any good Issue of the Business. The King for his part Careless of the County of York, and Declares to the Commons the Reasons of his Summoning the Gentry (and not them) together with his Intentions of Protecting them against all Oppositions, and to ease the Charge of Bille-money, and to put the Trained Bands of the Kingdom under Persons of Honour and Loyalty.

The Parliament on the other side, Order June the Fourth, That all the Deputy-Lieutenants of England and Wales, that be not Members of the House of Commons, be present at the severall Counties and Places of Training and Mustering the Counties: And all Lords-Lieutenants be Ordered to dispatch their Warrants and Commissions accordingly; and that some Members of both Houses shall be sent down to be present, and to Countenance the Service.

This Order was vigorously put in Execution, and six days after, June the Tenth, comes our another for bringing in of Money or Plate, to maintain Horse, Foot-men, and Armes: For the publick Peace and Defence of the King, and both Houses of Parliament.

In the mean time, the Kings Agents in Holland are busie in getting Armes and Ammunition for him, upon Pawn of the Crown Jewels, whilst he himself sends abroad his Letters, with Commissions of Array, beginning with the County of Leicester, Directing it to the Earls of Huntingdon and Devon, Authorizing them to Muster all the ancient Trained Bands, and Freehold Bands of the County, and over them to appoint Colonels, Captains, and Officers; and to Issue Warrants for Assembling the people for discharge of that Service. This Commission was Declared by the Parliament to be against the Law, the Liberty, and Property of the Subject; and the Actors therein to be Disturbers of the Peace, and Betrayers of the Subjects Liberty.

The Lord Keeper Littleton, having delivered the Great Seal to one Elliot, whom the King had sent to him for that purpose, durst not stay behind, for fear of being questioned about it, but shifted away to the King to York, as likewise many of the Peers had done, whose Names we find thus Recorded:

The Duke of Richmond, Marquess of Hartford, the Earls of Lindsey, Camberland, Huntingdon, Bath, Southampton, Dorset, Salisbury, Northampton, Devonshire, Cambridge, Bristol, Westmoreland, Berkshire, Arundel, Rivers, Newcastle, Dover, Carnarvan, Newport, the Lord of Monmouth, Barkshire, Malmesbury, Wiltshire, Ebury, Rich, Howard of Carlisle, Newark, Paget, Chandos, Faulkebridge, Paulth, Lovelace, Savile, Coventry, Malmesbury, Dunsford, Seymore, Gray of Ruthen, Capell, Falkland, Master Controller, Secretary Nicholas, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, chief Justice Banks.

These Noblemen and the privy Council were by the King summoned, to whom he Declares and Protests, That he would not usurp any illegal Authority over them, but is ready to maintain them against all others that would; And that he would Defend them from all Votes and Orders of Parliament, together with the true Protestant Religion, the lawfull Liberty of the Subject, and the just Privileges of the three Estates of Parliament: Nor will he engage them in any War, but what shall be for the necessary Defence of his and their Rights. Whereupon they all engaged to him their Duty and Allegiance in a most solemn Protestation: Sir Richard Gurney was then Lord Mayor of London, to whom, and his Brethren the Aldermen, and Sheriffs of London, the King sends his Letters, forbidding them (upon Perill of having their Charter questioned) to levy Armes, or raise Money, upon pretence of a Guard for the Parliament, or any other Account, excepting onely the Relief of Ireland, or the payment of the Scots Subjects.

And now comes out the Kings general Declaration, wherein he Descants upon all the Parliaments Declarations for the last seven Months, and especially upon the last; professes, That henceforward he expects they should break out into disloyal Actions, Declains against their making the Defence of the King to be the pretence for their raising Forces, Protests his own constant Resolution for the preserving of Peace, Religion, the Laws and Subjects Liberties: And expects all his Subjects to assist him against the Trayterous Attempts of such men as would destroy his Person, Honour, and Estate, and bring on a Civil War; engaging, that whosoever should bring upon him Money, or Ammunition, Horse, or Armes, should receive Eight pounds per Cent. Consideration, and have good Assurance of both Principal and Interest upon his Forest Lands, Parks, and Houses.

They were rejected by the King.

In the mean time the Lords Subsign a Protestation, wherein they disallow all Meanings of War against the Parliament, and affirm their Endeavours only to tend to the maintaining of the Protestant Religion, the Laws of Peace, and Prosperity of the Kingdom.

About this time the King, by public Proclamation, forbade all Levies of Forces, and all Contributions to such Levies, without his express pleasure; grounding his Prohibition upon sundry Statutes, as 7 of Ed. 1. 2 Ed. 3. 11 Rich. 2. and the Earl of Sherburne's Case, in the Reign of Hen. 8. Then he minds them of their Oath of Allegiance, by which they were bound to be faithful not to the King only, as King, but to his Person as King Charles, contrary to the Parliamentary Distinction betwix his Person and his Authority; his Person at Tork. his Authority in Parliament.

Lastly, Concludes with a Justification of his Commissions of Array, which by this time, were issued into the several Counties of England and Wales: To this the Parliament Reply, and the King again to them, which was followed by several Messages to and fro: All which Messages rather exasperated, than allayed the Difference: And now began England to be divided (as once in Italy into Gulphs and Gibellines) into Royalists and Parliamentarians, Cavaliers and Round-heads.

The King to strengthen his own party, makes a Progress from York into Nottinghamshire, and summoning the Gentlemen and Freeholders of that County to Newark, Caresse them with the most Obliging Expressions, imaginable, for their Forwardness and Affections to him, Declaring his Resolutions of Acting according to the Protestation at York: The like he did to those of Lincolnshire, at Lincoln, and then July the Eleventh, sends a Message to the Parliament, to certify them of his Intentions, to reduce Hull by Force, if notwithstanding delivered to him, which if they should do, he would then admit of their future Addresses, and return such Propositions as may best conduce to prevent the Inguent War: together with the Message, he drew them a Copy of that Proclamation, which he published against Sir John Hotham, wherein he Complaineth of the Affront done to his Person by Sir John, and of the Parliaments justifying that Action by their Votes and Orders, That Hotham having Fortified the Town, and Browne'd the Country, had also set out a Pinnace at Sea, which had intercept ed his Packet-Boat with the Queens Letters, and that the Earl of Warwick, contrary to the Kings Commands, had taken upon him the Command of the Fleet: for which Reasons, the King was resolv'd to punish Hotham, and all other his Assistants. Indeed the Earl of Warwick had been by the Parliament commended to the King, as the fittest man for Admiral, the Earl of Northumberland being then sick, but he was Rejected by the King, who conferred that place upon Sir John Pennington: yet afterwards the Parliament conceiving it necessary to get the Fleet into their Hands, the Earl of Warwick, by their desired Admiral, who found such means, that in a short time, notwithstanding all the Opposition of Pennington, and his Adherents; he drew the Sea-men to his side, and completing his Design, Exauctorated the Captains of the opposite Party, and put in Others in their stead: Soon after which, a good Ship, called the Lyon, Laden with Armes and Ammunition for the King, from Holland, being ignorant of these last Passages, fell in amongst them, which was by Warwick taken, and sent up to the Parliament.

The Parliament now thought fit to Arm, and therefore Resolve, That an Army shall be raised for Defence (as was given out) of King and Parliament, and the Earl of Essex to be Captain-General, and the Earl of Bedford to Command the Horse.

The Earl of Holland, Sir John Holland, and Sir William Stapleton were Ordered to carry a Petition to the King then at Beverly; the Effect whereof was, To pray him to Disband all his Forces, to recall his Commissions of Array, to dismiss his Guards, and return to the Parliament: All which the King refused. The Parliament consider of raising Moneys, and so Declare for Henry upon Public Faith, to promote which the Endeavours of the Ministers were not a little Serviceable unto their self, whereby in a small time a very considerable Mass of Moneys, Plate, and Ammunition was brought in; the King was pretty well furnished with Moneys from the Queen upon his pawned Jewells, and some Contribution from such Lords, and Gentlemen as adhered to his Majesty, besides a liberal Loan from the University of Oxford: From Beverly the King removes to Lincolne, and carelesse the Inhabitants of that County in like manner, as he had done to those of Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire; onely the Earl of Stamford was proclaimed Traitor, for removing the County Magazine from the Town, to his own House at Bradgate, and setting a Guard over it; but shortly after the Parliament (whose Lord-Lieutenant he was for that County) Vindicated him by a publick Declaration.

August the First, the King comes back to Tork-shire. Informs the Gentlemen there of the Parliaments forwardness to a War; desires then to spare him some A. m. i. e. s. and so Compleats Prince Charles his Regiment, for the Guard of his Person, under the Command of the Earl of Cambridge land.

Nor was the Parliament slack in their Business, but Declare for the raising of all their Power and Force against all Traitors which disturbed the State, and the Peace of the Kingdom, the Principall of which were Declared to be the Commissioners of Array, &c. Of the Northern Countie, the Earl of Northampton, the Lord Dunsmore, Lord Willoughby of Erbery, Some of the Earl of Lindsie, Henry Hastings, and others, of the Countie of Lincoln, Nottingham, Leicester, Warwick, Oxfordshire: And for the Western Countie, the Marquis Harford, the Lord Pauli.

And, Paulley, Lord Seymour, Sir John Stowell, Sir Ralph Mynors, and John Blythe, and others in, the County of Somerset; Townshend, in the Parliament to authorize their General Writ, and appoint also their Lieutenants in the several Counties; Writ, The Lordship of Queens, the Bar, of Peiborough of Northampton; Lord Wharton of Bedfordshire; Earl of Sunderland of Northumberland; Earl of Arundel of Wiltshire; Earl of Bedford of Somersetshire; and Thomas of Brook of Warwick; Lord Chamberlain of Dorsetshire; Lord Willoughby of Parham of Lincolnshire; Dumfries of the City and County of Bedford.

The King dealing with their Commanders, as they did with his, and Proclamations, General Orders, with all his Colonels and Officers, which would not instantly lay down Arms, to be Rebels and Traytors : And to Counterplot their Designs of lending some Forces Northward against himself, and others Westward, &c. at Portsmouth, he Commands Colonel Goring, the Governor thereof, to oppose them, and orders William Marquis of Hertford, his Lieutenant-General of his Force, to march into the Countie of Devon, Somerset, Dorset, Wilts, Southampton, Gloucester, Berks, Oxford, Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecknock, Glamorgan, Carmarthen, Pembrokeshire, Cardigan, the Cities of Exeter, Bristol, Gloucester, Oxford, Bath and Wells, The Town and County of Poole, Southampton and Haveringport, and of all the Trained Bands and other Volunteers, to Match against the said Party of Rebels, and his Complements, and themselves, who shall take special care to maintaine the Town of Portsmouth, the Isle of Wight, and Southampton.

¶ Againe the Twelfth, his Majesty publishes his Proclamation, requiring all his Subjects on the Northside of Trent, and twenty Miles Southward, to Appear and Assist him; and to that end, to meet him on the twenty second of that Month; with Armes and Furniture at Nottingham, where, and when he intended to Erect his Standard; and promises to repay what Money and Armes they shall think fit to lend him.

August the Twelfth, the King publishes his Grand Declaration, which will be too tedious to be here repeated: wherein he sets forth his own Greivances, and how ready he is to call this Parliament before the meeting of the Peerie at York; accuses them of Partiality, in expelling divers Members upon an Account of Monopolies; and yet Conning at Sir Henry Mildmay and Mr. Lanfranco Whitaker; then he reckons up his several Acts of Greivance, Viz. His passing a Bill for a Triennial Parliament, putting down Scots Charters, and High-Commission Courts; relinquishing Ship-Money; and the Banquets of Knighthood; and easing the Subjects in Matters of Forest Lands, and regulating the Stannary Courts; and the Clerk of the Market. And lastly, His passing the Act for the Continuance of this Parliament, untill the Peace of England and Scotland, and all their Desires in reference therunto, were provided for: That he Accuseth them for Not supplying his Wants; Making their own private Advantages of Offices, and Places of Profit; Keeping up the Scots Army for their own Ends, Voting down Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, Devying false Reports of Designs, and dangerous Plots against them; Erecting and Countenancing Unlearned and Seditious Lecturers; Their publishing Profanations, Declarations; and Remonstrances; Charging him with all the Mishaps and Misfortunes during his Reign, purposely to render him Odious to his Subjects; Their changing and unsettling the Militia, Encouraging Tumults and Tumultuary Meetings, whereby such Members of either House as disliked the Violence of their Proceedings, were terrified into a Compliance, and himself constrained for his own Security, to remove further off the City: Next he complains of the Business of Holly and Boham, their feising his Goods and Money, their Calumniating him, as intending to levy War, Voting his Actions Illegally, and Issuing out Warrants for the Apprehension of all the Great Officers of State, which referred to him, their feising his Navy, and making the Earl of Warwick Admiral, raising an Army, and making the Earl of Essex General: Making Forage and Poundage without his Consent, and converting the Money destined to the Relief of Ireland, and the discharge of the Kingdomes Debts, to serve their Turn to War against himself, besides the Insolent Speeches of divers Members, Viz. Mr. Pym, Mr. Martin, Sir Henry Ludlow, and others, in the House hitherto unopposed: Next he takes notice of the unworthy Carriage of the Earl of Warwick, who was so ashamed to require a Confirmation of the Letter Office to him for three Lives, at the same time that he complained of as a Monopoly, and without the alteration of any Circumstance for the ease of the Subject, and with so much Greediness and Authority, that whilst it was complained of as a Monopoly, he procured an Assignment to be made of it to him, from the person complained of, after he had by his Interest stopped the Proceedings of the Committee, for five Months before the Assignment made to him, upon pretence that he was concerned in it, and desired to be heard.

Lastly, He justifies his own Proceedings against the Lord Kimbleton, and the five Members, whom together with Mr. Martin, Sibbels, Ludlow, Pennington, and Caprain Pen, he offers to prove Guilty of High-Treason; of which Crime likewise he had especially just Ground of Indictment upon the Statute of this 3d. Ed. 3. against the Earls of Warwick, Essex, and Stamford, Lord Brooke, Sir John Rotham, Major-General Skippin; and these who should therefore have exercised the Militia, by virtue of the Ordinance; And finally That his Quarrel is not against the Parliament, but against the fore-named particular men, and concludes with an Offer of a general Pardon such that shall desire it, the above-mentioned Persons only excepted.

Treason by the Parliament;
Mr. Hunt, Mr.
Nichols, and Mr.
Macworth presented Petitions against the King.

The Parliament had before it a Petition for raising of four hundred thousand pounds, for Relief of A Ireland: And when Money was to be lent them One hundred thousand pounds of it upon the Publick Faith: Whereupon the King remembers them of the Act of Parliament, That no part of that Money should be employed to any other purpose than the reducing of those Rebels; and therefore charges them to retract their Order, which they refuse upon him as a high breach of Privilege; and Accuse his Counsellors of raising the Irish Rebellion: to suppress which they had a Design to raise a Militia of Money, and to send thither five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, under the Lord Straunge, for Relief of Munster, all which they fail, and dash by the Kings with-drawing to the North besides that his Forces Quartering in and about the Common Roads to which had been a great Provision of Arms, Ammunition, and Baggage, had been directed towards Chester for their Service: As likewise, that he had recalled two Ships appointed for the Guard of those Seas by which the Rebels had Opportunity to strengthen themselves, and that they were forced to have the Fortification of Sully to supply the present dificiencies of the Army, which all these Nobility had compelled them to raise for Defence of King and Kingdom: And now of the forwarding of their Forces, the Parliament Order their Deputy-Lieutenants in the Northern Counties, to put in Execution the Ordinance of the Militia, with other particular Advices and Orders; and further they promise the Gentry of the Counties, That what Damage they sustained from the Cavaliers (for so those that Adhere to his Majesty are now generally called by a Title inferiour from dishonourable, however intended) by Plundering and Pillaging, shall be fully repaid out of the Estates of those persons who shall persist in this for the King against the Parliament.

It was the twenty second, the King comes to Nottingham, and there Erects his Standard, to which some Numbers resort, but far short of what he expected, so three Dayes afterward he sends a Message to the Parliament, to propose a Treaty, the Messengers were the Earls of Santamper and Dorset, Sir John Culpeper, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir William Udall; none of which were suffered to enter the House, for to deliver their Errand, wherefore it was sent in by the Utter of the Black Rod, to which the Parliament made this Answer:

“That until his Majesty shall recall his Proclamations and Declarations of Treason against the Earl of Essex, and them; and their Adherents; And unless the Kings Standard be set up in pursuance thereof, be taken down, they cannot by the Fundamental Privileges of Parliament, give his Majesty another Answer.”

The King Replies, That he never intended to Declare the Parliament Traitors, or set up his Standard against them; but if they shall resolve to Treat, either Party shall revoke their Declarations against all Persons as Traitors, and the same day to take down his Standard.

To this they Answer, That the Differences could not any wayes be concluded, unless he would forfake his evil Counsellors, and return to his Parliament. And accordingly September the Sixth, they Order and Declare, That the Armes which they have, or shall take up for the Parliament, Religion, Laws, and Liberties of the Kingdom, shall not be layd down, untill the King with-draw his Protection from such Persons as are and shall be Voted Delinquents, and shall leave them to Justice, to the end, that their Estates may discharge the Debts and Loan-money of the Commonwealth.

The War being now begun, the new-raised Souldiers began to commit sundry Out-rages upon the Country-people, which both King and Parliament, upon Complaint, laboured to rectifie, Sir Thomas Barrington and Mr. Grimston being sent down into Essex by the Parliament; upon that business, seized Sir John Lucas and his Lady at Gloucester, and committed them to the Jail, and soon after, Lucas is proclaimed Traitor by the Parliament, and brought up to London, and Committed to the Gatehouse; in Essex one Mr. Newcombe was likewise Imprisoned, both of them to be brought to a speedy Trial: The Parliament had formerly Voted, That Money should be borrowed upon the Publick Faith; but because the People might look for some Assurance for the re-payment of such Loans, they now Declared, That all such persons as shall Assist them by Moneys, or othe-wise, at their own Charges, shall receive satisfaction out of the Estates of those men which are, or shall be Voted Delinquents; of whom James Lord Straunge, Son and Heir to the Earl of Derby, was not the least, who was Impeached of High-Treason by the Parliament, for summoning the Lancashire men on the fifteen day of July last past, to Manchester, to Support and Aye the King against the Parliament, and for raising of Forces, by some of whom, one Richard Percival, a Linnen Webster, was killed. The King at Shrewsbury, by Advice of Judge Hewitt, Adjourned Richard Mansel Term, and hearing of the Proceedings against the Lord Straunge at Bridgenorth, he proclaims Thomas Nicholls, Humphrey Macworth, and Thomas Hunt, Esquires, (notable Sticklers for the Parliament) to be Traitors.

The Parliament hearing of the preparation made in Holland for the Kings supply, sent over Mr.
Strickland with a Declaration.

September 29. The Lord Fairfax for the Parliament, and Mr. Bellasis for the King, had concluded Articles of Neutrality for Yorkshire, at which the Parliament take Exceptions, Declared October 16. the Lord Fairfax and his Party not bound to observe the Articles, but to Assist the Parliament in Defence of the Common Cause.

The Queen was very Active in Holland to promote her Husbands Affairs, and by her Interest with the Prince of Orange, and the Industry of the Lord Digby, had procured from the States of the United Provinces, some Experienced Officers, with Arms and Ammunition, to be sent over to the Kings Army; which coming to the Parliaments knowledge, they presently send over Mr.
Walter Strickland, a Member of the House of Commons, their Residentiary there to present them in their Names, with this ensuing Declaration:

WE the Lords and Commons in Parliament Assembled, taking into serious Consideration, the Means of Composing the great Distempers and Combustions begun in this Kingdome, which threaten the Destruction and Ruine, and of all other Protestant Princes and States, have thought good to make this Declaration to the high and mighty Lords, the States of the United Provinces; That we understand, by a Letter of the Lord Digby, a Person fled out of this Kingdome for High-Treason: That as he often endeavoured by his wicked and malicious Councils to make Division between his Majesty and the Parliament, and hath been in great part the Cause of that miserable and unnatural War, which is made against us by his Majesty, so he hath laboured by all means in the United Provinces to provide Arms, Powder, and Ammunition, for the Fomenting of that War, and making it more dangerous to the Kingdome; and for this purpose did Address himself to the Prince of Orange, by whose Countenance and Help (as we are informed by the Lord Digby's Letters) he hath made Provision for great quantities of Ordnance, Powder, Arms, and divers other sorts of Warlike Provision.

And we are further informed by credible Advertisement, That the Prince of Orange in Favour of the Lord Digby, and those other wicked Councillors, and Incendiaries, who being joyned together in these mischievous Practices against the Peace of this Kingdome, hath not only Licensed (but the better to encourage divers Commanders, experienced Officers and Souldiers, to resort into this Kingdome, in Ayde of them against the Parliament) hath promised to reserve their Places for them in their Absence, and doth cause other Provision of the same kind to be made, and prepared to be sent over for their Supply, to the great hurt of this Kingdome, and the danger of the interrupting the most necessary, profitable, and long continued Amity between the two States.

We further desire to let them know, That we cannot believe that this is done by any Authority or Direction from their Lordships, considering the great help that they have received from this Kingdome, when heretofore they lay under the heavy Oppression of their Princes; and how conducible the Friendship of this Nation, (concurring with the Wisdom, Valour, and Industry of their own people) hath been to the present Greatness and Power which they now enjoy: Neither can we think, that they will be forward to help to make us Slaves, who have been useful and assistant in making them Free-men. Or that they will forget that our Troubles and Dangers issue from the same Fountain with their Own: And that those who are set awork to undermine Religion, and Liberty in the Kingdome, are the same, which by open force did seek to bereave them of both. It cannot be unknown to that wise State, That it is the Jealous Faction here, that hath corrupted the Councils of our King, the Conscience of a great part of our Clergy, which have plotted so many michievous Designs to destroy the Parliament, and still endeavour to divide Ireland from this Kingdome, by a most wicked and cruell Rebellion there, and to divide the King from the Parliament here, and by false Slanders and Imputations of things never done, nor intended by us, hath incensed his Majesty, so as that after many bitter Invectives published against us, without any just Cause given;
He hath now at last resolved to set up his Royal Standard, and to draw his Sword for the Destruction of his most faithful and obedient People, whom by the Laws and Constitutions of this Kingdome, he is bound to preserve and protect. The Cases

Cafes and Fortunes of both Estates being so Involved and United, we cannot expect to be hindered by them in our Just Defence: Or that they will do any thing to aggravate the Miseries and Troubles of this Kingdome, in the Peace and Happiness whereof they have found much Advantage, and by such unfriendly and unseasonable Supplies of our common Enemies, make way to their own as well as our Ruine.

We therefore desire they may betimes look into this Mischief, and having searched it into the bottom, to stop the further progress of it: That they will not suffer more Ordnance, Armour, or any other Warlike Provision to be brought over to strengthen those, who as soon as they shall prevail against the Parliament (according to their Principles and Interests by which they are guided) will use that strength to the ruine of those, from whom they have had it. We desire they would not send over any Country-men to further our Destruction, who were sent to them for their Preservation: That they will not anticipate the spilling of English Blood in an unnatural Civil War, which hath been so cheerfully, and plentifully hazarded and spent, in that Just and Honourable War, by which they have been so long preserved, and to which the Blood of those persons, and many other Subjects of this Kingdome, is still in a manner Dedicated; but rather that they would cashier and discharge from their Employment those that will presume to come over for that purpose: And in satisfying these our reasonable and necessary Desires, they shall thereby not only secure us; but themselves, yea, they shall most of all advantage his Majesty, for whose Service those things are pretended to be done. The Question between his Majesty and the Parliament, is not, Whether he shall enjoy the same Prerogative and Power which hath belonged to our former Kings, his Majesties Royall Predecessors; but, Whether that Prerogative and Power should be employed for our Defence, or to our Ruine? We expect nothing from him but Security, and protection from those mischievous Designs, which have been so often multiplied and renewed against us, though hitherto (through Gods Providence) as often frustrated. It cannot be denied by those, who look indifferently into our Proceedings and Affairs, but that it will be more Honour, and Wealth, Safety and Greatness to his Majesty, in concurring with his Parliament, then in the course in which he now is: but so unhappy hath his Majesty been in those who have the greatest influence upon his Councils, that they look more upon the prevailing of their own party, then upon any those great Advantages both to his Crown, and Royal Person, which he might obtain by joyning with his People: And so cunning are those Factors for Popery, in prosecution of their own Aymes, that they can put on a counterfeit Visage of Honour, Peace, and Greatness, upon those Courses and Counsels which have no truth and reality: but of Weakness, Dishonour, and Miseries to his Majesty and whole Kingdome. We have lately expressed our earnest Inclinations to that Nationall Love and Amity with the United Provinces, which is nourished and confirmed by so many Civill Respects, and Mutual Interests, as makes it so naturall to us, that we have, this Parliament, in our humble Petition to his Majesty, desired we might be joyned with that State, in a more near and strict League and Union: And we cannot but expect some Returns from them of the like Expressions; and that they will be so far from blowing the Fire which begins to kindle amongst us, that they will rather endeavour to quench it by strengthening and encouraging us, who have no other Design, but to preserve our Religion, save our selves, and the other Reformed Churches of Christendome, from the Massacres and Extirpations, with which the Principles of the Popish Religion, do threaten us and them, which are begun to be Acted in Ireland, and in the Hopes, Endeavours, and Intentions of that Party, had long since been Executed upon us, if the Mercy, Blessing, and Favour of Almighty God had not superabounded, and prevented the Subtlety and Malignity of Cruell, Wicked, and Blood-thirsty men. A notable subtle and well-penn'd Declaration, and carrying in it a very fair appearance of Loyalty and Sincerity.

And now we enter upon Military Effects, the King himself is Generalissimo over his Own, his Captain Generall was first the Marquess of Herford, and afterward the Earl of Lindsey: and the Earl of Essex of the Parliamentarians.

The

The King returning to York, divers of his Forces were Quartered to near Hull, that it seemed as if they had some Design upon the Town: Upon this, Sir John Hotham (who perform'd the first Act of Hostility against his Majesty, and how he was rewarded by the Parliament that employ'd him, will hereafter appear) and his Assailant Sir John Meldrum, with a small Party, made a suddain Ensignion; and thence surprizing them, forced them to shift for themselves, killed some, took others, and so returned Victors: and shortly after receiving a Supply to the number of Five hundred from London, sallied out again upon the Royall Party, whom they compelled to a disorderly Retreat, killed twenty, seized their Colours, and seventeen Muskets, with some fifteen Prisoners, and burnt the Barn where some Arms and Ammunition was laid up for the King.

In these Encounters was the first Blood drawn: August the Fourth, the King had summoned all his Subjects North of Trent, to a Generall Rendezvous, from whence he marches to Nottingham, where, as we said, he set up his standards, thence Marched to Leicester, then to Leicester, to towards Wales, and settles at Shrewsbury, where his Army encamped into a considerable Body.

The Parliaments Forces formed at London, Rendezvous at St. Albans, and march Northward to meet the King, carrying with them a Petition of the two Houses, who prescribed these Directions to their Generall.

First, To restrain all Prophaneess in his Army.

Secondly, To March and Fight like Kings Army; and, by Butech, or otherwise, to rescue his Majesties Person, the Prince, and Duke of York, out of the hands of those about him.

Thirdly, To take his Opportunity in some Honourable way to cause the Petition of Parliament to be presented to his Majesty; who if he be pleased to withdraw himself from his Forces, and to resort to his Parliament, he was then to cause those Forces to Disband, and to serve and defend the King with sufficient Strength in his Return.

Fourthly, To Declare, That if any will (within ten dayes after publication) withdraw from assisting the King, and return to the Parliament, they shall have their Pardon, Except Delinquents already Voted, or to be Voted, or Impeached: Or who stand Impeached of High-Treason, or have been Eminent, or Acting against the Parliament. And except the Duke of Richmond, the Earls of Cumberland, New-Castle, Rivers, and Carnarvan; Viscounts Newark and Falkland, Principall Secretary to the King, Secretary Nichols, Mr. Edmund Porter, and Mr. Edward Hyde.

Fifthly, To receive Loans, or Contribution of Money, Plate, or Horses for the Support of the Army, certifying the Sums of Money, weight of Plate, value of Horses, that the parties may thereby be repaid upon Publick Faith.

Sixthly, To protect the Good people from Violence of the Cavaliers, and to restore to them their Losses.

Seventhly, To apprehend all persons Impeached as Traytors, and other Delinquents, and secure them to the Parliament.

Eighthly, To observe such further Directions as he shall receive from the Parliament.

Besides these Directions, he had a Committee, any Four of whom, whereof himself to be One, were Impowred to Consult of things concerning the good of the Army, to punish, or discharge Malignants, and to take Subscriptions of Money, Plate, or Provisions; to be repaid at Eight per Cent. by Publick Faith.

Colonel Goring held Portsmouth for the King, which the County-Bands intended to Surprize, but he having timely notice by the way, Skimmed, and retired: But the Parliament Espousing the Quarrell, and the Assailants having good Correspondents in the Town, Sir John Mericks Regiment, and a Troop of Horse were sent to their Assistance, who began the Siege, and with some other Helps so frightened Goring, that although Marquis Harford hastned to his Relief, yet he was necessitated to Surrender the Town, and take Ship for Holland: However, Marquis Harford seized Sherburn Castle, and giving the Earl of Bedford a Brush by the way, marched over Stradown towards Shrewsbury, where the King then Resided.

Sir John Byron had raised some Troops for the King in Oxford, but was unexpectedly set upon at Brackley in his March towards Oxford, by sundry Troops of the Parliamentarians, and the Townsmen of Brackley, by whom he was forced to retreat to the Heath with some loss, yet on he comes to Oxford, and after a small time of carrying, he marches to Worcester with Five hundred Horse, and takes the Town, and the next News we hear of him, is an Encounter with Colonel Nathaniel Fines.

Sir John Byron takes Worcester for the King.

About

1642.

Prince Robert, and Prince Maurice arrive in England.

The Earl of Essex marches out of London to his Army.

The Parliament presents Petition to the King by the Earl of Essex.

About the beginning of September Arrived in England the two Princes, Palatines, Rupert, and Maurice, who were presently entertained, and put into Command by the King their Uncle.

The King had now gotten together a Potent Army to whom between Stafford and Whitchurch, after a short Speech, he made a Solemn Protestation of his Candid Intentions, and sincere meaning to defend the Protest in Religion, the Laws, and Liberties of the Subjects, and Privileges of Parliament, according to his former Protestation at York.

Ten dayes before this, viz. September the Ninth, the Earl of Essex in great Pomp, attended on by the Parliament, set forth out of London towards St. Albans, and from thence to Northampton, where all his Forces met, amounting to the number of Fourteen thousand, having with him the Parliament's Petition, which he was to present to the King, the Effect whereof was:

That his Loyall Subjects, the Lords and Commons in Parliament, cannot without tenderness of Compassion behold the pressing Calamities of England and Ireland, by the Practises of a prevailing Party with his Majesty, to alter true Religion, and the ancient Government of this Kingdome, introducing Superstition into the Churches, and Confusion in the State; Exciting, Encouraging, and Fostering the Rebellion in Ireland: and as there, so here begin the like Massacres, by drawing on a War against the Parliament, leading his Person against them, as if by Conquest to establish an unlimited Power over the People, seeking to bring over the Rebels of Ireland to join with them: And all these Evil Counsellors are Defended and Protected against the Justice of Parliament; Who have for their just Defence of Religion, the King, Crown, and Dignity of the Lawes, Liberties, and Power of Parliament, taken up Arms, and Authorized the Earl of Essex to be their Captain-Generall against these Rebels and Traitors. And pray the King to withdraw his Person, and leave them to be Supprest by his Power, and to return to his Parliament, and that they will receive him with Honour, and yield him Obedience, secure his Person, and Establish Him, and his People, with all the Blessings of a Glorious and Happy REIGNE.

Which he refused to accept.

The King Marcheth from Shrewsbury towards London.

The Parliament order the Lands of the Bishops, &c. to be sequestered.

Colonel Sands routed at Worcester by Prince Rupert.

The Kings Forces quit that City upon the approach of the Earl of Essex.

This Petition was never delivered, notwithstanding that Generall Essex twice sent to the King, for a safe Conduct for those who should be employed therein; for the King refused to receive any Address by those whom he had accused of High-Treason, of whom the Earl of Essex was one. The King having Cursed the Inhabitants of Denbighshire, Flintshire, and Shrewsbury, furnished himself with money by melting in his new Erected Mint, such Plate as many of the Nobles and Gentlemen brought in plentifully; takes his March towards London; whereof the Parliament being informed, Order the Trained Bands of their Sociate Counties, of Essex, Hartford, Middlesex, and London, to Rendezvous, and be ready at an Hours Warning, and Fortifie all the Passages about the City with Posts, Chains, and Courts of Guard. And for further Security they Vote, That such as will not Contribute, shall be Secured and Disarmed: in which Business, the Mayor of London now Elect (instead of Sir Richard Gurney Ejected) was employed. And further, That the Fines, Rents, and Profits, of Archbishops, Bishops, Deans and Chapters, and other Delinquents, shall be Sequestered for the Service of the Common-wealth: And that all the Kings Revenue, arising out of Rents, Fines, and Courts, or Composition for Wards, be Sequestered for the State: And a Committee for Sequestration appointed.

Sir John Byron had taken Worcester; to dislodge whom, Colonel Nathaniel Fines, and Colonel Sandys Marched with a Brigade of Horse, and some Volunteers of Foot of the County, raised by the Lord Say, and Assailed the Town on the West-side of Severn, supposing that Essex had been at hand to fall upon the other side, as he was mis-informed by a Spy; but too late repented his mistake, when instead of Essex, comes Prince Rupert, whose Horse rushed upon the Parliamentarians in an incommensurable narrow Lane, where neither the Rear could come up, nor the Van retreat, so that all were slain, or routed, and Colonel Sandys with some others were taken Prisoners. But Generall Essex coming on with his Army, after he had Garrisoned Northampton, Coventry, and Warwick: Rupert and Byron were glad to quit the Town to him, who from thence sent out the Earl of Stamford with a Party to Hereford, to hinder the Forces of South-Wales from joining with with the King; from Hereford the Earl of Stamford with his Regiment of Foot, and two Troops of Horse, removes to Gloucester, entering the City as Governour: but not long after being called away into the West, Massey his Lieutenant-Colonel is left behind as Deputy at first, but afterwards hath the sole Government conferred upon him: Colonel Thomas Essex is commanded to Bristol, which he Garrisons, and after the Generals departure, is made Governour of Worcester; two more Regiments and ten Troops are sent to Kidderminster and Bendish, to join with the Lord Wharton and Sir Henry Cholmleys Regiments; and at Coventry and Warwick, lay the Lord Peterborough, Sir William Constable, and Colonel Brown, with their Forces, all to oppose the Cavaliers marching to London; and at Targuonish was seized a Ship coming from Holland for the Kings Service, with an hundred and forty Souldiers, and three hundred Barrels of Powder. But in Yorkshire the Kings Party grew potent, being headed by the Earl of Cumberland, Sir Francis Wortley, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir John Kay, Mr. Francis Nezil, and Sir Thomas Glenham, who forced Captain Hotham to forsake the Country, and retreat to Hull. In Cornwall near Pendennis, Sir Nicholas Slanning the Governour, Sir Bevil Grenville, and others of the Gentry, had gathered together a considerable Body of an Army, wherewith they possessed themselves of Lancelston, and with their General Sir Ralph Hopton performed divers Exploits against the contrary Party, who held Plymouth, and some few other adjoining Places for the Parliament.

In Wales the Earl of Worcester bestirred himself notably for the King, and drew a great Number of Welshmen to side with him, inasmuch, that seeing his Army encreased, he resolved to march towards London, and was gotten one dayes Journey before Essex, who perceiving his intent of staying so long at Worcester, hastens after him to the Relief of his Matters. The King disdaining to be pursued by a Subject, turns back to meet him, and October the Twenty third, both Cavaliers and Effemins drew into the Field, between Keinton and Edgehill in Warwickshire, the Cavaliers had gained the Top of the Hill, from whence the King took a view of the Parliaments Army, by whom he was saluted with three Pieces of Cannon, which was answered with two Shot of theirs, and the Fight Commenced about two of the Clock in the Afternoon; both Generalls performing their parts with great Courage, and Gallantry: The Earl of Lindsey now Generall for the King, led on his Forces with a Pike in his hand, and so did Essex; but was afterwards advised to retire from that Danger, as more becoming a private Souldier; then a Generall; the greatest Body of the Kings Horse was on the right Wing, Commanded by Prince Rupert, who furiously charged the left Wing of the others Commanded by Colonel Ramsey, Commissary Generall, whom he Routed and pursued to Keinton Town, and further, making great Slaughter all along; but the left Wing consisting of Horse and Dragoons, had not the same Success, being over-powered by the Right Wing of the Parliamentarians, which was Commanded by Sir William Balfore. Sir Philip Stapleton, the Lord Fielding, and Colonel Hurry: General Lindsey who Commanded the main Body, being too far engaged in the Fight, was taken Prisoner, and died presently after of the Wounds which he received in the Battell, and with him was taken the Lord Willoughby of Eresby; and Sir Edmund Verney Knight Marshall, and Standard-Bearer was killed, and the Standard taken, but instantly rescued by Mr. John Smith, who for that Service was Dubbed Knight and Baronet in the Field, and made Standard-Bearer: Night parted the Fray, and both Armies Retreat, each accounting themselves Victors; on both Sides were lost between Five and six thousand men: The most remarkable on the Kings Side, being the Earl of Lindsey, and Sir Edmund Verney; On the Parliaments, Colonel Thomas Essex, who was come to the Fight from his Government at Worcester, and Lieutenant Colonel Ramsey, and the Lord John, of Blaiso was taken Prisoner, and soon after died: The left Wing of Horse on both sides was Routed, and the Foot being left to themselves, were fain to shift for their Lives the best they could: Next day both the Parties quit the Field, the King marches towards Ayno, and Essex towards Coventry. From Coventry, October the Twenty seventh, the King sends a Proclamation of Pardon to the Cities of London and Westminster, wherein Alderman Fulk, and Manners were excepted: The Battell of Edge-Hill was fought on Sunday the same day Twelve-month that the Irish Rebellion brake out.

Banbury stood yet out against the King, which he now resolves to fall upon, but both Town and Castle Surrendered without any Blows, and the two Regiments of Foot, and a Troop of Horse then in the Siege, took Arms under him: So the King brings his Army to Oxford, whence Prince Rupert marches against the Lord Say's House at Broughton, and takes it, and with a flying Party makes Excursions to near London, that the Parliament thought good to desire their General Essex to bring his Army nearer the City, for their Safeguard, who accordingly Obeys, and comes to Westminster November the seventh, where he is honourably entertained by the Parliament, and presented with a Gratuity of Five thousand Pounds, and a Declaration set out concerning this late Victory, and acceptable Service in that Bloody Battell at Edge-hill. The Recusants of Lancashire judged this a reasonable time to Requiton the King, to take them into his Protection, and to suffer them to have and bear Arms in his and their own defence; which was granted: Whereby he incurred this Censure, from such as were forward to censure all his Actions, That he favoured Papists, and entertained them in his Army. The Parliament to recruit their Army, declare, That all Apprentices that will Lift themselves in their Service for the publick Cause, shall be secured from Indemnity of their Masters during their Service, and their time included, to go on towards their Freedom, and all their respective Masters are to receive them again when they shall return. By which means, an infinite number of Apprentices were induced to Lift themselves in the Army: C c c

And now they declare to the Scots, That the King was so addicted to the Prelatical Party, and the Papists, that unless they joined their helping hand, the Protestant Religion was in danger here of being subverted; that he had a Design of bringing in Forrainers into the North, which were to join with a party of Papists there while himself conducted the Prelatical Army, wherefore they desired them to take care for the securing of their Borders, and to assist here against the Popish and Forrainer Forces.

The King hears of this, and by a Letter to the Lords of his Privy-Council in Scotland, endeavors to turn the Scales, but in vain.

The Parliament had Voted an Address to the King, and desired a safe Conduct for these persons to present their Petition, Algernon Earl of Northumberland, Philip Earl of Pembroke, and Adonig-mery, and four Members of the Commons, Mr. Perpoint, the Lord Waiman, Sir John Evelyn of Wilts, and Sir John Hippistie, all which were admitted by the King, excepting onely Sir John Evelyn, who had been proclaimed Traytor at Oxford; which exception so irritated the Houses, that they voted it to be a refusal of a Treaty and Ordered a Committee to acquaint the City Common-Hall therewith; but this heat being somewhat allayed, the King at Colbrook, November the eleventh, receives the Parliaments Petition from the rest of the Delegates without Sir John Evelyn, which was in effect, to desire him to appoint some convenient place, not far from London, for his Residence, untill Committees of Parliament may attend him with some Propositions for removal of these Distempers: To which he answered; He would expect them at his Castle of Windsor, and desires them to hasten the Treaty.

The Delegates were scarcely departed, when Intelligence was brought to the King, that the Earl of Essex had drawn his Forces, with his Ordnance, out of London towards him; and that unless he gained Brainford, he would be hemmed in by the Parliaments Forces, who possessed most of the Towns round about him, whereupon he advanced thither the same night. In the Town were quartered part of Colonel Hollis's Regiment, who taking the Alarm, made bold Resistance, and defended themselves till the Lord Brookes Regiment, and Colonel Hamdens came in to their Rescue, and maintained the Fight against the Kings Forces, till night drew on, and then being overpowered by Numbers, retreated out of the Town, which the King presently took possession of, together with some Prisoners, Arms, and Ammunition, eleven Colours, and fifteen pieces of Ordnance. This was acted, November the thirteenth, but General Essex hearing of this Fight, with all speed makes towards Brainford, whither followed the City Militia, and Trained-Bands, which together made a formidable Army; inso much, that the King thought it his best way to march back again (taking Kingston in his way, then newly quieted by the Parliaments Forces,) from thence to Ox-lands, Reding, and so to Oxford. This Action of the Kings, in a time of Treaty, (though it appears not to have been without sufficient ground) was so ill relented of the Houses, that they thereupon Voted, To have no accommodation; Yet upon the Kings Message to them, That he intended to march at such a distance from London, that should take away all pretence of misapprehension from his Army, which might hinder them from preparing their Propositions, they again petition him to desert his Army, and return to his Parliament; and this with the same success as formerly: In the mean time, a Letter from one of the Kings Agents in Holland, to Secretary Nichols, is intercepted, making mention of considerable Forces and Ammunition ready to be sent over for the Kings Service. From Denmark are likewise sent Arms for ten thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, with a Train of Artillery, and every thing proportionable, to the very Drums and Halberts, two good Men of War come their Convoy, and in them an Ambassador to his Majesty, a person of great quality from Denmark, Cockram comes along with him.

In Yorkshire the Earl of Newcastle had raised great Forces for the King, with which he edgesto York, and joyns with the Earl of Cumberland, making up a Body of eight thousand Horse and Foot, whereof above two thousand were Horse-Dragoons. The Lord Fairfax was the most considerable man that stood up for the Parliament in those parts, between whom, and the Earl of Newcastle was a sharp Encounter at Tadcaster, from eleven of the clock, till four in the Evening, wherein the Lord Fairfax being overmatched, and not able to stand a second Encounter, the next day quitted the Town, and marched away to Selby for Recruits; from whence he sends out his Son Sir Thomas with five Companies and two Troops to Leeds, whom the Royalists force back again, and how the whole strength of the Parliament in the North is reckoned to be but one and twenty Companies of Foot, and five Troops of Horse, and one Company of Dragoon, too weak to resist the Earl of Newcastle, whose Forces now we find to be about Halifax, and the cloathing Towns, and Masters of the Field.

The Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Hertford, Cambridge, the Isle of Ely, and the City of Norwich, are Authorised by the Parliament to associate, under the Command of the Lord Grey of Wark, as Major-General; and Winchester and Chester are gained by the Parliament.

December the fifteenth, Lands Colonel Goring, with the Queens Standard, fourscore old Commanders, and store of Warlike Provision, to joyn with Newcastle. About this time the City petitioned the King, and profess their grief for his default of their Loyalty; with large Protestations of their zealous Intentions to defend him; with all that Love and Duty which became good Subjects.

The King replies, That he hath a good Opinion of many of them, and could freely and willingly pardon all except Pennington the present Mayor, and Verme-Poulke, and Manwaring; and concludes with the declaring of his high displeasure against such as shall continue acting and assisting his Adversaries. Many of them were startled with this Answer, yet take heart again, being revived with what Mr. Pym and the Parliament Committee told their Common-Council, of the Parliaments great love and Affection to them, and Resolution to live and dye in their Defence. In the North the Parliamentarians grow bold again, Sir Hugh Cholmley encounters with several parties of the Cavalry at Malton; and January the sixteenth, joyning with Sir Matthew Boynton, fell upon a party of six hundred Horse and Foot at Guburrough, commanded by Col. Slingsby, and put them to the Rout. Sir Thomas Fairfax had failed of his first Design against Leeds, but the second time he carries it with little loss, wherein he took four Colours, and five hundred prisoners, (six of which Commanders) with many Arms and much Ammunition: after which, the Kings Forces relinquish Wakefield, and Doncaster, which are forthwith invested for the Parliament. The Earl of Newcastle draws down his Forces to York, to prepare for the Queens entertainment; and January the Seventeenth proclaims the Lord Fairfax, and his Son Sir Thomas, and others Traytors, as the Earl of Cumberland had done the first of December last; which the Parliament resenting, do as much against the Earl. Some De-fires of the Parliament had been presented to the King at Oxford February the first, by the Earles of Northumberland, Salisbury, Pembroke, and Holland, with Eight of the Commons, Viz.

The Parliaments Propositions to the King.

To disband his Army, and to return home to his Parliament; to leave Delinquents to Cry, and Papists to be disarmed.

To pass a Bill for abolishing of Church-Governours, and Government, and such other Bills, as shall be devised for a New Reformation, Recusants to abjure Papacie, to remove Malignant Councillors, to settle the Militia as the Parliament please, to prefer to the great Offices, and places of Judicature, such of the Parliament as they shall name, and to take in all such as have been put out of the Commissions of Peace.

To pass a Bill to vindicate the Lord Kimbolton, and the Five Members; to enter Alliance with his Protestant Neighbours, for recovery of the Palatinate; to grant a Generall Pardon, with Exception of the Earl of Newcastle, the Lord Digby, and some others.

To restore such of the Parliaments Members as have been displaced, to their Offices and places, and to satisfy for their Losses.

The King on the other side proposed,

That his own Revenue, Magazines, Towns, Ships, and Forts, be restored.

That which hath been done contrary to Law, and the Kings Rights, may be renounced and recalled.

That all illegal power claimed or acted by Orders of Parliament, be disclaimed; as the King will readily consent to the Execution of all Laws made or to be made, concerning Popery and Reformation; so he desires a Bill for preserving the Books of Common-Prayer against Sectaries; And that all persons excepted against in the Treaty, may be tried per pares; That there be cessation of Arms, and a free Trade.

The Cessation of Arms was thus limited.

That all Arms, Victuals, Money, Bullion, and all Commodities, passing without safe Conduct, may be seized on either side, and their persons so passing; That the Kings Forces in Oxfordshire shall advance no nearer Windsor, than Wheatly; and in Buckinghamshire no nearer to Alisbury than Brill; and in Berkshire either Forces to continue as they are; The Parliaments Forces in Oxfordshire, to advance no nearer to Oxford, than Henley; Those in Buckinghamshire no nearer than Alisbury; That the Kings Forces shall take no new Quarters, no nearer then twelve miles from Oxford any way, nor the Parliament twelve miles from Windsor, where the Parliaments Army lay; That no Siege shall be against Gloucester, but the Kings Forces to return, and that the Parliaments Forces remain as they are in Gloucestershire.

The Cessation of Arms how limited.

Thus way was made for a Treaty, but no more done in it for the present, till the Fourth of March, when it was revived by the Advice of Sir Benjamin Rudyerd, a Member of the House of Commons; who in his Speech told the Parliament plainly, That the War would soon ruine all. So the Parliament appoint for their Commissioners, the Earl of Northumberland, Mr. Perpoint, Sir William Ermine, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Whitlock, to attend the King at Oxford.

Holland, from whence the Earl of Montrose, and the Lord Ogleby, with two Troops of Horse, conveyed her to York, where all things are prepared for her Honourable Reception, by the Earls of Cumberland and Newcastle; and there she begins first to form her Army.

Gloucestershire now began to be the Scene of the Action, where Captain Bridges kept Sully Castle for the Lord Chandos with sixty Soldiers, and all other things sufficient; against him Lieutenant Colonel Massey advances, and offers to storm the Castle, but is repulsed: next day some Horse and Dragoons possessed the Garden under the Castle, and fired the Hay and Straw, and smothered the Houles; by opportunity whereof, they had the advantage to bring up and plant their Ordnance in such a convenient place, as necessitated the Besieged to surrender upon quarter, leaving their Arms behind them, and to engage for payment of five hundred pounds, in six days, for the Goods in the Castle, or lose them; yet could not the Parliament boast of this Victory, for within a few days space comes Prince Rupert, with four thousand Horse and Foot, making them, as if he meant to regain it, but marches by to Cirencester, where the strength of the County, and a great part of the Magazine lay, and on the first of February masters the Guard, and forces his passage into the Town, which in two hours he gained, taking Eleven hundred Prisoners, and Three thousand Arms: And the next day Summons Gloucester; which Massey resolves to hold out, and to strengthen it the better, defects Sully and the other outward Garrisons.

The Welsh Army near 1500 raised by the Earl of Worcester and his Son the Lord Herbert, marched forward for the King, to the Forrest of Dean, and beat Colonel Boroughs Regiment out of Cardiff, a small Town near Monmouth, and come on to Hingham, two miles off from Gloucester, where they intrench, and their Major General Brett demands the Town, and is answered with Scorn, so that they stay and spend five Weeks, and at last march off without any memorable Action performed; for Massey, assisted by Captain John Fines from Bristol, with Two hundred Horse and Dragoons weakened them with continual Skirmishes, till Sir William Waller having taken Admabury, came to Gloucester and joyned his Forces with the other: Massey then draws out all his Horse with Five hundred Foot, and some Ordnance, and held them in play for the first day, next morning Alauns them with the Great Guns, and then both sides encounter fiercely, and the Welsh were likely to have Routed the others, and seize their Ordnance, at which instant Waller comes up and Charges them, to the great comfort of his almost defeated Friends, who taking courage joyntly, run upon their Enemies, and drive them back into the Houles, which they begin to batter with their Cannon: Whereupon the Welsh found a Parly, and conclude to render the place and themselves prisoners, but the Officers were to receive quarters according to their Qualities, and so the next day Waller and Massey lead their Booty in Triumph to Gloucester.

The Parliament had formerly desired the Assistance of the Scots, which they for their own advantage, notwithstanding their late Protestations not to take Arms against their Prince, quickly hearkened to; and now having compleated their Army, March the thirteenth, they cross the Tine and march Southward to find Work for the Earl of New-Castle.

The Pope, a more unlucky Fisher than he whose Successour he pretends himself, makes choice of troubled Waters, Irelands lakes and loughes must be the places of his Games: the Rebels there notwithstanding their Defeats at Treilagh and Dondalk, were much increased in numbers, and many who were hitherto at the beginning, now publicly declared for them, inasmuch, that all parts of the Land were overwhelmed as with an inundation, and it was high time now for this ghostly Father to cast in his Baits, which he doth by two Letters, the one subscribed to Owen O Neale, and the other to all Archbishops, Bishops, Nobles and People of the Kingdom of Ireland, in both which he commendeth those who had already appeared in the quarrell, and exhorts others to the same undertaking, declares his Joy for their late Actions, and bestowes upon them all his Fatherly Benediction, and a Plenary absolution. And so ends this Year, unfortunate to the German Emperor, whose Forces receiv'd several Discomfures from the Swedes and French; Lamboy one of the Imperial Generals is defeated about Bohemia by the French Count Guibrian, and is carried prisoner to Bois de Vincennes in France, to keep company with John de Werdt, formerly taken. Also Arch-Duke Leopold and Piccolomini were overthrown at Leipsick by the Swedish General Torstenson: But somewhat to recompence that loss, Piccolomini relieved Friberg, which was streightly besieged by the Swedes. And not long before, he had succoured Woblenbottell beleaguer'd by the Duke of Brunswick and the Protestant Forces. And in France this year was rendered notable by the death of the great Cardinal Richieu the Famous Bouteferre and disturber of Europe, and particularly of these Nations, of whose distractions he was both a principal cause and fomentor; he was the Harbinger, and led the way to his Master Lewis the Thirteenth, who deceased soon after in the midst of his Catalonian Conquests, leaving for his Successor his eldest Son Lewis the fourteenth under the Queen Dowagers Government, and Cardinal Mazarini in Richieu's stead.

His Majesties Nineteenth Year being the year 1643. begins with a Treaty of Peace which had been formerly agreed upon, but proceeded slackly, till revived at Sir Benjamin Rudyards persuasion. At Oxford the Delegates of both Parties met, and began to treat of the Kings Propositions concerning his Revenue, Magazines, Forts, and Ships, and the Parliaments Propositions concerning the Disbanding of Armies; which Points taking up longer time than was Expected by the King, He sends this Message to the Parliament, April 12.

That as soon as he was satisfied in his first Proposition concerning his own Revenue, Magazines, Ships, and Forces, in which he desired nothing but his Just Legal and known Rights to be restored to him, and to persons trusted by him; and as soon as the Members of both Houses should be restored unto the same capacity of Sitting and Voting in Parliament, as they had upon the first of January, 1641. (exclusively of such whose Votes had been taken away by Bill, or by new Elections, or new Writs) and that as soon as his Majesty and both Houses may be secured from such tumultuous Assemblies, as to the high dishonour of the Parliament, had awed the Members of the same, (which he conceived could not otherwise be done, but by adjourning the Parliament to some place Twenty miles from London, such as the Houses should agree upon) his Majesty most cheerfully and readily would consent to the disbanding of the Armies, and would return speedily to his two Houses of Parliament, according to the time and place which they should agree upon.

Upon this, the Parliament resolved to call back their Commissioners, and so the Treaty took end April the 15. In the beginning of March last, the Lord Brooke had marched towards Northampton, and seized on the Ammunition there, from whence he passed on to Warwick, and so to Stratford-Avon, and beats Colonel Crocker, and Lieutenant Colonel Wagstaffe, and their Forces out of the Town, which he plundered, and from thence retreated to Warwick, to refresh his Soldiers, and then to Stratfordshire; At Leichfield lay the Earl of Chesterfield, with some Forces under his Command, who knowing the Town to be indefenceable, retired to a more tenable place near adjoining, called the Close. Brooke being Master of the Town, takes up his Quarters, whilst his Soldiers go on upon the Enemy; but in the Fight, one of the Cavaliers shooting adventurously at the Window of his Lordships Chamber, pierced his eye-ball, of which he instantly died; the loss of him for a while amused his Followers, but recollecting themselves, they renewed the Fight, with such ardour of Revenge, That they took the Close with the Earl of Chesterfield, and all his Soldiers and Ordnance. But March the 22. the Earl of Northampton, with part of the Kings Army, besieged Leichfield, and forced the Parliamentarians, with their Commanders, to betake themselves to the Close, to whose relief were coming Sir John Gell, and Sir William Byron with Three Thousand Horse and Foot, whereof the Earl of Northampton having Intelligence, leaving sufficient Force to keep in the Besieged within the Close, marched off with the rest, and unexpectedly came upon the Enemy, who yet received them stoutly, till first the Horse were put to flight, and the Foot unable of themselves to keep the Field, were glad to shift for their own Lives, leaving the Victory with some Prisoners, Ammunition, and Baggage, some Ordnance, and four Drakes to the Kings Party, who yet had a shrewd Allay in the Success, having lost in the Fight their General, the Earl of Northampton, who was slain in the Head of his Troop. But now April the 21. comes Prince Rupert and joyns with the Earl of Northampton's Soldiers, and altogether fall upon the Parliamentarians, Commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Knollys, who despairing of Succour, yielded up the Place upon Honourable Conditions, and marched away to Coventry.

In April 17. General Essex sat down before Reading, and in a short space made two several Attempts upon it, but was in both repulsed, and the King himself marched from Oxford to Wallingford for relief of the Town; but Essex's Army daily increasing with fresh Supplies from London, both Parties happened to skirmish at Caversham Bridge, where the Royalists were worsted, and Essex continuing his Siege, played furiously upon the Town with his great Ordnance, whereby many were hurt, and Sir Arthur Aston the Governour was dangerously bruised with the fall of a Brick-bat upon his Head; and Colonel Fielding supplying his Room, Surrendered the Town, for which Fielding was Sentenced by a Councell of War at Oxford, to lose his Head, but afterward pardoned by the Intercession of his Friends.

May the Thirtieth, Cheapside Crost was pulled down; and the Queen was soon after Voted Guilty of High-Treason, for raising Armes against the Parliament; She had indeed raised a pretty Army, whereof she had left some Horse and Foot with Sir Charles Cavendish, for Defence of Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire, and with Three Thousand Foot, Thirty Companies of Horse and Dragoons, Six Pieces of Cannon, and Two Mortars, meets the King at Edgchill, and from thence went with him to Oxford, whither comes Monsieur Harcourt Ambassador from France, to Mediate an Accommodation, but returned without effecting any thing therein.

And now the War begins to spread larger, the King drawing to his Assistance the Irish, and the Parliament bringing in the Scots: These two last having Sworn the Solema League and Covenant each to other, which Oath was afterwards sent down, and urged by the Parliament to all the Counties in England and Wales.

In the West, Sir Ralph Hopton, for the King, lay with some Forces at Launceston, to dislodge whom, Sir George Chidley, Commander of the Parliaments Forces in Devonshire, sends out a Party from Okehampton, which coming undiscovered as far as Polsten Bridge, had almost Surprised the Kings Forces in their Quarters. They in the Town now having but short Warning, took the Alarm, and drew up to a Hill near adjoining, which they maintained against all the Force of the Assailants, till such Aid came in, as forced the Devonshire Men disorderly to Retreat home again, the Cavaliers pursue them to Serton Down; and the Night coming on, they make a stand, the Weather was then very Tempestuous and Stormy, and it Thundred and Lightened extraordinarily, to the great Astonishment of the Cornish; by means whereof, and a sudden mistake which surpris'd them; they were by one Captain Drake, who fell in among them, put to some disorder, and forced to retreat to Lanncoston: Yet within a short time after recovering Heart, they march again into Devonshire, and meet with the Parliamentarians at Chagford, whom they Defeat, though not without some Loss, Sidney Godolphin and others being slain upon the Place. Sir George Chidley having sent away the greatest Part of his Horse Westward, with the rest of his Horse, and all his Foot, encountered the Cornish Men at Stratton, May the Sixteenth, where the Foot being weakly Guarded with those few Troops that remained, and unable of themselves to sustain the Enemy's Charge, were utterly Routed, the most part being either slain, or taken Prisoners, which the Horse who marched Westward hearing of, posted away for Plymouth: Yet was this Loss in some measure Recompenced to the Parliament in the North by a Victory obtained, May the Twenty second, against the Kings Forces at Wakefield.

Colonell Nathaniell Pines, Governour of Bristol, had discovered a Plot of Robert Toomans and George Bouchier to deliver up the City to the Kings Forces: Whereupon they were apprehended, and by a Council of War Condemned to be Hanged, which Sentence was accordingly Executed May the Thirtieth, notwithstanding the Kings Letter to the Mayor and Citizens, and General Rubens to the Governour in their behalf: And so ends this Month Famous by the Death of Mr. John Pym, that Active Member of the House of Commons.

The next Month June began with the Arraignment of Mr. Waller, a Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Challoner, Mr. Hafell, Mr. Blinkhorn, Mr. White, and others, for Plotting to Seize into their Custody the Kings Children, some Members of the Parliament, the Lord Mayor, and Committee of the Militia, all the Cities Out-works and Forts, the Tower of London, and all the Magazines: Then to let in the Kings Forces to Surprize the City.

They were all Arraigned at Guildhall, and Condemned, but Tomkins and Challoner only were Hanged, Waller was Reprieved by General Essex, and after a years Imprisonment in the Tower, paid a Fine of 10000 l. to was Pardoned, and Travelled into France.

The Earl of Essex being about Tame, Ordered the Buckingham Forces to Alarum the Kings Army June the Seventeenth: Some Skirmishes passed between them; next Morning early, Prince Rupert engages their Body of Horse in Chalgrave Field, whom he Routed, took Captain Sheffield, the Earl of Musgrove Son, and many others Prisoners; Major Gunter shot dead in the place, and Mr. John Hamden, a stirring Member of Parliament; and a great Stickler in these unhappy Differences, received there his mortal Wound, of which he died a Week after. But in the Fifth, the Parliament's Forces had somewhat better Success, where they took in Taunton and Brighthelm: And now their main Business was to take care, how the want of the Great Seal should be supplied; Whereupon after long Debates, they Voted that a new Seal should be framed for Confirmation of their Acts and Ordinances, which was forthwith done; and thereon Engraven the Picture of the House of Commons and Members Sitting: Reversing the Armes of England and Ireland, Cross and Harp Paly; but between the Voting and Framing of it, they passed this Order: That if the Lord-Keeper Littleton upon Summons, did not return with the Great Seal within Fourteen Days, he should lose his Place, and whatever should be Sealed therewith by him after that time, should be Null and Void in Law: and presently after Mr. Henry Martin, a Member of Parliament, adventured to Seize the Regalia, which were Reposited in Westminster-Abbey. And farther to aggravate his boldness, he was heard to say to some of his Accomplies, That the time would come, when there will be need of Crowns and Scepters, (an Expression in part too unluckily propheticall.)

The Cornish Forces were advanced into Somersetshire, where at Lands Down near Bath, July the Fifth, Sir William Waller meets with them: Hoptons Forces were fewer in Number, yet stood bravely to it, maintaining the Fight from Two of the Clock in the Afternoon, till One the next Morning, and then the Enemy forsook the Field: But some of the Prisoners were taken, found Opportunity to blow up the Train; in which Business, Hopton himself, among others, received some hurt, and his Army for want of Ammunition was constrained to Retreat into the Devizes, having lost in the Battell divers Gentlemen of Note: Viz. Sir Berill Greenwith, Mr. Leak, Son to the Lord Daincourt, Mr. Baker, Mr. Bosford, Lieutenant Colonel Wall, Major Lower, Captain James, Captain Shawell, and others. But the Parliament's Loss was far greater, both of Officers and private Souldiers: Waller being Advertised of what had happened, Follows, and Besiegeth them, to whose Relief the King from Oxford sends the Lord Wilmot with a Body of 2500 Horse; Waller draws off to Roundway Down, where they come to Blows: With Wilmot joyned Hoptons Forces: the Horse on each Side began the Fight, in which the Parliamentarians were Defeated, and Fleed, leaving the Foot to the Mercy of their Enemies, by whom Hundreds of them were slain, and more Prisoners taken. Four fair Brads Guns, Ammunition and Baggage, Eight and twenty Colours, and Nine Cornets; and this July 13th. And Waller himself having thus lost his Army, with a small Retinue, posts to London for Recruits.

In the North there had risen some Difference between the Lord Ferdinand Fairfax, General for the Parliament, and Sir John Hotham, Governour of Hull; this latter refusing to submit to the former, and upon Complaints on either Side, the Parliament intended to displace Hotham, which he discovering by the Letter by him Intercepted, began to meditate new Designs, his Sir John Hotham and his Son sent up Prisoners to the Parliament.

A Son Captain Hotham being suspected by the Parliament, was Imprisoned at Nottingham, but made his Escape, and under-hand Treated with the Earl of Newcastle, and coming to Hull, his Father and he stand upon their Guard: the Parliament fearing the Consequence, sent down Sir Matthew Boynton with a Commission to Seize them both, and Succeeded in the Government of the Town: who not being suspected by Hotham, as being his Brother-in-law, found means so to tamper with the Garrison-souldiers, as that he made himself Master of their Affections, and the Magazine; and then Sir John too late spying the Practice, fled out of the Town: but at Beverley his own Souldiers set upon him, and constrained him to fly back again to Hull, where he was taken; with his Wife and Son, and the rest of his Children, and all the up Prisoners to the Parliament; and Sir Matthew Boynton remained Governour of the Town.

Colonell Finch Governour of Bristol had formerly banged up some Citizens for intending to have delivered up the Town to Prince Rupert, who nevertheless prosecuted his design upon that place, which soon after took effect, for having some while hovered about those Parts, July the 27th. Prince Rupert heists down before it, at such a time as he knew by his Correspondents, that it was worst provided for Resistance: So that the Governour after three dayes Siege was constrained to Surrender.

August the Twelfth the Earl of Windesore being freed from his Imprisonment which he had endured since Edgehill Fight, returned to the King at Oxford: Eight dayes after the Earls of Bedford and Holland came to Wallingford, and were received by the Governour Colonel Bligg, and were after brought to the King, to whom they made a large Profession of their Duty and Allegiance, and of their Resolution to desert the Parliament's Cause, but soon after upon some Discontent, the Wind changed, and they fled back again to the Parliament.

Prince  Maurice now Besieges Exeter, upon which he gives a fierce Assault, slings in Grenadoes, and fires part of the Suburbs, upon which unites a fruitless Parley: The next day the Prince Masters the great Sconce, and turns the Ordnance thereof upon the City, and then the Garrison agreed to yield up the Town: the Officers only to part with their Swords, and the private Souldiers with Cudgels in their hands, and the Government was conferred upon Sir John Berkeley, September the Fourth.

In the mean time, Judge Berkley who had been formerly Imprisoned by the Parliament for the Business of Ship-money, was Fined 2000 l. made incapable of all Offices; and to continue a Prisoner during Pleasure.

The Parliament about this time were busied for Recruiting Sir William Waller's Army, and to induce the Londoners to a more cheerful Compliance with them in it: Remington the Mayor was put in possession of the Lieutenancy of the Tower, but Waller was told to attend the longer, because General Essex was in the same Condition, and had need of Re-enforcements: Essex's Muster took place at Hounslow Heath, but they would not serve the turn for so weighty a Business, as the Relief of Gloucester, now Besieged by the King; and therefore he must make use of London Train.

Gloucester was the Place which stops the Current of the Kings Successes, which he now Besieges: Maffey was Governour of it, and had with him Two Regiments of Foot, One hundred Horse, and as many more from Berkley Castle, with the Trained Bands, and some Reformados, all about 1500 men; 40 Barrells of Powder, and a slender Artillery, the Works large, but not completed; and the West-side defended by the River, and in this Case it was, when August the Tenth, the King fate down before it with a formidable Army, and sends them his Summons, which taking no effect; his Forces advanced to the East Suburbs, which being instantly fired by the Citizens, they Entrench on the South and East parts, where for their Welcome, the Besieged Sallied out upon them, did some Execution, and returned Sir William Waller with the Welsh Forces Entrenched on the North-west side, in Order to joyning with the Worcester Forces, General Rushin on the South-side, and Sir Jacob Ashby in the East-Suburbs.

They within behaved themselves like men of Resolution, and Alarmed their Besiegers with frequent Salleys; and first, Captain Gray with an hundred and fifty Musquetteers attempts the Worcester Forces, and marching up to the main Guard, kills some, takes others, and burning their Guard returns. After him comes out Captain Mallory, with the like number, doth some Execution, and Retreats: Not long after this, Captain Crispe on the East-side makes a Sallie, with loss on both sides: The Besiegers resolve to make their Assault on the South and East-side, to which end they begin to raise their Works, and then they plant Three Pieces of Ordnance, of Fourteen, and Four and Twenty Buller, which they played furiously upon the Town, making a heigh Breach, which yet was soon made up again with Wooll-Packs and Cannon Baskets: The Welsh and Worcester Forces were now Quartered together, who placed four Pieces of Ordnance before their League, and one against the Avon-Gate, to amuse whom a Party Issues out over the Works and gives the Alarm, whilst a greater Body sallies forth at the North-Gate, and gets behind the Cannon, which they Nayled, having over-powered the main Guard, though not without some Loss.

Three Pieces of Cannon were now planted against the South, Three on the East, and Two at the East-Gate, with above an hundred and fifty shot, battering the Corner-points, and the Muskets playing from the Walls, and the Grenadoes shot out of their Morter-pieces, did some Execution on the People: yet were their Spirits nothing abated, for shortly after Two Parties sallied out of the Town, the One Commanded by Sterinson, and Moore, the other by Blunt and White, which did some Execution and Retired: At this Siege, it should seem that Pallas joyned with with Mars, so many ingenious Devices, for Offence and Defence were put in practice. Such Engines framed, such Myning and Countermyning, as the like was not used in all the time of these Wars.

Now the King prepares for a general Storm, and all his Endeavours were ready for it, the Besieged in Want, and their Ammunition consumed to three Barrells of Powder; When News comes, that the Earl of Essex was upon his march, with a Gallant Army to raise the Siege; wherefore the King sent away Prince Rupert to Retard his Speed, till he might rise and be gone. This was upon the Fifth of September, the Earl of Essex Enters Triumphant into Gloucester, where he sets things in Order, causeth the City to be plentifully furnished with Provisions from the Country, and leaving with them three Culverins, and forty six Barrells of Powder, departed after the King, who at this Siege, lost that Opportunity of marching up to London, (the Parliament having then no considerable Army in the Field) which he could never after regain.

In Ireland the Wars had continued hitherto, and the English Army had pretty good Success against the Rebels: But now the King understanding of the Parliament Contracting with the Scots for Aid, thought good to strengthen his Own Side, by recalling part of his Army there to help him at Home, and to that end Commissions his Lieutenant-General, the Earl of Ormond, to agree on a Cessation for a Year, which was concluded at Singliffen September the Fifteenth. One thousand six hundred forty and three, and three Dayes after was proclaimed by the Lords Justices and Council at Dublin.

And shortly after that, some Forces from thence, under the Command of Sir Michael Ennis landed in Wales, and Besieged Hawarden Castle near Chester, which was soon yielded up unto them by the Souldiers within, who came lately out of Ireland, and had been enforced to the Parliament Service.

The Earl of Essex having Relieved Gloucester, and furnished them with what they wanted, Speeds after the King, who passing by Cirencester, left there a strong Party, where Prince Maurice his Forces were also that Night expected; but instead of them, comes Essex, and mistaken for the Other, Enters the Town without Opposition, seizes four hundred Men, and thirty Carloads of Provision, and so marches to Chilton; near which, on Manum Hills his Forces had a hot skirmish with the Cavaliers, but Night parted the Fray; and the next Day, September the Twentieth, he marches for Newbury, the King was there before, and had gotten the Advantage of the Ground, and planned his Ordinance.

Early in the Morning, General Essex views his Enemies Battell; in Newbury Common draws up his Own, and falls to Firing, and the Kings Army do the like. That part is the Army which Prince Rupert charged, being over-lay'd, was forced to fall off to the Right Hand, where Two great Bodies of Horse, marched down the Hill, and fell in furiously upon the Prince, both sides drew their Parts with great Manhood and Animosity, coming to many Blowes with either Swords: The Essexians then Wheeling about, charged the Lord Jermyn's Regiment, whom they forced to make their Escape through some Bodies of Foot, in which Encounter were slain, Colonel Capstall, and the French Marquis De la Visi Visi. This Fight continued with great Loss and Bloodshed on either Side; but the greater on the Kings, whose other Bodies, of Horse Commanded by the Earls of Carnarvan and Northampton, notwithstanding the undaunted Courage of their Commanders, were overpowered, and Carnarvan slain. Night coming on, caused both Armies to retire: In this Fight, the London Trained Bands and Auxiliaries did good Service; many were slain on both Sides, and Essex lost many of his Officers; but on the Kings Part were killed the Earls of Carnarvan and Sunderland, Vicount Falkland, Colonel Morgan, Lieutenant Colonel Piddling, besides Mr. Sironde, and many other Gentlemen, Volunteers, and most of his Officers hurt.

This was a harder Bout then that of Edgehill; So that neither Part having any Stomach to Renew the Fight, they marched away one from the other, both the King and Essex having first sent their Warrants to Newbury and Enbarns, for the Burial of the Dead Bodies. Essex his Army was to Relieve Gloucester, which he accordingly effected, though not without some Damage; for Colonel Murray with a good Party of Horse fell upon the Rear of his Army, Commanded by Sir Philip Stapleton, whom in a narrow Lane they Charged so furiously, that they forced them to a Run directly forward through their own Foot, till at length getting into the Field, they Faced about, and forced the Kings Party back again: many Colours of the Kings Corners were carried up to London, and much Reputation was Gained by this Expedition to General Essex, and the London Trained Bands; not that there had been wanting the height of Gallantry and Resolution (however Fortune fail'd) on the Kings Side.

Sir William Vaughan comes to Hereford with a strong Party, which he Augments with some G Forces in those Parts, and being Commissioned to Command in chief in that County and Gloucestershire, Garrisons Tewkesbury, from whence he comes to Sudley Castle, then held by the Lord Chandoyce, and thence to Neverstone Castle, which he also Garrisoned, Caresseing the Country People all the way, in hopes of inducing them to rise for the King: but failing of his Purpose, retired back again.

Barkley Castle was now kept for the King by Captain Roskarrack, who made many Incursions towards Gloucester, for repressing of which, a Company was placed at Frampton House, and another at Slimbridge; Massey himself Faced the Castle with two Troops of Horse and some Musketeers, whilst another Party of Horse went out to fetch in Malignants (as they call'd them) but were frustrated by the Lord Herbert's Horse: Sir John Winter for the King Manned his House at Lidney in the Forest of Dean, from whence with the Lord Herbert's Help he Infested the Parliamentarians, and had many Bickerings with Colonel Massey.

And now were Forces come over out of Ireland for the King's Service Commanded by Colonel Myn, and Sir William St. Leger, so that Gloucester was again in a manner Surrounded by Enemies to the Number of about Six thousand, and Prince Rupert himself amongst them.

Sir William Waller now enters Gloucestershire, (whereupon the Kings Forces withdrew to their severall Garrisons) from whence he Advanced towards Monmouth, which he enters, the Lord Herbert's Garrison Retiring; from thence he marches to Uske, and spending no long time there, returns with his Horse and Dragoons through the lowest part of the Forest of Dean, near the Rivers side of Severn, whilst his Foot and Artillery came back at Chepflow by a Bridge of Boats. And high time it was, for Prince Maurice had entred Tewkesbury with a Brigade of Horse and Foot, and joyning with the Lord Grandison, resolved to follow Waller, or meet him in his Return. Waller not having Strength enough to Fight the Prince, caused two Parties to give a false Alarm to his Quarters, whilst himself with his main Body slipped between both; and being re-inforced with two Troops of Horse, and two hundred Foot from Gloucester, he falls upon Tewkesbury, which he Surprised with some Prisoners, forcing the Governour Sir Matthew Cary to shift for himself: And Sir Robert Cook was made Governour of the Town for the Parliament, and then Marches away with his flying Body. But in Ripfield the Prince overtakes him, finding him drawn up and divided into three Bodies, but not in a Condition to Fight, being fewer in Number, no Shot prepared, no Canoners, few Foot, the Wind and Sun in their Faces.

In this posture, some perswaded to Fight, others to Retreat, to which Waller Assented, although there was no other way but through a long Incommodious Lane, which accordingly he puts in Execution, Commanding a Party of Dragoons to Face the Cavaliers, and the Musketeers to stand at the Corner to make good his Retreat. But Prince Maurice falls on, and beats the Dragoons, over Hedge and Ditch, who in their Flight did greatly disorder the rest; and more hurt he had done, if Hastlerig with some Horse and Foot had not made a Charge by which means the other had Opportunity to get out of the Lane, and from thence to Tewkesbury.

About this time it was, that General Essex Besieged Reading, which occasioned the King to draw away his main Forces out of Gloucestershire, whereby Waller got freedom to take Breath, and after some time of Refreshment, achieved sundry Exploits, and joyning with Massey, marched to Hereford, which they took, and in it the Lord Scudamore, Colonel Cunnesby, and Sir William Crofts, with others, some Arms and Ammunition.

After this they came up before Worcester, which yet they would not stay to besiege, because of the approach of the Kings Forces, under the Lord Capell, and the Lord Loughborough, who came to the Relief of Captain Bride, Governour of Eccleshall Castle, Besieged by the Parliament Forces under Sir William Brereton, Colonel Gell, Colonel Graves, Colonel Rigby, Colonel Jackson: These had lately drawn the Moortlanders (Inhabitants of the Lower Grounds in Staffordshire) to their Side, and had made themselves Masters of the Town of Stafford: Brereton quickly Mastered Eccleshall Town, and Summoned the Castle, but received a resolute Answer: and having spent some Months time in the Siege of it, Capell and Loughborough Arrived with their Forces; against whom, the Besiegers finding themselves unable to make Resistance upon even Terms, quit their Trenches, and retire to the Church, where they Fortified themselves; but there was no such need of fear, for the Lords being to attend upon Business of greater Importance, could not make any Stay there, but contenting themselves with having Relieved the Castle, resolved forthwith to march away; Notwithstanding all the Intreaties of Governour Bride, who seeing he could not prevail with them to make any Attempts upon the Church, and despairing of any Possibilities to hold out without them, delivered up his Charge to the Lords, who placed Captain Abel a Dane, in that Command, and immediately departed; and the old Souldiers loving their Old Captain, forsook the New, and followed him: And shortly after, the Parliamentarians coming on again, the Dane was necessitated to Surrender upon reasonable Quarter.

And now comes out an Ordinance of Parliament to Seize upon the Kings Revenue, and another for the abating of the Excise upon Virginia Tobacco, upon Complaint from the Plantation there.

Sir William Waller who after the taking of Hereford, was Defeated at the Devizes, was now again Recruited, and sent away with a Promise of a new Commission to be Sergeant Major General of Hampshire, Sussex, Surrey, and Kent; and marching to Farnham, beat a Party of the Kings Army, and from thence marched to Aulton, which he took, and thence to Arundell Castle, where his promised Commission was sent him, and he thereby Encouraged, so ordered the matter, that in eight and twenty dayes Siege, he had the Place Surrendered.

During which time, Colonel Norton assaying to stop Hopton from going to molest Waller in his foresaid Siege, was by him Routed, and flying towards Chichester, could not gain Admission; at which Waller being Disgusted, Writ up to the Parliament, craving Authority to place and displace all all Governours of Towns and Castles within his Association; which was granted: and as he obtained it without the good Will of Generall Essex, so was he thereby let at Liberty, without Dependence on his Direction.

The Parliament finding the Kings Power to encrease, Publish, That whosoever shall Assist the King, with Horse, Arms, Plate, or Money, against them, are Traitors to the Parliament, and shall be so proceeded against. Notwithstanding which, his Power greatly augmented, and his Armies in several parts obtained very Fortunate Successes.

About this time Cardinal Mazarine, Richelieu's true Successor, desiring rather to pry into the Estate of this Land, than to do any good in it, procured Count Harcourt to cross the Seas hither, as Ambassador to mediate a Peace between the King and Parliament, which took no Effect according to the Cardinals own Desires.

The Earl of Manchester being at Cambridge about the Business of Sequestration, and not certainly resolved, Whether the Colledges and Halls were within his Commission, the Parliament clear the Point with this Ordinance,

Their Ordinance touching the University of Cambridge.

That the Estates, Rents, and Revenues of the Colledges and Halls in the University of Cambridge, are in no wise to be seized on, but shall remain and be to the same University, Colledges, and Halls, as if the Ordinance of Sequestration had never been made.

Provided, That if any Part, Portion, or Dividend be due to any Head, Fellow, or Scholar in the said University, being, or which hereafter shall be a Malignant, or Delinquent, within any of the Ordinances of Sequestration, then they shall be excepted from receiving any Part or Portion of his Allowance, but shall be dealt with as it shall be Ordered by the Earl of Manchester, and none to be Receiver, Treasurer, or Burser, but such as shall be approved by him.

The King summons a Parliament at Oxford.

December the Twenty second, the King at Oxford summons a Parliament, which Convened January the Twenty second; and the King calling them together, at the great Hall at Christ Church, tells them, That if he had the least Thoughts of disagreeing with the Happiness of the Kingdom, he would not advise with such Counsellors as they were. And for the Upper Schools were Assigned to the Lords, and the Convocation-House to the Commons. In this Parliament, besides the Prince and the Duke of York, Lord-Keeper Lisleton, Treasurer Cottington, Duke of Richmond, and Marquis Harford, were Nineteen Earls, and as many Lords, and an Hundred and seventeen Knights and Gentlemen; but afterwards Five Lords more, and Twenty three Knights and Gentlemen, then disabled by several Occasions, appeared in this Convention. The first thing by them taken in hand, was, to Consider of Means for the effecting of Peace, to which end a Letter is Ordered to be Written to Generall Essex, and, Subsigned by all the Members, accordingly sent to him, to which the Earl returns no Answer, but sends it up to the Parliament at Westminster.

The Scots Army enter England.

January the Sixteenth, the Scots Army entered England by way of New-Castle, consisting of 18000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, under the Command of Generall Leven, for Assistance of the Parliament, in pursuance of the Solemn League and Covenant, sending before them a specious Declaration, for the Judgment of their Cause, which they profess to be Reformation of Religion, Honour of the King, and Peace of the Kingdoms.

Secondly, The Lawfulness of their Calling thereunto, which they ground upon that particular Obligation, which the Parliament had upon their Nation, for refusing to Countenance a War against them in 1640.

And lastly, Their Carriage therein, which they will manifest by their Civil Demeanor during their Abode in England, and their Peaceable Departure afterwards. For which they freely give the Publick Faith of the Kingdom of Scotland, Declaring it to be a main End of their Coming, to Rescue the King from his pernicious Counsellors.

Sir John Meldrum b besieged Newark.

Sir Richard Biron Governor of Newark for the King, had been very Active in those Parts, and had made Excursions as far as within three Miles of Lincoln; which so provoked the Parliamentarians, that Sir John Meldrum with Seven thousand Men sits down before the Town, where having continued three Weeks, continually Alarumed by Courageous sallies of the Besieged, at length comes Prince Rupert with 4000 Horse and Dragoons, and a 1000 Foot: upon whose Approach Meldrum drew off to his chief Work, at Spittle, or Exeter-House, a little more than Musket shot from the Town, whither they had drawn all their Regiments, Cannon and Ammunition. However, Prince Rupert Advanceth up the Beak and Hill, at the Descend whereof, he espies Four Bodies of Horse standing in readiness to receive them, and all the rest Horse and Foot drawn up in Battalia near the Spittle. Upon these Prince Rupert gives a stout Charge, and after some stiff Bouts, by main force drove them quite out of the Fields, beyond their own Work, Foot and Cannon at the Spittle, some into the Island, and others to Muskhams-Bridge, and Assailed their chief Work at the Spittle, in all which Places the Parliamentarians Valiantly Defended themselves: but having lost 2000 of their Number in Attempts upon the Town, before the Prince's coming, and and being now Distressed by Rupert before, and Governour Biron behind, all Intercourse cut off by the Prince's Interposition between the Spittle, Muskhams-Bridge, and the Island, and not Victuals for above two Dayes, they were constrained to desire a Parley, and then come to these Articles:

First, That Match, Bullet, Powder, Cannon, and all other Fire-Arms belonging to the Artillery, be delivered up.

Secondly, That all Souldiers march away with their Swords by their sides, and Colours and Drums.

Thirdly, That all Officers march without Molestation with their Arms, and Horses for themselves and Servants: And all Bagg and Baggage, Money, and whatsoever doth truly belong to themselves.

Fourthly, That all Troopers and Dragoons march with their Swords, Horses, and Colours. Fifthly, That his Highness send a Convoy to Protect them from any Injury two Miles from the utmost of his Highness Quarters.

The Parliament Caretels the Scots Army, and Impower them to Assist for themselves, the Twentieth Part over all the North, and all Malignants Estates in those Parts, besides what other Counties and Associations were Assailed for them.

But the Earl of New-Castle is marching to give them rougher Entertainment, and against him the Lord Fairfax sends his Son Sir Thomas.

But in the mean time, other Matters are preparing for Scotland by James Earl of Montros: This Lord had sided with the Covenantors in 1638. whilst they pretended to move by Persecution only, and not by Force, for Preservation of Religion, the Kings Honour, and the Peoples Good.

In 1639. the Command of 2000 Foot, and five Hundred Horse was Conferred upon him, being Absent, and the Command of 5000 more upon his near Relations and Friends, being a Considerable Part of that Army which then Invaded England: In which Service he shewed much forwardness, as being the first that passed over the Tweede, and that on Foot, thereby shadowing his Intentions of turning to the King when Opportunity should serve, if the Pacification had not Intervened.

In the next Scottish Invasion he also accompanied them, and writ several Letters privately to the King at York, professing his Duty and Fidelity, which was stoln out of the Kings Pockets by the Scots of his Bed-Chamber, and Copied out for the Covenantors. After the Disbanding of that Army, Montros returning home, joyned in League with some of the Nobility for upholding the Kings Interest, but was again betrayed to the Adverse Party; and shortly after they intercept a Letter from the King to him Quilted in the Messengers Saddle: upon which, he with Napier Lord of Marchmont, and Sir Starling Ker, were Imprisoned in the Castle of Edenborough. Being afterwards Released, he in the Year 1642. was offered the Command of the Scots Covenantors Army then to be levied for Assistance of the Parliament of England; which he refused; and privately with the Lord Ogleby came to the Queen then newly landed out of Holland at Burghton in Torkshire: to her he states the Case, and proposes some means to remedy those Evills which were threatened from the North; but all was quashd by Hamiltons coming home: he returns, and makes shew of some kind of Willingness to comply with the Covenantors; Whereupon Alexander Hinderston comes to Caretels and to satisfy his Conscience, and with him comes Sir James Rollock, from whom he sifts the Secrets, and their Resolutions to send an Army in Ayde of their Brethren in England against the King, and so Posts away with Ogleby to England, and comes to Oxford, where he Communicates his Intelligence to the Queen; who trusting more upon the Hamiltons, made no great Account of it: whereupon they take their way to the King then before Gloucester, with whom also they gained small Belief, being over-weighed by the prevalent Authority of Hamilton at Court, who ever laboured to keep down this Earl, as knowing his Worth to be such, that if once he came in Favour, he would soon over-top him. But the King returning to his Winter-Quarters at Oxford, by daily Reports found Montros to be too true; and now too late repenting his Incredulity, he Commissions Montros to be Generall Governour of Scotland, and orders the Earl of Arbuthnot to Ayde him in Person, with some considerable Forces out of Ireland, to be Landed in the West of Scotland, and the Earl of New-Castle to furnish him with a Party of Horse to enter upon the South, and so into the Heart of that Kingdom. And forthwith Sir John Cock, and is dispatched to the King of Denmark, to Negotiate for Men, Money, and Ammunition.

In the mean time, the Hamiltons come Post towards Oxford, giving out by the way, that their very Zeal for their King, made their Country too hot for them; but being forbidden the Court, the Earl of Lamrick gets to the Parliament at London, and from thence to the Scottish Army: Whereupon his eldest Brother the Marquis, was sent Prisoner to Pendennis Castle in Cornwall. Montros coming to the Marquis of New-Castle, could obtain of him but two hundred Horse, with two Brass Field-Pieces, and Orders to the Kings Forces to help him in his Journey to Scotland, and by the Counties of Cumberland and Westmerland was supplied with Eight hundred Foot, and three Troops of Horses: and passing forwards by the help of some Friends, got together Two hundred Horse more, wherewith he shortly after, Viz. The year following, April 13. entered Scotland; and so ended this Year with Us: Which was rendred Famous abroad by the Two Battels

The manner of Montroses falling off from the Covenantors, and applying himself to the Kings Service.

Montros made General Governour of Scotland for the King.

Marquis Hamilton sent Prisoner to Pendennis, upon his Brother's flying to the Parliament. Montros enters Scotland with an Army.

tejs of Rocroy, and Darling, the First in May, at which time Don Francisco de Melo Besieged Rocroy, having made the Duke of Albuquerque, a young Portugall, and a raw Souldier, General of the Horse, wherat his Officers were so Dilected, that when the Prince of Cerde, and Montfieur Gassion fell on, the Spaniards without making any considerable Resistance, began to Rout, and then to Run, and the French Victorious, presently took the Town of Theoville: Whereupon Melo was displaced, and the Government given to Cassell Rudrigo, till the coming of the Arch-Duke Leopold.

But in Bavaria the Spaniards were quit with them at Messieurs, where the Duke of Lorraine, (then in their Service) with John de Werat, and the Baron of Mercy, Vanquished the French, and Weymarians, and took Prisoners the Four Marshalls of France, which Conducted the Army, together with Four hundred Officers, and a Thousand Common Souldiers, besides the Pillage: This was about the end of November.

Sir William Waller Defeats
the Lord Hop-ton's Forces, and takes Winchester.

It was now the Twentieth Year of his Majesties Reign, being the Year 1644. when Sir William Waller having taken Arundell Castle, and gotten a Commission to his Mind, marches forward against the Lord Hopton, whom he finds drawn out in Brandon Heath near Alisbury, with Intention to Fight; which Waller refused not, and so gains an Advantageous Hill, from whence, being forced, he gets up to another, whither the Cavaliers follow him and enter into a sharp Dispute, but at length the Parliamentarians by the help of the Ground, and the Covert of Trees and Hedges, did such Execution upon the Enemy, that after the loss of many Persons of Quality, besides a great Number of the Vulgar Sort; they Retreated in great Disorder; and drawing off their Cannon towards Winchester, wheeled off unseen to Basing-House, whence Hopton hastens to Oxford, and Winchester after this Victory yields to Waller, upon Summons. On the Kings Side, these were mortally Wounded; The Lord Stewart, Sir John Smith, and three Colonels, Sandys, Manning, and Scott; and these were hurt, which afterwards recovered; Colonel Appleyard, Captain Perfon, Sir Edward Stowell, and Sir Henry Barde. Of the Parlements Side, besides divers that were slain, Dalbier was Wounded, and Colonel Tomlin lost his Leg by a Cannon Shot.

About this time, Colonel Griffith made his ridiculous Expedition with his Silver Trumpets, and guarded Coats, for the Reduction of Wales to the Parliaments Obedience, but was totally Routed at his first Encounter, and so being Calhired, we hear no more of him, but only that for his prodigality in Expences, he is commonly called Prince Griffith; as also, because at his setting forth, he brags'd, That he would seek out Prince Rupert to fight with him hand to hand; afterwards having spent his Estate, he Travell'd beyond-Sea, and was killed in a Tavern at Paris.

This Spring, General Essex had his Army Recruited to seven compleat Regiments of Horse, and six of Foot, and the Parliament also compleated their Navy: and one Colonel Oliver Cromwell, a Person that will be too well known to us hereafter, was made Governour of Ely, with Power to raise Moneys within the Isle, for Support of that Garrison, which consisted of Seven hundred Foot: and three Troops of Horse.

May the Third, Colonel Fox for the Parliament comes from Tamworth to Beudly by Night with a single Troop, and obtained Entrance of the Guard, under pretence of one of Prince Roberts Troops, passes into the Town, Surprises the Garrison, takes the Governour Sir Thomas Littleton Prisoner, with divers other Gentlemen, about Fifty Horse, and carries them all away with him.

And in York-shire the Fairfaxes after divers Successes, April the Tenth, Mastered the Kings Garrisons at Selby and Heintough, and took many Prisoners: And now think themselves able to deal with the Earl of New-Castle.

April the Nineteenth, the Parliament at Oxford having little Business, and some Differences also among them, were willing to Recede, wherefore the King Prologued them to the Eighth of October, and afterwards by Proclamation to the Ninth of November.

Now the Parliament in Scotland about this time Assembled, to whom the Parliament at Westminster send Congratulatory Letters, with Thanks for their Assistance both here and in Ireland, and certify them, That they had fertied a Committee of both Kingdomes at Westminster to Consult together for the good of both Nations. and that they had appointed a Committee to Reside with the Stish Army in England, to which Army they had already sent 30000 l. and had 30000 l. more in readiness to be speedily sent unto them.

Latham Houfe had been near Eighteen Weeks Befieged by some Parliament Forces, under the Command of Colonels Afhton, Moor, and Rigby; but at laft Prince Rupert marches that way and takes Stripwafh, where the Parliament had a ftrong Garrifon; and from thence fends Relief to the Counteff of Derby, who in her flout defending of that Place, had manifefted a more than common Magnanimity, Whereupon the Befiegers drew off.

The King in the presence of the Peers at Oxford, received the Sacrament at Christ Church, at the Hands of Bishop Usher, using these Solemn Protestations :

My Lords, I espy here many resolved Protestants, who may Declare to the world the Resolution I do now make : I have to the utmost of my Power prepared my Soul to become a Worthy Receiver ; And may I so receive comfort by the blessed Sacrament, as I do intend the

A the Establishment of the true Reformed Protestant Religion, as it stood in its Beauty in the happy Dayes of Queen Elizabeth, without any Connivance at Popery : bleſs God, that in the miſt of theſe publick Diſtractions, I have ſtill Liberty to Communicate : and may this Sacrament be my Damnation, if my Heart do not joy with my Lips in this Profeſtation.

The Parliament at Westminster Voted it Treason for any Member or Members of either House to desert them, and go to the King, and they never to be received again.

And in the mean time, Essex and Waller joyn together, and enter Oxfordshire, with Intention to inviron the King, whose greate Armies were then abroad : to prevent which, he marches out of Oxford by Nigh, leaving sufficient Force behind for the Defence of the City, and comes to North-ly, where he drew up his Army of 3000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, 12 Drakes, and 60 Carriages, and so marches on towards Worcester. Essex and Waller pursue two several wayes, but both met at Burford, where it is agreed between them, That Essex with his heavy Guns should march to reduce the Western Counties, and Waller with the lightest Field-pieces should joyn with Majesty's Forces, and pursue the King : So Essex marches to Faringdon, and Waller toward Gloucester, and from thence in Queit of the King, who hearing of Essex's departure, turns back, with Intention to be furnished with Ammunition from Oxford, and to give Waller Battel : At Burford he receives his expected Ammunition, and at Whitney some additional Recruits, and from thence comes to Buckingham, and taking Brackley and Culworth in his way, advanceth to Grimsbury Fields near Banbury, and Faces Waller who was drawn up on Crock-Hill ; but he soon left that standing, and gained Burton-Hill, a more advantageous Ground, where he stood in Battalia, whom when the King could by no meanes draw down, he marched over Cropley Bridge towards Duniry. The Kings Van and main Body being a good space before, Waller makes down with 2000 Horse, and 9000 Foot over the Bridge, and falls upon the Kings Rear, commanded by the Earles of Northampton and Cleveland, these Faced about, and charged the Enemy through and through and were so well seconded, that they routed Sir Williams Horse and Foot, killed 150 men, took all his Train of Artillery, together with many considerable Officers prisoners : And this hapned June 20.

The King presently marcheth to Bath after Essex, who was gotten Westward, and by the Lord Roberts Entreaty, was perswaded into the narrow Noose of Cornwall.

On July 23, the King comes to Kingmoor in Somersetshire; and from thence, August the first, to Lutter, eight miles distance from the Earl of Essex, who was at Richmond, and there was accompanied by the King and Prince Maurice at Beconnes, by Sir Leiford Greenville at Bodmyns, and Sir Jacob Ashley at Hale; the Cavaliers were very desirous to fight, but after a serious Deliberation, it was judged more advisable to starve them; to that end, General Goring with a party of Horse, and Sir Thomas Bassett with 1500 Foot were sent Westward, to stop all Provisions that way, and to strengthen them, by keeping their Horse and Foot close together: Hereupon the Parliamentarians dig up their Canons and Baggage towards Fox, but the greatest part of their Horse, being 2200, commanded by Sir Williams Balfore, broke through the Kings two Quarters, and got to Salisbury, and thence to Plymouth, which all the War-time held out stoutly for the Parliament: All this while, the King pursues his Advantage upon Essex his Foot, who with those few Horse that were left, made the best Resistance that they could; but at last being over-powered by the Kings Forces, which in a manner lay round about them, and the Country rising in great Numbers upon them, the Earl of Essex quits his Command, and by Water, makes for Plymouth; and the Souldiers now destitute of a General, come to a Parley September the first: The Commissioners on the Kings side were Prince Maurice, General Rutchen, and the Lord Digby. On the other, Colonel Barkley, Colonel Whitchcock, and Colonel Buller, who at last agreed upon seven or eight Articles; the sum whereof were, To deliver up to the King all their Artillery, with all their Bag and Baggage, no person under the degree of a Corporal, to wear any kind of Weapon, all Officers above onely Sword and Pistol: There were accordingly delivered up forty Pieces of Brats Ordnance, two hundred Barrels of Powder, with Buller and Match proportionable, nine thousand Arms for Horse and Foot; some thousands of private Souldiers were immediately upon their Desires entertained in his Majesties Service. The generous Depoartment, (in this particular) of Major-General Skippon, who commanded the Foot, deservedly challenge a laudable Commemoration, who being desired by the General to escape away with him by Water to Plymouth, chose rather to live and die with his Fellow-Souldiers, than to desert them in such a distressed Condition.

And when after the fore-mentioned Agreement, the Cavaliers took too uncivil an Advantage upon the unarmed Parliamentarians in their March, he courageously addressed himself to the Kings, and representing what Dishonour would thereby accrue to his Majesty, procured more strict Command for the punctual observation of the Articles, and so marched to Pool. After these, sundry other Successes erected the Kings Party, Ipsedcombe, Barnstable, and Salisbury taken; and to the King Victorious, takes leave of the Western Parts, and returns to Oxford.

The King after the Defeat of Waller at Cropredy Bridge, had written from Evesham, July 4. to the Parliament for a Treaty; and to the same purpose, he sends another Letter from Ludger to Essex, at Lostwithiel; the like did the Lords and great Officers, and Commanders of the Army: but through mutual Mistrusts, all came to nothing: Yet now after this Victory, the King offers

Tawstock sends another Letter, dated Septemb. 8. to both Houses, for an Accommodation, willing A them to take his former Letter from Exeter into consideration.

September the twelfth, the Parliament at Oxford assembled again, but falling into Divisions and Factions, the King despairing of any good Effects from them, in March following dissolved them.

The French had formerly mediated a Peace between the King and Parliament, but in vain; and now the United Provinces mean to try what they could do in it, or at leastwise to settle Trade, however the Game went: from these, many men expected much good, by reason of the Kings previous Messages; but yet in the end of the year, they also returned, having effected nothing as to a Reconciliation.

The Earl of Newcastle, who had done many Exploits in the North for the King, was now overpowered by the Parliaments Forces, consisting of the Scots, under the Earl of Levens Command, and of the English in two Bodies, the one commanded by the Earl of Manchester, the other by the Lord Fairfax, each General having his particular Lieutenant-General; Leven had his Colon, Collo-nel David Leslie; Manchester, Colonel Oliver Cromwell; and the Lord Fairfax had his Son Sir Thomas: These Armies held the Earl of Newcastle Besieged in York about two Months, for whose Relief, Prince Rupert advanced Northward with a great Power of Horse and Foot, taking in his Way three Carillons, Stoford, Bolton, and Liverpool, and so comes forward towards York, upon whose Approach the Besiegers drew off, and those within fall out upon the Rear, and bring back with them some Provisions. After this Rupert and Newcastle joyn their Forces, and pursue them with a Resolution to give Battle.

July the third, both Armies face one another upon a great Plain, called Marston Moor; the
Horse and Foot, and a Reserve of Scots; Routed them, and pursued them a great way; the like did General Goring, Sir Charles Lucas, and Major-General Porter, upon the main Body: but they too eagerly following the Chase, the Victory now almost Achieved, was snatched out of their Hands, by Manchester and Cromwell, who with the Parliaments Left Wing utterly Routed the Earl of Newcastle, who commanded the Right Wing of the Cavaliers, and then came in timely to the Relief of his Companions, who now again Rallied, fell altogether upon the divided Bodies of Rupert and Goring, and totally dispersed them, and obtained a compleat Victory, after three hours Fight resolutely maintained on both sides, from seven in the morning till Ten, took 3000 Prisoners, 10 pieces of Ordnance, besides a considerable number of Officers, and 47 Colours of Horse and Foot, and soon after made themselves Masters of all in the North.

Sir Thomas Glemham was Governour of York, which the three Generals besiege, and he standing in want of Ammunition, Prince Rupert having made use of most of what was in the City for the Fight, July 16. Surrenders upon Articles; and then the three Generals parting their Forces, Leven returns into Northumberland, and takes the Town of Newcastle. After this Battle, which was the greatest, both for the fierceness of it, and for the number of Souldiers on both sides, that was fought during this unhappy and intestine War: Prince Rupert sped him into Lancashire, with the Relicks of his Army, but others departed the Kingdom (through Discontent taken at some Injury, which they conceived, probably by mistake, to be offered them by the Prince, upon which they resisted to engage any further in that Cause) and landed at Hamburgh, viz. The Earl of Newcastle lately made Marquis, with his two Sons, and his Brother Sir Charles Cavendish, General King, the Lord Falconbridge, the Lord Widdrington, the Earl of Cranworth, the Bishop of London-Derry, Sir
Edward Widdrington, Colonel Carnaby, Col. Basset, Col. Monson, Sir William Vavasor, Sir Francis Mackworth, with about Eighty other persons.

The Parliament Ordain new Levies to be raised, 10000 Foot, and 1500 Horse, and 1300 Dragoon-gouts, out of the lately Affiliated South-Eastern Counties, and as much Moneys to be advanced out of those Counties, as might pay those Souldiers during their Employment.

Middleton a Scotch-man, Lieut. Gen. to Sir William Waller, comes before Dennington-Castle in Berkshire, with 3000 Horse and Foot, which he gives a stout Assault to, but Repulsed, and finding it himself unable to do the Work, marches Westward after Gen. Essex: but in the way is met with and routed by Sir Francis Dorrington, and Sir William Courtney; this makes him retreat to Shirburn in Dor-setshire, where he falls upon a party of the Kings Horse, and beats them, repairing his Credit by their Overthrow: Then comes Colonel Horton, and makes a second Attempt upon the Castle, and after him the Earl of Manchester a Third: but through the stout Resolution of the Governour
Boyle and his Garrison, they were frustrated of their hopes; and so the Earl marched away to Reading, and Horton to Abbingdon.

The Queen being come from Oxford to Exeter, was there delivered of a Daughter, June 16. which was called Henrietta Maria; and after, she journeyed from thence to Pendennis Castle in Cornwall, where she embarked for France, continuing there till the happy Restauration of her Son, his Majesty that now is.

Barbury had been besieged about eleven Weeks, being defended by Sir William Compton, Brother to the Earl of Northampton, who is now at leisure to succour his Brother, which he doth, October 25. putting to flight Col. John Fines, and his Forces which lay before the Castle.

But in Gloucestershire Massey prevails; Colonel Myn had been long a Goad in his sides, and had now designed with the Forces of both Counties, Hereford and Worcester, to have marched from their

1644

A their Rendezvous at Casslane, to the Gates of Gloucester; but Massey prevents them, and with a competent Number of Souldiers, falls upon Myn, whom he finds drawn up into Battalia 160 Horse, and 850 Foot: these he charges, and after a tough Resistance disperseth them: Myn was slain upon the place, and about 170 more, divers Officers, and many common Souldiers taken prisoners: at length, too late, the Hereford and Worcester Forces came up; but understanding what had passed, returned home again without any memorable Action.

Prince Rupert, after his Defeat at Marston Moor, lying about Bristol, had an Intention to pass Ashbury, to guard which, he sends 500 Horse and Foot, fortifying Beachly for a standing Guard, being a place of Strength, between Severn and Wye: Massey who was not accustomed to be idle, resolves to attack them, and boldly performed that his Attempt, gains the Victory, masters the Guard and Place, and soon after takes Mummouth, by the Treachery of Kirle Lieutenant-Colonel to Holby the Governour.

Newbury seemed to be the place destined for Martial Exploits, near which, one memorable Bat-tel had been fought before, and now a second no less cruel, is to be disputed between the exasperated Parties, the Parliamentarians seeking to regain what Credit they had lost in the West, and the Royalists to repair the Loss in the North; the King had amassed his Forces at King's Leigh; and on the other side, the Earles of Essex and Manchester, and Sir William Waller, marched to a General Rendezvous near Basing October 23. and from thence the day following to Padworth, and next morning to Buckbury Heath near Newbury (where the King then was) and about twelve of the clock drew down the whole Army between Thatcham and Shaw, and skirmished with the Kings Horse.
On Saturday both Armies plyed one another with their great Ordnance, but without much hurt done.

Sunday, October 27. Some of Manchesters Forces, and London Trained-Bands, crossed the River
Kennet, between the Hill and Newbury, and did some Execution upon those that kept the Pass against them: But Sir Bernard Ashley coming to Rescue, forceth the other over the River. Again in the Afternoon 4000 of Essex and Waller's Horse and Dragoons, with 500 Pikes, charged the Royal Army on the West-side of Newbury, where were the Cornish Foot, and the Duke of York's Regiment, with five Field-Pieces, and Prince Maurice's Brigade of Cornish Horse; all which having not unmanfully sustain'd the rough Charge of the Parliamentarians, were yet forced to retreat back in some Disorder, and here the Kings five Field-pieces were taken. The Essexians following their Success, advance with 500 Horse, and a sufficient strength of Musquetiers, betwixt Newbury and Spine, upon the Kings Life-guards, and Colonel Sir Humphrey Bennet's Brigade, whom they overpowered, and had much more endamaged, if the Lord Bernard Stewart had not come up to their Assistance, and secured their Retreat on the East-side of Spine; the Parliamentarians having settled three Bodies of Foot in certain Inclosures, advanced over a Ditch, with a great Body of Horse, to break in through the Kings Guards, but met first fight with General Goring, and the Earl of Cleveland's Brigade, who charged stoutly, and beat back the Enemy; but pursuing disorderly, were repulsed with loss.

Upon the North-East of Newbury stood the Lord Ashley, with Colonel George Lyle, for the King, against whom the Earl of Manchester's Horse and Foot, with the Trained-Bands of London, came down the Hill, and worked Colonel Lyle's Guards: But then Sir John Brown comes on with Plymouth Charles's Regiment of Horse, charges the Foot, and then receives a Charge of 1000 Horse, and so retreats.

Meanwhile Manchesters forces his way to the Reserve commanded by Colonel Thelwell, and after a smart Dispute, beats them out of the Field, gains their Colours, and two Pieces of Canon. In this Fight, of the Kings part were slain, Sir Anthony St. Leger, Lieutenant-Colonel Leak, Lieutenant-Collo-nel Topping, and Captain Callin; the Earl of Cleveland, with others, were taken; the Earl of Brain-ford and Forth, Sir John Greville, Sir Richard Campfield, Major Alford, and Captain Walgrave, and others, were wounded, many private Souldiers slain, and others taken prisoners. This Fight endured till eight of the clock at night; the Essexians called it the Revenge of Cornwall. The King perceiving that all his Brigades were worsted by the Parliamentarians, and fearing a total Overthrow, if the Battle should be renewed, marched away secretly to Dennington Castle, and there leaves behind him his great pieces of Ordnance, and so hafts to Wallingford. General Essex marches into Newbury, and after in vain Summons and Assaults Dennington Castle, and so takes leave committing the care of that Siege to a party which he left behind him.

Massey had formerly taken Mummouth, and had made Major Frogmorton Governour of it, who desiring to show himself active in his fresh Authority, draws out 300 Horse and Foot to take in Chepstow Castle, in whose absence, the Cavaliers, Novemb. 19. early in the morning enter the Town, seize the main Guard, and take the rest in their Beds, with Colonel Brinton, and many Officers and common Souldiers, the Committee, and pretty store of Arms and Ammunition: Frogmorton hearing of this Surprize, desists from his Chepstow Design, and marches away to meet Massey at Barford.

The King sends out Sir Jacob Ashley with three Brigades of Foot, and four Regiments of Horse, who places his Head-quarters at Chenestrey, and from thence sends out several Parties which return with Prisoners and Spoil, whilst himself masters Massey's Guard at Lipior, and grows so formidable, that he commands Contribution to the very Gates of Gloucester: Prince Maurice also Depures a Regiment of Horse and Dragoons, to the service and use of Sir John Winter's Garrison.

Garrison of Lidney, in the Forest of Dean, and so the Kings Power becomes considerable in these parts.

The Hothams, and Sir Alexander Cary beheaded.

Macgwire and Macmahon hang'd, drawn, and quartered at Tisbury.

A Treaty begun at Uxbridge between King and Parliament.

The Kings Memorials to Secretary Nichols.

His Directions to his Commissioners.

The Hothams must now come to their Tryal, the Earl of Manchester, and others are assigned to be their Judges; and so December the first, Sir John is charged in the Hustings-Court at Guild-Hall, London, That he had Trayterously betrayed the Trust reposed in him by the Parliament, and adhered to the Enemy; to be proved by his Words, by his Letters, and by his Actions: And that he had Correspondence with the Queen, the Earl of Newcastle, the Lord Digby, and others of that side, and endeavoured to betray the Town of Hull to the Cavaliers. His Son was charged with Crimes of the same Nature; as for intercourse of Letters with the Earl of Newcastle, under pretence of Trading about Exchange of prisoners: Which things being proved against them, they were both sentenced to lose their Heads, and accordingly were executed; the Son upon the first of January, and the Father the next day after. And a little before, viz. December 23. Sir Alexander Cary had been Beheaded, for endeavouring to give up the Island of Plymouth to the Kings Forces. Two principall Irish Rebels, the Lord Macgwire, and Macmahon, had been seized in Ireland, and sent up to the Parliament, and imprisoned in the Tower, whence they found means to make an escape, but were taken and brought to Tryal; and first Macmahon being found guilty of High-Treason, was, according to Sentence at the Kings-Bench Bar, hang'd, drawn, and quartered at Tisbury in November: and Macgwire, notwithstanding his Complaint to the House of Lords, to consider his quality as a Peer of Ireland, was by the same Court condemned of High-Treason, and like as his Fellow, was sentenced to be hang'd, drawn, and quartered, which was performed upon him, February 20.

The King had formerly sent to the Parliament for a Treaty, which they now began to hearken to, and to Commissioners are appointed on both sides to meet at Uxbridge, January 30. the Commissioners for the King were these; The Duke of Richmond and Lenox, Marquess of Hartford, the Earles of Southampton, Kingston, and Chichester, the Lords, Capel, Seamur, Hutton, and Culpeper, Sir Edward Nichols, Sir Edward Hyde, Sir Richard Lane, Sir Thomas Grandure, Sir Orlando Bridgman, Mr. John Albirgham, Mr. Jeffery Palmer, Doctor Stewart. Those for the Parliaments of England and Scotland (for now they are joyned in all publick Affairs) were the Earles of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury and Denbigh, Lord Wainman, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pierpoint, Sir Henry Vane the younger, Mr. Crom, Mr. Whitlock, Mr. St. Johns, Mr. Pridaux, Lord Lowden, Sir Charles Erskine, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Brakely, and Mr. Henderson.

Many previous Desires of the Parliament had passed, but now they come to the Business. But before the Meeting, the King gives these Memorials to Secretary Nichols.

First, For Religion and Church-Government, the King will not go one jot further than is by you offered already.

Secondly, And so for the Militia, more then what you have allowed by Me, but even in that you must observe, That I must have free Nomination of the full half, as if the Total Number, Scots and all be Thirty, I must name fifteen: Yet if the Parliament be so unworthy, as to admit of ten Scots to twenty English, I am contented to name five Scots, and ten English, and so proportional to any Number. As for gaining of particular Persons, besides Security, promise them Rewards for performed Services, not sparing to engage for Places, so they be not of great Trust, nor dispossess honest men, but as much Profit as you will: With this last, you are onely to acquiesce, Richmond, Southampton, Culpeper, and Hyde.

And the King gives Directions to his Commissioners in Writing, thus;

First, Concerning Religion; In this the Government of the Church (as I suppose) will be the chief Question: wherein these two Things are to be considered; Conscience, and Policy: In the first, I cannot yield to the Change of the Government of Bishops, nor onely as I concur with the most General Opinion of Christians in all Ages as being the best: but likewise I hold my Self particularly bound by the Oath I took at my Coronation, nor to alter the Government of the Church, from what I found it.

And as for the Churches Patrimony, I cannot suffer any Diminution, or Alienation of it (it being without peradventure Sacrilege, and likewise contrary to the former Oath.) But whatsoever shall be offered for rectifying of Abuses, if any have crept in, or yet for the ease of tender Consciences (so that it endamage not the Foundation) I am contented to hear, and will be ready to give a Gracious Answer.

For

For the Second (Policy) As the Kings Duty is to Protect the Church, so it is the Churches to Assist the King in the maintenance of his just Authority, and before my Predecessors have been always carefull (especially since the Reformation) to keep the Dependence of the Clergy entirely upon the Crown, without which it will scarcely sit fast upon the Kings Head. Therefore do nothing to change or lessen this necessary Dependence.

Concerning the Militia, after Conscience this is certainly the fittest Subject for a Kings Quarrel, for without it, the Kings Power is but a shadow; and therefore upon no means to be Acquired, but to be maintained according to the Ancient Laws of the Land. Yet (because to attain to this so much wished Peace by all good Men) it is in a manner necessary, that sufficient and reall Security be given for performance of the Agreement.

I permit you therefore, either by leaving strong Towns, or other Military Forces into their Possession (untill Articles be performed) to give such Assurance for performance of Conditions, as you shall judge necessary, to conclude a Peace.

Provided alwayes, that you take (at least) as great Care by sufficient Security, that Conditions be performed to Me. And to make sure, that, the Peace once settled, all Things shall return into their Ancient Channels.

For Ireland, I confess they have very specious popular Arguments to press this Point, they gaining no Article more conducing to their Ends then this; and I have as much Reason both in Honour and Policy to take Care how to Answer this, as any: All the World knows the Eminent Inevitable Necessity, which caused me to make the Irish Cessation; and there remain yet as strong Reasons, for the concluding of that Peace. Wherefore you must content to nothing to hinder me therein, untill a clear way be shewen to Me, how my Protestant Subjects there, may probably (at least) Defend themselves; and that I shall have no more need to Defend my Conscience and Crown from the Injuries of this Rebellion.

The Protestation Consented to, and Taken, by his Majesties Commissioners appointed to Treat.

IA.B. One of the Commissioners Assigned by his Majesty for this present Treaty at Uxbridge, do Protest and Promise in the sight of Almighty God, that I will not Disclose nor Reveal to any person, or persons whatsoever (who is not a Commissioner), any Matter, or thing that shall be spoken of during the Treaty by any One, or more of his Majesties Commissioners; in any private Debate among themselves, concerning the said Treaty, so as to Name, or Describe Directly, or Indirectly, the person, or persons that shall speak any such Matter, or Thing, unless by the Consent of all the said Commissioners, that shall be then Living.

Memorandum, That it is by all the said Commissioners agreed, that this shall not bind, where any Ten of the Commissioners shall agree to certify his Majesty, the Number of the Assentors, or Dissentors upon any particular Result in this Treaty, not Naming, or Describing the Persons.

The Commissioners on both sides being met, the things to be Treated of were;

First, Religion.

Secondly, The Militia.

Thirdly, Ireland.

But first, the Kings Commissioners give in this Paper concerning Religion.

First, That Freedom be left to all Persons of what Opinion soever in Matters of Ceremony, and that all the Penalties of the Laws and Customes which enjoin these Penalties be suspended.

The Officers of the Kings Commissioners concerning Religion.

Secondly, That the Bishops shall exercise no Act of Jurisdiction, or Ordination, without the Consent and Counsel of the Presbyters, who shall be Chosen by the Clergy of each Diocese, out of the Learnedest and Gravest Ministers of that Diocese.

Thirdly, That the Bishop keep his constant Residence in his Diocese, except when he shall be required by his Majesty to Attend Him on any Occasion: And that if he be not hindered by the Infirmary of old Age, or Sickness, he Preach every Sunday in some Church within his Diocese.

Fourthly, That the Ordination of Ministers shall be alwayes in the Publick and Solemn manner, and very strict Rules observed concerning the Sufficiency and other Qualifications of those Men, who shall not yet be received into Holy Orders, without the Consent and Approbation of the Presbyters, or the Major part of them.

Fifthly, That Competent Maintenance be established by Parliament, to such Vicaridges as belong to Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, out of the Impropriations, according to the Value of the several Parishes.

Sixthly, That no man shall be capable of Two Parsonages or Vicaridges, with Cure of Souls.

Seventhly, That towards the settling of the publick Peace, an Hundred thousand pounds shall be raised by Parliament, out of the Estates of Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, in such manner as the King and Parliament shall think fit, without the Alienation of any of the said Lands.

Eighthly, That the Jurisdiction in Causes Testamentary, Decimals, Matrimonials, be settled in such manner as shall seem most convenient by the King and Parliament: And likewise that Acts be passed for Regulating of Visitations, and against Immoderate Fees in Ecclesiastical Courts, and Abuses by frivolous Excommunications, and all other Abuses in Ecclesiastical Jurisdictions, as shall be agreed upon by King and Parliament.

And if the Parliaments Commissioners will insist upon any other things which they shall think necessary for Religion, the Kings Commissioners shall very willingly apply themselves to the Consideration thereof.

The Parliaments Commissioners Paper concerning Religion, was,

That the Bill be passed for Abolishing and taking away of all Archbishops, Bishops, &c. according to the Third Proposition.

That the Ordinances concerning the Calling and Sitting of the Assembly of Divines, be Confirmed by Act of Parliament.

That the Directory for publick Worship, already passed both Houses, and the Propositions concerning Church-Government annexed, and passed both Houses, be Enacted as a part of Reformation of Religion and Uniformity, according to the first Proposition.

That his Majesty take the Solemn League and Covenant, and that the Covenants be enjoined to be taken, according to the second Proposition.

To this was Annexed the following Paper.

That the Ordinary way of dividing Christians into distinct Congregations, and most expedient for Edification, is, By the respective Bounds of their Dwellings.

That the Minister and Church-Officers in each Congregation, shall joyn in the Government of the Church, as shall be Established by Parliament.

That many particular Congregations shall be under one Presbyterian Government.

That

That the Church be Governed by Congregationall, Classicall, and Synodical Assemblies to be Established by Parliament.

That Synodical Assemblies shall consist both of Provincial and National Assemblies.

Which Papers took up three Dayes of the Treaty in Dispute; the next three Dayes were Ordered for the Militia, and was afterwards Resumed for other three Dayes.

Propositions concerning the Militia, the Fourth of February.

Concerning the Militia.

We desire, That the Subjects of England may be Armed, Trained, and Disciplined, as the Parliament shall think fit.

The like for Scotland, as the Parliament there shall think fit.

That an Act for settling the Admiralty, and Forces at Sea, and Moneys thereto for Maintenance, may be as the Parliament shall think fit.

The like for Scotland.

That there be an Act for settling all Forces by Sea and Land, in Commissioners, to be named by the Parliament, and as both Kingdomes shall Confide in, and to suppress all Powers and Forces contrary thereto, and to Act as they shall be directed by Parliament.

So for the Kingdom of Scotland.

That the Militia of the City of London, and of the Parishes within London, and the Liberties within the Weekly Bills of Mortality, be in the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council.

That the Tower of London may be in the Government of the City, and chief Officers, those to be Nominated, and removed by the Common Council.

That the Citizens, and Forces of London, may not be drawn out of the City, without their own consent; and that the Example in these distracted Times, be no Precedent for the Future.

The next Three Dayes began the Seventh of February, and the same was taken up again; on February the Eighteenth began the other Three Dayes, for Ireland.

That an Act of Parliament be passed to make void the Cessation of Ireland, and all Treaties with the Rebels, without consent of Parliament, and to settle the Prosecution of the War of Ireland in the Parliament, to be Managed by the joyned Advice of both Kingdomes, and his Majesty to Assist, and to do no Act to Discountenance, or Molest them therein.

These things being of great Consequence, I have set down Verbatim, without any Variation. The Kings Commissioners would not consent to the Parliaments Propositions, in any of the Three Points, of Religion, Militia, or Ireland; but motioned, That if the Articles proposed by them did not give Satisfaction, that then so great an Alteration as a total Abolishment of a Government Established by Law may be suspended, till after the Disbanding of all Armies, the King may be present with the Parliament, and a Nationall Synode may be called to consider and determine of so Important a Business.

Secondly, For the Militia, they would condescend no further, than that the Persons to be trusted with the Militia be Nominated between them, or that an equal Number, the one half by the King, and the other by the Parliament, and this to be but for three years.

But Thirdly, As to Ireland, they justified the Kings Proceedings, and would not allow of any thing which should make against the Cessation: And so the Treaty takes end, without any thing effected of what the poor People longed for; the Commissioners on both sides being so much bounded by their Superiours, though his Majesty on his part condescended as far as in reason he could.

The Marquis of Winchester held out his House at Basing for the King; to Reduce which, Sir William Waller with his new Levies, advances and Storms it thrice in Nine Dayes, but was beaten off, and fain to Retreat to Farnham: Colonell Norton succeeds in that Service, with whom joyn Colonell Morley, and Sir Richard Onslow, who fall furiously to the Work, but with greater hurt to themselves.

Basing House Besieged by Sir William Waller.

Shortly

1644.

Shortly after Colonel Whithead comes to them with his Regiment. The Besiegers fall to Battering, while Necessities encrease within. Norton sends his Summons, which are contemned by the Marquis. The Besieged fall out, and do much Execution. Now comes Sir William Waller himself, and with some Troops Faced the House, on whom the Besieged play from their Works; the Marquis sends to Oxford for Relief, which is promised: In the mean time, Waller departs, Colonel Gage is sent from Oxford, with a Regiment of bold Blades, who findes Norton ready to receive him on Chinham Down Septemb. 12. Gage makes his Approach, appearing first on a Hill near the High-way, which leads to Andover; Whereupon Norton Charges with great Courage, and breaks through the others Horse, who having a Reserve of Musketeers, with more then Ordinary Valour, forced Norton to Retreat as far as the Church, and so through Basing-floke. The same time the Besieged sallied out at several places, brought in many Prisoners, Viz. Two Captains, two Lieutenants, four Sergeants, and neer an hundred private Souldiers; The Relief which Gage brought in, consisted of many Horse-load of Powder, and Match, a Drove of Cattel, besides Plunder from Basing-floke.

November the sixteenth, The Besiegers after four and twenty Weeks labour in vain, raise the Siege, having lost about 1000 Men one way or other, during their stay before that House. Nor had the Kings Forces any better success in their long Sieges before Rhymond, Lyme, and Tandon in the West, which three Places cost them the lives of some Thousands of their Souldiers, and yet not taken at last.

The Archbishop of Canterbury had been accused by the Parliament, in the year 1640, as Farmer of the Canons agreed upon by the Convocation, and for other Delinquencies, and the Scots had joyined him with the Earl of Stratford in their Grand Accusation, and charged him for Obtaining upon their Nation the Liturgy, or Book of Common-Prayer, and the new Book of Canons, and Constitutions Ecclesiasticall, and for advising the King to Dissolve the last Parliament, and such other things: For which he was first committed to the Custody of the Black-Rod, and Ten Weeks after Voted Guilty of High-Treason, and sent Prisoner to the Tower, where he continued the space of four years; in which mean time, his Rents were Sequestred, his Goods, Books, and Papers seized. His Charge was, endeavouring the Subversion

1. Of the Laws.
2. Of Religion.

3. Of the Priviledges of Parliament. After a hundred times Attendance on the House, January the fourth, they passed their Ordinance of Parliament, that he should be Hanged, Drawn, and Quartered; but upon his Petition, they Voted him to be Beheaded, and allowing his Chaplain, Doctor Stern, to Administer with him, they also joyined Mr. Marshall, but the Archbishop refused him. January the Tenth, he was brought to the Scaffold on Tower-Hill, by Alderman Pennington, where he made his last Sermon, or Speech, which lasted about an hour, having for his Text the second Verse of the Twelfth Chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews; and then after Prayer, and some short Ejaculations, laid down his Head upon the Block, which the Executioner Chopt off at one Blow. And this was the end of that great Prelate, William Laud, after he had seen that Hierarchy and Liturgy Abolished, whereof he Lived and Died so stout a Champion.

The Parliament were somewhat discontented with their General, the Earl of Essex, whom they suspected as Careless, or Discontent, because after the Second Battell at Newbury, he suffered the King to march away, without any Molestation, and after to Relieve Donnington Castle; and beside, that he had quitted Newbury, and let it fall into the Kings Hands, to serve as a Cover-Quarter for his Forces; whereupon they begin to consider of new Modelling the Army.

The King was much Taxed, by those who were not slack to find out Occasions of Cavill against him, about the Treaty at Uxbridge; especially for bewraying so much Favour and good Will to the Irish, as was discovered in the Article about Ireland; and also his Transaction with them; as namely, his Writing two Letters to the Earl of Ormond, to hasten the Peace with them; and promising them that the Penal Statutes against Roman Catholics should not be put in Execution, the Peace being made, and they remaining in their due Obedience. And further, that when they gave him that Assistance which they promised for his English Occasions, then he would consent to the Repeal of them all, by a Law, except those against Appeals to Rome and Prebendary; Nay, and more than this; it is layd to his Charge as a matter of a high Nature, that he had written to Ormond a Third Letter for the hastning the Peace, which rather than misse, he should promise to joyne with them against the Scots, and the Lord Inchiquin: These things the Parliament did much exaggarate against him, and also took such Care for Succouring their Friends against the Rebels, that they were never able to send over the promised Supplies to the King.

The Earl of Montrose entred Scotland, April the thirteenth, and seized Dunsmire, expelling Antrim's Irish, which not coming according to promise, he was fain to retire into England, and from thence sends the Lord Ogleby, and Sir William Rollock Disguised into the Heart of Scotland, who bring back uncomfortable Tydings of the great Power and Strength of the Covenanters; whereupon he sends Ogleby to the King for more Men, or at least Armes from beyond-Sea; but these Messengers were surprized, and Imprisoned by the Covenanters. Montrose with a small Retinue, re-enters Scotland, and comes to his Cousin Patrick Graham, where he lyes close, untill

The Archbishop of Canterbury brought to his Tryal.

Beheaded at Tower-hill.

The Parliament begin to think of new Modelling the Army.

The King tax'd as a Favourer of the Irish Rebels.

Montrose's his Proceedings in Scotland.

Instead of Ten thousand promised, Alexander Macdonell brings over into the North of Scotland, 110 Irish from Antrim, with whom Montrose meets in Athole, where Eight hundred Country-men joyne with them. With these Forces he proceeds further, and the Lord Kilpont, Son to the Earl of Taith, and Sir John Drummond, Son to the Earl of Perth, Unite with them. With Five hundred Foot: The Covenanters Rendezvouzed at Perth, and from thence draw out to Tepper Moore, Commanded by the Earl of Tullibarden, and the Lords Elch and Drummond, with Six thousand Foot, and Seven hundred Horse: ready to Fight.

September the First, the Lord Drummond comes out with a Fortiori Hope, and at the first Onset is Routed back to the Main Body, and so Montrose with a shout, let loose his whole Forces upon them, and puts them to flight, with the Slaughter of Two thousand, and many Prisoners, and the City of Perth taken.

After this Victory, the Earl of Kinnle and Arley, Sir Thomas Ogleby, and his Brother Sir David, and other Gentlemen thereabouts come in to him, with whom he seeks out the Enemy, who lay at Aberdeen with an Army of Two thousand Foot, and Five hundred Horse, Commanded by the Lord Barghley, expecting the Conjunction of the Earl of Argile, and his Forces, which Montrose means to prevent by Fighting them: Montrose had but four and forty Horse, (none at all in the first Battell) and Fifteen hundred Foot, all resolute Men, which did their Work with much Courage, Routed the Enemy, and had the pursuit of them to the Gates of Dundee: After which, Montrose enters Aberdeen; But News comes Post, that the Earls of Argile and Lothian were at hand with a strong Body of Horse; which Montrose unable to Encounter with, retires to Higland Mountains, and goes to Strathbeggy, to try if he could perswade the Gordons to engage on his Side, but they were hindred by the Earl of Huntly their Chief, who though a Royalist himself, yet out of meer Envy to Montrose, did more Obstruct the Kings Business, then the Covenanters themselves.

Here Montrose sculkt, but Argile and Lothian follow him, and near Ferry Castle they Skirmish together, and the Montrosians having the advantage of a Hill, put their Enemies to a disorderly Retreat: After which, they both fall to Treating, during which, some of Montrose's Followers are dealt with to Betray him; wherefore to secure himself, he marcheth away to Badrineth, many of his Men by Argile's Corruption falling off from him, and making no stay there, through unknown By-ways, comes to Dunkeldin, and frightens Argile out of those Parts: Macdonnell was Employed by Montrose to the Mack Renolds, with whom he used such Perswasions, that 500 of them with their Chief, followed him to the Earl, and Patrick Graham brings some Recruits from Athole with these Montrose's marches through Braidalmain into the Country of Argile, where the Earl was lifting Souldiers, near the Castle Immerare, but Montrose's coming Scares him away, and he Victorious divides his Army into Three Brigades, himself Leading the One, Macdonnell Another, and Macdonald a Third, and with Fire and Sword Devastates all, and so departs to Lagbess, where 5000 Horse and Foot commanded by the Earl of Sesfort, were ready to Oppose him, and the Earl of Argile not far off with 3000 Foot at Innerlochy. To prevent their Joyning, he resolves to fall upon Argile, which he does on the 2d. of February, and after a short Fight, in which 1500 were slain, put him to the Rout, with such Terror, that they ran Nine miles out-right. On Montrose's Part were but few killed, though many hurt, of whom Sir Thomas Ogleby dyed after of his Wounds.

In England the Kings Forces prevail in Gloucestershire, and take Rowdon-House, after stiff Resistance made by the Colonels, Deverex, and Stevens: and Colonel Hopton, having raised Sixty Horse, and Forty Foot for the Parliament, is surprized and carried Prisoner with all his Men into Linbury in Hersfordshire: But the Parliamentarians meet with Sir John Winter abroad, and beat him; and about the same time another Party of their Side surprize Shrewsbury: Prince Rupert is now in Wales, and with him Prince Maurice, the Lord Hastings, Ashley, Langdale, and Gerrard, with the greatest Part of the Kings Forces, and are very active in Impressing more Men and Arms in the Neighbouring Counties. Nor was the King Sollicitous only at home, but by his Agents abroad Negotiated with foreign Princes for Ayde: The Duke of Lorrain had an Indifferent Army about Colten, with whom the Queen Treats, and had brought her Business to some end, when Cardinal Mazarine spoys all, and finds other Work for the Duke.

To Denmark Colonel Cockram was sent with Instructions; and indeed King Christian was willing to have Assisted his Nephew, but he was suddenly Imbroyled at home by the Invasion of the Swedes, who had well-near ruined the Dane this year, if the Hollander had not Arrived with a Fleet at Copenhagen for his Defence, and in it an Ambassador to the Swedes, by whose Means Advantages; and two years after, the old King Christian (now at Peace, though with the losse of a considerable Part of his Dominion,) having Reigned above Fifty years, Deceased, leaving a Son named Erndrick the Third, to succeed him. And so his Majesty being here also frustrated, was fain to apply himself to make the best Provision that he could at home, to Cope with the Parliament's New Modell. And thus ends this Year.

It was now the One and twentieth Year of his Majesties Reign, being the year 1645; at the beginning whereof, the Parliament were buied about framing an Ordinance for calling the Members of both Houses from Military and Civill Affairs and Places; which was at last passed, nor without without Exceptions of some, as Cromwell, and a few others: And this was call'd the Self-denying Ordinance.

Rowdon House taken by the Cavaliers.

Strensbury surprized by the Parliament's Forces.

The King sends to the Duke of Lorrain, and the King of Denmark for Ayde.

The Parliamentarians had, as we have said, Surprized Shrewsbury, for which piece of Service, Colonel Mittin receives publick Thanks in the House of Commons, and that deservedly, in respect of the great advantage they got by it: It having been the Kings chiefest Garrison, as may be judged by the following particulars: for here were taken Eight Knights and Baronets, forty Colonels, Majors Captains, and others of Quality, besides common Men, Fifteen Pieces of Ordnance, many hundreds of Arms, divers Barrells of Powder, Prince Maurice's Magazine, and all this without any considerable Loss.

February the Twenty second, About this time Ambassadors come to the Parliament from Swedenland, with whom the Parliament (being offended with the Dane, for his forwardness to Assist the King) readily entered into a League of strict Amity and Friendship.

Sir Marmaduke Langdale with 2000 Horse and Dragoons from Oxford, beats the Lincolnsire Horse, Relieves Newark, Belvey, and Asby-Delazonch, with Provision, and marcheth Northward to Pomfret, and in the night of the Lord Fairfax's Power, Relieveth that Castle also: from thence he returns to Newark, so to Lichfield, then to the Forrest of Dean, and beats off Colonel Massey from lying before Lidbury.

The King at Oxford takes Care to furnish his Garrisons, and to fit his Army for the Field, and the Earl of Northampton Routs the Parliament's Northampton Horse: But Major General Brown Governour of Abbingdon for the Parliament, sends out several Parties, who return with Success: And about this time the House of Lords make the Earl of Northumberland and his Counsellors, Governour, and Councellers of the Kings Children at White-Hall.

The Parliament having resolved to Modell the Army, the Earls of Essex, Manchester, and Dorset, Surrender their Commissions in the House of Lords, but withall, desire that their Souldiers Arrears may be discharged, which the Lords commend to the Commons, and a Vote is passed for it, and 10000 l. per annum ordered to the Earl of Essex out of Delinquents Estates, for his Services and Losses: And the Earl of Warwick yields up his Commission of Admirall, which Offices are presently Insulted to Commissioners.

The Parliament after some Jarring of both Houses about it, Elec'ted Sir Thomas Fairfax to be General of their Army, and had accordingly sent for him up out of the North, which was the reason that he was not present, when Sir Marmaduke Langdale Defeated his Fathers Forces, and Relieved Pomfret: The other Chief Officers of this New Modell were these, Philip Skippon Major General to the whole Army, Oliver Cromwell Lieutenant General of the Horse, Thomas Hammond Lieutenant General of the Ordnance, Henry Ireton Commissary-General of the Horse, The Colonells of Foot were these, Sir Hardress Waller, Hamond, Harley, Mountague, Loph Pickering, Holburn, Craford, Berkley, Aldridge, Ingouldsby, Rainsborough, Welden. For the Horse were, Buller, Sheffield, Fleetwood, Roffiter, Rich, Whaley, Graves, Sidney, Middleton, Vermuden, Levisaire, and Sir Robert Pie, and Colonel Okey of Dragoons.

General Fairfax having received his Commission, yet stayed for the finishing of the Great Ordinance, the Effect of which was;

That all and every the Members of either House shall be discharged (at the end of Forty Dayes, after the passing of this Ordinance) of all their Command, Military, or Civil, conferred by Parliament since the Twentieth of November, 1640.

That all other Governours and Commanders (not Members) by Land, or Sea, shall continue in their Offices, wherein they were Intrusted the 20 of March, 1644.

Provided and Excepted, That Lieutenants and their Deputies in several Counties, Cities, and Places, or of any Custos Rotulorum, or Justices of Peace, or Stewards, or any Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, or Goal-Delivery: And also, that those Members of either House who had Offices by Grant from his Majesty, before the Parliament, and were by him Displaced before the Sitting of this Parliament; and have since by the Parliament been restored, shall not be Discharged from their said Offices, or Profits thereof, but shall Enjoy the same:

After this unhappy new Modell it was that the Kings Affairs in all parts began fatally to decline.

April 31 Sir Thomas Fairfax sets forth for Windsor, where he applies himself to the framing of his new Army, a Business of no small Difficulty, in which Major General Skippon to effectually bestrid himself, that the Parliament thought fit to send him a Letter of hearty Thanks, for that and all his former faithfull Services: Hither comes Lieutenant General Cromwell, whom after some Salutations passed, the General Ordered to march towards Oxford with a Brigade of 1100 Horse, and Dragoons, to intercept a Convoy of 2000 Horse, which Prince Rupert had sent from Worcester to fetch off the King, with his Train of Artillery, and some Foot, so to Imbody and take the Field. At Ipsley Bridge Cromwell falls upon them, and Routs them, takes between Four and five Cromwell routs the Cavaliers at Ipsley Bridge, takes Blabington House, and falls upon a Party at Bampton Bush.

A five hundred Horse, and Two hundred Prisoners with the Queens Standard; the rest betook themselves to Blabington House, whither Cromwell pursues them, and sends a sharp Summons to the Governour, who doubting of Relief from Oxford, thinking that the Enemy had a considerable Strength of Foot, and over-weighed by the pulling Tears of some Ladies got thither to visit his Wife, Surrendered the House with all the Arms, and Ammunition, which were sent to Alisbury, and the House slighted; for which the Governour Colonel Windbank is shot to death at Oxford: Cromwell Improves his Success, and falls upon a Party of 350 Foot, about Bampton Bush, whom he Defeats and takes them almost all Prisoners, with their Arms and Ammunition, and sends them with a Convoy to Abbingdon. And Colonel John Fines beats another Party of Horse, and takes 150 Horse, 3 Colours, 40 Prisoners, and 50 Arms. Sir John Winter being Relieved by all Gloucester Forces upon him. April 22. the Prince marches all Night to his Assistance, and finds Massey before Lidbury, and gives him a suddain Alarm: Massey being thus put to it, drew off and fought the Horse, entreating the Cavaliers with hot Charges, whilst the Foot might get up, but being over-powered was fain to give way, and the Cavaliers falling in upon the Foot, did much Execution upon them. Massey's Horse was shot dead under him by Prince Rupert, and Major Backhouse received his Mortall Wound, divers were slain, the rest by flight escaped.

Prince Rupert marches from thence with about 6000 Horse and Foot towards Ludlow, and so to Shrewsbury, Dreining Garrisons, and taking to him the less Brigades, and so he and his Brother Maurice, assisted with Goring's Horse and Dragoons, fetch'd off the King from Oxford, who with a numerous Army Advanced towards the Relief of Chester: but Goring takes leave, desiring to return to the West, to hinder the raising of Taunton Siege; but in his Way would beat up the Quarters of Lieutenant General Cromwell, who with his own Forces, and a supply of some Foot from Abbingdon, streightned the Kings Garrison at Farrington: But his Design being discovered, Cromwell was ready to Encounter him near Newbridge, where at first the Cavaliers had somewhat the better; but in the end Cromwell gaining the Passage over Newbridge, Goring declines engaging with all speed, and marches back after the Army into the West.

General Fairfax's Army being now fully Completed, it was taken into Consideration, Whether he should Besiege Oxford, it being the Kings chief Garrison, and the Place where most of his Artillery lay, and therefore of great Consequence, or else relieve Taunton: The Commiseration of which Distressed Towns estate, at length over-weighed in their Counsells, and so the General Advanced that way as far as Blainford, whilst Cromwell and Brown were Ordered to attend the Kings Marches: but upon second thoughts, the General was recalled, and Colonel Welden with a Brigade of well near 2000 Horse, and 5000 Foot, was Deputed to that Service, and so Fairfax departs to Newbury, whither came Cromwell and Brown to Confer with him, and so returned again to their Charges; and during the time of the Generalls stay in that Town, happened the forementioned Skirmish between Cromwell and Goring: And now Fairfax receives an Express to Advance to Oxford, and lay close Siege to it; and Lieutenant General Cromwell, and Major General Brown, are re-called from following the King, to Assist the General in the Siege.

Colonel Welden was come within a dayes March of Taunton, the Kings Forces being Informed that it was the whole Army, resolved to give one furious Assault, and in case that took no effect, to retire and be gone, which was performed; and so on Monday, May 12. Colonel Welden enters Taunton, and finds the Town almost ruined by Fire, Two long Streets of fair Buildings being burnt to the Ground. And thus was Taunton relieved, after it had long endured an hard Siege.

Major General Massey after his Defeat at Lidbury, received 340 Horse Auxiliaries from Newport-Pamell, and a larger Supply than that was afterwards brought him by Major Buller, so that now he was in a Condition to effect something, being also freed from his grand Enemy Sir John Wilmor, who being called away to publick Service in the Army, had Demolished his House at Lidbury.

Massey draws forth 500 Foot from Gloucester, and 200 from Warwick, with a strong able Brigade of Horse, against Evesham, where Colonel William Legg was Governour, who refusing to yield upon Summons, Massey storms the Town, and takes it with the Governour, and 20 Officers, 300 Foot, and 120 Horse, with all the Arms and Ammunition. And the General lying before Oxford, sent out a Party of Horse and Foot under Colonel Rainsborough, to Summon Gannus-Hole; the Governour whereof, though at first he answered, That he liked not Windbanks Law; yet seeing Rainsborough ready to storm it, Surrenders upon Quarter.

The King with his Army marching towards Chester, carried such a Terrour with him, that made Sir William Brereton quit the Siege, and so his Work being done, he wheels about, and sits down before Leicester, and sends a Summons to the Town, who return their Desires of Respite till the next Morning: The Trumpeter being returned with the Message, a Drum was instantly dispatched, requiring an Answer within a quarter of an hour; which time whilst they within spend in Debate, the Kings Cannons play upon the Town from the Battery, and all Commanded to their Charge, in order to a Storm; the Contest continued a day and a Night, and the Town was stormed at six or seven places, and about three of the Clock was entered, Saturday, May 31. The Committee-men, with the Governour Colonel Gray, and Hacker were taken Prisoners much Ammunition;

Colonel Windbank shot to death at Oxford.

Prince Rupert fetcheth off the King from Oxford.

Fairfax sends Colonel Welden to the Relief of Taunton.

Massey takes Evesham by Storm.

The Kings Army relieves Chester, and takes Leicester by Storm.

Taunton strengthened again by the Kings Forces in the West.

Ammunition, and the Plunder of the Town sent to the Kings Garisons thereabouts; those that escaped, fled to Rockingham-Castle: and from thence the King Triumphant marches towards Northampton, and Faces that Town.

In the West, Goring, Hopton, and Greenvil unite their Forces, and fall upon Welden's Brigade, whom they forced to retire to Taunton in great Disorder, where though the Town had been formerly Relieved with all manner of Provisions, it being kept in altogether by a Potent Enemy, they were greatly streightened, and distressed. Fairfax hereupon was Commanded to rise from before Oxford, and Cromwell marcheth into the Afflicted Counties to prevent the Kings Eruption into them, and Colonel Vermuden was to joyn with the Scots, with a Party of 2500 Horse and Dragoons, in case the King should Advance Northwards.

Friday the fifth of June, the Army had a generall Rendezvous at Great Brickhill, where Intelligence was brought them, that the King was about Darenty and thereupon it was resolved to give Battell, and to that end Lieutenant General Cromwell is sent for, who came afterwards with 600 Horse and Dragoons: Colonel Vermuden also returned to the General, because the Scots had unexpectedly Retreated to Westmerland, and Fairfax sends Post to Sir John Gell, Colonel Rossiter, and the Governours of Coventry, Warwick, Northampton, and Nottingham, to march with all speed with their Forces to the Army, for that there was likely to be speedily an Engagement.

The Kings Forces lay still about Darenty, and Burrough-hill, which being a place of great Advantage, it was thought he had chosen to Fight upon; but his Design was (having Relieved Oxford with force of Cartell and Sheep) to march for the Un-setting of Pomfret and Scarborough: But Fairfax Advanceth to Gilborough, within four miles of Northampton, and five miles of Burrough-hill, and both Armies lying nigh one another; the Fairfaxians Alarum the Cavaliers, and take some Prisoners, the King being then abroad.

Time this Thirteenth, the King drew off from Burrough-hill, to Harborough, minding to march to Pomfret; and thinking, that if he were followed, he should Fight with more Advantage, further Northward.

Fairfax sends out Ireton with a flying Party of Horse, who falls upon a Party of the Kings Rear, Quartered in Naseby Town, takes many Prisoners, some of the Princes Lifeguard, and Langdale's Brigade, and gives such an Alarum to the whole Army, that the King at Midnight leaves his own Quarters, and for Security hastens to Harborough, where the Van of his Army was Quartered. Draught: Prince Rupert, and calls a Council of War, where it was resolved to give Battell; and because Fairfax had been so forward, they would no longer stay for him, but seek him out: Fairfax was come from Gilborough, to Gilling, and from thence to Naseby, where both Armies drawn up in Battallies faced one another.

The Battell at

Saturday, June 14, was fought that unfortunate Battell which prov'd so fatal to the King and his Cause. His Majesty Commanded the main Body, Prince Rupert, and Prince Maurice the Right Wing, Sir Marmaduke Langdale the Left, the Earl of Linsley, and the Lord Aspley, the Right-hand Reserve, the Lord Bards and Sir George Lyle, the Left. Of the Parliamentary Army, Fairfax and Skippon Commanded the Main Body, Cromwell the Right Wing, with whom was Rossiter, who came with his Forces but a little before the Fight, and Ireton had the Left. The Relieves were brought up by Rainsborow, Hammond, and Pride: Prince Rupert Charged the Parliamentary Left Wing, Commanded by Ireton, who made notable Resistance, but at last was forced to give Ground, Ireton himself being run through the Thigh with a Pike, and into the Face with a Halbert, his Horse shot under him, and himself taken Prisoner. For a while Rupert follows the Chase almost to Naseby Town, and in his return summoned the Train, who made no other answer but with their Fire-locks: But in the mean time, Cromwell Chargeth furiously on the Kings Left Wing, and got the better, forcing them from the Body, and prosecuting the Advantage, quite broke them, and their Reserve; during which, the main Bodies had Charged one another with incredible Piereness, often Retreating and Rallying, falling in together with the But-ends of their Muskets, and coming to handy-Blows with their Swords: But Fairfax's Foot coming up seasonably to the Horse, and Cromwell coming in with his Victorious Right Wing, they all Charged together upon the Kings main Army, who unable to endure any longer, retir'd out of the Field towards Leicester, and Prince Rupert, who now too late returned from his too eager Pursuit, seeing the Day lost, accompanied them in their Flight, leaving (as Heaven would have it) a compleat Victory to the Parliamentarians, who pursued them within two Miles of Leicester, and the King finding the Pursuit so hot, leaves that Town, and hastes to Litchfield. This Battell was exceeding Bloody, both Armies being very Courageous and Numerous not being 500 Odds, Fought in a large Fallow Field on the North-west side of Naseby, about a mile broad; which space of Ground was wholly taken up. On the Parliamentary side were Wounded and Slain above 1000 Officers and private Souldiers; Major General Skippon (who was an old experienced Souldier, and was ordered to draw up the Form of the Battell) Fought stoutly that day; and although he was sorely Wounded in the beginning of the Fight, and the General desired him to go off the Field, he answered, He would not stir so long as a man would stand; and accordingly stayed till the Battell was ended. Ireton (as is said before) was dangerously hurt, and taken Prisoner for a while, after he had done his Part, but in the confusion of the Fight got loose again, and saw the Victory Achieved. The General and Lieutenant-General performed 1645.

A performed their Work with sufficient Resolution, (had their Cause been as good) and by their own Examples infused Valour into their Followers: so likewise did the other Officers, of whom divers were wounded.

On the other side, the King shewed himself that Day a courageous General, keeping close with his Horse, and himself in Person Rallying them to hot Encounters, the Earl of Linsley, Lord Aspley, Colonel Rastol, and others, were wounded, 20 Colonels, Knights, and Officers of Note, and 600 private Souldiers slain: but much more was the Damage that the King sustained, by what was taken viz. Six Colonels, eight Lieutenant-Colonels, eighteen Majors, seventy Captains, eight Lieutenants, two hundred Ensigns, and other inferior Officers, 4500 Common Souldiers, and many Women, 13 of the Kings Household-Servants, four of his Foot-men, twelve Pieces of Ordnance, eight thousand Arms, forty Barrels of Powder, two hundred Carriages, all their Bag and Baggage, with store of rich Pillage, three thousand Horse, the Kings Standard, one of the Kings Coaches, and his Cabinet of Letters and Papers, which were after published (with less decency and civility, than became such an Assembly) by the Parliament: Sir Marmaduke Langdale halted away the same Night to Newark: The next day the General sent up Colonel John Fines to London, with the Prisoners, and Colours taken in the Fight. And with this comes Newes of several other Successes, as the gaining of Houghton Garison near Grantham; And Sir William Brereton's beating a Party of the Kings Forces in Cheshire, and taking a hundred and fifty prisoners; and four hundred prisoners taken in fight by a party from Shrewsbury, and the taking of Major Fenningham, and divers others, by Captain Stone, Governour of Eccleshal Castle in Staffordshire.

Sir John Gell was marching with two thousand Horse, according to the Generals Order, and in his way took ninety prisoners, some of them being of the Kings scattered Horse, and the rest Newarkians, and forthwith joyned with the General, who sat down before Leicester, April 16, and summoned the Governour, the Lord Hastings, to deliver up the Town: Which he refusing, Warrants are issued out for the Countrey to bring in Ladders, and other Necessaries for a Storm; and to the next day he Affairs the Town in several places, and at the Newark-side, made a wide Breach, which surpris'd the Governour into a Parley; after which ensued Surrender upon honourable Terms: In it were fourteen Pieces of Ordnance, thirty Colours, two thousand Arms, five hundred Horse, fifty Barrels of Powder, and other Ammunition proportionable.

And not long after, Sir Thomas Glenham, Governour of Carville in Cumberland, having been long Besieged by the Parliament Forces; and despairing of Succour, yields up the Town, June 28.

The low Condition of the Parliamentarians about Taunton, caused the Parliament and Committee of both Kingdoms, to Order the General to repair thither, which was readily obeyed; and Sir Thomas Fairfax by long Marches comes to Dorchester, and there hears that a multitude of rusticall people, called Club-men, were up in a Tumultuary way, Declaring themselves to be Neuters, being mostly Wiltshire, and Dorsetshire men: These had fallen upon Major-General Massey, who was likewise Commanded into those Parts with three thousand men, for the Relief of Taunton: Some of the Club-men were killed in the Quarrel, of which they boldly demanded Reparation; and their Numbers encreasing, forced the Parliamentarians Quarters at Sturminster, Newton, and other places, seize all their Horse in the Grounds, near one hundred Dragoons, and grew so insolent, as to Capitulate with Fairfax himself at Dorchester, and to desire safe Passage for their Commissioners, to go both to King and Parliament.

Sir Thomas sends them a Civil Answer in Writing; which not contenting them, they draw off in Discontent, and set upon a party of the Garison of Lyme, and kill some of them; but Fairfax and Massey joyning in a Body, scared them into more Moderation, so that the Army passed quietly on their Journey.

General Goring hearing of Fairfax's Approach, drew off from Taunton, in which Siege he had sustained great Loss, the place being stoutly maintained by Colonel Robert Blake: This man was formerly Assistant to Governour Cesly of Lyme, and was chief Actor in the Repulse of Prince Maurice from that Town, and afterwards found means to surprize Taunton; which with indefatigable Labour, and sufficient Courage, he kept against Goring's Forces, being first (after extreme Hardships endured) Relieved by Colonel Welden, and now by General Fairfax; for upon Report of the Generals coming, Goring Retreats to Langport, not without some loss by a Sally from the Besieged.

Fairfax and Massey had now again divided their Forces, Massey comes up by Adortaby, falls upon Goring's Rear, and takes some prisoners. On the other side of the River Fairfax marches up, and reduceth the Cavaliers to an inevitable necessity of fighting: Goring had seized a convenient Pass leading to Bridgewater, which Major Bethel and Major Desbrough force, and the General advances, and puts the Royalists to a disorderly Retreat; and pressing fiercely upon them, pursues them almost to Bridgewater, many slain, fourteen hundred prisoners taken, about twelve hundred Horse, Colonel Heningham, Colonel Slingsby, and divers Officers of quality, and thirty Colours.

In the Number of the slain on each side, there was not much odds, they were supposed in all to be about eleven hundred. This Battell was fought July 20, in Sutton Field near Langport.

Gen. Fairfax.

Goring having refreshed himself at Bridgewater, marcheth away to the North of Devonshire, and presently after Sir Thomas Fairfax sits down before that Town, (about the time that Purrough Garrison was taken by Colonel Okey) : The General sends in his Summons, which was resolutely refused by Colonel Windham, (who together with Sir John Digby, and Sir John Stowel, expect a gallant Resolution, to hold out as long as it was possible.) Whereupon he forms, and wins the lower part of the Town, but is repelled from the Upper, and much en-ammaged by the continual flinging of Granadoes, and other combustible Stuff from within. The next day he sends another Summons, telling them, That their Denial wrought no other thoughts of Compassion in him, but onely to Women and Children, who might otherwise suffer by the Governours Obstinacy; and so divers Ladies, Gentlewomen, and Children came out of the Town; and then the General being better provided with Materials for his Work, gave the second Assault; some stormed, others fired with Granadoes, and Slugs of hot Iron; and the Wind serving their turn, it wrought such Effect, that the Governour moved therewith, first Treated, and then Surrendered, upon condition onely of fair quarter, and the Town to be preserved from Plunder: And this July 23. there being 1000 Officers and Souldiers prisoners, 44 Barrels of Powder, 1500 Arms, 44 Pieces of Ordnance, and 400 Weight of Mutch.

Fight.

Sherborn Castle taken by Fairfax.

In the North, Pomfret Castle was taken by Major-General Poyns, and Scarborough by Sir Matthew Boynton. About the latter end of July, the General sent a party of Horse and Dragoons under Colonel Rich, and Colonel Okey to Bath, who had the Town surrendered to them, without any Opposition, there being in it but a very small Garrison.

The next Business was to attempt Sherborn Castle, where Sir Lewis Dives was Governour for the King: In the time of this Siege, the Club-men continued their Meetings, and Colonel Fleetwood was sent against them to Shaftesbury, who Invironed them in the Town, and carryed away fifty of the King-leaders prisoners, but this would not quash them; for shortly after, about four thousand Muster upon Hambel tow-Hill near Shrawton: Against these, Lieut. Gen. Cromwell marcheth, and endeavours to reduce them to Reason by Parley; but that proving fruitless, falls upon them, kills some, disperseth the rest, and takes four hundred prisoners, and so returned to the Generall lying before Sherborn.

This Despair being seconded by the Ordinance of Parliament against their Illegal Assembling, so allayed their impatient Spirits, that they never afterwards made any Disturbance.

Hereford yet held out for the King, which the Scots were ordered to Besiege, who accordingly D surrounded, and summoned the Governour Sir Barnaby Scudamore, which was answered with Neglect: Whereupon they begin their Approaches, and raised their Batteries, from whence they played with their Ordnance upon the Town, but did little Execution that way, and so fall to Mining, but are discovered and Countermined: This Siege continued till the first of September, at what time the tottering State of their Affairs in their own Country called for their Aid, Montrose prevailing incredibly against the Covenanters; David Lesley had been sent before with the greatest part of the Horse, and now General Leven ariseth from the Siege, with Intention to march Northwards, at the Nick of time that the King having raised some Recruits in Wales, with a flying Army came to Hereford, and did some hurt to the Rear of the departing Scots: David Lesley entered Scotland, and so managed his Business, that there was little need of Leven, who therefore takes up his Quarters in Yorkshire.

Indeed Sir Thomas Fairfax hearing of the Scottish Affairs, had sent a Letter subscribed by himself, and all the chief Officers of the Army, to General Leven, representing the Condition of their Kingdom, and their willingness to spare Forces for their Assistance. But about this time some Disgust arose between the Parliament and the Scottish Army, which made them somewhat more jealous of one anothers Intentions, while the Scots clamoured with the Parliament for Money, and the Parliament at the Scots, for not Addressing themselves to the Siege of Newark: Hereford Siege being raised, the King marches up and down Wales, to raise Supplies, thence comes to Lichfield, and by the way fights a party of Scottish Horse and Dragoon, then marches to Ashbourne, beats Sir John Gell, and carries some prisoners with him to Welbeck-house, and so with a flying Army rangeeth up and down, comes to Huntington, and takes that, marches to Cambridge, and after a small Skirmish forceth his Entrance, thence to St. Ives, which place he Fined five hundred pounds; thence to Owborn, and so to Oxford, August 28. where he staid not long, but advanced to Ludlow, earnestly intent upon the Relief of Chester, then close Besieged by Sir William Brereton.

Major-General Poyns, with a party of Horse, was appointed to attend the Kings Motion, and followed him to close, that on Ranton Heath, two miles off Chester, they came to a Fight, where Poyns was forced to give Ground, and had been utterly overthrown, if Colonel Jones had not come in with a new Supply from Brereton, which encouraged Poyns to Rally; and so the King being be-tet both Rear and Front, forsook the Field, and betook himself into Chester; but finding the City much weakened by Batteries, and the Assailants ready to storm, he took leave, and sped him into Wales again for Recruits.

General Fairfax was now before Sherborn Castle, of which Sir Lewis Dives was Governour, and would not hearken to any Summons, and so endured a furious Storm, till after an extreame cruel Fight, and much Bloud shed on both sides, the Castle was yielded upon Quarter, with four hundred prisoners, many of them persons of quality, 18 Pieces of Ordnance, and a Morter-Piece, August 15.

After

1645.

Bristol Besieged by Fairfax, and Cromwell.

A After the taking of Sherborn, it was Debated in a Conncell of War, Whether they should pursue Goring, or Besiege Bristol, whereof Prince Rupert was Governour: At last, the latter was resolved on, and accordingly they marched thither, and fate down before it; the Parliament Ships being Ordered to Guard it by Sea.

In the mean time, Nunney Castle was surrendered to Collonel Rainsborough, and Portsmouth Point to Collonel Kempson. Bristol was sufficiently furnished with P. provisions, for Food and Fighting, and the ill-affected Disarmed. Fairfax sends in his Summons to prevent Bloud-shed, and hazard to the City. Rupert desires leave to send to the King; which being denied, he offers to Surrender up the Place on these Conditions;

B Every Man to march away in the height of Honour, with their Arms, flying Colours, Drums, Trumpets, and as much Powder and Match as they could carry about them, with Bag and Baggage, Horse, Arms, Ten Guns, Fifty Barrels of Powder.
And lastly, The Lines and Fortifications to be slighted, and the City to be no more a Garrison.

Fairfax sends Answer satisfactory enough, as to the Concernments of the Souldiers, but not in reference to the Lines and Fortifications, and dismantling the Garrison.

Prince Rupert had made several Sallies, and done some Execution upon the Enemy, and had lost some considerable Persons on his own side too; as Sir Bernard Ashley, Sir Richard Crain, and others, who dyed of Wounds then received; but seeing no good to be done that way, the Parliament Strength increasing by the Accession of the Country people, he thought good to protract the time, by Treating, till his Counterscarpes and Lines were finished; which Fairfax now smelling out, resolves upon a Storm to be made good in three Places; Collonel Portescue with four Regiments to storm on Somerlesbury side; Collonel Montague with the like Number on both sides of Lakeford-Gate, and Collonel Rainsborough on this side the River From, from the Sally-Port to the Priors Port; and other Regiments disposed in several Stations, to second the Assailants, and to enter the Lines, in case of the Stormers success.

Portescue failed in his Attempt, and so did onely Alarm; Montague and Rainsborough did their Work, and forced their Entrance into the City, firing the Houses as they went; and the Seamen also Mastered Water-Port: And Prince Rupert having done as much as was possible, retired into the Castle, and the next day came to a Parley, and concluded on the same Articles, which Sir Thomas Fairfax formerly offered them, and so marched out September 12.

In this Service, the Parliament lost many men, Lieutenant-Collonel Parfey, and Captain Hill, were slain upon the place, Major Behel, and Major Cromwell mortally wounded.

This was Bristol, a place of great Consequence, gained to the Parliament, which might else have proved a Work of more Difficulty, if the King had joyned with Goring for the Relief of it, as was intended; the Parliament Forces being but sufficient for that Siege, and so not likely to have impeded their Conjunction: Here was found 140 Pieces of Canon mounted, 100 Barrels of Powder, Victuals in the Royal-Port for 150 Men; for 320 Days, the Castle Victualled for near half so long; the Prince had in Garrison 2500 Foot, 1000 Horse, besides the Trained-Bands, and Auxiliaries above 1000.

Bristol being thus reduced into the Parliament Power, General Fairfax marches to Exeter, and Lieutenant-General Cromwell to the Devizes, which after several Batteries he Mastered, and Laycock House was taken by Collonel Pickering, and Barkley Castle by Collonel Rainsborough, although he had a sharp Dispute for it first: And Parly Castle in Somerlesbury, and Sendal Castle in Yorkshire, reduced by the Forces of the Parliament; and Chefflow in Monmouthshire, by Col. Morgan, Maffey Successour in the Government of Gloucester: And October the fifth, Lieutenant-General Cromwell takes Winchester Castle, and from thence departs to Basing House, which had held out against many Assaults, ever doing more hurt than it received. But now comes Cromwell, and resolutely holds it, they within shewed themselves as valiant as ever, but meeting with other kind of men than formerly, the Marquess of Winchester was forced to yield, and not unkindly used by the Conquerours, who found an unexpected Mass of Wealth in the House.

In earnest, the King's Condition began now to be very low, he had been formerly Routed near Witchetty, and thence he made shift to get into that City: Afterwards getting out again into Wales, he had gotten together a good Body of Horse, with which he Courted up and down; and lastly, resolved to send the Lord Digby, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with some sixteen hundred Horse, to joyn with Montrose, who accordingly marched into Yorkshire, and near Sherborn surprised eight hundred Horse of the Parliamentarians, with their Arms; but staying for Carriages to convey them away, Collonel Copley, Collonel Liburn, and other Commanders of Yorkshire, with sufficient Force, came upon them, and Routed them, recovered all, took four hundred prisoners, and six hundred Horse; Digby's Coach and Cabinet of Letters; Digby with the rest flies Northwards, and at Castle Sands was the second time Defeated by Sir John Brown, with the loss of 100 slain, and the taking of 200 Horse, and many Prisoners; and in their Fight towards Bristol Castle, were met with by Collonel Briggs, who took 200 more of them, besides 180 of them, who flying through Windsor and Windsor, were seized by Vanderhuk; so that the Lord Digby, with a very small Retinue, fled over to the Isle of Man, and thence into Ireland to the Earl of Ormond.

The Parliament thrive every where; Fairfax takes Tiverton, Cromwel Langford House, and Major A General Lauchborn in Wales reduces Carmarthen.

While the General lay about Charde, the Lord Goring beat up his quarters by Night, took about 40 Foot, and 20 Dragoons; but then the Alarm being taken, the Cavaliers returned: Fairfax followed, and in his way (as was said) reduced Tiverton; and from thence, after several Marches, drew near to Exeter, which he streightned, in order to a Siege. About this time, Monmouth was taken by the Parliament's Forces, and Shelford house near Newark, Worton, Wiverton, and Welback, by Major-General Poyas: And now dies Colonel Pickering, who had done great Service for the Parliament in this War, but is here overtaken by a new Disease, which brought him to his End, with many others at Aintree.

Overtures of a Treaty between Prince Charles, Goring, and Sir Thomas Fairfax.

Col. Birch takes Hereford for the Parliament, by a Stratagem.

In this mean time, several Occurrences intervened between Prince Charles (his Majesty that now is) the Lord Goring, and General Fairfax, which last continually answered the two former, That he would Treat with them, as a Soldier, and a Servant to the Parliament, but no further; Goring crosseth the Seas for France, to raise new Supplies there against the next Summer: and Prince Charles, with his Council, bestirred themselves about raising the Counties of Cornwall and Devon, to disturb Sir Thomas Fairfax, in his lying before Exeter.

December the Eighteenth, Hereford was taken by Surprise, the manner thus; The Governour had issued out Warrants for the Country-people, to come in to work in the Town, for the service of the Garrison: Colonel Morgan, and Colonel Birch had Intelligence of it, and so laid their Design; Morgan had 1100 Horse and Foot, and Birch had 900 Foot, and a Troop of Horse ready for the Enterprize, with which they march from Glossopster to Hereford, in one Day and a Night, where some lully Fellows were picked up, and arrayed in the Habit of Country Labourers, and one of them to serve for a Constable, with a Warrant in his Hand, to bring these Fellows to work, according to the Governours Order; 150 Firelocks were lodged in the dark, as near the Gate as possible, and another Body to second them: So the Bridge is let down, the supposed Constable and his Companions enter, and presently take an occasion to quarrel with the Guard, killed three of them; then in come the Firelocks, and after Colonel Birch; and lastly, Colonel Morgan with the whole

Thereupon mastered the unware surprized Garrison, with small loss on either side, wherein were 11 Pieces of Ordnance, much Arms and Ammunition, the Lord Brudenel, and Judge Jenkins, 14 Knights, 4 Lieutenant-Colonels, three Captains, and other Officers and Gentlemen one hundred; and with this Action, Morgan and Birch gained much honour.

Worcester had been long Besieged, and much of the Kings Hope was reposed in the holding out of that City; many Engagements had been used for the Relief of it, and many Transactions had passed with the Irish about it; the Lord Biron was Governour of it, and Sir William Brereton for the Parliament had lain before it since August last, and endured many Sallies from the Besieged; Colonel Jones, and Colonel Lombard, who had hovered about Bristol, drew off at Midnight with a party of 1500 Horse and Foot, and by four of the clock attained the East-side of Chester, which they stormed in four several places; and though at first repulsed, yet continuing the Assault with much Resolution, forced the Cavaliers to effect the Forty-Street, which they took possession of, with the Mayors House, Sword, and Mace, and the Sheriffs Ward: After which piece of Service, Brereton Soldiers enlarge, and by degrees, almost block up the West-side too: Hereupon Sir William Kingham for the King, with 1700 Horse, and 700 Foot, marched towards the Besiegers, but is met with by Milton, Jones, and Lombard, with 1400 Horse, and 1000 Foot; between whom happened a resolute Engagement, but the Victory fell to the Parliamentarians, 100 slain, and 400 taken prisoners.

Worcester taken by the Parliament's Force.

A second Design of Relief was attempted by Sir Arthur Ashton, but he was routed at Sturbridge, and himself taken prisoner. So now Sir William Brereton summons the Governours, who yet stand out, and sends a Messenger to the King, who returning without any hopes of Success, Biron was contented to Treat, (the Suburbs, as was said, were taken before) and February the first surrendered the City upon honourable Conditions; and so Sir William marches towards Lichfield: And about this time, the Court of Wards and Liveries was Voted down by the Parliament.

A Quarrel amongst some of the Kings chief Commanders.

The King being come to Newark, as a place of greatest Security, and most unlikely to be Besieged, a strange Quarrel happened amongst the great Ones there, concerning the Lord Digby, lately defeated at Shirburn, whom Major General Charles Gerard charged with Treason: with him sided the two Princes, Rupert and Maurice, the Lord Hawley, and Sir Richard Willis; but Governour Bellasis stood up for Digby, with divers others: The Contention grew hot from Words they come to Swords, and the King coming in to part them, increased the Feude, by siding for Digby: Whereupon Rupert and the rest of the contrary Party, of the Number of four hundred, in much Disgust laid down their Commissions, and depart to another Place, where they stand upon their Guard, and so the King departs for Oxford, with a Guard of three hundred Horse, whom Poyas meets with at their Return, and Routs them; and then takes in Bevoys Castle, and not long after, the Countess of Dartmouth surrenders up her House at Latham to the Parliament.

Belvoir Castle, and Latham house surrendered to the Parliament.

The King at Oxford, with Rupert and Maurice now Reconciled, was blockt up by the Parliament's Forces; whereupon he commands a Fast to be observed every Fryday, during his Troubles.

In the mean time, a Treaty was Agitated between the King and Parliament; and the King desired to come to a Personal Treaty with the Two Houses at Westminster, and some likelihood there was of a good Effect: When all was Blasted on a sudden, by a Discovery of certain Transactions between the King and the Irish, gathered out of certain Letters which had been intercepted at Sherburn, by the taking of the Lord Digby's Coach, and others which had been taken out of the Pockets of the Bishop of Trane, slain in Ireland, at the Battell of Sleigo; all which Transactions were represented with very untoward Reflections upon the Kings Honour and Credit; as if the King, to get Supplies from the Irish Rebels, resolv'd to make Peace with them upon any Terms, though never so dishonourable, Viz. The granting them an absolute Toleration of Religion, the allowing them Power to choose a Governour of their Own, the entrusting them with several Castles and Forts for their Caution: And to aggravate the matter the more, a Commission directed to the Earl of Clanrickard is produc't, which made shew of some Clandestine Negotiations between his Majesty and the Earl, about concluding a Peace with the Rebels; in answer to which, the King in Two Messages; the first of the 17th of January, the other of the 24th, of January, Remonstrates to them, how ill a Ground these Allegations were for them to refuse to come to a Treaty of Peace with him, since their Disloyalty, in taking up Arms against their lawful Sovereign, compell'd him to take such Courses for the Vindicating and defending his Person and just Rights, as were no way grateful to him, it being his greatest Desire to put a Period to these unhappy Differences, and the effusion of any more Christian Blood; and for the Commission to the Earl of Clanrickard, he endeavour'd to give them satisfaction by his Message of the 29th. of January, wherein he declar'd unto them, how that the Earl of Clanrickard having without his Majesties Knowledge, or the Order and Consent of the Lord Lieutenant and Council in Ireland, made Conditions with the Commissioners of the Roman Catholics, very much to the derogation of his Honour, and the prejudice of the Protestant Religion; He was so far from owning what was Transacted in this kind by the said Earl, that he had not the least Notice of the said Earls Treating with those Commissioners, much less of his concluding those Articles with them, so prejudicial to Religion and his Majesties Honors till such time as he had Advertisement of his being arrested and restrain'd for his Presumption; his Commission being only for the raising what Forces he could there, and conducting them over hither for his Majesties Service: It is not denied, but that the Marquis of Ormond had a Commission granted him to Treat about a Peace with the Irish; but it was as much for the Ease and Relief of the Protestant Subjects, as for any other Respect, they having been harass'd with continual Wars; and but scantily supply'd with those Ayds which they had been so liberally promis'd. Thus did his Majesty labour by all means possible to remove all Objections that might give them any occasion of Cavil against him, and thereby obstruct their coming to a Treaty of Peace with him; and his Majesty so earnestly sought, and so far courted them, that notwithstanding his two foregoing Messages were left wholly neglected and answer'd, he did not yet desist from sending them another Message of Jan. 29. still pressing his former Desires; yet all came to nothing, in regard the Parliament's Commissioners (when they did come to Treat) were bound so strictly to the rigour of their Demands, though the Kings Concessions were still as far as could consist with the safety of his Honour and Conscience; offering them moreover to come to the Two Houses, upon Assurance of the safety of his Person, and to Advise with them for the Good and Safety of Kingdome: Provided, all that have Adhered to his Majesty, may have Liberty to go to their own Homes in safety, and their Sequestrations to be taken off: Upon which Conditions, his Majesty was willing to Disband all his Soldiers, and Dismantle his Garrisons, pass an Act of Oblivion, and Free Pardon to all: And so these Hopes of Reconciliation vanished.

The Town of Monmouth was now taken by the Parliament Forces, and Exeter streightned, on the East-side, by the Garrisoning of Nutwell, Broadcliff, Pontimore, and Stonk; and on the other side beyond the River, by the Garrisoning of Kirtonsulford, and Cannouten: Captain Deau was also sent to take in Pouldram House, but failing of his Design, possessed himself of Pouldram Church; but being there continually Assailed by fresh Numbers of the Royalists, who came very thick upon them from Exeter and other Places; Sir Thomas Fairfax fearing their Loss, Commanded them away: Upon News of the Cavaliers Advance from before Plimouth, to Relieve Exeter, Sir Thomas resolves to meet them, and therefore riseth from the Siege of Exeter, leaving that Place sufficiently Blockt up by the forenamed Garrisons, and the Addition of Sir George Childes House at Ashton: At Bevoys, lay the Lord Wentworth with Five Regiments, whom Lieutenant General Cromwell surprizeth, and takes three Regiments, and disperseth the rest, Wentworth himself hardly Escaping.

Monmouth taken for the Parliament.

Lieutenant General Cromwell surprizeth the Lord Wentworth's Forces at Bevoys.

Fairfax comes now to Tonnes, whose Approach caused the Cavaliers before Plimouth to quit their Trenches, and be gone, having been shrewdly put to it, by that stout Gistion, who sallied out upon them Frequently and Successfully.

From Tonnes, the General orders Two Regiments to be drawn before Dartmouth, and himself follows after with the rest, and upon Rejection of a Summons, falls to Storm it in Three Places; The first Post by the West-Gate is assaulted by Colonel Hammond, that on the North by Colonel Pride, and that on Tunstall Church and Works by Colonel Fortescue: All which fell on with great Resolution, gaining one Foot after another, till they had Mattered all, but Kingworth Fort, the Castle, and Gallants Bower. In Kingworth Fort was Sir Henry Cary with his Regiment, who failed not to do his Part; but being overpowred, yielded upon good Terms, to march away with his Officers and Souldiers; and so the Parliamentarians entered it, wherein were twelve Guns, twelve Barrells of Powder, and convenient proportion of Ammunition. The next Morning the General Summons the Castle, and the Governour was willing to Treat, but having stood it out to this Extremity, could obtain no other Conditions, but Quarter for himself, and all his Officers and Souldiers; but afterwards the General dismissed all the common Souldiers, but kept Prisoners Sir Hugh Pollard the Governour, the Earl of Newport, Colonel Seymour, and the other Officers; Ordnance about 120 mounted, and Two Men of War were taken, January 19. Shortly after a French Vessell, not knowing the Town was taken, being strook into Dartmouth with a Packet of Letters from the Queen; which being Seized, they discovered the whole Business of the Kings Negotiation with France.

Colonel Hammond takes in Poldram Castle, and the General sits down again before Exeter, and Summons the Governour, Sir John Barkley, who Answers, That in Honour he cannot Surrender, having good Hopes of Relief from the Prince. Fairfax resolves to Storm, but hearing of Hopton's Advance to Torrington, with 5000 Horse, and 4000 Foot; he once more rises from that Siege, leaving Sir Hardress Waller behind him with some Regiments, and marches to Chimley, and from thence towards Torrington, where the Kings Forces then lay, and beat them out of Stevenston House. The Cavaliers had Fortified the Town with Lines and Barradoes, which yet could not Discourage the Parliamentarians from pressing upon them: The Battell began near the Town, whither Hopton Retreated, the Horse following, enters close with him, whom the Cavaliers Charged so boldly, that they were like to give over; But the Army seconding the Lofs with fresh Men, the Town was wholly gained: But some of the Cavaliers fired the Magazine in the Church, which blew up the Church, and did more harm to the Assailants, than the Sword had done before, upon whom, in this Amazement, Sir John Digby Charging, did much Execution, and then bid farewell, at Eleven of the Clock at Night, February 16. Hopton himself was shor in the Thigh, and Digby in the Head, many Prisoners, and Horse taken, and divers slain. Hopton departs to Stratton, and Fairfax follows, which causeth his Lordship to march more Westward; yet some of his Rear Loyered so long, that about 80 of them, and about 300 Horse, were taken; from thence the Army Advanceth to Lanceson, which the Prince had quitted, leaving Colonel Bassett behind him with 500 Foot, and some Horse, who skirmished, and being soon worsted, escaped away by the darkness of the Night: Saltash, and Mount-Edgcombe being Reduced, General Fairfax follows them towards Bodmyn, always keeping a watchful Eye to hinder them from breaking through: And Prince Charles finding the Pursuit so hot, imbarqued himself for Scilly. All things succeeded so happily with Fairfax, that after several Successes, the Lord Hopton desired a Cessation; But General Fairfax Summons him to lay down Armes, upon which ensued a Treaty at Tresilian Bridge, Sir Thomas Fairfax Quarters at Truro, and the Lord Hopton further Westward, where at length these Articles were agreed upon, March the Thirteenth.

That the Lord Hopton should Disband his Army in the West: General Fairfax excepting his Lordship to have Fifty of his own Horse, and Fifty of Fairfax's, for his Conveyance to Oxford. All Strangers to have Passes to go beyond Seas, and to carry with them what is their Own, without Horses and Armes. All English Officers to go home to their Habitations, or if they will beyond Sea: Each Colonel to have his Horse, and two Men and Horses to wait on them: Each Captain one Man and Horse; the Troopers 20 s. apiece, and to go where they pleased.

But Hopton hearing of the Effects of the Propositions of Peace, changed his Course for Oxford, and Sailed into France. After the Disbanding of these Forces, all the Kings Garisons and Forts in Cornwall yielded, except only Pendennis Castle, and the Mount: And General Fairfax returned to the Siege at Exeter.

The Kings Forces in this mean while had not been Idle, but moved up and down in flying Parties, to their best Advantage; The King, the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, and Prince Maurice, were at Oxford closely Surrounded by the Parliaments Forces, their Horse being about Farrington, expecting the Lord Ashby, with his Foot to joyn with them: But he was met with by Sir William Brereton, and Colonel Morgan at Stow in the Wold, upon the Edge of Gloucester, where he was totally Defeated, and himself taken Prisoner, 1500 Horse and Foot, with his Baggage, Ammunition, and some of the Kings Letters, March 21.

But in Scotland the Kings Affairs Succeed better, this year, where the Earl of Montrose prospered Incredibly; for after his Defeat given to the Earl of Argyle, many of the Camells took part with him, by whose help he took Elgin, the chief Town of Murray, while the Lord Gordon, eldest Son to the Marquis Huntly, with some Forces joyned with him; so that now he was strong, 2000 Foot, and 200 Horse, with these he Defeats Sir John Hurry, and the Covenanters Army at Brechin, and marches to Grantsbain, towards the River Tay, and so for the Forth, there he meets with General Baily and Hurry, and offers them Battell, which they refuse; so he is for Donkeldon, where Lewis, the youngest Son of Marquis Huntly, takes leave, and goes home to his Father, carrying with him all the Gordons: however Montrose and the Lord Gordon, who never deferred him, Summons Dundee, and upon refusal, falls to Storming, and enters the Town; In the Nick of time, comes Baily and Hurry with a strong Power, whom Montrose not able to Encounter, Retreated through rough and unknown ways, Skirmishing with the Pursuers for many Miles together, gether, and with much ado, passed over the South-Eske, and returns to Brechin. Now having some time to rest, he sends the Lord Gordon to endeavour the bringing back of his Brother, and the rest of the Gordons, himself with 500 Foot, and 50 Horse, marches through Angus, Perthshire, and near the River Erne, Repulses Baily, and comes to Balwider, where the Earl of Abin meets him: at Lough Carrines he had Intelligence, that Hurry was upon Engaging with the Lord Gordon, to whose Assistance Montrose makes speed, and after a tedious uncouth march, Joyns with him (in the midst of Marre) having gotten together 1000 Foot, and 200 Horse; Hurry Retreats, followed by Montrose, who pressed so hard upon him, that at a Village called Aldern, they came to Battell, May 5. in which Montrose's right Wing was overpowered; but that Lofs was abundantly recompened by the Left, which utterly Routed Hurry's right Wing, and coming opportunely to the Rescue of their Fellows, put the Others to Flight.

The Earl of Linsey now took upon him the Command of the Covenanters Army in Arguile's stead, and joyns with Baily to seek out Montrose, who Retired to Kingarf Castle, and so Linsey departs to Atholl, and Baily to ruin Huntley's Country, which Montrose means to Defend, and marches to Aileford Hill, and possesseth it; Baily was unwilling to Fight, but being perswaded by the Lord Balcarreis, prepared for Battell, which Montrose refused not; both Sides Fought well, but at length Montrose obtained the Victory, though dearly purchased with the Death of the Lord Gordon, who was there shot dead, July 22.

After this Victory, Montrose was Recruited with 1800 Men, with which he Advanceth to St. Johnstone, where the Parliament then sat, whom having somewhat Scared, he turned away to Dunkeldon, and there is met by Abin, with 200 Horse, and as many Dragoons: And the Earl of Arley, and his Son Sir David, bringing with them 80 Horse of the Oglebys: And now thinking himself able to deal with any Scottish Army, he entred Fife, and Incamps in Kilspick with 4500 Foot, and 500 Horse: Baily was ready to Encounter him with far greater Forces: And so August 17. they came to a Battell, which was one of the Bloodiest that was Fought in Scotland all this War, for the Montrosians Fought desperately, resolving generally, rather to lay their Bodies in the Field, than turn their Backs: The Covenanters Disputed it with much Animosity, but at length their Horse being resolutely Charged, turned about and Fleat, and the Foot unable of themselves to endure, followed, whom the Montrosians pursued 14 Miles together, so that the Covenanters lost this Day in Fight and Flight about 5000 Men: After this great Victory, all things for awhile answered Montroses Expectation; most of the chief Places of Scotland, even Edinburgh it self submitted to him, and Macdonell and Drummond dispersed those Forces which the Earls of Cassells and Elington were raising in the Western Parts. But this Prosperity was short lived; for the Highlanders thinking they had done their Work, being laden with Spoyle, returned Home: And others to the Number of 3000, and 120 Irish, with Macdonnell their Leader, took leave of Montros for a season, promising to return with many more Men, within 40 dayes, which yet they never performed: And shortly after the Earl of Abin carries away with him his own Men, and all others of the Northern Forces: Insomuch that now he had but a small Army with him.

In this mean time, the Covenanters privily sent to David Lesley in England, to come to their Help, who readily obeyed, and hastened to Berwick, with all the Scottish Horse, and presently entred Scotland; at which News, Montrose was much troubled, as knowing his own Weakness in Horse, and therefore would have got himself into the North again: But Lesley prevented him, and by hasty marches overtook him in a Field called Phillips-Lough, near Salkirke, where he forced him to Flight, September 13. Lesley had about 6000 Men, most of them Horse; which notwithstanding the Montrosians Valiantly received, and stood out their Charges: But in the End, were over-powered, and beaten down with a great Slaughter. Montrose himself with much ado Escaped to his old Shelters, and the next day got together the Remainders of his scattered Forces, which are seasonably augmented by the coming in of Marquis Dowglash, and Sir John Dalryell, with a small Parcy of Horse; with these he marches Northwards, Fordeed over Cluid River, and meets with the Earls of Craford and Arley: And now he had 200 Horse, and some Foot, whom he leads into Atholl, and is there furnished with 400 Foot, with whom he Climbs over Grantsbain Mountains, to meet with Abin, and then returns back again the same way, and falls into Perthshire; and here by Messengers from the King, had Order to March Southward, if possible, to meet the Lord Digby with his Parcy of Horse: which Messengers and Letters he sends to Huntley, and Abin; Montrose himself passeth the Forth, and spoyle Sir John Buchanans Lands.

About this time deceased the Lord Napier of Merchiston, (a noted Mathematician; famous especially for his Invention of those Arithmetical Instruments, called Napier's Bones); And Sir William Rollock, Sir Phillip Nasbit, and Alexander Ogleby being taken by the Covenanters, were Condemned and Executed at Glasgow, and Colonel O'Carren, and Colonel Laghlan at Edinburgh. Montrose, in Revenge of his Friends, wastes the Country about Glasgow with 300 Horse, and 1500 Foot, himself Encamping at Leven, where he hears the News of Digby's Defeat; this makes him return Northward, where he spends much time in Treating with Huntley, who played fast and loose with him; And promising to Assist him in the Siege of Inverness, but failed, so that Design came to nothing, being also frustrated by Major General Middleton, who came from the Scots Army in England with Forces; yet Huntly upon his own private Quarrel, Besieges and takes Aberdeen, wherinto Middleton had thrust 500 Men: but the Marquis gaining the Town, Plundered the Inhabitants, who for the most part were Royally Affected, yet freely Released all Prisoners which were of Middleton's Men. Montrose, notwithstanding all these Discouragements, still laboured to keep up the Royal Interest, and had gotten together many Friends and Tenants of the Earl of Sesford, the Lord Ross, Sir James Mac-donnell, Maclin, Gleggar, Macmold, with whose Help he made shift to keep up the War, doing no small hurt to his Enemies. But the next year, the King having entrusted himself with the Scots Army in England, sent a Herald to Montrose, with Commands to lay down Arms, and Disband, and to pass over into France, till his Majesties further Pleasure, which Orders he readily obeyed: And by that means the Covenanters had Elbow room, having already put to Death four of their Capital Enemies, at St. Andrews, Viz. Sir Robert Spotswood, Nathaniel Gordon, Andrew Gulerly, and William Murray; but the Lord Ogleby putting on his Sisters Apparell, had made an Escape out of Prison. And now they have left us to jangle with the Parliament of England, about some Differences at that time arising.

Nor was England only the Seat of War this Year, but other Nations also had their Share: The Swedes had made a Peace with the Dane, but still continued Hostility with the Emperor, which continued with various Success, till at last they came to a Battell, wherein at first the Germans had the better; but buying themselves according to their Custom, too greedily about the Baggage; the Swedish General Torstenson rallies his almost Defeated Forces, falls upon the Plundering Imperialists, and Wrecks the Victory out of their Hands, taking Prisoners, four Generals, Hatzfeld, Mercy, Bray, and Zaradeskie: seven Colonells, and 4000 others, besides 3000 slain; Yet was this Fight nothing too bloody, as that between the French and Bavarians, near Friburge; Inasmuch as On-fayes, They had a Design to die all, such a horrible Slaughter there was, the greatest part of both Armies lying dead on the Field: Nor could either Side boast of their Gains, but what Advantage could be claimed, was rather on the French side, Whole Generals the Duke of Anguien, and Marshall Turenne, reinforcing their Troops, seized Philipsburg, Spires, and Montz. The Spaniard for his Part was this Year as the Emperor, loosing the greatest part of Flanders to the French; And the Salt of Guant to the Hollander: And in Italy the French take Pombino, and Portolongone, and Defeat the Spaniard at the Passage Mora, besides several Successes in Catalonia.

It was now the Twenty Second Year of His Majesties Reign, Viz. 1646. which the Parliament began with disabling all Members absent, with the King, for ever sitting in the House; and Impower the Speaker to give Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, for new Elections in their Places.

The Prince of Wales being in Scilly, the Parliament Invite him to come to them, but he would not Venture, only, being now in the Isle of Guernsey, he desires that the Archbishop of Armagh may have leave to come to him: And that the Lord Capell might have a Pass to go to the King at Oxford, to make some Overtures to him in order to a Peace, but all came to nothing.

The King had formerly offered to come to the Parliament, in Order to a Personal Treaty, which not being Relished by the Parliament, They Order the Committee of the London Militia, to secure all such as shall come with him, to prevent Refort to him, and to secure his Person from Danger; And all Cavaliers are to depart the City between the 30th. of March, and the 6th. of April: And withall, in London a Court-Martial is Established, who make it Death for any to repair to the King, Queen, Prince, or Malignant Lords, and Commanders; Or to Plot, Contive, or Hold Intelligence with them: And further, the Parliament being mis-informed, That the King was come to London, Ordered, That in Case it were so, he should instantly be Conducted to St. James's House, with a Guard to prevent Refort; And that it should be Treason for any to Conceal him.

The War is now almost brought to a Period, the Kings Forces beaten out of the Field, Garrisons Surrender apace, Dennington Castle, Michaels Mount, Ruthen Castle, Woodstock, and others yield to the Parliament. General Fairfax, and Lieutenant General Cromwell, return to the Siege of Exeter, which had been Blocked up by Sir Hardress Waller, during the Generalls stay in the West. The Governour Sir John Berkley being Summoned, and despairing of Relief, returned Answer, That it was agreed on at his Council of War, That Commissioners might meet on either Side, to Treat on Friday, April the Third, which was assented unto. The Treaty lasted till Thursday, April he Ninth, at which time the Articles were Signed, no wayes Dishonourable to the Besieged, who marched out, April the Threenth. After which the General went to Barrethable, and had it Surrendered to him, upon the same Conditions that Exeter was.

And now Sir Thomas Fairfax resolves to march for Oxford, which put the King upon thoughts of providing for his own Safety: And therefore, April the Thirteenth, he came out of Oxford in Disguise, with Mr. Hudson a Minister, and Mr. John Ashburnham, whose Servant he personated, and got to the Scots Army, before Neward, May the Sixth. whereupon divers Noblemen, as if they had been deserted by the King, yielded to General Fairfax. But the Governour Sir Thomas Glenham, would not so easily quit his Charge: However Fairfax goes on, and fixes his Quarters; the first upon Hellington Hill, which was committed to Major General Skippon, lately recovered of his Nasby Wounds: The second being a Bridge over Charwell, near Marston, and a Line drawn from Ifts to Charwell, fell to Colonel Rainsborough: A third to Colonel Lambert, And a fourth to Colonel Harbert. And Major General Skippon had the managing and carrying on of these Works, Lines, and Approaches.

Treaty.
The Scots Or-out of England.

Sir Thomas Glenham being summoned, returns a Civil Answer, Desiring leave to send to the King about it, but was refused: Many Messages past to and fro, till at last, May 18. the Treaty began, which held till June 20. and then Concluded upon very Noble Terms; which Sir Thomas Fairfax was the rather Induced to Condescend unto, out of his Respect (as he pretended) to the Colledges, and Library. And accordingly the City was Surrendered, June 24. together with Faringdon Castle, which was included in the Treaty. There marched out in a Body well Armed, about Three thousand; besides near as many more which afterwards had Passes. Prince Rupert, found Seventy Barrells of Powder, Thirtyeight Pieces of Ordnance, whereof Twenty six Brass, and plentifull Store of Provision of Victualls. The Duke of Tork was carried to St. James's, where he met with his Sister the Princess Henrietta Maria, who had been sent thither from the Surrender of Exeter, but was shortly after conveyed over into France, by her Governes the Lady Dalglish.

Oxford being taken, it was in vain for the lesser Garrisons to stand out; wherefore Newes comesthick and threefold to the Parliament, of the Surrenders of Banbury, Borshull, Carnarvon, Ludlow, Lichfield, Worcester, Wallingford, and Gothbridge: And Mr. Arundell, who could not till now by any means be Induced to deliver up Pendennis Castle, when all the West besides was Reduced, at length yields to Colonel Forbes: And the Marquess of Worcester having been long Besieged by Colonel Morgan, and now Summoned by Sir Thomas Fairfax himself, gives up his Castle of Redland. It was long before the Scots would be persuaded to return out of the North, and besiege Newark; but at last, being overcome with the Sum of Thirty thousand pounds, they came on, and Encamped on the North side of the Town, and Rogues and Rossiter on the South-side; the Besieged make frequent Salles out upon their Enemies, killing and taking many. But the King Town to the English. In obedience whereunto it was, upon Honourable Conditions, Surrendered to Colonel Poyntz, about the beginning of May.

The Seals of State being sent from Oxford to Westminster, were according to the Vote of the Two Houses broken in the House of Lords, in the presence of the Commons. The War in England being now, after much Bloodshed, brought to some End, the Parliament were at leisure to dispute with the Scots, concerning their keeping of the King; Who fearing lest Sir Thomas Fairfax should fall upon them, and Compell them to deliver him up, Retreated Northward to New Castle. The Earl of Essex had lived to see his War Accomplished by another General, and this Year dies of an Apoplexy, at Essex House in the Strand, September 14. And the Parliament in respect to his former Services, Voted 3000 l. to be given towards his Funerall: He was Honourably Attended to his Grave, and Interred, October 23. Mr. Jones, Preaching his Funerall Sermon, The Parliament seeing the King gotten into the Scots Possession, sends a second Invitation to the Prince of Wales to come to London, with promise of Honour and Safety, but he did not think fit to venture.

The Parliament about this time passed an Ordinance, for Disbanding Major General Massey's Brigade, which General Fairfax was ordered to put in Execution; who thereupon marched from Oxford to the Droghda, where he found them consisting of the Number of Two thousand Foot, and Five hundred Horse, prepared by the persuasion of Major General Massey, Colonel Cole, and others of their Officers, to obey the Ordinance of Parliament. Soon after this, the General after his Recovery, he set forward for London, whither he came November 12. being met by him their Publick Thanks for his good Services, which accordingly was fulfilled, Saturday, November 14. And on the 17. he received a Congratulation from the Mayors, Recorder, and Aldermen of the City.

The King at Southwell had written to the Parliament for a Treaty, and being now at New Castle, he writes to the Parliament of Scotland, to the same effect, and likewise to the City of London; But the House of Commons are Debailed. Thus the Kings Person should be Demanded of the Scots, and making that the Parliament House formerly sent into Scotland, were returned into England, they Vote the whole Army of the Scots to return to their Country, and quit their English Garrisons upon Recede of part of their Armies; and the rest to be sent after them. The Scots (having offered William to escape beyond the Seas) send a Letter to the Parliament, wherein they desire that they would send Propositions of Peace to the King. And in the mean time there happened a Misunderstanding between the King, and Mr. Alexander Henderson, a Scottish Minister, about Church matters; which being since published, sufficiently manifested to the World, that his Majesty was not intentioned to be led by the King; much time was spent in Wrangling, whilst the King denyed the Scots to have any Rights in Disposition of the King in England; and the Scots as they dispose of the King in England, as the English could Challenge in Scotland. In Conclusion, the Scots conceived the Parliaments Motions to be too High, and inconsistent with their first Pretensions:

sions: But at length, Sixteen General Propositions, with sundry Qualifications, were presented to the King at New-Castle, July 27. by the Earls of Pembroke and Suffolk, Sir Walter Earle, Sir John Hippisley, Mr. Goodwin, and Mr. Robinson, who were limited to Ten Days.

The King returned Answer,

THAT their Propositions imported so great an alteration of Government both in Church and State, derogated so much from his Prerogative, and imposed such hard Conditions upon him in reference to his Friends and Adherents, and likewise that their Commissioners were so bound from any Capacity either of giving Reasons for the Demands they brought, or giving Ear to such Desires as his Majesty should propound, That it was impossible for him, with any Satisfaction to his Conscience, to give such an Answer to their Propositions, as that thereby a well-grounded Peace might ensue. And withall, he urges his desire of coming to London, there to Treat Personally.

This Desire of his (however by some thought very reasonable) they utterly refuse; Nor would the Parliament permit the King of France to Interpose in the present Differences, by his Extraordinary Ambassador, Monsieur Balline.

The Scots Generall Assembly send a Remonstrance to the King, desiring him to settle Matters in England, according to the Covenant, and to Sign the Parliaments Propositions: And Chancellor London told him plainly, That there was no other Means for him to close with his Two Houses: And moreover, That unless he so resolv'd, if he lost England, he should not be admitted to come and Reign in Scotland. But all this could not prevail, and therefore the Scots who had hitherto somewhat sharply Disputed about the Disposal of his Person, are content, upon the Receipt of a good Summ of Money, to depart Home, and leave the King in the Power of the Parliament; Who Voted him to Holmby House, and sent their Commissioners, the Earls of Pembroke, and Denbigh, and the Lord Mountague; Sir James Harrington, Sir John Holyland, Sir Walter Earle, Sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and Major Generall Brown, to receive him from the Scots at New-Castle, to whom he was accordingly delivered; and February 6. they left New-Castle in Possession of the English, and marched Homewards: February the 8th. The King sad and sorrowfull, sets forward with the Commissioners for Holmby, Attended with 900 Horse, and after a Fortnight came to his Journeys end: Being met by the Way by Generall Fairfax, and many of his Officers. The Commissioners had Two Chaplains, Mr. Marshall, and Mr. Corih, but the King would never hear any of them; Requesting the Parliament, that Two of his own Chaplains might be sent to him; which was not thought fit to be granted, because they looked upon them as Disaffected.

The Parliament was now freed from all fear of Opposition, but break out among themselves, dividing into several Parties, under the Title of Presbyterians, and Independents: And March 19. the Vote was passed for Disbanding some part of the Army, and Disarming many Garrisons: This made the Army Mute, and knowing their own Power, draw near to London and Westminster, and frame a Petition, whereat the City being Startled, they likewise draw up their Petition, and pray, That the Parliament would give Command, that the Army be forthwith removed, and after with all speed be Disbanded: And that the City may make Annuall Election of their own Militia: And to ends this Year, Remarkable for the Death of Henry of Nassau the old Prince of Orange, whose only Son William Succeeded him in the Dignity of General, and Admiral of the United Provinces.

The Affairs of Ireland.

In Ireland all things are gone to Wrack, for these last Four years: for after the Treaty of Simonsfield, 1643. the King trusting too much to the Fidelity of the Irish, withdrew part of his Forces, to Assist him in England: Whereof the Irish taking Advantage, fell to Plundering and Pillaging the English, seizing upon sundry Forts and Castles, and not performing any thing of what they Promised: And having now gotten Expert Generalls from beyond Sea, they were so bold as to fall upon the Scottish Forces, to whom they gave a most Unfortunate Blow. And to increase the Miseries of the English there, they were now unhappily divided among themselves: Ormond for the King; Branghly and Inchiquin for the Parliament: Ormond for his Part to promote the Kings Affairs, would turn the Cession into a Peace with the Irish; which the French were ready to promote; and to heighten the Kings Party against the Parliamentarians, sent 16000. to Ormond, as an Earnest of greater Matters: And the King and Parliament being then in Treaty, the French Resident took occasion to Write to Ormond, That if the King and Parliament should conclude a Peace, it must be necessary to comprehend the Irish therein, for their Settlement in their due Rights, otherwise his Matter must take the Irish into his Protection: But the Parliament Vote the Lord Lyle (Son to the Earl of Leicesters) to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Determine to send him over with considerable Forces: In the mean time, the Marquess of Ormond (the King having upon hopes of their Fidelity, and through the Exigence of his Affairs in England, agreed to a Peace with the Irish) Treats with them for it upon these following Conditions, (which were indeed but too advantageous for them.)

A That the Irish be not bound to take the Oath of Supremacy. A Parliament to be held before November. All Acts against Roman Catholics be Repealed. Places of Strength to be in the hands of Men of Merit. Hereupon the Marquess and the Irish Laity were agreed, and the Peace concluded.

But the Popes Nuncio, and the Irish Clergy Disclaimed this Peace; which Ormond understanding, and being in great Want of Ammunition and Powder, Treats with Two of the Parliaments Sea-Captains, and soon after sends Commissioners to the Parliament themselves, about a Surrender of Dublin, and the rest of the Places of Strength in his Power. To which they readily give Ear, But the Irish being now 15000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, Commanded by Owen O Neale, and Preston, seemed to threaten a Siege to Dublin, wherein lay 3000 Garrison Souldiers. The Parliament send over Colonel Monk, with 1870 Horse and Foot, which arrived at Dublin, and expected that Ormond would have delivered the City into their Hands, according to his Treaty with the Parliament: But finding themselves deceived of their Hopes, (in regard the Marquess not having his Majesties Commands, could not answer their Expectations) they set Saile and Landed at Belfast in the North. However, the War goes on, the Irish nor daring to Disturb their Clergy: Ormond between these Sireights is at a loss, so that these Garrisons are left to the Irish, Lefe, Strathkilly, Grange, Melkon, Rebend, Alby, Greenhill Castle, Jordan, Edenberry, Marmee Town, Sir James Hayes Houle, Honestown, Hans, Castle Warden, Monmouth, Lestlip, Lucan, Falmshore, Tallon, Bullotis, and Bellament. And in conclusion, Ormond is forc'd to enter into a Confederacy with the Irish, upon disadvantageous Terms. But on the other side, the Parliamentarians had some Successes against them, and took Castle Lyons, and Inchiquin Castle, Dungarvan, and Blarney Castle, and stoutly Defended Banratty against Musgraves Forces. And now the Lord Lieutenant Lyle comes over to his Government, January 28. And having set things in Order, and encouraged those of his Party, returned back into England, April the First. But the Parliament resolve to prosecute the War Vigorously, and to send over 8400 Foot, besides Officers, with 3000 Horse, and 1200 Dragoons: All which were to be taken out of Generall Fairfax's Army, which occasioned much Distemper between the Army and Parliament.

Little News from Foreign Parts this Year, but only the Surrender of Dunkirk to the French, and the Emperours Eldest Son Crowned King of Bohemia.

Dunkirk surrendered to the French.

D Men might have reasonably expected, that the 23d. Year of his Majesties Reign, 1647. should have begun with a Sunshine of Settlement so desirable, after such Storms of War. But contrariwise, these Hopes were suddenly Blasted by Dissentions between the Parliament and Army; These last being offended with the Intentions of the former; to Disband them: And being encouraged by Petitions from severall Countiees (probably suborn'd thereunto) to the General, not to Disband till the Peace of the Kingdome were fully settled; they drew up a Petition, which was presented to the Parliament by Lieutenant Generall Hammond, and Three Colonels, Desiring Provision for Indemnity. Their Arrears to be paid; That the Foot Souldiers may not be Preit out of the Kingdome, nor Horsemen serve on Foot: That the Widows and Children of such as were Slain in their Service, might be provided for; and (until the Army be Disbanded) that they may receive Pay to discharge their Quarters, and not Burthen the Country. This Net led the Parliament, who declared their high Dislike of it, and Voted, That such as continued in this way of Aiding, should be proceeded against as Enemies of the State.

The Armes
Petition.

Some Petitions from Essex, and other places, are brought to the Parliament, inveighing against the Armes Proceedings, which fret the Souldiers, who sharply Appologize for themselves, and utterly refuse the Service of Ireland, till Satisfaction were given to their Desires. The Difference was likely to have grown wider: But to close the Breach, Commissioners are chosen on both sides to meet, in Order to a right understanding. But the Army judged, that it would not be a little advantageous to their Concernments, if they could get the King into their Hands: And therefore on the Third of June, Cornet Joyce was sent to Holmby, with 500 Horse, who brought away the King from thence, with his Guardians Commissioners, (who would by no means leave him) having first promised him, that he should have no Violence offered to his Person; that his Trunks and Papers should not be rifled and tumbled; that he should be attended with such Servants, against whom there could be no just Exception; and that nothing should be imposed on him contrary to his Conscience: And so he was conveyed to Childersley, and thence (according to his own Desire) to New-Market: And this the General certifies in a Letter to the Parliament; withall affirming, that it was done without his Consent; And that the Reason alledged by the Parties, was, Because certain Persons had designed to take away his Majesty, thereby to gather Strength to make a New War, which they were able and ready to prove.

Holmby to the

And now the Army, to the great Terror of the Parliament, march towards London, and come to St. Albans, notwithstanding a Message from the Houses, not to come within 25 miles of the City; which the General excuses, saying, That the Army was come thither, ere they received the Parliaments Desires. And here he obtains a Months Pay for the Souldiers: The Parliament Vote, That the General be required to deliver the Person of the King to the former Commissioners, who were to bring him to Richmond; to the intent, that Propositions of Peace might be speedily presented to his Majesty, and that Colonel Rossiter and his Regiment might guard his Person. To this the Army would not consent, and therefore sent up their Representation, with these Proposals, the onely effectual Means to procure a stable Settlement (Viz.) That the Houses may be speedily purged purged of such as ought not to sit there. That such who abused the Parliament and Army, and A endanger the Kingdome, may be speedily disabled from doing the like, or worse. That some determinate Period of time may be set to this and future Parliaments, according to the Intent of the Bill for Triennial Parliaments. That Provision may be made not to be Adjournable, or Dissolvable, by any Power but by their own Consent, during their respective Period, and then to determine themselves. That the Freedom of the People to prevent Grievances by Petition to Parliament may be Vindicated. That the Exorbitant Power of Country Committees may be taken away. That the Kingdome may be satisfied in the Parliaments Accounts for the vast Summs received; and also in divers other things, wherein the Common-wealth hath been abused. That after Delinquents have passed their Compositions an Act of Oblivion may be passed.

The Parliament being (as was said) divided into Two Parties, The Independents Countenanced the Army, and the Presbyterians the City, in a high manner against the Army, of whom they would fain have rid themselves, by sending a great part of them into Ireland, and Disbanding all the rest: To prevent which, they have in readiness an Impeachment against Eleven of the chiefest of them; For Retarding the Relief of Ireland; For Acting many things against the Laws and Liberties of the People; And for obstructing the Courts of Justice. All which was offered and proved against them: Their Names were, Denzell Hollis Esquire, Sir Phillip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, Sir John Maynard, Major General Massey, Mr. Glynn Recorder of London, Colonel Walter Longe, Colonel Edward Harley, and Anthony Nicholls Esquire. And with this Charge they delivered in a Paper, Desiring that the Accused Members be forthwith Suspended from sitting in the House. This was much stumbled at, and lookt upon as too much intrenching upon the Privilege of Parliament: But the Army persisting in their Desires, the Eleven Members first forbore the House, and afterwards obtained leave to Travell for Six Months. But to give some Satisfaction to the Parliament, the Army removed further off from London, having the King continually near them, who had a great mind to see his Children; which was effected, by means of a Letter from General Fairfax to the Parliament. The Eleven Members being gone, the Army-Party in the House began to prevail, (for it is apparent enough wherefore the discarding of those Members was so zealously contended for) and then a Vote was passed for taking the London Militia out of the hands of the City, and transferring it to others better Affected to the Army: And it was made Treason to seek Subscriptions to Petitions: Upon which, great Multitudes of Prentices and others flock to Westminster in a Muteous manner, Clamouring at the Parliament Doors, that, That Vote should be Repealed, before the Members should pass out of the House, and forcing the Speaker back into the Chair, Constrained him and them to sit, till they Extorted this Vote from them,

That the King should come to London, and the City have their Militia restored to them. And then the Parliament Adjourned for Four Days.

The Generall, who for ease of the Country was moved to Bedford, hears of this, and marches up towards London, and sends before him a Letter to the Mayor and Aldermen; wherein he signifies His Repentment of the late Outrage, and requires Justice to be done upon the Offenders. In his Way he is met with, by the Speakers of both Houses, and such of the Members as sided with the Army, who repaired to him at Hounslow, Complaining of the Affront and injurious Violation offered unto them, and there they Consult together, how to get the City without Blood.

In the mean time, the contrary party meet together in Parliament, and hope to carry all before them, and choose new Speakers. The eleven Members are now gotten in again; the first Thing done, is to confirm the last extorted Votes, and to put the City in a posture of Defence, Ordering Souldiers to be Lifted, and Major-General Massey, Sir William Waller, and Colonel Poyns, to have the Command of them: And the Citizens set forth a Declaration against the Army; yet were not things so evenly carried, but that upon the Approach of General Fairfax, all was in a Hubbub, many Diffentions in their Councils: And at Guild-Hall they fell from Words to Blows, divers wounded, and some slain. And lastly, The Aldermen conclude, to write to the General to excuse themselves, laying the fault upon some particular persons: The General sends a Brigade, under the Command of Rainsborough and Hewson, over Kingston Bridge, to Southwark, who take in the great Fort on the High-way to Lambeth: The Common-Council post away Messages to the General for a Pacification, which he, with the Consent of the Members of Parliament then present, granted upon Condition, That they should desert that Parliament then sitting, and the Eleven Impeached Members, and deliver up the Tower, and their other Forts; which they were glad to submit to. Presently a Declaration is published, making Null all Acts, passed by the Members at Westminster, since the Twenty sixth of July last.

August the Sixth, The Generall marched in Triumph to Westminster, and re-established the G disturbed Members of Parliament, and received their Publick Thanks, for Vindicating them from the Injurious Usage, as they complain'd, of the Citizens; And the next Day marched through the City with the whole Army, being 20000 Horse and Foot to the Tower, and puts in Colonel Tichbourn for his Deputy-Lieutenant, by Vertue of an Ordinance of Parliament, whereby he was Constituted Captain General of all the Forces and Garrisons in England and Wales, and Constable of the Tower: And a Months Pay was given to the Army, as a Gratuity for their good Service, in Suppressing the late Insurrection; but the Excise was thought fit to be continued. 1648.

The General had his Head-quarters at Kingston, and the King was settled at Hampton-Court, with his Children about him; whither the Earl of Ormond repaired to him, having by his Command quitted his Government in Ireland to the Parliaments Commissioners: Inquiry being now made after the chief Actors and Fomenters of the late Uproar, they were proceeded against at the discretion of their Judges. Mr. Glynn was cited of his Recorderthip, Sir John Maynard was Impeached of Treason, Hollis, Waller, Clotworthy, Massey, Long, and Nichols, were summoned to attend the House the 16th of October: Sir John Gayr Lord Mayor, and four Aldermen, Culham, Bunch, Langham, and Adams, were accused and committed to the Tower; and the Earls of Lincoln, Suffolk, and Middlesex, with the Lord Barkley, Maynard, Hunston, and Wilkoughby of Parham, were committed to the Black-Rod.

But care was now taken to pull down the Pride of the City; to which end, both Houses Order the casting down of all the Works about the City, and the dividing of their Militia, Impowering the City of Westminster, the Burrough of Southwark, and the Hamlets about the Tower, each to have its distinct Militia of it self.

The Army are much behind hand for Arrears, therefore petition the Parliament for payment of them, which the Houses taking into Consideration, raised some Summs of Money to stop their Mouths for the present, and to apply themselves to draw up Propositions of Peace to be sent to the King to Hampton-Court, which were in substance the same that were offered to him at Newcastle, and had the same Effect, the business of Episcopacy being ever a main Obstruction, which the Parliament were resolved to Abolish, and the King preferring the satisfaction of his Conscience before worldly respects, would rather loose all, then give consent thereunto; and in his Answer of the 9th of September, was thought to shew a greater Inclination to the Army then the Parliament, which giving them great occasion of distast, is thought to have contributed much to his prejudice.

About this time the Parliament Vote Six thousand Foot, Two thousand four hundred Horse and Dragoons to be sent into Ireland, and Eighteen thousand Foot, and Seven thousand two hundred Horse, and a Thousand Dragoons, to be kept up as a standing Army for England.

About this time, the Officers to provide for their own Concernments, thought good to Elect out of every Regiment a certain Number of Souldiers to meet and consult by the Name of Agitators: These together draw up a large Letter to the General full of Compliments, and desires, That he would take some course to settle the Nation in Peace, and to secure such as had fought against the King, from standing in any need of asking him Pardon, or receiving Indemnity from him. That Parliaments may be determined to certain Periods of Time, And that Care be taken for due Election of Members for the future, and for the Payments of the Armes Arrears, that they may not be burthenome to the Country. Sir Thomas Answers, That he had a good Opinion of the honesty of their Intentions, and referred their Desires to the Generall Council of Officers.

November the Sixth, the Scots Commissioners send a Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and require, That the King may be admitted to a Personall Treaty, or at least, that he should not be carried from Hampton-Court, violently by the Army, as he was from Holmby House, but that Commissioners of both Parliaments may freely pass to, and from him, to Treat for the Settlement of the Kingdoms. This put the Parliament upon preparing new Propositions: In which mean while, the King is informed, That his Person was in some hazard, from the Agitators, who were Plotting of some Design to take away his Life; though this hath been shrewdly suspected to have been a design of some of the great ones of the Army, for the getting of his Majesty more firmly into their Clutches, as from the Signer may be conjectured, and by Colonel Whaley's bringing him a Letter pretended to have been put into his hand by an unknown person: whereupon he Consults with Sir John Berkley, Mr. John Ashburnham, and Colonel William Legg, how to prevent the danger; and among them it is Resolved to escape to the Isle of Jersey: to which end a Ship is prepared, to take him in about Southampton, and Horses are Lodged near Hampton-Ferry. And thus November the Eleventh, he according to his Custom withdrew himself, a little before Evening Prayer, with his Three forementioned Confidants, and escaped to his Horses, by the way of Paradise, a place so called in the Garden, and Rode away, leaving behind him a Letter to the Parliament, which was afterward delivered them: Wherein he promised to break through this Cloud of Retirement, and shew himself really to be a Father of his Country, if he might be heard with Freedom, Honour, and Safety. But the King coming to the Sea-shore, found himself to be disappointed of his Design, by the failing of the Ship; wherefore it was concluded, that the King & Leg should go to Tedworth, to the Countess Dowager of Southamptons House, whilst Berkley & Ashburnham should go to the Isle of Wight, to Governour Hammond, of whom the King had some Hopes, because of his Brother Doctor Hammond, (who was the Kings Chaplain) to him they were to signify in general, That the King having escaped from Eminent Danger of Assassination, was willing to cast himself upon his Fidelity, if he would engage upon Oath, for the Safety and Liberty of his Person.

His Letter to the Parli. from Carisbrook Castle.

Hammond would promise for his Safety, but not for his Liberty; and they fearing to be taken into Custody, came over with him to the Ladies House, where the King was, who found himself necessitated to cast himself upon no better Terms, with an unwilling Willingness, upon Hammond's Protection, who presently certifies the Parliament of it; and they being well contented with it, Ordered his Continuance there, with the same Attendants which he had at Hampton-Court, and no other.

The King at Carisbrook Castle writes a Letter to the Parliament, and another to the Scots Commissioners; wherein he professes, That he cannot, either as a Christian, or a King, consent to the Abolishing of Episcopal Hierarchy, because he looked upon it as Apostolical, and had sworn at his Coronation to maintain it: But yet he was willing that Presbytery should be continued for Three Years, and a free Debate to be had, between the Divines Assembled at Westminster, and Twenty that he should appoint, about the Settlement of Church-Government for the future. He is also willing, that the Parliament should dispose of the Militia, and have the Choice of his Privy-Counsellors during his Reign; Provided they have it by Grant of Patent from him, and that it return to his Successors: And he is willing that the Arrears of the Army should be paid, and he will be ready to use his utmost Endeavour for the raising of so much Money. These and some other Proposals he made; promising moreover, to give Satisfaction to the Kingdom of Scotland, when he shall receive his Desires: And still he pressed for a Personal Treaty, which the Parliament refuse; yet after three days Debate, they were content to admit of it; Provided, that he would sign these four Bills:

First, That it be lawful for the future, to Order the Militia of the Kingdom, without the Kings Consent; to raise what Armies they please: All others, under pain of Treason, to be prohibited to Assemble, to the Number of Thirty Persons, without the Authority of Parliament.

Secondly, That it be lawful for the Houses to sit, to Adjourn their Sitting to what place they please; to assemble at what time soever, and at their own Discretion.

Thirdly, That all Oaths, Interdictions, and Declarations, set forth in publick, against either Houses, be accounted and declared void.

Fourthly, Whomsoever of the Nobility the King hath Dignified with Titles, from the time Himself departed, and carried away the Great Seal of the Kingdom, the same be Degraded of their Honours; And these to be passed into Acts.

These Propositions were carried to the King by the Earl of Denbigh, Lord Montague, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Kemp, and Mr. Bunckley; But the Scots Commissioners follow, and protest against them, as too derogatory to the Kings Honour, and contrary to the Parliaments former Engagements and Protections: And to the King refused to sign them, desiring the Commissioners to tell the Two Houses, That there were different Interests to be complied with (Viz.) The Parliament, the Army, and the Scots; and therefore he requested, That some Means might be found out, which might give Contentment to all these, without which, a well-grounded Peace could never be established.

The Kings Refusal so offended the Commons, that they presently put it to the Vote, Whether any more Addresses should be made unto Him; and after a long Debate, it was Resolved,

First, That no Addresses shall hereafter be made to Him by the Parliament of England.

Secondly, That none shall, on pain of Treason, make any Addresses, without leave from the Parliament.

Thirdly, That no written Paper, Message, or Declaration, be received from his Majesty, on penalty of Treason.

Which Votes were so well resented by the Army, That now having no further need of their Agitators, they reduce them into Order, and publish a Declaration of their owning the Parliaments Proceedings, and their Resolution to adhere with, and stand by them in their said Votes, even against the King himself, or any that shall partake with him: Which the Lords perceiving, after many dayes Tugging about it, at last assented to the Votes of the Commons.

In the mean time, Col. Hammond had turned away the Kings Servants, and used him a little more severely then formerly, which occasioned a Mutiny in Newport, the chief Town in the Isle of Wight, where one Capt. Burligh beat a Drum for the Kings Service and Delivery; but was soon

A suppressed, himself taken prisoner, and afterwards hanged, drawn, and quartered as a Traytor; And more Forces sent at Hammond's Request to secure the Island: and Judges were appointed, to proceed against those that mutined, about keeping of Christmas, in London, Canterbury, and other places.

And now both Houses Vote, That the Committee of Derby House, have a Plenipotence to transact the Business of the whole Kingdom, and to dispose as they shall think fit of the Army commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax, who is now Impowred to place and displace the Kings Attendants, provided he allow him not above Thirty. And a little after he becomes Lord Fairfax, by the Decease of his Father.

About this time, Judge Jenkins was brought to the Bar of the House, where he refused to kneel, his Charge was read against him:

That he had passed Sentence against men to be Hanged, Drawn, and Quartered, for not Assisting against the Parliament.

That he took up Arms himself, and stirred up others against them, and had charged them with Countersigning the Great Seal. Which he was so far from denying, or any way exenuating, that he boldly owned all, and more than they accused him of, endeavouring to terrifie the Parliament with the numberousness of the Royal Issue; and so provoked the House with his Deportment, and Words, that he was Fined a Thousand pounds; and the House Voted a Charge to be brought in, against him.

The Marquess of Ormond after several Capitulations, had yielded up the Irish Government into the hands of the Parliament, by whom was sent over Col. Jones with 1450 Horse and Foot, who took possession of Dublin, June 17. and is made Governour of the City, at the same time that Sir Charles Coote Defeated a Party of the Irish. And not to be idle, he marches out with 3000 Men against General Preston, who being 8000 strong, routed him, and put him to flight, and did much Execution upon his Forces in four miles pursuit. But August the Eighth, they came to a second Encounter near Trym, where Col. Jones did revenge his former Foyl, beat Preston out of his Bogg, killed 5470 Foot Souldiers, and 300 of the Genry, took 7000 Arms, 4 Pieces of Ordnance, and great Pillage, with 150 Oxen; And improving his Victory, takes Castell Richard, Port-Castell, Abbej, Gruncesfort, the Mabbey, Belliloe, Cabbrough, Castell-Lewar, Danmook, Carrat, Mastrose, Castell-Down, and Castell-Amon: And in Munster near Megallo, and Clancard, the Lord Inchiquin, November the 13. gave such a Defeat to another party of the Irish, that, what with the taken and slain, their Loss was reckoned four thousand: So that now the Parliament having no need of the Scottish Forces in Ulster, are earnest to have them recalled Home out of Ireland.

The 24th year of his Majesties Reign, being the year, 1648. now begins with the Visitation of the University of Oxford, which was performed by the new Chancellor, the Earl of Pembroke, not without much Resistance; for the Heads and Principals would neither own the Authority, nor the Covenant, for which Reason, many of them were outed of their places, and others put in: And the Parliament Vote, That all those who will not submit to the Power, shall be expelled the University, and all the Colledge-Rents be paid to the Visitors by them appointed.

This Summer, the King, though a Prisoner, was as Formidable as ever since the late Troubles, the very Name of a King proving sufficient to raise considerable Armies: London it self was not free from Mutiny; for April the Ninth, the Apprentices set upon a part of the Trained-Bands, whom they over-powred, and encreasing hourly, divided into Parties; One whereof made towards White-Hall, but were Repressed by the Horse-Guard of the Mews; yet at Night they joyn again, surprize Newgate and Ludgate, and shut up the Gates; then they seize a Drake-piece from the Lord Mayors House, which they planted within Ludgate: the Morning following they laboured to get Arms, and broke open some Sale-mens Houses of Ammunition, and Mattered the Magazine at Leaden-Hall, crying out for God and King Charles: But the next day General Fairfax entered Aldersgate with two Regiments, marched to Leaden-Hall-Street, and there Charged the undisciplined Multitude, who after a short Tumultuary Skirmish, was utterly dispersed with little or no Loss.

But in Wales Colonel Poyer, Governour of Pembroke Castle, refused to yield up his Charge (though Commanded) without full payment of his Arrears: And Major-General Langhorn, for the same Reason, refused to Disband his Men; and so both Revolt, and Langhorn surprizes Tenby Castle; with the Parliaments Commissioners in it: And now they grow bold, Commanding Contribution round about, and Declare for the King.

Colonel Horton is sent Commander in Chief against them, with thirty Companies of Horse and Foot, who sends out Colonel Fleming to gain a Pass from Poyer, which he finds quitted to his hands; but going on improvidently, falls into Poyers Ambuscado, by whom he is totally routed, and compelled to fly, with a few others, to a Neighbouring Church; and perceiving himself unable to hold it out, died, as it is thought, by his own Sword; and the rest were taken prisoners. This Success was attended with another, Chepstow Castle being taken by Sir Thomas Keynsham in the Governours Absence. But now the Tyde turns: News comes that Lieutenant-General Cromwell is advancing with a strong Power to suppress them, which makes Langhorn resolve to fight Horton before his coming who as willingly marched to meet him, and near St. Fagons, May the eighth, views his Enemy, near 8000 strong, but in disorder, and unready to fight.

In this Condition Horton charged them, and obtained an easie Victory, killed some, took 1500 Officers, and 3000 Common Souldiers, Langhorn himself, and Powel escaped by flight. Lieutenant General Cromwell enters Wales, forms Tenby Castle, and has it yielded upon mercy; and Chepstow Castle was re-taken by Col. Ewer: But all this could not keep Sir John Owen quiet, who whilst Cromwell besieged Pembroke Castle, got together some Forces in North-Wales; which the County Sheriff would have suppressed; but being too weak, was defeated and taken prisoner; and shortly after the same Fortune befell Owen himself, by the Forces of Major General Milton. Pembroke Town and Castle stood out courageously for a long time; but at length were to distressed, that they willingly would have surrendered, if they could have obtained any other Conditions: They yielded upon Discretion. Cromwell gives a furious Storm; which the Besieged resolutely endured: But the Scottish Invasion made the Lieutenant-General more inclinable to give them Attidles; upon which the Town and Castle was delivered up, July 13. (viz.) Langhorn, Poyer, and three other principal Actors, to submit to the Parliaments Mercy: the other Commanders, Knights, and Gentlemen, to depart the Kingdom within six Weeks, for two years: the rest to return to their respective Dwellings, and the Townsmen to enjoy their Freedoms and Liberties: Those that submitted to Mercy, were afterwards tryed as Traytors, notwithstanding the Princes Letter in their behalf to Gen. Fairfax: But this Favour was extended towards them, that they should eat Lots for their Lives; and to onely Poyer suffered.

April 20. The Duke of York Disguised in Womens Apparel, made his Escape from St. James's by Water, and landed at Dort in Holland, by the help of one Col. Bampfild, sent over purposely on that Design by the Queen.

The Country began now to be displeased, that after such Expence of Men and Money, there was yet no likelyhood of a Settlement, but rather a fearful Expectation of New Wars, and therefore resolves to Petition: The County of Essex begins the Dance, and desires the Parliament, that the Army may be paid and disbanded, and the King admitted to a Personal Treaty. Smock follows, and desires the like, but in higher Terms; and being numerous, quarrel with the Souldiers at Walthamstow, and come to Blows: some hurt was done on both sides, but Night parts the Fray. The City succeeds, and Petition to the same Effect; and also desire, That those prisoners, who stood committed for their former Inurrection in Massey's Bugness, might be released, as shortly after they were upon the Cities constant adhering to the Parliament, and refusing to send any Aid to the Kentish against the General: And at their Desire, their Militia was restored; and Maj. Gen. Skippin was appointed Commander of the City, and all the Forces within the late Lines of Communication. The Lieutenant of the Tower was discharged, and Mr. West Citizen, furrogated in his place, and Col. Barkstead, and Col. Rich were ordered to draw off their Regiments out of White-Hall, and the M. w. instead of which the City Common-Council order a Guard for the Parliament, and six hundred pounds yearly for their Major-General: And all this with the Generals free Consent and Approbation.

The Kentish Men would not Petition, but with their Swords in their Hands, and were up in Arms in such considerable numbers, that it was thought fit for Sir Thomas himself to march against them, which he doth, with six thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; the Kentish were near Ten Thousand: but unadvisedly parted their Forces, and sent away a Brigade to besiege Dover Castle. The General advances, and defeats some of them between Craford Heath, and Gravesend; from thence he sends Major Husbands before, who gains a Passage over a Bridge at Northfield, and some Prisoners: The General comes on, marching in a full Body, expecting the Kentish would have engaged, but they were not prepared, and so without any Resistance he came to Maidstone, in which the Kentish were drawn up into a Body, the Town strongly Man'd, and well provided with Ordnance, and Barracadoed.

Fairfax having his Army increased to Ten Thousand, falls to storming at seven a Clock at Night, June the second; twice he was Repulsed, the third time got Entrance; but then the Fight was more perillous than before, whilst the Assailants had to do not onely with those who Manned the Streets, but were also Gallied with continual Shot from the Houses, getting all by Inches: Not could they acquire the Victory, till after six hours Fight, and much loss on their own side: But of the Kentish two hundred were slain, above one thousand three hundred prisoners, divers of quality, four hundred Horse, and eight Pieces of Ordnance, with good Booty: And presently upon this, Rochester was also quitted to the Generals Mercy; Many of the Kentish men after this Defeat reinforcing their Compinies, marched up in a Body towards London, and Rendezvouz'd upon Black-Heath, whither some resolute persons repaired to them, under Command of the old Lord Goring: But the Kentish perceiving their Succours to come far short of what they expected, quit their Commanders apace and return Home: but Goring with five hundred men crossed over Greenwich Ferry into Essex; in which County the Committee-men were already secured, and Sir Charles Lucas having gotten together two thousand Horse and Foot, joyns with Goring, who seizes the Earl of Warwick's Armoury, and gets into Colchester, which now becomes a Seat of War, and the Country flocked in unto them, together with a party from London, and the Lord Capit, and the Lord Loughborough from Hartfordshire.

But General Fairfax leaving Colonel Rich, and Colonel Henson, who had now raised Dover Siege, to take in those places in Kent, which himself had not time to reduce, crossed over into Essex after the Enemy, and came before Colchester, which he immediately surrounded with a potent Army. The

A The Seamen being Dissatisfied, mutiny, and divers of the Ships went to the Prince, with Vice-Admirall Batten himself, who was thereupon Knighted: And now the Prince with a considerable Fleet sets to Sea, having with him his Brother the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, the Earl of Braintree, the Lords, Hopton, Wilmot, Willoughby, and Culpeper, with others of Quality, and came into Yarmouth Rode, with Twenty good Men of War, and Two thousand Souldiers; there he would have Landed; but hearing of Colonel Scroop coming against him with a Party of Horse and Foot, he sailed from thence to the Downs in Kent, seizing what Merchant-Ships and Goods he could meet with all. Deal Castle was at this time Besieged, for Relief whereof, the Prince would needs Attempt something, and therefore sets 500 Men ashore, who at first Charged handfomly; but being too weak, were beaten, several slain and taken, and the rest got Aboard again. Soon after this Sandwich, Deal, and Weymouth Castles were yielded up, and the whole County of Kent fully Reduced. Whilst the Prince Anchors in the Downs, the States of Scotland Invite him to them, and engage the Publick Faith of that Kingdom, for his Well-being, in Honour, Freedome, and Safety, with them, or with their Army then in England, and to remove from them, or their Army, when, or whither he pleased: But he having Written to the House of Lords, for promoting the Treaty with the King, and in vain Summoned the Earl of Warwick (Admiral for the Parliament) to submit to him as highest Caprain-General under his Majesty, and beginning to stand in need of Provision, returned with his Fleet back into Holland.

But the Earl of Holland being Commissioned from the Prince, Heads a fresh Insurrection, just as it were in the View of the Parliament, at Kington upon Thames; His chief Associates were the Duke of Buckingham, and his Brother the Lord Francis, and the Earl of Peterborough, July 2d. they Mustred 500 Horse, and some Foot upon Kington Heath, and from thence marched to Darling, and would have possessed Riegate, but were prevented by Colonel Rich and Major Gibbons, whereupon they Retreat towards Kington, closely pursued by the other, and sending away their Foot before, to secure their Retreat to the Town, they made a stand between Enck and Nonfuch Park; The Pursuers follow on, the Fight was short and smart: the Lord Francis Villiers refusing Quarter was slain, with Major Dalbier, and a Son of Sir Kensell Digby, and others, the rest put to flight, and many Prisoners of Note taken; July 7. the Earl of Holland made no long stay at Kington, but fled with all speed to St. Needs in Huntingtonshire, where he was totally subdued, and taken by Colonel Scroop, and sent Prisoner to Warwick Castle; but the Duke of Buckingham fled towards Lincolnshire, and escaped beyond Seas. Colchester holds out Courageously, makes frequent Salles upon the Besiegers, with pretty good Success, and good hopes of Relief from the North; for the Parliament of Scotland had Sate ever since the Second of March, and were Disgusted at the English Proceedings, in reference to the King, which was increased by the Report of their Commissioners now returned: so that notwithstanding the Parliament of England made them fair Offers, concerning the payment of the Money due upon Account of their Auxiliary Armies both in England and Ireland, and shewed moreover some Inclination to settle the Presbyterian Government here; yet all will not serve, for they had formed a Committee of Danger, to Consult of their Affairs in relation to England: the Major part of these being Hamiltons Faction, Voted a War, which the others Protest against; but to no purpose: And now the Scots Publish their Declaration, the Heads whereof were these;

"That his Majesty may come to London, or to some of his Houses near, and that with Safety.

"That Reparation be made for his Carrying away, or Satisfaction by punishing them that did it.

"That the Army under the Lord Fairfax be Disbanded.

"That Presbytery be settled, Sectaries punished.

"That all Members of the House be restored.

Cavaliers now Flock apace to Edenborough, and Wogan, a Captain in the English Army, Revolts to them with his Troop, and Two Companies of Foot Landed out of Ireland, at Chester, and marched thither likewise: Barnick is Surprized by the Cavaliers, Sir Thomas Glenham and Sir Phillip Musgrave raise Forces for the King in Westmerland and Cumberland, with which they Surprize Carlisle, and with them Joynes Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with some Horse, being General of the English Army for the King; and now being 3000 strong, they Coast about the Northern Counties.

July the Thirteenth, The Scots Army entred England, the Van was brought up by Duke Hamilton their General, the Main Body by Major General Middleton, and the Rear by the Earl of Calender; these joyn with Langdale, and fall upon Major General Lambert, near Appleby, and force force him to Retire into the Town, from whence he Retreats to Kilbyseven, and after to Bowes, leaving some of his Forces behind him, to Defend the Castle, which was Besieged and taken August 7, by Sir Phillip Musgrave, Colonell Boynton, Governour of Scarborough Castle, Declares for the King, and Pomfret Castle was surprized by Major Morris; Tinmouth Castle likewise Revolts, but was suddenly retaken by Sir Arthur Haslerig.

The Scots Retreat to Kendall in Westmerland, and Major General Lamberts Army increases daily with additional Forces: Lieutenant General Cromwell having quiered Wales, marches to Joyn with Lambert, and in his way takes Pomfret Town, but not the Castle. Hamilton leaves Kendall, and marches into Lancashire, intending for London; which the English Army meant to hinder, and therefore march to Preston, where Hamilton and Langdale lay with their Souldiers, little fewer then 24000; Cromwell and Lambert were reckoned to have 5000 Horse and Dragoons, and 7000 Foot. August 17, both Armies Faced one another, Major Smithson Commanded the Foreloft of the English, who charged furiously on the other, Routed them, and Alarmed the whole Army, and to the Battells joyn on a Moor two Miles East of Preston; and the Fight was very hot for two Hours, and then the Scots gave Ground, which encouraged the English to pursue, and that so fiercely, that they were forced to Divide: One Part being a Body of Three thousand Horse, moved towards Lancaster, and was pursued and dispersed by Coldwell, Twissleton, and Colonell Thorulow, who took Multitudes of them: Prisoners; the other part Horse and Foot marched over the River Ribbles, whom the Main of the English Army follow; and at Ribbel Bridge, the Scots make a stand, Defending the Pass stoutly for two Hours, even to Push of Pike, and then were constrained to Retire: The next Morning the Scots draw up upon a Hill on the side of Preston, whence being forced by the English, they fled in great Disorder to Wigan, which they Plundered, and next Morning marched towards Warrington (the English pursuing all the while) near Warrington the Scots taking advantage of a Pass, make another stand, but were again beaten, with the loss of a Thousand Men, and were prosecuted to the very Bridge, where the Foot, in Number 4000, being deserted by the Horse, laid down their Armes, and submitted to Mercy; Hamilton got away with Three thousand Horse to Nantwich, where the Country being up in Armes, seized 500 of them. Lieutenant General Cromwell marched towards Cumberland, to meet Monroe, giving Order to all the Parliament Commanders in those Counties to follow the flying Scots; by some of whom, Major General Middleton, who Commanded 400 Horse, was Defeated, and taken Prisoner, and the rest dispersed; Hamilton himself was met with at Uxeter, and made to submit to Mercy, by the Lord Gray of Greby, who sent him Prisoner to Ashby de la Zouch. In this Dates Fight, the English took more Prisoners, then their own whole Army amounted to: The Ensigns, Cornets, and Colours here taken were afterward hung up in Westminster-Hall; Sir Marmaduke Langdale was apprehended in an Inn. Cromwell Improves his Success, and comes to Donham, to look out Monroe, supposed to be about Six thousand strong; but the Presbyterian Party in Scotland having now recovered the Sword, Command him to return, which he obeys more for fear of the English, then dutifullness to them; and joyning with the Earl of Lanrick, both together made 8000 Horse and Foot, to oppose whom, the Presbyterians provided an Army, whereof the Earl of Argyle was Commander in Chief, and David Lesley Lieutenant General. Cromwell enters Scotland, and Publishes this Declaration.

The Scots Army Defeated by Lieutenant General Cromwell.

Hamilton taken Prisoner by the Lord Gray of Greby.

Cromwell enters Scotland.

His Declaration.

Whereas We are marching with the Forces of the Parliament of England, into the Kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of the remaining Part of the Enemy, who lately Invaded the Kingdom of England, and for the Recovery of the Garisons of Berwick and Carlisle: These are to Declare, That if any Officer or Souldier under my Command, shall take, or demand any Money, or shall take any Horses, Goods, or Victuals, without Order, or shall abuse the People in any sort, he shall be tryed and punished with Death, by a Council of War.

To him Argyle, Lowden, Leaven, and other of the Scots Nobility repair, and Contract with him for subduing of the Publick Enemy: And so much feared he was in Scotland, that this Agreement was Consented to;

First, That the Armies under Argyle, and the other under Lanrick and Monroe, with all the Forces in any of the Garisons in Scotland be Disbanded, and Berwick and Carlisle be Delivered to the English.

Secondly, That the Settlement of Religion at Home, and promoting Reformation Abroad, be ordered to the Determination of the General Assembly, and all Civil Differences be referred to a Parliament speedily to be Called.

Thirdly, That no Party that were in the last Engagements against England, be of the New Parliament, or of the General Assembly. And so he Returns into England, after he had been Invited to Edenborough, to Feasts and Banquets, and highly

A highly Circelled, by the States of Scotland, with all Expressions of Honour: And in Yorkshire he was desired by the Committee to Reduce Scarborough and Pomfret Castles, which was then promised, but afterwards performed.

Colchester had endured a tedious Siege, and was now brought to such Scarcity of Provision, that they had not Horse-flesh enough to serve them one day, that being the Food which they had fed on almost a Fortnight, and purchased with much Blood spilt in divers Sallies for dead Horses: And now perceiving all hopes of Succour utterly frustrated, were necessitated to yield upon these Conditions;

The Common Souldiers to depart with Life, and the Officers to remain at the Generals Disposal, he to Exempt from Mercy whom he pleased, the Remainder to be remitted to the Parliament Mercy, and the Town to raise 14000 l. to preserve it from Plunder. The Prisoners of Quality, were the Lord Goring, Capell, and Donoughborough; Eleven Knights, Twelve Colonels, Eight Lieutenant Colonels, Nine Majors, Twenty Captains, and Sixty five Gentlemen; the private Souldiers were about Three thousand; Three of the Knights were Condemned by a Council of War, (Viz. Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and Sir Bernard Gascoyne, a Papist; this last was Reprieved, and the other Two were Shot to Death. The first having (as the General said in his Letter to the Parliament) contrary to his Promise, falsified his Word with him; The second directed the shooting of poisoned Bullets, being against the Law of Armes.

Colchester Surrenders upon Articles.

Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle shot to death.

And to General Fairfax, after much loss of Time and Men, and difficult Service for a Quarter of a Year (for undoubtedly the Besieged were valiant Men) took possession of the Town of Colchester, August 27. After which he marches up and down the Counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Hartford, to settle Peace, and visit the Garisons, and so returns to St. Albans, his Head-quarters. And thus we have ended with the Military Actions this Year.

Whilst the Army was busied in Fighting, the Parliament were taken up with Petitions from the several County, for a Treaty with the King; the City, among the rest, had preferred One, and which desired the Release of their Aldermen, Gayer, Langham, and Bunch, and Serjeant Glyn, which the House Voted; and likewise Repeated their Orders against the Earls of Lindsey, Suffolk, and Middlesex; and the Lords Berkley, Hunsdon, Maynard, Willoughby of Parham, and the Eleven Members: And now they apply themselves to the Business so much desired; The Earl of Middlesex, Sir John Hipsley, and Mr. Bulkley, were sent to the King, to let him know the Parliament Intentions; who returned with his Desires; upon which the Parliament Voted,

Petitions from City and Country, for a Treaty with the King.

- That the Votes of Non-Addressees should be Recalled.
- That such Persons as he should send for, as necessary to him in the Treaty, be Admitted.
- That he be in the same state of Freedome, as at Hampton-Court, with such Servants as he desires.
- That Five Lords and Ten Commons be chosen Commissioners, to Treat with the King, and the place to be Newport in the Isle of Wight. And that the King be admitted to Invite the Scots thereunto, but to Treat only concerning that Kingdome.

The Vote of Non-Addressees recalled.

Which Votes were sent down to the King, who was to Treat Personally with these Commissioners; The Earls of Salisbury, Pembroke, Middlesex, Northumberland, and the Lord Say, for the House of Lords: And the Lord Wanman, Mr. Peirpoint, Sir Henry Vane the Younger; Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir John Potts, Mr. Brown, Mr. Crew, Mr. Bulkley, for the House of Commons; and with these joyned Mr. Hollis and Mr. Glyn, both lately re-admitted to the House.

Commissioners sent with new Propositions to the King.

Monday, September the Eighteenth, the Treaty begins; the Propositions were in Number Eleven.

- The First was, For calling in all his Declarations; which he Assented to, with this Proviso, That neither this Concession, nor any other of his should be taken Advantage of, unless the whole were concluded.
- The Second Proposition was, Concerning the settlement of the Church, in reference to which he Condescended: To settle the Directory, to pass an Act to Confirm the Assembly, and to Establish Presbyterian Government for three Years, reserving Liberty to himself and his Party to use the old Form: But would not agree to the utter Abolishing of the Episcopal Hierarchy, nor the selling of their Lands.
- The Third Proposition was, For settling the Militia in the Hands of the Parliament for twenty Years solely, to which he Assented.
- And likewise to the Fourth, For making void the Cessation of Ireland, and permitting the Government of it both Civil and Military to the Two Houses at Westminster.

And to the Fifth, and Sixth, For Nulling all Honours and Titles, since the carrying away of the Great Seal, and for payment of Publick Debts.

The seventeenth Proposition concerning Delinquents, to whom the Parliament intended great Severity: The King was contented that they should be Fined, and prohibited Access to Council or Court, without the Parliaments Consent; That they be deprived for three Years, of their Right of Sitting in Parliament, and brought to Tryall, if the Two Houses think fit, to suffer according to the Merit, whereof they shall be Legally Convicted: But he would by no means hear of Branding them with Treason, nor taking away either Lives, or Possessions, or any others, but such as after a Legal Trial shall be found Guilty of breaking the Established Laws of the Land.

The Eight, for Impowring the Parliament to Confer all Offices of the Kingdom and chief Magistrates for twenty years.

The Ninth, For Confirming the New Great Seal, with all Grants and Commissions Sealed by it.

The Tenth, For Ratifying all Priviledges, Grants, Charters, and Immunities, Power to dispose of the Tower, and the Militia to be Confirmed to the City of London; And all the Citizens to be Exempted from Military Service out of the Liberties, unless at the Parliaments Appointment.

All these were fully Consented to, and likewise the Last, which was for totall Exterminating the Court of Wards, Provided, That 10000 l. might be yearly paid to the King by way of Compensation.

The Earl of Ormond had gotten back into Ireland, and raised Forces there in Opposition to the Parliament, by the Kings Commission; But the King assured the Commissioners, That if the Treaty should take effect, the Irish Affairs shall be managed at the Discretion of the Houses only.

The King having thus far Complied with the Parliament, they likewise at his Desire Voted;

That he be in Honour, Freedome, and Safety, according to the Laws.

Secondly, That he have his Revenue as before, excepting the Dedications of such Forts and Garisons, as were of old Accustomed to be Allowed Maintenance.

Thirdly, That he have Compensation for the Court of Wards.

Fourthly, That an Act of Oblivion be past.

Most men thought now, that the King and Parliament would have United, and so in all likelihood they had, nothing being in Difference but only the Business of Episcopacy. But all this is broken off by the Armes Interposall, who could not think themselves secure so long as the King lived; And therefore to find other Work for the Parliament, They first send up for their Arrears, Amounting to a vast Summ of Money, which whilst the Houses were Debating, they prepare Petition.

For a Scrutiny to be taken for discovery of Contrivers and Actors in the late bloody Wars, and that speedy Justice be done upon them. That the same Fault may have the same Justice and Punishment in the Person of King, or Lord, as in the person of the poorest Common. That such as Speak or Act in the Kings behalf (till he be Acquitted of Shedding Innocent Blood) be proceeded against as Traytors.

When this would not do, the Army draw nearer; and taking up their Head-Quarters at Windsor, conclude a Remonstrance, which they send up to the Parliament.

Requiring, First, That the King be brought to Justice, as the Capital Cause of all the Evils of the Civil War.

Secondly, That a peremptory Day be set for the summoning the Prince of Wales, and Duke of York, and if they refuse, to Declare them Incapable of Government, or Succession, and to stand Exiled as Traytors; and if they render themselves, yet they to be proceeded against for Satisfaction: That the Revenues of the Crown be Sequestred.

Thirdly,

The Parliament
Vote a full Agreement with the King.

The Army Petition for Justice against the King.

Their Remonstrance to the same effect.

Thirdly, That Publick Justice be done against the Actors in the late Wars.

And lastly, They conclude, Desiring their Arrears, with the old Pretence of calling the Country of Free-Quarter; and desire, that a Period may be put to this Parliament, and a good care taken to Elect a new Representative.

In the mean time, Generall Fairfax Commands Colonel Hammond to deliver up his Charge to Colonel Ewer, by whom the King is Conveyed out of the Isle of Wight, to Hurst Castle, November 30. And all this contrary to the Intentions of the Parliament, who Voted, That the Seizing upon the Person of the King, and carrying him Prisoner unto Hurst Castle, was without the Advice and Consent of the Houses.

And thus the Treaty was Violently broken off; yet the Lords Vote the Kings Concessions a sufficient Ground for Peace, and forthwith Adjourn; and the Major part of the Commons Vote the same: But the Army being now come up to London, resolve to hinder these Proceedings, and therefore discharge the Trained Bands, from being a Guard to the Parliament, and Order Pride's and Rich's Regiments to supply their Places, by whom above Forty Members coming to the House, were Seized, and shortly after sent with a Guard, to an adjoining Inne called Hell, from thence to the Kings Head near Charing-Cross, and so to the Swan in the Strand. Not satisfied with this, the Army Accused Major Generall Brown, and Ninety odd Members, for Inviting in the Seas the last Summer, and therefore desire they may be excluded the House. At which time the Commons being Angry, Adjourn, December 8, for Four or Five dayes; in which space, the Army is busied, in devising a new Way of Government, and their Committee at White-Hall move,

That this present Parliament be dissolved the last of April next: And that the Representatives of the whole Nation, shall consist of Three hundred Persons, half of which Number, shall suffice to make an Act of Law, and that in the Intervalls of Parliament, a Council of State shall Govern: And this Declaration, together with half a Score of Modifications, they stile, The Agreement of the People, which was afterwards presented to the House of Commons, by Sir Hardress Waller, and sixteen Officers. The House new Moulded met again, Annulled the Votes against Non-Adresses, and those Others, which approved of the Kings Concessions; and Vote, That no Message be received from him, upon pain of Treason. That the Generall take Care of the King: And that the Council of War draw up a Charge against him. So now they are resolved upon his Tryall, and accordingly Orders are Issued out for his Removal.

Before it came to this point of open Violence against the King, there had not been left unattempted certain close and secret Practices against his Person, as there is great probability to believe from the Tryall of Captain Roff, whom one Osburn offer'd to prove and justify before the Parliament, to have been sent with Letters to Colonel Hammond from some of the Army, for the making away his Majesty by Pistol or other means. This Roff was committed by the Parliaments Order, and try'd at Southampton: But the business was so carry'd by the sticking of some of the prevailing Party in his behalf, that the Information was found Ignoramus, and the said Roff acquitted.

December the Tenth, the King was brought from Hurst Castle, with a strong Guard of Horse to Winchester, next day to Farnham, and the next day to Windsor.

In the mean time, the Two Houses differ among themselves: The Commons Assert, That it is Treason for the King to levy War against the Common-wealth; And the Lords deny, That the King can commit Treason against the Common-wealth, and therefore Reject the Ordinance of the Commons for his Tryall; and Declare, That no Act of the Commons is Binding without their Consent. Upon which the Commons Vote, That all Members, and others appointed to Act in any Ordinance, are Impowred and Injoynd to Sit, Act, and Execute, notwithstanding the House of Peers joyned not with them: And so Earnest were both the Commons, and the Army about it, That the Queen desiring to see her Husband before his Tryall, could not obtain a Pass for her secure Coming and Returning.

January the Sixth, The Ordinance for the Kings Tryall was Ingrossed, and Proclamation was made two Dayes after in Westminster-Hall, Cheapside, and the Old Exchange, for Witnesses to come in against the King, and Commissioners were appointed about it. And now the City (or rather a Party of the City suborned to that purpose) Petition the House for Justice against the King: And Hillary Term beginning January 23. was Adjourned till Fourteen Dayes after.

January the Nineteenth, The King was brought from Windsor to St. James's House: All things are now in readiness for this fatal Business; and notwithstanding the Dissenting of the House of Lords, and the Remonstrance of the Scottish Parliament against it. The Commons Erect a new Tribunal, which they call the High Court of Justice, who are Impowred to Convene, Hear, Judge, and Execute, CHARLES STEWART, King of England: His Title in Writs, Carolus Dei Gratia, the Commons had already Voted to be altered, and the Great Seal of England to be broken, and a New Seal was Ordered, with the Croffe for England, and the Harp for Ireland, with these Words, The Great Seal of England. And on the Reverse, the Picture of the House of Commons Sitting, with these Words, In the First Year of Freedome by Gods Blessing Restored, 1648.

Thus this great, though Unfortunate Prince, once Owner of Three Mighty Kingdoms, was now through the unsearchable Providence of the Omnipotent Disposer of all things, cast down into to the miserable Condition of a Calamitous Prisoner, to his own Subjects, by whom he was Tried, A heads of the greatest part of those that were the chief Actors of so abhor'd a fact, as in the Se-quell of the Story will appear at large.

Of his Taxations.

King James Dying, left his Son a large Dominion, but a poor Exchequer, which was the Occasion that his Taxations were so many.

In his First Year, the Parliament at their first Session Granted him from the Lairy Two Subsidies from Protestants, Four from Papists, and from the Clergie Three.

In his Second Year being Engaged in a War with France, for the Relief of Reckell, he borrowed 300000 l. by way of Loan.

In his Third Year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, they gave him Five Subsidies; And Doctor Mannering was Fined 1000 l. to the King.

In his Sixth Year, the Statute of Knight-hood was put in Execution, whereby above 100000 l.
 was brought into the Exchequer.

And in his Seventh Year, Sir Giles Allington was Fined 12000 l. to the King for his Incestuous Marriage with his own Niece.

In his Ninth Year, at a Parliament holden at Edenborough, a Tax was Granted to be paid in Four Years, amounting to 100000 l. Scots per Annum.

In his Tenth Year, Attorney-Generall Noy set the Design of Ship-money on Foot, (Grounded upon an Ancient Presiden-) for raising of a Tax upon the Nation, for the setting forth a Navy, in case of Danger, by sole Authority of the King, whereby he procured to the King vast Sums, but with much Reluctance, and no less hatred. And in a Parliament holden in Ireland, The Deputy Strafford obtained a Subsidy for the Payment of the Army, and the Encrease of his Majesties Revenue.

In his Thirteenth Year, Burton, Pryn, and Bastwick, were Fined in Star-Chamber 5000 l.
 apiece: And Bishop Williams of Lincoln was Sentericed 10000 l. by the same Court.

In his Fourteenth Year, he obtained a Free Contribution from the Nobility, Gentry, and Clergy, towards the raising of an Army, for the suppressing of the Scottish Insurrections: which being likely to break out more violently the following Year, the King Consulted with his Cabinet Coun-cell, who subscribe considerable Loans; The Earl of Strafford 20000 l. the Duke of Richmond as much, and the others according to their severall Abilities. And at the Queens Desire, the Papists Contributed very Liberally.

In his Sixteenth Year, the Earl of Strafford was led into the House of Lords, with much Honour for his good Service in Ireland, where he obtained of the Irish Parliament the Grant of Four Subsidies: And the Convocation of Bishops gave him an ample Benevolence of Four Shillings in the pound for Six Years, to be Assessed on all the Clergy in England, towards the carrying on of the Scottish War: The City was also Summoned to lend, which they refused, yet were contented to part with a considerable Summ towards the Building of a Royall Palace for the King, in St. James's Park, which never yet took effect. And all Knights and Gentlemen who held Land in Capite of the King, were to send Horse and Men answerable to their Abilities, for the Compleating of the Royall Army. And the Scots being now gotten into England, Taxed the Bishoprick of Durham 350 l. per diem, and the County of Northumberland 300 l. per diem, upon penalty of Plundering. The long Parliament Commencing this Year, borrowed 100000 l. of the City of London, upon Interest, to be repaid out of the Subsidies, and Voted as much to the Scots for the Expence of their Army. May the Fifth, the Parliament offered the King to procure him the Loan of 650000 l. till the Subsidies might be raised: Provided, That the King would pass a Bill nor to Adjourn, P. orogue, or dissolve this Parliament, without Consent of both Houses, to which he Assented. In February following, they Voted 300000 l. to be paid to the Scots for their Charges, for levying of which, the Bill for Poll-Money was passed.

In his Seventeenth year, the Irish Rebellion brake out, for suppression of which, the Parliament Voted, That 500000 l. should be forthwith provided: And the King at York, puts forth Proclamations for Tunnage and Poundage, and infinite Collections were made for Relief of the Protestants in Ireland.

In his Eighteenth Year, this Civill War began, and the King was fain to borrow much Money and Plate of the Loyall Nobility and Gentry; as likewise did the Parliament, of those who were Affected to them, Engaging the Publick Faith for payment out of Delinquents Estates; by which means, an Incredible Mass of Money and Plate was brought into Guild-Hall: And after this came out a Weekly Assessment from the Parliament, upon England and Wales, which amounted unto Thirty three thousand nine hundred eighty one pounds, thirteen shillings.

In his Nineteenth Year, Mr. Waller one of the Conspirators with Tomkins and Challoner, was Fined 10000 l. to the Parliament, who Voted, That the Kings and Queens Revenue should be detained and Employed in the Publick Service: And that a Tax should be laid upon Beer, Ale, Wine, Tobacco, and such other Commodities, which was called Excise: And also Order Thirty

A thousand pounds to be instantly borrowed, for Advancing the Scottish Army to their Assistance.

In his Twentieth Year, the Scots were Impowred by the Parliament to Assess for themselves, the Twentieth Part over all the North, and all Malignants Estates they could Seize within their Reach.
 The King likewise makes Proclamation, for Assistance of all the Neighbour Counties, to come in with Provision to Oxford: And the Parliament borrowed a hundred thousand pounds of the City, for Recruit of their Army under the Earl of Essex; and in the end of the Year, the Army was new Modelled, not without great Claiges, and Ten thousand pounds per annum was given to Generall Essex out of Delinquents Estates, to Discard him.

In his One and twentieth Year, Thirty thousand pound was paid to the Scots, to Induce them to Besiege Nemark, and vast Sums of Money were raised by Delinquents Compositions, which for the most part was paid to the Army for their Arrears.

In his Two and twentieth Year, the Parliament being weary of the Scots, and desirous also to have the King in their Possession, paid to them Two hundred thousand pounds, which was Conveyed to them by Major General Skippon, being raised out of the Sale of Bishops Lands, and the Excise; and Engaged the Publick Faith for the Payment of the other Two hundred thousand pounds, and Sixteen thousand pounds was allowed for the Charges of the Carriages; Five thousand pound was given to Mr. Denzil Hollis; Five thousand pound to Mr. Selden; Five thousand pound to the younger Children of Sir John Elliot, and to his eldest Son; his Fine in the Court of Wards was remitted; Five thousand pound to Mr. Sronds Kindred; Five thousand pound to Mr. Valentine; Five thousand pound to Mr. Longe; Five thousand pound to Sir Miles Hubbert; Five thousand pound to Sir Peter Hainwants Children; Five thousand pound to Mr. Hamden's Children; Ten thousand pound to Mr. Vassell; Ten thousand pound to the Earl of Northumberland:
 And this to be levied upon the Subjects.

In his Three and twentieth Year, the Army was Modelled into less, and Sixty thousand pound a Month settled for their Pay. And after the Reducing of London, a months Pay was given them for a Gratuity, and Thirty thousand pounds in part of Payment of their Arrears.

In this last Year, the Army doubting lest the Treary at Newport might take effect, made a great Bufile for the payment of their Arrears: Whereupon Three and twenty thousand pounds was paid them in part; but their Necessities were more Urgent, and therefore they seize Twenty thousand pounds in the Treasuries of Haberdasher, Goldsmith, and Weavers Halls, and demand Forty thousand pounds of the City, which was accordingly Collected for them: And Colchester being taken by Sir Thomas Fairfax, was Ordered to raise Fourteen thousand pounds to prevent Plunder. All these things accounted, the Taxations that were Collected in this King's Reign, were more than can be paralleld by any Precedent Reign: But then it must be consider'd, that what was rais'd by others, and for occasions not his own, out-balance'd what was levied by his Authority, and with his own Consent.

 tted on Sundays; and likewise for the King to make Leaves of Lands, parcell of his Dut-

In his Sixteenth Year, An Act was passed for preventing of Inconveniencies hapning by the long Intermision of Parliaments; and also for the Limitation and Abbreviation of Mitchelmus the Bill for the Triennial Parliament.

In his Seventeenth Year, Tunnage and Poundage were Voted down, together with the Court of Wards, High-Commission, and Star-Chamber; And the King passed the Bill for Continuation of

In His one and twentieth Year, an Ordinance passed for giving the Publick Faith of the Kingdom, for repayment of Publicke Debts, out of the Twentieth and Fifth Parts of Delinquents Estates: Also for Authorizing Commissioners to Seize and Regulate the Heralls Office.

In his Three and twentieth Year, Festivalls and Stage-Playes were Abolished by Ordinance of B Parliament.

And in his last Year, an Ordinance passed for better payment of Tithes and Dues to Ministers, and for punishing of Blasphemies and Heresies: And the Commons being Resolved upon the Trial of the King, Voted the Title in Write, Carolus Dei Gratia, &c. to be altered and referred to a Committee: That the Great Seal of England be broken, and Ordered a New Seal, with the Cross of England, and the Harp of Ireland, with this Motto, The Great Seal of England: And on the Reverse, the Picture of the House of Commons Sitting, with these words, In the First Year of Freedom, by Gods Blessing Restored 1648.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

THE King at his Coronation had Sworn to Maintain Episcopacy, in Observation of which Oath, he was so strictly Exact, that he chose rather to undergo those Inconveniences, which by reason of his refusal were impos'd upon him, and which indeed brought on his unfortunate and untimely End, than to Consent to things so contrary to his Judgment and Conscience. In England the Estate of the Church had not the least Wink of difference for divers Years, since the Conference at Hampton-Court, in King James's Time; But in Ireland, in the Second Year of this Kings Reign, a Proposition was made, for a further-Toleration for Popery, which the Papists were willing to buy at a good Price: But the Archbishop of Armagh, and the other Protestant Bishops, with Vehemency Protested against it: So that that Design was profoundly qualified, and the Religion of Ireland then Endangered by the

In his Fourth Year, Sate the Committee for Regulatinf of Religion, then Endangered by the Two Rocks of Arminianisme, and Poper.

In his Sixth Year, hapnd a notable Contest between the Jesuits, and Secular Priests in England, to reconcile whom, Panzani, Con, Rozetti, and others came over, and spent much Labour in vain: for the Feude instead of being Extinguished, did rather Dilate it self in France, Majors, and other Countries.

other Countries. In his Seventh Year, the Sabbatarian Controversie waxed very hot, while some Maintained the Fourth Commandment to be simply and intirely Morall, and Christians Obliged as well as the Jews, to observe everlastingly that Day. Others maintain'd, That the Lords-Day is an ordinary Working Day, it being Will-worship to make it a Sabbath by Vertue of the Fourth Commandment. This begat many Disputations, between Sabbatarians, Moderate Men, and Antisabbatarians; some of whom Asserted, That the poor Labourers who had no other time for Diversion, or Recreation, were not so much Obliged to the strictness of the Day, as the Richer Sort. But in Somer-setts the Case is Disputed more boisterously, where at their Church-Ales and Wakes, on that Day they fell to Fighting, which was Suppressed by Order of Judge Richardson: This was Interpreted by the Archbishop as an Usurpation upon Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction: And the King himself was troubled to settle this Difference, between these Two Great Men, and so thought good to set forth his Declaration, For Tolerating of Sports on the Lords-Day in the Afternoon; in which the Parliament afterwards charged home upon his Account. These were but petty Business, to that which followed.

Dr. Laud being preferred to be Archbishop of Canterbury, was very earnest and zealous for the strict observation of the Ceremonies of the Church of England; and for the bringing in use again of severall ancient Ceremonies that had been intermitted; and judging that the surest way to continue a Settlement in the Church, and to extirpate Heresies, was to proceed rigorously against those that would not be conformable, he thereby contracted a great Odium and Envy upon himself: from all the dissenting Party, who then went only by the name of Puritans, and Nonconformists: But that which so much the more inflamed the hatred of his Enemies against him, and increased the number of them, was this Occasion following: Chamwell these had received

In Scotland, the Bishop of Dumblae, Dean of his Majesties Private Chappell there, had received Order from England,

1. That Prayers should be Performed twice a day after the English manner.
2. That a Monthly Communion should be received on their knees.
3. That whosoever should officiate in Sundays or Holydaies, should do his duty as a Minister of Christ, and serve diligently among the people.

These things occasion'd much grumbling and seditious discontent among a People long possess'd against that way of Service: But in the 23<sup>d</sup>. Year of his Majestties Reign, an Injunction was sent down

A down (which was believ'd to have been done chiefly by the Arch-Bishops Advice) for the constant use of the Service-Book in all Churches in Scotland. This Proceeding so far exasperated the Peoples minds (not without encouragement questionless, from their chief Heads and Demagogues) that there ensued great Uproars and Commotions; which however allayed for the time, upon the remitting of the forefaid Injunction; yet at length broke out into Acts of open Hostility.

In the mean time, the Convocation of Bishops in England, perceiving Episcopal Hierarchy to be had in Contempt by many in this Kingdom, as well as in Scotland, thought good for their own Support to frame this Oath,

I A. B. do Swear, That I do approve the Doctrine and Discipline of Government Established in the Church of England, as containing all Things necessary to Salvation; And that I will not endeavor by my Self, or any other, Directly, or Indirectly, to bring in any Popish Doctrine, contrary to that so Established: Nor will I ever give my Consent, to alter the Government of this Church, by Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it stands now Established, and as by Right it ought to stand: Nor yet ever to subject it to the Usurpations, and Superstitions of the Sea of Rome: And all those things do I plainly and sincerely Acknowledge, and Swear, according to the plain and common Sense and Understanding of the same Words, without any E~~x~~ception, or Mental Reservation, or secret Reservation whatsoever: And this I do Heartily, Willingly, and Truly, upon the Faith of a Christian: So help Me God in Jesus Christ.

2 The Oath framed by the Bishops.

This Oath was excepted against for three Reasons :

First, Because the (&c.) did leave the Oath so loose, that neither the Makers, nor the Takers Gives Diffalt; thereof, understood the same.

Secondly, For that exacting an Oath of Dissent from Civil Establishment, in things of Indifference, was an Affront to the very Fundamentals of Government.

And lastly, That the Juror therein declares, he swears willingly, to which he was constrained under the highest Penalties.

The King had by this time rais'd an Army against the Scots, a Party whereof being sent before into the North, was Defeated at Newburn: The King and the Earl of Stafford come on in Person, but in regard his Majesty was desirous to try all fair means to avoid Blood-shed, and the Calamities of War, the matter is brought to a Treaty; and, in Conclusion, the Scots obtained all their Defires.

At Home, Episcopal Government was become so grievous to a great part of the people, upon whom the Non-Conforming Clergy began now to have a strong Influence, that now a Regulation would not serve their turn, mens Minds are bent upon an utter Extirpation of it, as too Oppressive and Imperious : And these Non-Conformists, or Puritans, (for so they were then called) being countenanced by the Long-Parliament then sitting, and encouraged by the Success of the Scots, began more boldly to Declaim in their Pulpits against the Bishops.

And no sooner were the unhappy Differences between King and Parliament, arrived to an utter Breach and Separation, but the Lords and Commons themselves proved as absolute Enemies to Episcopal Government as any; inasmuch as one Mr. Thomas, a Member of the House, having made a long Speech concerning them, wherein he had recited sundry Inconveniencies which befell this Realm, by their means: Twelve of the chiefest of them were Impeached of High-Treason; For protesting against all Acts passed by the Lords, during their Absence, they being forced to forbear the House. However Episcopacy continued yet alive, though in weak Estate, till the Year, 1646, at which time it was utterly Abolished by Ordinance of Parliament, October the Ninth. And the Church-Government was Constituted in the Hands of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, by whom Presbytery was Established for a time. But their Common Enemy being now removed, the Non-Conformists sadly clasp, and divide amongst themselves: the two younger Brothers, the Independent and the Anabaptist, thought their Case to be little bettered, seeing their Elder Brother the Presbyterian, to aim alio at a Compulsory Uniformity; but being well backed by the Army, at last through their means, obtained a Toleration of Tender Consciences.

Works

1648.

Works of Piety done by this King, or others in his Time.Order taken for the Repair of St. Pauls.

Structures of this Nature, there hapned not any in this Kings Reign, the Times for the most part being Turbulent; Yea in the Eighth Year of his Reign, the King and the Arch-Bishop began to take Order for the Repair of St. Pauls Church and Steeple, which had suffered much since the former Reparation in the time of King James; and great Hopes there were, that the Work would have been perfected, if the unhappy Wars breaking out, had not caused them, and the other Benefactors to desist: Other Works of Piety we find not, unless we reckon the Liberal Contributions; throughout the Nation, for the Relief of the distressed Protestants; and Sir Hugh Middletons cutting the New River, from Ware to London.

Of Casualties hapning in his Time.

A great Plague in the beginning of King Charles his Reign.

In his First Year, the Plague broke out in London, more dangerously than in the beginning of this Fathers Reign, inasmuch, that the King was fain to Adjourn the Parliament, because of the thin appearance of the Members, by reason of the Raging Contagion.

In the Second Year, was a great Earthquake.

The sudden death of William Earl of Pembroke.

In his Sixth Year, dyed William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, he sopped the Night before his death, with the Countess of Bedford, at Bishops-Gate, from whence he went to Barnards-Castle; he lay up, as his usual Customs was, very late, for he was a hearty Feeder, and went to Bed very well. But not long after, he ferche a deep and deadly Groan, which caused his Lady that lay by; and she not able to awake him, called for Company, who found him breathless, in which manner he continued till Eight in this Morning, and then died, as a Figure-singer had told him before. And the same Year, May the 29, appeared a Star visible at Noon, the Sun shining clear, at what time the King Rode to St. Pauls Church, to give Thanks for the Queens safe Delivery, of her second Son, Prince Charles.

In his Eighth Year, a Fire brake out on London Bridge, by which most of the Houses which were built upon it (which, when they were all standing, made up a very Beautiful Street) were burnt down to the Ground.

at London-Bridge.

In his Eleventh Year, by the Earl of Arundels procurement, one Robert Parr, Aged 160 years, was brought up to London; but feeding there upon other Dyer, than he had used in the Countrey, he shortly after Deceased; he was one of the Wonders of this last Age.

Robert Parr

London.

In his Sixteenth Year, the Earl of Haddington in Scotland, having recovered those Pieces of Ordnance, which the Garrison of Berwick had seized at Dunse, returned back to Douglas, where sitting merry at Dinner, with about twenty Knights and Gentlemen, on a suddain, the Magazine of Powder, that lay in a Vaulted Room, took Fire by Accident, whereby the Earl and his Company were blown up.

A sad Accident at Douglas in Scotland.

The same Year likewise, a Pond in Cambridge became Red as Blood, the Water whereof being taken up in Basons, retained still the same Colour: Many Sights also were seen in the Ayr, as Armies fighting one against the other; all looked upon as sad Prefages of the ensuing Broyls. Neither is that strange Thunder and Lightning unworthy of mention, which hapned at Withcombe, in the County of Devon, in the Fourteenth Year of this Kings Reign, where a Ball of Fire was seen to come into the Church, in the time of Divine Service, whereby three persons were killed, and threescore and two hurt, divers of whom had their Linings burnt, though their outward Garments were not so much as singed; most of the Seats were turned up side down, the Pillars, Steeple, and Church more endamaged than three hundred pounds sufficed to repair.

In his last year, Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir George Lisle, were shot to death, concerning whom, it is credibly reported by Eye-witnesses, that in the place where they fell, there grew no Grass for sundry years; notwithstanding the Ground round about be very fertile.

Of His Wife and Children.

He Married Mary the Daughter of Henry the Fourth, King of France, whose Marriage was Solemnized in the year 1625, being the first year of his Reign. He had Issue by her Four Sons, and as many Daughters; his eldest Son born before the time, was Baptized Charles, and lived not above two hours: His Second Son born, May the twenty ninth, 1630, was also named Charles, and afterwards Created Prince of Wales. And in the year, 1660, Restored, (after many years Seclusion in Foreign Countries) with the universal Congratulation of his Subjects to his Fathers Throne, happily blest with the Regal Virtues of so illustrious a Monarch. His Third Son was born, October the Thirteenth, 1633, was Baptized James, and Created Duke of York; a Prince of Incalculable Courage, and Heroick Valour; as his Actions in France and Flanders, yet fresh in Memory, have given sufficient Testimony. His Fourth and last Son was born the Twentieth of July, and Christened Henry; afterwards Created Duke of Gloucester: He, since his Brothers happy Restauration, decess'd on the 13th of September, 1660, thereby bereaving the World of those fair hopes, which had been generally conceived of his Noble and Princely Endowments. His Eldest Daughter Mary was born, November the Fourth, 1631, and afterwards Married to William of Nassau, Prince of Orange, by whom she had one Son Named William, Heir and Successor to his Father in his Dignities: She quickly followed her Brother the Duke of Gloucester, viz. the 24th of December, 1660, her Loss being very much bewail'd, especially by any who had Relation to her Service, as being a Princess of Universal Goodness, Charity, and Bounty. His Second Daughter Elizabeth, the twenty eighth of December, 1635. She dyed at Carisbrook in the Isle of Wight, September the 8, 1650, for meer Grief (as it is not without Reason believ'd) of her Fathers unfortunate Death. And his Third Daughter Anne, the Seventeenth of March, 1636, who also dyed very young. His Fourth and last Daughter was Born, June the Sixteenth, 1644, at Exeter, from whence she was brought up to St. James's, but afterwards Conveyed into France, by her Governess, the Lady Dalkeith: Whence coming into England, since his Majesties Arrival, she soon returned back into France, where she was married to the Duke of Anjou, Brother to Lewis the Fourteenth, present King of France; A Princess she is of incomparable Beauty, and Gallantry of Spirit.

Of His Personage and Conditions.

HE was of a comely Sature, Tall, Streight, well timbred; which Frame of Body, rendered him excellent in all active Exercises, and therein Indefatigable both in Mind and Body; His Hair of a darkish Brown, and somewhat long; One Imperfection he had, viz. a little hesitation in his Utterance, which yet was much more abundant in the Kings of France and Spain, then living; and which he so ordered, that whereas it substracted from the Eloquence of others, yet it seemed to add some Grace and Ornament to his Speech. He is judg'd by some, that would be thought wife, to have been deficient in Policy and Point of Government; but considering to what streights he was reduc'd, and what manner of Persons he had to deal with, the Miscarriages that hapned in his Reign, ought certainly to be imputed rather to his Unfortunate Ascendant, then to any defect of Prudence and noble Parts; which that they were not wanting in him, hath been sufficiently manifested by divers of his Messages to the Parliament, and that admirable Work of his, long since publish'd to the World. He was ever Eminent for Chastity and Constancy to his Marriage-Bed, very Learned, Affable, and Courteous, and of a most unchanged Mind, in the greatest Changes of his Fortunes; Neither in Prosperity Elevated beyond his Ordinary Temper, nor in Adversity Dejected: But most unhappy in the Mischoise of his Friends, and the want of fit and able Persons about him for the most part, which proved Fatal to him, and contributed not a little to that unhappy Catastrophe, which we must now recite.

Of His Death and Burial.

HIS Death was strange and unparalleled; We may read of many Kings who came to violent Ends, but never any that was so Formally and Solemnly: First, Tried for his Life, and then Judicially Executed in Publick by his own Subjects.

The House of Commons on the Fourth of January, being turned into a Grand Committee, passed the following Votes,

- I. That the People under God, are the Original of all just Power.
- II. That the Commons of England Assembled in Parliament, being Chosen by, and representing the People, have the Supreme Authority of this Nation.
- III. That whatsoever is Enacted and Declared for Law by the Commons of England, Assembled in Parliament, hath the force of a Law.
- IV. That all the People of this Nation are included thereby, although the Consent and Concurrence of the King and House of Peers be not had thereto.
- V. That to raise Arms against the Peoples Representative, or Parliament, and to make War upon them, is High-Treason.

6. That the King himself took Arms against the Parliament, and upon that Account is Guilty of the Bloodshed throughout the Civil-War; and that he ought to Expiate the Crime with his own Blood.

Next an Ordinance for the Kings Tryal was resolved on, which on Saturday the sixth of January was ingrossed and Read, and Commissioners were appointed for his Tryal; and on the Monday following, Proclamation was made, That those who had any thing to say against the King, should have a Hearing given them: And this was proclaimed first in Westminster-Hall, by one Denny, who was Sergeant at Arms to the Commissioners, who Rode into the Hall with his Mace, attended with six Trumpeters, and other Officers, who also rode bare into the Hall with him; the Drums of the Guard in the mean time beating without in the Palace-Yard: And the day after, Proclamation was made to the same effect in Cheapside, and at the Old-Exchange: And in order to this Grand Tryal, Hillary Term which usually begins on the twenty third of January, was adjourned for fourteen days. The House of Lords refusing to concur with the Commons in their Ordinance for the Kings Tryal, the Commons Retolved, and Vote;

That all Members and others, appointed to act in any Ordinance, are Impowered and Injoyed to Sit, Act, and Execute notwithstanding the House of Peers join not with them.

The Ministers in general and now even the Presbyterians also (heretofore furious Enemies to the Kings Cause) Declare themselves both in their Pulpits, and by earnest Petitions to the Parliament, Zealous Depricators of the Kings Death, and every where publicly protest against this Tryall.

The Nobility offer themselves Pledges on the Kings behalf, and the People universally seem greatly troubled and astonished: Notwithstanding all which, the House of Commons and the Army went resolutely on, and according to Agreement, a High-Court of Justice was Erected; the Commissioners whereof met in the Painted-Chamber, to consult what Course to take about the Tryall of the King; the Names of the Commissioners were as follow;

Oliver Cromwel of Huntington-shire, the Grand Usurper of infamous Memory; Henry Ireton, Cromwells Son-in-Law and Creature; John Bradshaw, a Cheshire-man, and a dishonour to the Law; Thomas Harrison, a Butchers Son of Newcastle under Line in Stafford-shire, once Servant to one D Halke, an Attorney, afterward a Colonel in the Army; John Carew, the Brother of Sir Alexander Carew, who was Beheaded by the Parliament in the year 1644. Edward Whalley of Nottinghamshire, once a Linnen-Draper; he betrayed the King at Hampton-Court; William Hewson, a Gentleman of an antient Family, and fair Estate in Suffolk, two more inexcusable his Treason; Isaac Penington, once Lord Mayor of London, which Office he took upon him contrary to the Kings absolute Command, the rest of his Actions being correspondent; Col. Henry Martin notorious for his ill life; his Father Sir Henry was Judge of the Prerogative Court; Col. John Barkstead, once a petty Goldsmith; but fitting Cromwells Purposes, was by him made Lieutenant of the Tower, and at this day his Head is there advanced Supreme; John Life, one of a good Family and fair Estate in the Isle of Wight, who being bred to the Law, was by Cromwel made President of his High-Courts of Injustice; William Say a Lawyer, once Deputy-Speaker for Lenthall; Gilbert Millington, once Chair-man for the Plunder'd Ministers; Edmund Ludlow, who came to be Lieutenant-General, and one of the chief Commissioners for Ireland; Sir Hardress Waller, a Souldier of Fortune, and at length Major-General in Ireland; Sir Michael Livesey, a Kentish-man, Bankrupt in Fortunes and Reputation; Robert Tichburn, from a Linnen-Draper, Lieutenant of the Tower, and next Lord Mayor of London; Owen Roe, originally a Silk-man, all along a strong Independent; Robert Lilburn, of the Bishoprick of Durham, Brother to hot-headed John; Adrian Scroop, the honour of whose Family was blemish'd by his Treasonable Acting; John Okey, first a Stoker in a Brew-house, next a Chandler by Billings Gate, at length a Colonnell and great Man in Cromwells Army; John Hewson, from a blunt Shoo-maker advanced to a Colonnell, and at length one of Cromwells rough-hewn Lords; William Goff, once Apprentice to a Salter; from whom running away to the Army, he was preferred by Cromwel, and at last was made one of his Lords; Cornelius Holland, once Servant to Sir Henry Vane, by whom he was preferred to be Clark of the Green-Cloth to his Majesty, whom nevertheless he ungratefully was the death of; Thomas Chaloner, a great Inveigher against the Kings Person, and Monarchy it self, in his popular harangues; Col. John Jones, first a Serving-man, next a Committee-man, and thence advanced to Alliance with Cromwel, by marrying his Sister; Miles Corbet, a Person of a good Family in Norfolk, had his Conditions been answerable; Henry Smith a Leicestershire man of a good Estate, and moreover made one of the Six Clerks in Chancery; Gregory Clement, once a Merchant, expell'd the House for being too publick a Fornicator; Thomas Wogan, Eleated into the Long Parliament, as a Person for their turn; Edmund Harvey, a great Committee-man and Publican; Thomas Scot, a Brewers Clerk, next a Country Attorney, and lastly, Burgess of Wickam, a furious Enemy to King and Kingly Government; William Cawley, a Brewer of Chichester, Eleated into the Long Parliament; John Downes, who of a Citizen became a Colonnell in the Army, he engaged in the unhappy Act, rather by constraint than voluntarily; Nicholas Love, Son to Doctor Love of Winchester, made one of the Six Clerks, a

A man of great bitterness and violence in the way he went. Vincent Potter one of the Long Parliament, a Person unknown, and untaken Notice of, till this Business. Augustine Ga land, Burgess of Quimborough and Chair-man of the Committee that drew up the Act for the Kings Tryall; John Dixwell, Burgess for Dover, and made Governour of Dover Castle; Colonnell George Fleetwood, a Buckinghamshire Gentleman, and made one of Cromwells Lords; Simon Alyn, one of a fair Estate in Buckinghamshire of the Long Parliament, a great Committee-man and Sequesterator; James Temple, a Suffex man, and Colonnell in Cromwells Army; Peter Temple, once a Linnen Draper in Friday Street, till an Estate of 400 l. a year fell to him in Leicestershire, of the County Town of which he was Burgess; Thomas Waite, a Rutlandshire man, who being made Governour of Burleigh, was thereby engaged into the Faction: Daniel Blagrove, one that rais'd his small Fortune by Acting for the Long Parliament; into which he was chosen Burgess for Reading: Sir John Danvers, Brother to the Earl of Denby, who, for his Loyalty, was made Delinquent: Sir Thomas Maleverer, a Yorkshires Gentleman, of an honourable Family, was made Delinquent: Sir Thomas Williams Pursefoy, once Governour of Coventry, a Warwickshire man, likewise of a fair'd Gentility; John Blackstone, heretofore a Shopkeeper in Newcastle, for which Town he was chosen Burgess into the Long Parliament; Sir William Constable, a Yorkshires Knight, who having sold his Lands to Sir Marmaduke Langdale, got them again for nothing; Richard Deau, originally a Hoymans Servant in Ipswich, but rising by degrees in the late Wars, he becomes at length one of the Parliaments Sea Generalls; Francis Allen, formerly a Goldsmith in Fleet Street, but thriv'd most Conspicuously by adhering to Cromwel, and the unhappy Powrs, among whom he became a main man in Committees, Receipts, and Publick Dapedrations; Peregrine Pelham, a Yorkshires man, he was made Governour of Hull after Holham; John Moor, once Colonnell of the Guards; John Alured, a Colonnell of the Army, and Souldier of Fortune; Humphrey Edwards, one of the Long Parliament, Male-contented for not being prefer'd according to his Desire; Sir Gregory Norton, a poor man, though a Knight, and had a Pension from the King, for which, how well did he shew his Gratitude? John Ven, formerly a Silkman in Chapeide, who breaking, had the Government of Windsor Castle given him, for a Repair to his broken Fortunes; Thomas Andrews, heretofore a Linnen Draper of London, he was made Treasurer of the Plate that was brought into Guild-hall; Anthony Stapely, a Suffex man, once a Colonnell in the Army, and made Governour of Chichester; Thomas Hurton, a Person not otherwise known but by being a Member of the Long Parliament, and of this unhappy High Court; John Fry, a Yeoman of Dorsetshire, Committee-man, and Arrian in Print; Thomas Hamond, the Kings Jailer in the Ile of Wight, he was Brother to the Reverend Dr. Hamond; the more the pity: Sir John Bourchier, a Yorkshires Knight, a zealous Instrument of the Independent Faction; Sir Henry Mildmay, once the Kings Jeweller, and by his Majesty both Advanc'd, and favour'd with more then ordinary Benefits; an ungrateful Servant to so gracious a Master: William Lord Admonson, whose first advancement was his marrying the Lady to whom he was once a Page; Robert Wallop, a person well defended, and of a great Estate in Hampshire, and therefore much the more inexcusable for joyning in so heinous a Fact; as likewise for the same Reason were Sir James Harrington, and James Challoner Esquire; The Lord Grey of Grooby, Son to the Earl of Stamford; Colonnell John Hutchinson, and Colonnell Richard Ingoldsbey, the latter of whom brought Testimonies of the forcible Constraint and Menaces that were us'd by Cromwel to make him Sign the Act, which afterwards both he and Hutchinson solemnly disclaim'd, testifying their Repentance in a publick and extraordinary manner. These were the Members of that horrible High-Court of Justice so called, which was Erected by those who pretended a Parliamentary Authority, and Supreme Pow'r of Judicature, for the Tryal and Condemnation of their lawful Prince and Sovereign, of whom what betided for the most part, and how divers of them were brought to Condisigne Punishment, will be declar'd at large in the History of the next Kings Reign. Officers Attending the Court; Doctor Drislaus, Mr. Ashby Counsellor, Mr. Cook, Solicitor, Colonnell Humphrey Sword-bearer, Mr. Denny Jun. Serjeant at Armes, Mr. Phelps, Mr. Broughton, Clerks to the Court. Messengers, Wolfred, Pain, Radley, Powell, Isaac King the Cryer: Many besides these were Nominated, as General Fairfax, and others, but they refused the Employment.

On Friday the Nineteenth of January, the King was brought with a strong Guard of Horse from Windsor to St. James's, and the next day he was led to his Tryall; In the Morning the Commissioners met in the Painted Chamber, where they sat a while in Consultation, from thence they went into Westminster-Hall, at the upper end whereof the Fabrick was framed for this Tribunal; the President, in his Scarlet Robe, had the Sword carried before him by Colonnell Humphrey, the Mace by Serjeant Denny the younger, and a Guard to Attend him, consisting of Twenty Men with Partisans: In the midst of the Court was placed for the President to sit on, a Chair of State of Crimson Velvet, with a Cushion thereon of Crimson Velvet, and a Desk before him, on each side were Benches for the rest to sit upon, covered with Scarlet Cloth; the Court being sate, and Silence Proclaim'd, the Hall-Gates were set open, and the Royall Prisoner having been brought from St. James's through the Park to Whitehall, and from thence by Water to Sir John Cottons House, was thence Conducted into the Hall by Colonnell Templin, and a Guard of Twenty Partisans. At the Bar was plac'd for him a Chair of Red Velvet, where after he had look'd sternly round about him, upon the Court, and up into the Galleries, he sat down, without taking the least notice of his Judges; then presently he rose up again, and look'd downward on the Guards, and the Throng of Spectators: Then the Commission from the House of Commons, by which they sat, was read by Phelps the Clerk, who sat at the Feet of the President;

President, on the right side of the Table (covered with a Turkey Carpet) whereon lay the Sword and the Mace; and after that, was read the Charge against the King, which was to this Effect.

That the said Charles Stuart being admitted King of England, and Intrusted with a Limited Power to Govern according to the Laws, for the Good and Benefit of the People, and preserving their Rights and Liberties; Yet nevertheless, out of a wicked Design, to uphold himself by a Tyrannical Power, according to his Will, thereby to overthrow the Rights and Liberties of the People; yea, thereby to make void the Foundation thereof; He the said Charles Stuart, for Accomplishing such Wicked Designs, and for the promoting himself, and his Adherents in his and their wicked Practices; Hath Trayterously and Maliciously levied War against the present Parliament, and the People therein Represented, particularly, upon, or about the Thirtieth day of June, 1642. at Beverley, in the County of York; at or upon the Thirtieth day of July, in the year aforesaid, in the County and City of York: And upon the Twenty fourth day of August, in the same year, at the Town of Nottingham (when, and where he set up his Standard of War): And on, or about the Twenty third of October, in the same year, at Edgehill and Keinton Field: And upon, or about the Thirtieth day of November, in the same year, at Brainsford, in the County of Middlesex: And at, or upon the Thirtieth day of August, 1643. at Cavesham Bridge, near Reading, in the County of Berks; And at, or upon the Thirtieth day of October, in the same year, at, or near the City of Gloucester: And at, or upon the Thirtieth day of November, in the year last mentioned, at Newbery, in the County of Berks: And upon or about the One and Thirtieth of July, 1644. at Cropredy Bridge, in the County of Oxon: And upon or about the Thirtieth day of September, in the same year, at Bodwin, and other places near Adjacent in Cornwall: And on the Thirtieth day of November, in the year last mentioned, at Newbery aforesaid; And on the Eighth day of June, 1645. at the Town of Leicester: And also on the Fourteenth day of the same Month, in the same year, at Naseby Field. At which several Times and Places, or most of them, and at many other places in the Land, at several other times within the years aforementioned; as also in the year, 1646. He the said Charles Stuart, hath caused many Thousands of the People of this Nation to be slain; And by Divisions, Parties, and Insurrections in the Land; and by Invasions from Forrein Parts, endeavoured and procured by him, and by many other evil Ways and Means, He the said Charles Stuart, hath not only maintained and carried on the said War by Land and Sea, during the years aforementioned; But hath also Revived, or caused to be Revived the said War against the Parliament, and the good People of this Nation, this present year, 1648. In the Counties of Essex, Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and Middlesex, and in many other Counties in England and Wales; and also by Sea: And particularly, He the said Charles Stuart, hath given Commissions to his Son, the Prince, for that Purpose. By the which Cruel and Unnatural War, by him the said Charles Stuart Levied, Continued, and Revived as aforesaid, much Innocent Blood hath been spilt, many Families have been undone, the Publick Treasury Wasted, and Exhausted, Trade obstructed and decayed, vast Expence and Damage to the Nation Incurred, and many parts of the Land spoiled, some even to Desolation. And for further prosecution of the said Evil Designs, He the said Charles Stuart, doth still continue his Commissions to the said Prince, and other Rebels and Revolters. All which wicked Designs, Wars, and evil Practices of him the said Charles Stuart, hath been, and are carried on, for the Advancing and Upholding of Will and Power, and pretended Prerogatives to himself, against the Publick Interest, Right, Justice, and Peace of this Nation, by, and for whom he was Intrusted as aforesaid. By all which it appeareth, That he the said Charles Stuart hath been, and is the Occasioner, Author, and Contriver of the said Unnatural War, and thereby Guilty of all the Treasons, Murthers, Rapines, Burnings, Spoils, Desolations, Damages, and Mischiefs to this Nation, Acted and Committed in the said Wars, or occasioned thereby.

And for the said Treasons and Crimes, John Coke doth on the behalf of the People 1648.

People of England, Impeach the said Charles Stuart as a Tyrant, Traytor, Murderer, and a Publick and Implacable Enemy to the Common-wealth of England: And therefore prayeth, That the said Charles Stuart, King of England, may be put to Answer all and every of the said Premisses; that such Proceedings, Examinations, Tryals, Sentences, and Judgments may be hereupon had, as may be agreeable to Justice.

The Charge being Read, which the King heard with a Countenance for the most part unaltered, only at some Passages disdainfully Smiling; the President standing up, Sir, said he, You have heard your Charge, containing such Matters as appear in it, and in the Close it is prayed, that you Answer to your Charge, which this Court Expects.

In Answer to which, the King Asks

By what Authority they brought to Tryall a King, their most Rightful Sovereign, against the Publick Faith so lately given him, at a Treaty between Him and his Two Houses? By what lawful Authority? said he again, more Emphatically; for I am not Ignorant, continued He, that there are on Foot every where very many unlawfull Powers, as of Thieves and Robbers in the High-way. Moreover he told them, That whatsoever they did, he was resolved not to Betray the Charge Committed to him by God, and Confirmed to him by Ancient Descent.

Then the President told the King;

That he was called to Account by the Authority of the People of England, by whose Election he was admitted King.

To which the King made Answer;

That the Kingdome descended not to him by Election, but by Hereditary Right derived from above a Thousand years; That by refusing an unlawful Power, he stood more Apparently then they for the Liberties of the People of England, whose Authority was shewed in Parliamentary Assemblies; but that here appeared none of the Lords, whose presence (and not only theirs, but the Kings also) was required to the Constituting of a Parliament; but that neither One, nor both Houses, nor any Judicatory upon Earth, had Power to Call the King of England to Account, much less some certain Judges, Chosen by his Accusers, and Masked with the Authority of the Lower House. That he could not make his Defence, unless they produc'd their Authority, since it would be the same Offence to acknowledge a Tyrannical Power, as to resist a lawful One.

The President often Interrupted the Kings Speech; saying,

That they were satisfied with their Authority, and that their present Work to do Justice was upon Gods Authority, and the Kingdomes.

To which the King urged;

That it was not his own Apprehension, nor theirs neither, which ought to Decide the Matter.

Hereupon the President gave Command, that the Prisoner should be taken away, and remanded into Custody, so the Court Adjourned till the next day following, save one: It is Observable in this first dayes Tryal, that while the Charge was reading, the head of the Kings Staff fell off, which he wondering at, and perceiving no Body offer to take it up, stoop't for it himself, and put it in his pocket. As his Majesty was going out of the Court, he look't upon his Judges with an austere Countenance, without moving his Hat; and said no more, but Well Sir; after which, Bradshaw having commanded the Guard to take him away. He said at his going down, pointing with his Staff at the Sword, I do not fear that; and as He went down the Stairs, divers of the People ventur'd to Cry out, God save the King: And this was the Result of the first Daies Tryal.

Two daies after, being the Twenty second of January, the Court met again in the Painted Chamber, and considering the Kings Resolution, and to hinder him from Arguing again against the Courts Jurisdiction, they make their Pre-Order; 1648.

- That if the King offer to Dispute the same again, the President shall tell him, That the Commons of England, Assembled in Parliament, have Constituted this Court, whose Power may not be permitted to be Disputed by him.
 That if he refuse to Answer, it shall be accounted a Contumacy to the Court.
 That if he Answer with a Salvo of his pretended Prerogative above the Court, he shall be required to Answer positively Yea, or No.
 That he shall not have a Copy of his Charge, till he own the Court, and declare his Intentions to Answer.

On the Two and twentieth of January, the Court met again, the King was brought to the Bar, and Solicitor Croke again Accuses him, and requires, That the King may be put to it, either to give in his Positive Answer, or else the Charge to be taken Pro confesso; accordingly the President having in brief repeated the Passage of the last Day, required his Answer: But he persisted firm in the Disowning their Authority, and offered to give in his Reasons for it, saying;

That he less regarded his Life, than his Conscience, his Honour, the Laws and Liberties of the People; which that they might not all perish together, was a sufficient Reason why he could not make his Defence before the Judges, and acknowledge a new Form of Judicature: For what Power had ever any Judges to Erect a Judicature against their King? Or by what Power, said He, was it ever Granted? Not by Gods Laws, which on the contrary command Obedience to Princes; Nor by the Laws of the Land, which Injoyn all Accusations to be read in the Kings Name: Nor do the Laws give any Power to the Lower House, of judging even the meanest Subject. Nor lastly, Doth their Power flow from any Authority which might be pretended Extraordinary, delegated from the People, since they had not asked the Consent so much as of every Tenth Man in this Matter.

The President still Ever and Anon Interrupting the Kings Speech, and telling him, That the Court, abundantly satisfied of their Authority, would not admit of any Reasons that should detract from their Power: At last put upon him to be mindfull of his Doom: But where, said the King, in all the World is that Court, in which no place is left for Reason? You shall find, Sir, Answered the President, That this very Court is such a One. Then the King still urg'd, That they would at least permit him to Exhibit his Reasons in Writing, which if they could Satisfactorily Answer, he would yield himself to their Jurisdiction. Hereupon the President growing into Choler, Commanded that the Prisoner should be taken away: Remember, said he then, as he was going away, That it is your King from whom you turn away your Ear; In vain certainly will my Subjects expect Justice from you, who stop your Ears to your King ready to plead his Cause.

The very next Day, being the Twenty third of January, The King was the Third time brought to his Tryall, where when he came, the Attorney General stood up, and addressing his Speech to the President, with a large Preamble, moved for speedy Justice against the Prisoner, saying, That his standing in Contempt, and not Pleading, ought by an Implicite Confession to be taken Pro confesso. Hereupon the President stood up, and having put the King in mind of what Mr. Solicitor had moved against him in behalf of the Kingdom, urged him to give his Positive and Finall Answer to the Charge of Treason brought in against him; the King Answered, That having somewhat to say for the Liberties of the People, as he had formerly exprest, he desired to know whether he might freely speak without Interruption, or not: To which the President reply'd, That as soon as he had acknowledged the Jurisdiction of the Court, he should be heard at large, to make what Defence he could for himself, but till then, he was not to be permitted to run into any other Discourses. The King then again made Answer, That he valued not the Charge a Rush, it was the Liberty of the People he stood for; and that for him to acknowledge a new Court, that he never heard of before, was a thing he could not do: for which refusal he was ready to shew his Reasons; if he might but have time Granted him. The President having again told him, That the Court Commanded him to give in his Positive Answer. Broughton, one of the Clerks, read as followeth;

CHARLES STEWART, King of England, You are Accused in the behalf of the Commons of England, of divers high Crimes and Treasons, which Charge hath been Read unto you; The Court now requires you to give your Positive and Finall Answer, either by way of Confession, or Deniall.

But

- But the King still persisted in his first Resolution, alledging, That to acknowledg this new Court, was against the Priviledges of the People, and the Fundamentall Law of the Kingdome. Then the President commanded the Clerk to Record the Default, and the Guard to take back the Prisoner; which accordingly was done.

But his Fourth and last Tryall was on Saturday, January the Twenty seventh. As the King came into the Hall in his usuall posture with his Hat on, some of the Souldiers (none else, and they it is verily believed set on) cry'd out loud, Justice, Justice, Execution. When the Court being Sate, the King was again brought to the Bar; yet still refused to plead his Cause before them, but said; He had some things conducing to the good of the People, which he desired liberty to deliver before the Members of both Houses. But the President Replyed, That it was but a further declining of the Courts Jurisdiction, and a Retardation of Justice. To which the King made Answer; That a short Delay was much more Safe, and Conducable to the Good of the Kingdome, than to precipitate a dangerous Sentence: And therefore desired, That he might have leave to Withdraw for the present, and they have time to Consider. Accordingly they all Withdraw for half an Hour, and then returned: And the King being demanded what he had more to say? Only insisted upon being heard before the Lords and Commons. Whereunto the Court would by no means Condescend, But forthwith proceeded to pass Sentence of Death upon him: Which Sentence was utter'd in by a large and Elaborate Speech of the Presidents; wherein he first maintained,

- That the King ought not to think himself Exempted from the Law, for that the Law was his Superiour; and that the only Estate Superiour to the Law, as being the Parent and Author of it, was the People of England: Whose Representative the Parliament being the Sovereign and Highest Court of Justice, were to be look'd upon as the Supreme and most Authentick Expounders of the Law, since they are the sole Makers of it. He confess'd, that the King hath not Parein in Regno, and that he is Major singulis, but that he is Minor Universis, & in exhibitione juris quasi minimus. Next he called to mind, How the Barons in their Wars stood out for their Liberties against those Kings that did invade them, and play the Tyrants, calling them to an Account for those things which they did amiss: And thus, said he, we see the Nobility then took upon them Franchum ponere, to put a Curb to the Exorbitant Actions of their Kings, and if they are now un-mindfull of their Honours, and the Kingdomes Good, certainly the Commons of England will not. He said also, That the King is but an Officer in Trust, and takes his Oath at his Election to be true to the People, and that Parliaments were Instituted as Remedies, in case this Oath be not duly observ'd, to adjudge the wrongs done by the King to the People. He shew'd, That this last Parliament had been Call'd upon the same Occasion; Namely, To Redress the Grievances and Miscarriages of his Government, and that he had done all that in him lay, to Subvert this Parliament, and take away their Priviledges. Next, he endeavour'd to Evince, That his Proceeding was not without President, as was alledg'd by the Kings Party, but that it had been the Custome of other Nations in former Ages; As, France, Spain, Germany (from whence he yet brought no Examples for want, as he said, of time) to call their Kings to an Account, in case of Misgovernment: More especially, he remembred, That the Ancient Law of Arragon, whereby the Justice of Arragon hath power to Reform whatsoever Wrong is done by the King, and also to prosecute against him for Miscarriages in Governing. Also, that the Tribunes of Rome, the Ephori of Sparta, were of the same Nature. Next, he omitted not to mention the frequent Practice of the Kingdome of Scotland, in Ancient Times, to Punish, Depose, and put to Death their Kings. And moreover, he instanc'd in our own Kingdome of England, the Case of Edward the Second, and Richard the Second: And whereas the King had stood upon his Descent, the President Asserted, That although many times it had Succeeded according to Descent, yet the Kings of England ever held the greatest Assurance of their Titles, when it was Declar'd in Parliament; And however the next Person in Blood hath been still design'd, the People may upon just Cause refuse him: He Affirmed, the Liege, or Contract between King and People to be Reciprocall, a Bond of Perfection from the King, of Subjection from the People; which first (said he) being broken Subjection trahit. Lastly, He went about to prove, wherein the King stood Guilty of those Crimes, for which in the Charge he was termed a Tyrant, Traytor, and a Murderer, wishing him seriously to consider of his own Estate, and of the Guilt of his Mis-doings; and telling him, That they ought not to decline the doing of their Duty, in the Administration of Justice even to himself: And that whatsoever Revenge was Threatned by his Party, they were Resolv'd, by the Grace of God, to go on with it.

The King once more desired, That he might be heard for the clearing himself of those heavy A Imputations which they had laid to his Charge. But the President told him, That since he had been pleas'd to Disavow them as a Court, it would be Improper for them to Hear him, nor could they admit of any further Delay. And thereupon he Commanded the Clerk to read the Sentence; which was done in manner following:

WHEREAS, The Commons of England in Parliament Assembled have appointed them a High Court of Justice, for the Trying and of Charles Stewart, King of England; before whom he had been Three times Convicted: And at the First time, A Charge of High Treason, and other Crimes and Misdemeanours was Read in behalf of the Kingdome of England, &c. (And then the Charge was read) To which Charge, He the said Charles Stewart, refused severall times to Answer. (And then the severall passages of his refusall to answer, were exprest,) For all which Treasons and Crimes, this Court doth Adjudge the said Charles Stewart, as a Tyrant, Traytor, Murtherer, and a Publick Enemy, to be put to Death, by Severing his Head from his Body.

This Sentence being Read, was approved by the Members of the Court, by holding up their Hands; The King offered to Speak, but he was instantly Commanded to be taken away, and the Court broke up. And as being hurried from the Bar, he was passing down the Staires, the ordinary Souldiers not only revild him with many irreverent and curtilous tauntes, but cast in his Face the smoke of their Tobacco; than which, a more odious and ingratefull fume could not have been presented to him, flinging their nasty Pipes at his Feet: And one among the rest most superlatively rude and insolent, was not ashamed to spit in his Face: All which Affronts his Majesty bore with admirable Patience and equanimity; and hearing them cry out, Justice, Justice; Alas poor souls, said he, for a Piece of Money, they'll do as much for any of their Commanders. His Majesty being Conveyed back to Sir Robert Cotton's House, Sir Hardesty Waller, Commissary General Iretton, Harrison, Dean, and Okey, Colonels, were appointed to confider of the Time and Place, for his Execution: By whom it was resolved, That he should be Executed on Tuesday, January the Thirtieth, between Ten and Two of the Clock, upon a Scaffold covered with Black, in the open Street before White-Hall Banqueting-House. In the mean time, one of his Chaplains, Doctor Juxton, Bishop of London, was allowed him to Administer those Spirituall Helps, which should be suitable to his present Condition. But he would by no means admit of Mr. Marshall, Mr. Nye, Mr. Carryll, Mr. Salway, and Mr. Dell, whom the Court had Ordered to Attend him for that Purpose. January the Twenty seventh, the King lay at White-Hall, and the next day being Sunday, the Bishop of London Preached before him in his Chamber. Monday following, he was conveyed to St. James's, where his Children had leave to Visit him, but stayed not long: Being come he gave them his Blessing, and told them, That it was the last time they should ever see him. And withall he Committed them to look upon P. Charles hereafter, not only as their Brother, but their Sovereign: Speaking those words principally to the Lady Elizabeth, to whom continuing his Speech, Sweet heart, said he, you'll forget this. No, said she, I shall never forget it whilst I live; and pouring forth abundance of Tears, promis'd him to write down the Particulars. Thentaking the Duke of Gloucester upon his knees, Sweet heart, said he, now they will cut off thy Fathers Head: (Upon which words the Child looking stedfastly on him) Mark Child what I say, added he, they will cut off my head, and perhaps make thee a King: but mark what I say, you must not be a King, so long as your Brothers Charles and James do live; for they will cut off your Brothers Heads when they can catch them, and cut off thy head too at last: and therefore I charge you do not be made King by them. At which the Child sighing, said, I will be torn in pieces first. Which falling to unexpectedly from one so young, made the King rejoyce exceedingly: And so they parted from him, with his Command to send his Blessing to his other Children beyond the Seas, and Commendation to all his Friends. The Dutch Ambassadour, in behalf of his Majesty, made Intercession to the Parliament for the Kings Life, but prevailed nothing: For Tuesday the Thirtieth of January, he was Attended with a Regiment of Foot, and a Guard of Parisians through the Park, with the Bishop of London on the one Hand, and Colonel Tomlinson on the other: He bids them go faster, telling them, That he now went before them to strive for a Heavenly Crown, with less Sollicitude then he had oftentimes bid his Souldiers to fight for an Earthly Diadem. Coming to White-Hall, he spent above two Hours in his Devotion, in his Cabinet-Chamber, where he us'd to lodge, receiving the Sacrament from the hands of the Bishop of London, who reading for the 2d. Lesson the 27th Chapter of St. Matthew, which contains the history of our Saviour's Death and Passion, and his Majesty thanking him for so seasonable a portion of Scripture: He reply'd, That no thanks was due to him him for that, since it was the proper Lesson appointed by the Rubrick for that day, being the 30th of January. Instead of dining, he only eat a bit of Bread, and drank a Glass of Claret Wine: Near One of the Clock, he was Conveyed through the Banqueting-House, and past through the great Window, unto the Scaffold (which was made adjoining thereunto, divers Companies of Foot, and Troops of Horse attending, and the multitude of Spectators being very great): Where being nothing Daunted at the sight of the Block and Axe, nor to behold his Executioner (who was more possessed with Fear, than He, and therefore Disguized with a Vizard), He Addressed his Speech to Colonel Tomlinson, as followeth.

I Shall be very little heard of any Body else, I shall therefore speak a Word to You here: Indeed I could have held my peace very well, if I did not think, that holding my peace would make some Men think, That I did submit to the Guilt, as well as to the Punishment: But I think it is my Duty to God first, and then to my Country, to clear my Self, both as an Honest Man, A good King, and A good Christian.

I shall begin First, With my Innocency: And, In Troath, I think it not very needfull for me to Insist long upon this: For all the World knows, That I did never begin a Warr with the Two Houses of Parliament; And I Call God to Witness, unto whom I must shortly make an Account, That I did never intend to Inroach upon their Priviledges: They began upon Me; It is the Militia they began upon: They Confess the Militia was Mine, but they thought it fit to have it from Me. And to be short, If any body will look to the Dates of Commissions, of their Commissions and Mine, And likewise to the Declarations, he will see clearly, that they began these Unhappy Troubles, not I. So as that for the Guilt of these Enormous Crimes that are laid against Me, I hope that God will clear Me out. I will not, (for I am in Charity) and God forbid that I should, lay it upon the Two Houses of Parliament, there is no Necessity of Either, I hope they are free of this Guilt: But I believe, that all Instruments between Them and Me, have been the chief Cause of all this Blood-shed: So that as I find my Self clear of this, I hope, (and pray God) that they may too. Yet for all this, God forbid, that I should be so ill a Christian, as not to say, that Gods Judgments are Just upon Me: Many times he doth pay Justice, by an Unjust Sentence; that is Ordinary: I will only say this, That unjust Sentence that I suffered to take Effect, is Punished by an unjust Sentence upon Me. So far I have said to shew you, That I am an Innocent Man. Now for to shew you, That I am a good Christian, I hope there is a good Man, that will bear Me Witness, That I have forgiven all the World. And even those in particular, that have been the chief Causes of my Death: Who they are, God knows, I do not desire to know, I pray God forgive them. But this is not all, my Charity must go further, I wish that they may Repent, for indeed they have committed a great Sin in that Particular, I pray God with St. Stephen, That this be not laid to their Charge: And withall, that they may take the Right Way to the Peace of the Kingdome; For my Charity Commands Me, not only to forgive particular Men, but to Endeavour to the last Gaspe, the Peace of the Kingdome. So (Sirs) I do wish with all my Soul, (I see there are some here, that will Carry it further,) that they endeavour the Peace of the Kingdome. (Sirs)

Looking about him upon the People, and perceiving them to be kept off by the Souldiers.

* At which instant he pointed to Dr. Juxton.

* Speaking of Juxton that wrote.

(Sirs) I must shew you, both how you are out of the Way, and put you in a Way. First, You are out of the Way, for certainly all the Way you ever had yet, as far as I could find by any thing, is in the Way of Conquest: Certainly this is an ill Way, for Conquest, in my Opinion, is never just, except there be a just and good Cause, either for matter of Wrong, or a just Title: And then if yee go beyond the first Quarrell that yee have, that makes it Unjust at the End, that was Just at the First: for if there be only Matter of Conquest, then it is a great Robbery: As a Pyrate said to Alexander, That he was the great Robber, himself was but a Petty Robber. And so, Sirs, I do think, for the Way that you are in, you are much out of the Way. Now, Sirs, to put you in the Way, believe it you will never go Right, nor God will never Prosper you, until you give God his Due, the King his Due, (that is, My Successor) and the People their Due: I am as much for them as any of you. You must give God his Due, by Regulating Rightly his Church, according to the Scripture, (which is now out of Order.) And to set you in a Way particularly, now cannot: But only this, A Nationall Synod freely Called, freely Debating among themselves, must Settle this: When every Opinion is freely and clearly Heard: For the King, indeed I will not, the Laws of the Land will clearly Instruct you for that: Therefore because it Concerns mine own Particular, I only give you a Touch of it. For the People, Truly I desire their Liberty and Freedome as much as any Body whomsoever: But I must tell you, that their Liberty and their Freedome consist in having Government under those Laws, by which their Lives and their Goods may be most their own: it is not in having a share in the Government, that is nothing pertaining to them: A Subject and a Sovereign are clean different things; And therefore until you do that, I mean, that you put the People into that Liberty, as I say, Certainly they will never Enjoy themselves.

Sirs, It was for this that now I am hither Come, for if I would have given Way to an Arbitrary Way, for to have all Laws Changed according to the Power of the Sword, I need not have come here: And therefore I tell you (and I pray God it be not laid to your Charge) That am the Martyr of the People. Introath Sirs, I shall not hold you any longer, I will only say this to you, That I could have desired some little time longer, because I would have put this, that I have said, in a little better Order, and have had it a little better Digested, then I have done, and therefore I hope you will Excuse Me: I have delivered my Conscience, I pray God you take those Courses, that are best for the Good of the Kingdome, and your own Salvation.

This his Speech did deeply Affect the Standers by, who yet for fear of the Souldiers, durst not make any great shew thereof. Then having put up some short Prayers, he openly Declared, He did a Christian, according to the Profession of the Church of England, as he found it left him by his Father: After which, he Discoursed a little with the Bishop, to whom he gave his George for the Prince. And having his Hair put up under his Night Cap, and being Undowned to his colour Watcoat; I go, said he, from a Corruptible, to an Incorruptible Crown, where no Disturbance can be. And so after some few Ejaculations, laid down his Head upon the Block, and stretching out his hands (The Sign agreed on) had it Severed from his Body at one Blow, by the Vizarded Executioner, who presently held it up, and shewed it to the People: His Head and Trunk were afterwards

A afterwards Confined in Lead, and Exposed to Publick View at St. James's; till, lastly, The Duke of Lenox, the Marquis of Hartford, the Marquis of Dorchester, the Earl of Lindsey, and the Bishop of London, begged the Body to Bury it, which they Conducted to Windsor Chappel-Royal, and there Interred it, with only this Inscription upon the Coffin; CHARLES, KING OF ENGLAND, MDC XLVIII. Princepsne priconatus ab Inacho; Nil Interest, an pauper, & Infima de gente: Sub dio Jacobis, Victimam miserantis Oris. To this untimely and unfortunate End was brought this once great and powerful Monarch, through the evil artifices of those who having for a long time secretly contriv'd his Ruine, found means at length to bring their cruel Purposes to pass; Of his Constancy of Mind, and Christian Fortitude, there needs no better testimony then his serene and undisturb'd behaviour at the Block: how strangely must the World be mistaken, if he were a Tyrant, whom the major suffrage of Men, by far, and those the most rational, Concludes to have been the most Pious and Vertuous Prince that ever bore the Scepter of this Nation: besides, that one of his most inveterate Enemies, namely, Henry Martin hath been heard to say, That if there must be a King in England, he had rather have Him then any man living.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

Men of Valour in his Time, were so frequent, That to Enumerate them all, were to fill a Volume; Yet we shall Particularize in some of the Chief, the rest may be seen in the History of this Kings Reign. We shall begin with Sir Charles Morgan, whose Valour is sufficiently Renowned in Germany, where, with Six thousand English Men, He more Troubled Count Tilly, the Imperial General, then the King of Denmark, could do with all his Protestant Confederates. Then Sir John Burroughs gave Eminent proofs of Courage in the Expedition of Calais and Rhe: The Earl of Strafford was, was Ex viroque, both a Valiant Souldier, and of such State Abilities (ayes the King) as might make a Prince rather Affraid, than Ashamed, to Employ him in the greatest Affairs. But when the Civil Wars broke out, the English Nation was then divided into Royalists and Parliamentarians: Of the Royalists, the most Famous were the Earl of Lindsey, Cleaveland, Northampton, and Carnarvan; The wise and Learned Lord Falkland, the Lords, Ashley, Goring, and Capell, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Thomas Glenham, Sir Henry Gage, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Bevil Grenvill, Sir Nicholas Slanning, Sir Richard Greenvile, Sir John Winter, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lyffe, Colonel John Arundell, Colonel John Trevanion, and Sir William Vavasor.

Of the Parliament Side were the Earls of Essex and Manchester, the Lord Fairfax, and his Son Sir Thomas, Lieutenant General Oliver Cromwell, no less Famous for his Valour and Conduct, then infamous for his Disimulation and Tyranny, Major General Phillip Skippon, Lieutenant General Thomas Hammond, Commissary General Henry Ireton, Cromwell's Janizaries; Major General Edward Massey, once Governour of Gloucester, Colonel Robert Blake, Governour of Taunton, and afterwards Admiral, Colonel John Lambert, Colonel Charles Fleetwood, Colonel Thomas Rainsborough, Colonel John Desborough, and Sir William Waller, Colonel Richard Ingoldsby, Colonel Thomas Morgan, Colonel Poynt, and Major General Brown: whereof Massey, Ingoldsby, Morgan and Brown, will in time to come prove as good Subjects as Souldiers.

In Ireland, The Earl of Ormond, the Lord Moor, and Inchiquin, Sir Henry Titchburn, Sir Charles Coote, Colonel Michael Jones, and (whereof more advantageous mention must be made hereafter) Colonel George Monk, Eternized their own Memories by notable Performances against the Rebels.

Of the Scots, the most Famous for the King, were the Earls of Forth and Montrose, with the Lords Gordon and Ogilby: for the Covenanters, were the Earl of Leven, and his Nephew David Lesley, with the Colonels, Meldrum, Strathern, Ker Montgomery, Brown, Middleton, Bayly, and Hurry, and the last, though not the least, was the Lord Douglas, in the King of Sweden's Service.

As there was this great Plenty of Martial Men, so there was no less Plenty of Learned Men; William Laud, Archbishop of Camberbury, Bishop Prideaux of Worcester, and Bishop Hall of Exeter, whose Abilities and Learning are Conspicuous in their Treatises, Doctor Reynolds of Christ-Church in Oxford, Doctor Collins, and Doctor Comber of Kings Colledge, and Trinity in Cambridge. But He whose Fame swallowed up all the rest, was James Usher, that Incomparable Archbishop of Armagh in Ireland, Famous and Renowned both at Home and Abroad, for his universal Learning, Piety, Prudence, and Moderation; Archbishop Spotwood of St. Andrews in Scotland, Sir Kenelm Digby, Mr. John Selden, Doctor Preston, Mr. White, Doctor Brown of Norwich, and Profound Doctor Hammond. The Worth and Excellent Parts of which Men, are sufficiently made known by their Admired Works. But we shall be Injurious to Physicians, if we forget Doctor Harvey, the Ornament of our Age and Country, by whom that deep and abstruse Mystery of the Circulation of the Blood was first Published to the World, since universally acknowledged, and approved by the ablest Practitioners of that most necessary Science.

Poetry was never more Resplendent, nor never more Graced; wherein Johnson, Silvester, Shack, Aspere, Beaumont, Fletcher, Shirley, Broom, Massinger, Cartwright, Conly, Randolph, Walker, Fanshawe, Dunham, Cleaveland, Quailles, Carew, Davenant, and Sucklin, not onely far excelled their own Country-men, but the whole World besides. And in a Word, we may truly say, That in this Kings Reign, Bellona and Minerva contended, who should have the most Adorers: And these Lands for their Happinesse, might have proved the Envy of Christendome, if it had not been for Discordia detrimens Viperum vitis innoxia cruentis.

Of the Solemn League and Covenant.

A Frier Men of Note, it will not be amiss to insert a thing of note. At what time the Scots, in Opposition to the English Liturgies and Service-Book, recommended to them by Archbishop Land, and the English Prelacy, had set up their four General Council-Tables: They then framed their Solemn League and Covenant, to be taken throughout all the Nation: But when the Parliament of England desired the Assistance of that Kingdom, a Confederacy was then entered into, between both Nations, alleged for Defence of their Liberties, both Civil and Ecclesiastical, against all men that in their Apprehensions should endeavour Oppression. One of the Conditions of this Confederacy was, That the People as well of England and Ireland, as of Scotland, should take this National Solemn League and Covenant, which followeth.

W E Noble-men, Barons, Knights, Gentlemen, Citizens, Burgeses, Ministers of the Gospel, and Commons of all sorts in the Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; By the Providence of God living under one King, and being of one Reformed Religion: Having before our Eyes the Glory of God, and the Advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the Honour and Happiness of the Kings Majesties, and his Posterity, and the true publick Liberty, Safety, and peace of the Kingdoms, wherein every ones private Condition is included. And causing to mind, the treacherous and bloody Plots, Conspiracies, Attempts, and practices of the Enemies of God, against the true Religion, and professors thereof, in all places, specially in these three Kingdoms, ever since the Reformation of Religion; and how much their rage, power, and presumption, are of late, and at this time, increased and exercised: Whereof the deplorable Estate of the Church and Kingdom of Ireland, the distressed Estate of the Church and Kingdom of England, and the dangerous Estate of the Church and Kingdom of Scotland, are present and publick Testimonies, are now at last (after other means of Supplication, Remonstrances, Protestations, and Sufferings) for the preservation of our Selves, and our Religion, from utter Ruine and Destruction, according to the commendable Practice of the chief Kingdoms in former Times, and the Example of Gods people in other Nations, after mature Deliberation, Resolved and Determined to enter into a Mutual and Solemn League and Covenant, wherein we all Subscribe, and each one of us for Himself, with our Hands lifted up to the most High God, do Swear;

‘First, That We shall Sincerely, Really, and Constantly, through the Grace of God, endeavour in our several Places and Callings, the preservation of the Reformed Religion in the Church of Scotland, in Doctrine, Worship, Discipline, and Government, against our common Enemies; The Reformation of Religion in the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, in Doctrine, Worship, Discipline, and Government, according to the Word of God, and the Example of the best Reformed Churches, and shall endeavour to bring the Churches of God in the Three Kingdoms, to the nearest Conjunction and Uniformity in Religion, Confession of Faith, Form of Church-Government, Directory for Worship, and Catechizing; That We and our Posterity after us, may as Brethren live in Faith and Love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midst of us.

‘Secondly, That We shall in like manner, without respect of persons, endeavour the Extirpation of Popery, Prelacy, (That is) Church-Government by Arch-Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissioners, Deans, and Chapters, Archdeacons, and all other Ecclesiastical Officers depending on that Hierarchy, with all Superstition, Heresie, Schism, Profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found to be contrary to sound Doctrine, and the Power of Godliness, least We partake in other mens sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their Plagues: And that the Lord may be One, and his Name One in the Three Kingdoms.

‘Thirdly,

‘Thirdly, We shall with the same Sincerity, Reality, and Constancy, in our several Vocations, endeavour with our Estates and Lives, mutually to preserve the Rights and Priviledges of the Parliament, and the Liberties of the Kingdoms; And to preserve and defend the Kings Majesties Person and Authority, in the preservation and defence of the true Religion and Liberties of the Kingdoms; That the World may bear Witness with our Consciences, of our Loyalty, and that we have no Thoughts or Intentions to diminish his Majesties just Power and Greatness.

‘Fourthly, We shall also with all Faithfulness endeavour the Discovery of all such as have been, or shall be, Incendiaries, Malignants, or evil Instruments, by hindring the Reformation of Religion, dividing the King from his People, or one of the Kingdoms from another, or making any Faction or Parties among the People, contrary to this League and Covenant; That they may be brought to publick Tryal, and receive condign punishment, as the degree of their Offences shall require or deserve, or the Supreme Judicatories of both Kingdoms respectively; or other having power from them for that Effect, shall judge convenient.

‘Fifthly, And whereas the Happiness of a blessed Peace between these Kingdoms, denied in former times to our Progenitors, is by the good Providence of God granted unto Us, and hath been lately concluded and sealed by both Parliaments, We shall each one of Us, according to our place and Interest, endeavour that they may remain conjoynd in a firm Peace and Union to all Posterity; And that Justice may be done upon the wilful Opposers thereof, in manner expressed in the precedent Article.

‘Sixthly, We shall also according to our Places and Callings, in this common Cause of Religion, Liberty, and the Peace of the Kingdom, Assist and Defend all those that enter into this League and Covenant, in the maintaining and pursuing thereof; And shall not suffer our Selves Directly or Indirectly, by whatsoever Combination, Perswasion, or Terrour, to be divided and withdrawn from this blessed Union and Conjunction, whether to make defection to the contrary part, or to give our Selves to a detestable Indifferency or Neutrality in this Cause, which so much concerneth the Glory of God, the good of the Kingdoms, and Honour of the King; But shall all the days of our lives, zealously and constantly continue therein, against all Opposition, and promote the same according to our Power, against all Lets and Impediments whatsoever: And that We are not able our Selves to suppress or overcome, We shall reveal or make known, that it may be timely prevented and removed. All which We shall do as in the sight of God.

‘And because these Kingdoms are guilty of many Sins, and Provocations against God, and his Son Jesus Christ, as it is too manifest by our present Distresses and Dangers, the Fruits thereof, we profess and declare before God and the World our unfained Desire, to be humbled for our own sinnes, and for the sins of these Kingdoms, especially, that we have not as we ought, valued the inestimable Benefit of the Gospel: That we have not laboured for the purity and power thereof; And we have not endeavoured to receive Christ in our Hearts, nor to walk worthy of him in our Lives, which are the causes of our sins and transgressions so much abounding amongst us: And our true and unfained Purpose, Desire, and Endeavour, for our selves, and all others under our Power and Charge, both in publick and private, in all Duties we owe to God and Man, to amend our Lives, and each one to go before another in the Example of a reall Reformation, that the Lord may turn away his Wrath and heavy Indignation, and establish these Churches and Kingdoms in Truth and Peace: And this Covenant we make in the presence of Almighty God, the Searcher of all Hearts, with a true Intention to perform the same, as we shall answer at that Great Day, when the Secrets of all Hearts shall be disclosed; Most humbly beseeching the Lord to strengthen Us by his Holy Spirit for this End, and to bless our Desires and Proceedings with such Success, as may be Deliverance and Safety to his People, and Encouragement to other Christian Churches, Groaning under, or in danger of the Yoke of Antichristian Tyranny, to joyn in the same or like Association and Covenant; to the Glory of God, the Enlargement of the Kingdome of Jesus Christ, and the Peace and Tranquillity of Christian Kingdomes, and Common-wealths.

I thought it not Impertinent to bring in at large this Solemn League and Covenant, since it is known to have been a matter of no less Remark and Consideration, than what ever this Age hath produced extraordinary; and though it was soon laid aside in this Nation as a thing presently out of Date, having declin'd with the Fortune of its Party that vail'd bonnet to a succeeding Generation of such as pretended to be more exalted and refin'd, and given place, forsooth, to higher Dispensations; Yet for the time it was received by us with high Veneration and Esteem from our Brethren of Scotland: It was the cause of strange and unwonted Effects, and is to this Day (as far as dares be own'd) the great Diana of the Presbyterian Cause, and therefore may well serve for the Epilogue to this present History, as it seems to have been the Prologue to the late Wars. But such is the Mutability of Affairs below, that those things which at one time have been held most Sacred and inviolable, have at another time been reduc'd to the lowest ebbe of ignominie and contempt; and such was the Fate of this once so Venerable Oath, which by the same authority by which it was at first Voted up into the strictest Observance and as it were Adoration (viz. Parliamentary) comes at length to be Sentenc'd and Condemn'd after the manner of most execrable Malefactors; as in due time will be more particularly related in the subsequent History.

Thus having taken a full View of the Life, the (for the most part) troublesome Reign, and the perniciously contriv'd and perpetrated death of this Magnanimous and most Vertuous Prince, we shall end at his Monument, where blotting out the Name of Tyrant, which his Enemies most unjustly went about to fix upon his Memory, we shall instead thereof engrave this following Epitaph, which (written by an unknown Authour) we have, among all the Elegies and Epitaphs that have been consecrated to his Fame, adjudg'd Worthy (for its Much comprehended in a Little) to be hereunto Adjoyned.

*Within this Sacred Vault doth ly,
The Quintessence of Majesty,
Which being set, more Glorious Shines;
The best of Kings, best of Divines,
Britains Shame, and Britains Glory,
Mirrour of Princes, Compleat Story
Of Royalty; One so Exact,
That Praise comes short, and doth detract.
If you would see Him to Endure,
Behold him in his Portraiture;
If such another you will find,
It must by Angels be Design'd.*

A Proclama-

Kingly Government.

No sooner was the Sacred Majestie of that most Vertuous and Accomplish'd Prince (whose Unhappy Reign we have last delivered) thus removed out of the Way by so strange and bold a kind of Parricide, as hath been declar'd; but the prevailing Power (consisting of a pack'd number of the Commons in Parliament, and the Chief Officers of the Army, combined together with bonds of Iniquity) seeing how Successfull, and unoppos'd they had effected this so unparall'd a Deed, to which they knew the generality of the Nation not only not consenting, but plainly averse, and as far as they durst shewing their utter dislike, resolve now to proceed secure to the carrying on of their intended Designs with a high hand, and to that end they immediately fall upon the alteration of Government, thinking to make sure work by subverting the Ancient Monarchy of this Realm, and instead thereof, introducing that which they call'd a Free State or Commonwealth. For the Constituting of which the first thing they did, was to Vote and Publish a Proclamation, That whereas several Princes might be made to the Crown, &c. to the apparent hazard of the Publick Peace, No Person whatsoever should pretend to Pre-claim or any way to Promote Charles Stuart Son of the said Charles late King of England, or any other Person, to be King or Chief Magistrate, &c. by colour of Inheritance, or any other Claim whatsoever, without the free Consent of the People, in Parliament first signified by a particular Act for that purpose, any Law or Customs to the contrary notwithstanding: and whosoever should contrary to this Order Proclaim, &c. should be adjudg'd a Traitor, and suffer accordingly. This proceeding was founded upon a Maxim which they had taken up and firmly agreed on among themselves, namely, That all Power and Authority is Originally in the People. But well knowing that their Councils had soon been confounded, and themselves interrupted in the course they had begun, if they had incorporated again with those of their Members, which (haply by their procuring) had been forcibly kept out by the Army, they Resolve and Decree, That all those Members that had assented to the Vote of the 5th of December, concerning the Kings Concessions, (for that was the occasion of their Sedition) should never be re-admitted; and that those that Voted in the Negative, should presently enter their said Dissent, or before they were to be admitted. And together with the fortune of our Monarchy, was involved that of the House of Peers, who having sent to desire a Conference about settling the

A the Government, in regard the Judges Commissions were determin'd by the Kings Death, instead of an answer to their Message, receiv'd a Sentence of exaction from the Legislative Power: For the Junctio of Commons upon Debate, Whether the Jurisdiction of the Lords House should stand, concluded it at length to be Useless and Dangerous, and therefore to be laid aside; as in like manner they declar'd the Kingly Office to be Unnecessary and Barrenness, and therefore fit to be abolish'd: Only the Lords they so far favour'd, that they allow'd them the Priviledge of being Capable to be chosen Burgesses into the House of Commons; which two of them, namely Salisbury and Pembroke, accepted.

But the rest of the Lords were so highly incens'd hereat, that there was suddenly publish'd a Declaration in the Name of all the Peers and Barons of the Realm, wherein they boldly asserted their Priviledges, and the Fundamentall Laws of the Nation; disclaim'd and protested against all Acts, Votes, Orders, or Ordinances, of the said Members of the Commons House for erecting of New Courts of Justice to Try or Execute the King, or any Peer or Subject of the Realm, for altering the Government, Laws, Great Seal, ancient Forms of Writs or Legall Procees, raising new Forces, or imposing new Taxes or Oaths, granting Commissions, or making Officers; as likewise against the Murdering of the late King, and the dis-inhering of his Son the Prince of Wales; and particularly against that Insolent and Frantick Vote (as they call'd it) of Febr. 6. concerning their abolishing the House of Peers as Useless and Dangerous. All which Acts, Votes and Orders they declar'd to be not only illegall, and therefore void, but likewise unreasonable, detestable, and destructive both to the Rights and Beings of Parliaments, the Fundamentall Laws of the Realm, and the Lives, Liberties, and Properties of the People.

Besides this Declaration of the Peers; For as much as it was thought necessary by the faithfullst of the Kings Friends, that the Just Right and Claim of the true Heir should not appear unregarded of his Subjects; and to shew that there were not wanting those that durst venture to promote it, in despite of all the penalties denounc'd, all the Acts, Votes, and Orders to the contrary: this following Proclamation, in the Name of all the Nobility, Gentry, and Commonalty of the Kingdom was Printed, and dispersed in severall Places of the City of London:

WE the Noblemen, Judges, Knights, Lawyers, Gentlemen, Freeholders, Merchants, Citizens, Yeomen, Sea men, and other Freeman of England; Do according to our Allegiance and Covenant by these Presents, Heartily, Joyfully, and Unanimously, Acknowledge and Proclaim the Illustrious CHARLES, Prince of Wales, next Heir to his Father King Charles, (whose late wicked Murthers, and all Consenters thereunto, we from our Souls Abominate) to be by Hereditary Birth right, and lawfull Succession, rightfull and undoubted King of Great Britain, &c. And that we will constantly and Sincerely in our severall Places and Callings, Defend and Maintain his Royall Person, Crown, and Dignity, with our Estates and Lives, against all Opposers, whom hereby we Declare to be Enemies to his Majesty and Kingdomes: In Testimony whereof, we have caused these to be Publish'd throughout all Counties and Corporations of this Realm; The First Day of February, in the First Year of his Majesties Reign.

But little could unarmed Declarations and verball indeavours avail against the reigning Power of an armed faction, who thinking they could not better stamp a face of Authority upon their new founded Government, than by assuming new Ensigns of Sovereignty, and cancelling the old, caus'd all Writs, Commissions, and Instruments of publick concernment to be issued out under a new Style and Title, viz. of the Keepers of the Liberties of England by Authority of Parliament; order'd the old great Seal to be broken, and a new one to be made with the Arms of England and Ireland on the one side, and this Inscription, The Great Seal of England; on the other side the Picture of the House of Commons with this Inscription, In the first Year of Freedom by Gods blessing restor'd 1648, and appointed that all the money which from that time was to be coin'd, should instead of the old Impression, bear the Arms of England and Ireland with this Motto, God with us. With the keering of the Seal there were encrested three joint Commissions, namely, Whitlock, Keble, and Lisle. Moreover they rescind'd certain Clauses in the Statutes of 1 Eliz. and 3 Jacobi, which intayn'd the Oaths of Allegiance or Supremacy, and urg'd an Oath of Fidelity to the Commonwealth of England, to all such as were put in places of profit or trust, or were made free of the City of London. And to accomplish all the formalities of State which they thought requisite to their Greatness, they erected a certain Convocation which was call'd a Council or Committee of State, consisting of 40 persons, Officers of the Army and others, to whom was committed the power of ordering the Land and Sea Militia, with the Magazines and Stores of the Nation; in fine, their Province was the executive part of Government, while the Junctio of Commons retain'd the Judiciary, and Legislative.

From their modelling of State, we shall descend to their Acts of Justice (for so it was then call'd), which because it seems they could not well be put in execution by the usual way of Tryall, according to the Ancient Law of the Land, they were perform'd by a new expedient they had found out, (which unhappily first try'd conclusions upon the life of their Sovereign himself) call'd

The Erecting of a High Court of Justice for the Tryall of Duke Hamilton, Earl of Holland, and Lord Capell, &c.

They are brought to their Tryall.

Of the Lord Capell.

call'd a High Court of Justice, and this is forthwith to be erected anew for the Tryall of such Capital offenders against the present Power, as were next to be brought in question, being persons of the most eminent quality (the less considerable being dispatch'd with less Ceremony in other places); these grand Victims were Duke Hamilton, taken after the defeat of the Battle of Preston, The Earl of Holland taken at St. Neots after the Fight at Kingstone, The Lord Capell, and the Earl of Norwich, taken at the Siege of Colchester, and Sir John Owen taken in Wales; one of whom, viz. the Lord Capell, had made his escape out of the Tower, but not so fortunate in his escape as Colonnell Massey, Sir Lewis Dives, and Mr. Holden, (who by a cleanly conveyance, though through a Privy, got clear away) was re-taken by the treachery of one Davis a Waterman; whom he hir'd to carry him from the Tower to Lambeth.

These noble Prisoners being brought to the Bar of this formidable Court, since they could not deny matter of fact, the evidence being too apparent; It was in vain for them to alledge either the quarter given them at their taking, or the Justice of their Cause; in regard the first was easily evaded by the distinctions of their Judges; and for the latter, It was taken for granted; that the Decrees of the present Authority, back'd with uncontrollable force, were a sufficient eviction to the contrary; so that on the 9th of March, the Duke, the Earl of Holland, and the Lord Capell, having receiv'd th. Sentence, were brought to their execution in the Palace-yard at Westminster: the first that came upon the Scaffold was Duke Hamilton, who in his Speech before his death, declared His affection to this Kingdom, the Reason of his coming into England with an Army, that is to say, his being commanded thereto by the peremptory Command of the Parliament of his own Country, which if he had disobey'd, he had suffer'd the same penalty he was to suffer here for obeying: He said many things in vindication of himself, from the Imputation of having been inconsistent in his Religion, or false and unfaithful in his Actions and Intentions toward the King his Master; he seem'd also to intimate a readiness to serve them in what they so much desire of him, namely, the discovery of those who were the Invaders of him, so that his life might have been spar'd, with other things which concern'd his condition as a dying man.

The next that came after him was the Earl of Holland, who touch'd upon the honour of his Family, and the nobleness of his Education, profess'd his sincere and constant adherence to the true Protestant Religion, justified himself as to the matter for which he was condemn'd, alledging his defection from the Parliament, not to have been out of any ill design against the State or Kingdom, or any abjuration of his first Principles, which led him faithfully to serve the Parliament, whose Service he should not have desert'd, had not the changes and alterations among them, carried them beyond what was reasonable, or what perhaps they themselves at first intended: He pray'd God to bless this Kingdom, and to settle it in the ancient way of Government by King, Lords, and Commons; and wish'd the present change might not bring confusion upon it; he wish'd that the Kings Posterity might be look'd upon, and own'd by the People, and restor'd to their native Rights without bloodshed; that his blood might be the last that might be spilt, and concluded, as he was Chancellor of Cambridge, with his Prayers to God for a blessing upon this University.

The last of the three that suffer'd, was my Lord Capell, who having made a very able and substantial defence for himself, both from the ancient Laws and Privileges of the Nation, and from their own Acts and Consults, though all in vain; behav'd himself at his death, like what he had shew'd himself all along to be, in his residence Acting for the Kings Service, a Person of a high Spirit, and Heroick Portraiture, and deliver'd what he had to say with a fearless and undaunted Deportment; wherein after an ample Account of his Religion, professing his hearty Zeal and Devotion to the true Protestant Religion, as it was Establish'd in the Church of England, he took the Liberty to urge the unjustness of his Execution, as contrary to the Law of Arms, to Honour, and the Word given him at his rendering of himself, against the Justice of the known Laws of the Land; and for no other cause, than his maintaining the Fifth Commandment: He express'd much trouble and repentance, for having been out of those that gave their Vote to the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford, manifest'd to the World the high Opinion and venerable Remembrance he had of his late Majesties transcendent Virtue, nobleness of Mind, and ability of Parts: Next, he pray'd heartily for his Majesty that now is, for his happy Restoration, long life, and continued prosperity; recommending to the People, the hopes they were to entertain in him of a most accomplished Person, and most excellent Prince, from the several years Experience he had had of the greatness of his Apprehension and Understanding the Honour of his Nature, and the Generosity of his Inclinations: And so shut up all with what they all Three generally consented in, viz. a cheerful readiness to forgive his Enemies, and those that had been the occasion of bringing him to that place.

By the same High-Court were sentenc'd to Death the Earl of Norwich, and Sir John Owen; but they finding so much favour, as to have it put to the question; Whether they should live or die, Sir John Owen had his Life, upon the courtesy of several Voices in his behalf; but the Earl of Norwich had the good hap to live only by the Speaker's casting Voice, his killing and his saving Votes being otherwise precisely of an equal number: And doubtless, it had gone hard with a number more of the most considerable Persons of the Kingdom had they not in time, by seasonable flight beyond Sea, provided for their Safeties; the chief of which were (besides the King and the Duke of York) the Duke of Buckingham the Marquis of Worcester, the Marquis of Newcastle, the Earl of Bristol, George Lord Digby the Lord Cottington, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Culpeper, the Lord Byron, Sir Edward Hyde, Sir Philip Musgrave, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Richard Grimvile, Sir Francis Doddington, with several others, who since their persons were out of reach, were Executed in their Estates, which were utterly condemn'd and confiscated to the use of the Commonwealth.

A non-wealth; these were Delinquents beyond all Recovery: But there were a Multitude of others, which were call'd Compounders; and these were such as were admitted to the favour of enjoying their own Estates, upon condition of paying round Sums of Money for them.

Besides what was done by this new Court of Judicature, in the matter of taking away mens lives, some were condemn'd and taken off by Commissions of Oyer and Terminer: such was afterwards the Lot of Lieutenant-Colonnell Morris, and Cornet Blackburn, who for the surprisall of Pontefract Castle (which had been but lately re-taken) were hang'd and quarter'd at York; Some by Councils of War, and this was the Fate of one Mr. Beaumont a Minister, who was hang'd at Pontefract, Major Munday who was shot to death at Lancaster; and those three eminent Indevourers, though late, for his Majesties Service in Wales, Poyer, Laughton, and Powell, who notwithstanding from the consideration of what they had formerly acted for their first Masters (and indeed with far better Success) had the Indulgence of casting Lots, which two of the three should live; and those two who in their Lots had Life given them by the Lord (such was the fine Phrase they were call'd by) were Laughton and Powell, the fatal Blank was drawn by Poyer; who thereupon, on 25 of April, was shot to death near Bedford-Wall in Covent-Garden.

Among the rest of the Common-Wealths grand Delinquents, and the Kings most Loyall Subjects, there escap'd (though with life) yet not without Tryal for their Lives, at the Bar of the Kings (then call'd the Upper) Bench, Judge Jenkins, a stout Maintainer of the Kings Prerogative by the Law of the Land; and Sir John Stomell, a true-hearted Royalist of a great Estate: The first came off with a long and tedious Imprisonment; the other, with Confiscation of his Estate, which being great, was his greatest Crime.

While all this Stir was at Westminster, and other parts of the Kingdom, it is not to be imagin'd that the City of London should be altogether quiet and unmeddled with, yet was not the Scene there altogether so Tragical; To Confiscation of Life, the matter proceeded not; but to that of Estate and Liberty, and that chiefly upon this occasion; The Reigning Commons what before they had Declar'd, Voted, and Order'd fram'd ere long into a Formal Act; namely, the Exheredation of the Royall Issue, the Abolishment of Monarchy, and the setting up of a Republick, or Free-State; this they then commanded the then Lord Mayor Alderman Reynolds, to publish and proclaim in the City; which refusing to do, he was committed prisoner to the Tower of London, together with three Aldermen more; and in his Place, to serve out the rest of the year, was chosen by a Common-Hall a new Lord Mayor fit for their Turn, one Alderman Andrews, who attended with several other Aldermen as complaisant as himself, viz. Pennington, Holliston, Foulkes, Edmunds, Pack, and some others, readily obeyed the Commands of his Masters, and proclaimed their Edict in several places of the City.

This Act however, was not thought altogether likely to prove so grateful to the Nation; but that it would be needful to back it with a Declaration; which accordingly was fram'd with many plausible and specious pretences, to soothe and flatter the people; as, the promise of Deliverance from that Bondage, which was brought in by the Norman Conquest; of maintaining the ancient Laws, which they seem'd highly to extoll for their Excellency and Equality; and the consistency of them with the present Government of a Republick, upon some easie alterations of Form only, leaving the Substance intire, and reforming only the Abuses thereof; the Establishment of a firm and safe Peace; the Advancement of the true Protestant Religion; and the liberal maintenance of a Godly Ministry, the selling of Treaties and Alliances with Foreign Princes and States, the encouraging of Manufactures, for the increase and flourishing of Trade, and the maintenance of the Poor in all places of the Land. With which, and other such like glorious Offers, they thought to make themselves look'd upon, as most zealous Patriots and Promoters of their Countries Welfare.

But they ow'd their Success to a surer Prop than their Art of Remonstrating, and courting the People, by the suggestion of high hopes and expectations: They promised fair indeed, but not without the Sword in their Hands; yet their Success that had hitherto gone on with such a smooth Career was threatned with a Storm, that had it not been cunningly avoided, might haply have overwhelm'd them. The same Agitating Spirit which Cromwell had rais'd in the Army, for bringing his Designs about, had spread it self so far among the Common Souldiers of the Army (who doubtless, thought every one of them to have been a Senator) that it was like to have Levell'd his Greatness, and superinduct a New Change over this Model of Government he had help'd to set up: for the Agitators seeing themselves forgotten, and unconsulted with in the Affairs of State then managed, pretended that there was not that thorough Reformation of Abuses in Government, as their Supream Officers had made them believe they fought for; and with these Suggestions they made it their Work to possess the generality of the Souldiery, so that their Faction soon increased, under the Name of Levellers. This male-contented Humour had been for a pretty while discern'd; and this Levelling Principle foreseen to be hatching; in somuch, that their Private Meetings were forbidden by Order, several Mutineers Disciplin'd according to the Military Custome, and one Lockier a principal Incendiary, shot to death: And for a more effectual Diversion of these growing Disorders, it was thought requisite to keep those ill Humours in motion, which were apt to be fomented by Idleness, and Ease; and therefore eleven Regiments were appointed to be drawn out for the Service in Ireland, where (notwithstanding their Triumph here) there was yet a great deal of Work left for them to do: But this Invention, instead of allaying the Fury of the Discontent, enrag'd it to a higher Flame; for immediately, through the active Incitement of one Thomson, a principal principall Champion of the Sedition, severall Regiments which had Confederated together, began to endeavour a Conjunction, the Souldiers of each Regiment exhorting one another, according as they had been animated themselves by the Chief Ring-leaders; to stand up stoutly for the Cause and the Liberty they had fought for; and they of Scroops Regiment having cast off their Officers; but ere they could unite, Cromwell himself, and Fairfax as yet General, with long Marches, and wonderful Expedition, came unexpectedly upon the chief party of them, and with the help of Cromwell's never failing Canning and Vigilance, soon brought the business to a period; for he having given his Word to come to a Treaty with them, for the giving of them satisfaction in their Demands; and conditioning, that neither side should come within 10 miles one of another, the Levellers thereupon thought themselves secure, and marching to Burford in Oxfordshire, berook them to their ease; of which Cromwell having notice, and being too much a Politician to let slip such an opportunity, sent Colonel Reynolds to fall in among them: And certainly it was no hard matter for him, finding them in such a careless posture, to seize the whole Body of them without any resistance or opposition, so that they were all taken prisoners, to the number of 900 Horse, and 400 Foot: The chief Ring-leaders, Thompson, and one or two more, were put to death for Example: for the rest, Cromwell, to ingratiate himself with the Army, pretended to obtain Pardon. But of all the Maintainers of this Levelling Principle, none attempted more boldly for it (though with another sort of weapon, the Pen) then Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn, whom nothing could deter from prosecuting his Opinion in Writing, and inveighing against the Powers then in being; Sometimes he was Impison'd, sometimes try'd for his life, yet he was only overpower'd, but never quell'd, not by Cromwell himself.

The Parliament of Scotland resolve to own and Treat with his present Majesty.

Their Letter to the Junto, protesting against the Murder of the King.

The Junto's Answer.

His Majesty Solemnly Proclaim'd by the Parliament of Scotland.

All this while the Parliament of Scotland were in Consultation about a Treaty with his Majesty, whom (whether to advance their own Interests thereby, or really intending his good) they had resolv'd to own and declare for their King immediately after his Fathers death; ever since which time, those brethren (once so termed) who had been formerly so firmly confederated with the English Parliament, became thenceforth disavowers of their Proceedings, and entertain'd not obscurely thoughts of hostility against them, as will hereafter more plainly appear: For having by their Commissioners testify'd their utter detestation of any violent proceeding against the late Kings Life, and strongly mediated on his behalf, as soon as they heard the horrible Fact was peremptorily determin'd, they immediately dispatch away a Letter to the Men at Westminster, D wherein they declar'd their utter dissent, disclaim'd and protested against their Proceedings: Yet in their Letter express their dissatisfaction in his Majesties Concessions at Newport in the Isle of Wight, and their resolution not to have crav'd his restoration to his Government, till satisfaction had been given him to that Kingdom.

To which Letter and Declaration of theirs, they were re-saluted from our States here with a Confident and resolute Answer, which told them, They were at liberty to act in their own affairs as should seem best to themselves, but were not to limit or impose upon others. And next, justified themselves as having done nothing but what the Trust reposed in them requir'd, and what they knew to be approv'd of by Him that was no respecter of Persons; and that if they had offended, it was by their too long neglect of the impartial Execution of Justice in relation to the innocent blood spilt in the late Wars; That they hop'd the course they had taken with the late King, and meant to follow towards other Capitall Offenders, would be for the good of both Nations; and that if Scotland thought fit to vindicate their own Freedom and Liberty, they should be ready to afford them all Neighbourly assistance.

This Invitation at the cloie of their Answer, though cunningly and persuasively urg'd, was nevertheless so far from prevailing with the Scots, that it rather exasperated them the more, so that they continue firm in their Intentions of speedily sending Commissioners to Treat with his Majesty; But in the first place, they with all due Pomp and Solemnity, the whole Parliament of Scotland being present, and the Lords array'd in their Parliament-Robes, Proclaim him King at Edenborough Crosse, being for that Occasion hung with Tapistry; the Chancellour himself dictating to the King of Arms the words of the Proclamation, which were as followeth:

THe Estates of Parliament presently convened in this second Sessions of this second Triennial Parliament, by virtue of an Act of the Committee of Estates, who had Power and Authority from the last Parliament for Convening the Parliament; considering, that so far as the Kings Majesty who lately Reign'd, is contrary to the Dissent and Protestation of this Kingdom removed by a violent death; and that by the Lords blessing there is left unto us a righteous Heir and lawful Successor, CHARLES Prince of Scotland and Wales, now KING of Great Britain, France and Ireland, we the Estates of the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland, do therefore most unanimously and cheerfully in recognition and acknowledgment of his Just Right, Title, and Succession to the Crown of these Kingdoms, hereby Proclaim and Declare to all the World, That the said Lord and Prince CHARLES, is by the Providence of God, and by the Lawfull Right of undoubted Succession, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, whom all the Subjects of this Kingdom are bound humbly and faithfully to obey, maintain, and defend

A send according to the Nationall Covenant, and the Solemn League and Covenant betwixt the Kingdoms, with their Lives and Goods, against all deadly Enemies, as their only righteous Sovereign Lord and King. And because his Majesty is bound by the Law of God, and Fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, to Rule in Righteousness and Equity to the Honour of Gods, the good of Religion, and the wealth of his People: It is hereby declared, That before he be admitted to the Exercise of his Royall Power, he shall give satisfaction to this Kingdom in those things that concern the security of Religion, the Unity betwixt the Kingdoms, and the Good and Peace of this Kingdom, according to the Nationall Covenant, and the Solemn League and Covenant: For which end we are resolv'd with all possible expedition to make our humble and earnest Addresses to his Majesty. For the Testification of all which, We the Parliament of the Kingdom of Scotland, publish this our Acknowledgment of his just Right, Title, and Succession to the Crown of these Kingdoms, at the Market-Cross at Edenburgh, with all usuall Solemnities in like Cases, and Ordain his Royall Name, Portrait and Seal to be used in the Publick Writings and Judicatories of this Kingdom, and in the Mint-House, as was usually done to his Royal Predecessors, and command this Act to be proclaimed at all the Market-Crosses of the Royall Burghs, and to be Printed, that none may pretend ignorance.

C GOD SAVE KING CHARLES the Second.

This was on the third of February, 1648, the like being done in all the chief Towns of Scotland; And to acquaint his Majesty both with what was done, and what was intended, there were forthwith dispatch't away to his Majesty then residing at the Hague, two of the late Kings Bed-Chamber, Sir William Murray, and Sir Joseph Douglas: Moreover, the Scots Commissioners, the Lord Lothian, Sir John Chesley, and Mr. Glendinning, were commanded home; but ere their departure, they left a Paper subscribed with their own names, and left Order to have it sent to the House, wherein they reckon'd up all their Declarations, and call'd to mind their frequent Solemn Vows, Oaths, and Protestations, for the maintenance of the Kings Person, and Just Rights: And upbraided to them their shamefull abjuration and infringement of them by what they had lately acted. This came to home, and touch'd them so to the quick, that the Messenger that brought it, was presently clapp'd up, the Paper Voted Scandalous and Seditious, and all such persons Traytors to the Common-wealth, as should offer to joyn with, or adhere to the Subscribers; whom likewise Order was taken in all haste to stop in their Journey, and ere before them: so that being overtaken at Gravesend, they were brought back, question'd, and (justifying what they had done) secur'd, till a Copy of the Paper were sent into Scotland, to know if the Parliament and Estates there would own the same. Upon which, one Mr. Belford was sent to our States, both to certifye them, that they own'd all that was contain'd in the Paper, and to Expostulate about the Imprisonment of their Commissioners, as a thing contrary to the Law of Nations. Upon which the Commissioners were set at liberty, and return'd home. However, these proceedings on either side increas'd the Difficults and Jealousies of Each the Other, and seem'd to preface what afterwards the matter came to, down right blows. The first Alarm on their side, was the report of some English Forces marching toward the Borders of Scotland. On ours, the News of their Vowing 6000 Foot, and 2000 Horse to be rais'd; which Preparation nevertheless was upon another Occasion than this difference with our Republick, namely, for the opposing and quelling of a Party in the North of Scotland, headed by Monroe, Middleton, the Gourdens and Mackenzies, rising purely upon the Kings Interest, without any Demurs or Conditions, and therefore by the Kirk and Estates of Scotland as little own'd, as were the Kings most profest Enemies; so far as the Covenanters in this one particular sided with the English Junto, that they endeavour'd as much as might be to depreas and discountenance the Malignant Party (so those were call'd who taking part with the Kings Friends in England, and other parts, were the most really and professedly devoted to his Majesties Service); with these they refus'd to have Intercommunion: nor would they in any of their Transactions with his Majesty, admit them into their Councils. There were also of the Scots, some so strictly addicted to the Kirk and Covenant, that they only intended the Advancement of them, and minded not any other Interest either of King, or Free State, but rather oppos'd them both; of which Faction, Col. Kerr, and Stranghern were thought to be two principal Men. Nor were there wanting in that Nation, such as held secret Correspondence with the Army and Power of England. Of such a Quadruple division did Scotland at that time consist: But they were most considerable both for number, and the Power they held in the Parliament and Committee of Estates, who persisting in their Intentions of Addresses to the King, continued yet fix't to their Kirk and Covenant, rather endeavouring to draw him over a Profelyte to them, than for his sake to abandon them. Of all these, the Royalists conceiving themselves (as indeed they were) the most constant and reall Assertors of the Kings Cause. (whereas it was thought they of the Covenant in seeking unto him, sought their own Advantages by him, not intending to admit him but upon their own Terms; as, That he should Sign their Covenant, Submit to the Kirk Censure, Renounce the Sins of his Fathers House, and the Advice of his Mother: With things of the the like nature,) took all opportunities to raise all the Forces they were able by their own Contrivances and Endeavours. And of this they gave some Testimony by the forementioned Insurrection of the Mackenzies, joining with Montrose, Middleton, the Lord Rea, and others, in which attempt, Innerneis was seiz'd for the King; several others being likewise expected to have join'd with them, had not Kerr and Strauchan, being sent against them, with wonderful expedition, taken them at disadvantage, set upon them, and utterly dispers'd them: and besides their ill success, these things gave a very fit occasion to them at Westminster, To lay before their late Brethren of Scotland the inconvenience of their owning the King or any of his Affairs, to tempt them to a speedy and utter breach with him, and to court them with the proffer of their utmost assistance against him and all his Adherents. Nor was it altogether not to be fear'd what effects such subtle Insinuations might have produc'd; yet such was the aversion of the Covenanters toward our Common-wealthsmen, as well as against the Malignants, so call'd, that all their Rhetorick prov'd in vain, deceiving their expectations, notwithstanding that much more formidable Efforts were afterwards made by the Royalists in Scotland, chiefly under the Auspices and Conduct of the Marquess of Montrose, who having been Commanded by the late King at the Infatigation of the Covenanters, to quit Scotland, and to cease from Arms, began now to appear again, having receiv'd Commission from his present Majesty to raise Forces for him in Holland, Germany, and those Parts. This the Covenanters, however they could not choose but know of, yet dissembling, it seems, their knowledge of it, they went on in their Overtures of Treaty with the King, who on the other side, finding those of the Covenant to be, at that time, in a better posture and capacity to help him, than his own genuine Friends, who were in all places at a low Ebbe; and considering that his expected Levies would be but a weak foundation to rely upon, did not think it safe to reject the Overtures that were made to him by the Scots, from whom he had assurance of Commissioners shortly to be sent to Treat with him.

His Majesty ever since the unhappy declension of his Fathers Fortune in the late Wars, had betaken himself to a Sure Refuge in the Dominions of Foreign Princes and States; than he was like to have found in his own, as the lamentable usage his Royall Father underwent among the Usurpers of his Dignity, made it suddenly to appear; a much more favourable than which he could not in all probability have expected, since there would soon have been found out pretences against him likewise, to the deprivation at least of Liberty, if not of Life. During his Retreat abroad, there want not sufficient proofs of his Industry, Valour, and Counsel, for the recovery of his Right, which will at large hereafter appear in the severall Transactions he went through, the many great Affairs he dextrously manag'd, the many Toils and Hazards he hardly endur'd, besides what hath been already related of his Conduct at Sea, and the fair way he was in for gaining the Command of the whole Fleet, had not that been wanting which is the Life of all great Designs; through which necessity of his Condition, he was forc'd to have recourse to those Princes his Friends and near Relations in France and the Low-Countries, who knew to Entertain him according to his and their Quality; but as to any considerable Supply toward the regaining of his Kingdoms, there appear'd the same either incapacity or coldness as among Friends of a lower rank. He was at present resident at the Hague with the Prince of Orange, who had a particular Kindness both out of a generous Commiseration of his Estate, and by reason of his Alliance with him by the Marriage of his Sister the Princess Royall. Nor in the Prince only, but also in the generality of the Dutch People, there were to be discern'd a manifest good will and Inclination toward his Cause, and a detestation and contempt toward those that were the detainers of his Right; as was plainly discover'd both upon other occasions which happened afterwards, and by an Accident which fell out before his departure from the Hague; One Dorians a Republican Dutchman, made Doctor of the Civill Law in the University of Oxford, thence in the time of Warr prefer'd to be Judge Advocate in the Parliaments Army; afterwards employ'd in drawing up of the Charge against his late Majesty of glorious Memory, being at last sent Agent into his own Country from their Brother Republic of England, took his Residence at the very Place where the King had his, the Hague: Which confronting presumption and boldness in a person that had so notoriously contriv'd against his Royall Fathers life, was so disdainfully resented and stomack't by the high spirited Cavaliers there, that one among the rest, one Col. Whitford a Scotchman, took the resolution to assault him in his Chamber, where he gave him his death's blow: upon which though a pretended Hue & Cry was made after the Assassinate by the Magistrates Order, yet the people were so far from shewing any forwardness in the Prosecution, that they rather further'd his Escape, than endeavour'd his Apprehension. In like manner, not long after was one Alcham, being sent Agent into Spain from the same Powers, assaulted at Madrid, together with his Interpreter Seignior Riba, by one Sparks, who had the same success as the other in Killing, but not in making his Escape; For by the Command of the King of Spain, more officious, belike, to our rising States, he was dragg'd out of the Sanctuary to which he fled, and Executed.

During the King's Abode at the Hague, the two Messengers Sir Joseph Douglas, and Sir William Murray, that had been sent to him from the Scots, were by Tempest driven back: Whereupon they were once in the mind to have sent them again with others join'd in Commission with them; but upon mature Debate, and second Counsels, they concluded first to send a particular Envoy with certain Propositions in order to a Treaty, and to know his Majesties Intentions therein; in the mean

A mean time, his Majesty left Holland for the present, and took his Journey toward France, intending to make some short stay at St. Germain with his Mother, the Queen Dowager of England, and from thence to pass over into the Isle of Jersey, thence to give a Meeting to the Scots Commissioners, and the Princess his Sister, he was splendidly entertain'd at most of the chief Places he pass'd through, at Rotterdam, Dort, and Breda, by the States of Holland; at Amster and Brussels by the Arch-Duke, by whom he was likewise preiented with a most magnificent Chariot, and eight galled for so illustrious a Guest: Upon the Frontiers of France, he was by the Duke of Lorraine Royally entertain'd and conducted toward Compeigne, where he was met by the French King, and by him accompanied to Paris, and from thence to St. Germain. Here, while for a season he made his abode, there came to him, out of Holland, his Royal Highness the Duke of Tork, who from the ample Expressions of Civility and Kindness made to him by the French King, and Cardinal Mazarine, took occasion to implore Aid in behalf of his Brother, and though he fail'd in the main of his Request, yet to oblige him with somewhat more than Compliments, and the specious Promise of very much Favour and Assistance, as soon as the King should have the Power and Opportunity to serve him, he was presented with Ten Thousand Crowns, besides many other Honours and Munificencies that were perform'd both to the King and him, during their stay in France. While thus his Majesty was sojourning in Foreign Courts, and rejected by the most Inferiour of his Subjects here, yet receiv'd and treated like himself by the greatest Princes abroad, his Tenants at Westminster were wholly taken up in the care of settling themselves, of maintaining their new Purchase, and of enlarging, as much as might be, their Dominions: All which to accomplish, it is easie to imagine how great their Advantage was, in having the whole Wealth of the Nation, either in Possession, or in their Power; forasmuch, as the Argument of a drawn Sword is not to be disputed; the Revenues of the Crown, the Revenues of the Church, the Confiscations of their Grand Delinquents Estates, the Compositions of those of the lower Classis, all the Kings Mannors, Houses, House-hold-Goods and Furniture, to be expos'd to Sale, together with Forreist Lands, all this they possist; and for the raising of more, they by Act impos'd a constant Tax of Ninety Thousand pounds a Moneth, besides the Command of the City's Purse, upon all emergent occasions: Out of which, though (after all Publick Charges cast up, the Pay of so great an Army, the Provision of so strong a Navy, and all other things defray'd, without which they had not been safe,) they had a pretty long Bill to pay; yet they neglected not to provide very comfortably for themselves, while Opportunity lasted, having the Convenience of gratifying and enriching one another, in a Parliamentary Way, out of other mens Estates: Nor could the Possession of one rich Kingdom satisfie their aspiring Minds; England was already wholly subjected to their Power, by an unhappy Destiny, Scotland not yet mature for their Invasion, Ireland is next the Object of their Ambition, the next Exercise of their successfull Arms: the truth is, it did not a little concern the Safety of their ill-gotten Dominion, to look after that Kingdom in time, lest the King should have been in soon as he had gain'd it totally to his Obedience; which was in a very fair way to have been accomplish'd, though the Care and serious Negotiation of the Marquess of Ormond (invested by the late King with the Dignity of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland); for seeing now a Necessity of closing with the Confederated Irish, and uniting all Interests there against the Common Enemy, he concluded a Peace with the most considerable Party of the Confederates, upon their Submission, and certain Articles, which (according to the Necessity of Affairs) yielded them many ample Privileges and Advantages: There join'd also with the Lord-Lieutenant my Lord Inchequin, the Marquess of Clanrickard, and the Earl of Casthaven; so that there had been a General Association for the King in all parts of Ireland, had not those in Ulster under General Owen Roe O'neal, a Person wholly guided by the Pope's Nuntio, and one of the most deeply engaged in the Irish Rebellion, stood out against the Lord-Lieutenant, and very much obstructed and oppos'd the Peace he made with the rest: yet with this very Faction did our Reformers here, who made so heinous a matter of the late Kings Treaty with the Irish, condescend so far to a Treaty, that what was Transacted in that nature between Owen Roe, and Colonel Monk (who having been long imprison'd by them, was at length releas'd, and sent over into Ireland, having it seems made a Vow, never to draw Sword more against the King in England) they secretly conniv'd at, however in open shew they were compell'd, by the shame of their former Pretences, to disown: but doubtless, Monk durst not of himself have proceeded so far in that business, nor granted O'neal what Conditions he desir'd, had he not had some private Instructions, or at least Encouragement from some of the Grandees here. Notwithstanding all these Difficulties, the Lord-Lieutenant with what Power and Influence he had in Munster, Connaught, Leinster, and other Parts of Ireland, sought by all means to get together a compleat Army, both for the reducing to Obedience O'neal and his Followers (toward which, the rest of the Confederate Irish themselves were the forwardest Undertakers, so great a Feud there was then between them), and for the gaining of those Places which yet held out for the English Republick, which were onely Dublin, London-Derry, Trim, Dundalk, and Droghda, of any regard: Of which, the three last surrender'd to the Kings Forces, upon the Defeat of O'neal by Colonel Mark Trevors, who together with the Lord Adair, and Sir Thomas Armstrong, had had but a little before declar'd for the King, and come in to my Lord Inchequene; the first, namely, A Dublin, being of chiefest Consequence, and therefore most labour'd for by my Lord Lieutenant, was govern'd by Collonel Michael Jones, who, by all means possible, both peremptory summons, and fair Invitations, had endeavour'd to win, to a Surrendry of the Town; which when he found to prove altogether vain and effectless, he resolv'd to lay close Siege to it with his whole Power: Which, what with the English he himself commanded, and others under Inchequene; and what with the Conjunction of Taffe, Preston, and others of the Confederate Irish Forces, that had Declar'd for the King, made up a gallant and well-furnished Army. (a gallanter and richer Army had scarce been seen in all the late Wars:) It was upon the 21 of June, 1649, that the Siege begun, and had in all probability succeeded, to the gaining of the City in a short time, had not the Difficulties and Discouragements on the part of the Besiegers been as great, as were the Encouragements and Advantages on the part of the Besieged: Here an Unanimity among the Garrison Souldiers, free from Factions and Divisions, a notable Vigilance and Courage in their Government, animated through Discontent, to fight against the Cause he had deserted for the Refusal of desir'd P.ferment, the City being re-inforc'd with a Supply of Three Thousand Horse and Foot, and a compleat Army suddenly expected out of England to their Relief: On the other side, Grudges and Animosities between the English and Irish in the Lord-Lieutenants Army; and thereupon a manifest Carelessness and Indifferency in some of the Officers and Souldiers, as seeming not to regard how the matter went; a necessity of drawing off a considerable part of the Army under my Lord Inchequene, for the Security and Defence of Munster against the threaten'd Invasion of the Army from England; To which may be added, my Lord-Lieutenants unwillingness to attack the City, out of a tender respect to what Inconvenience might have befallen the English Protestants within, had the City been taken by Assault: Embolden'd by these Considerations, the Besieged took the Courage; first, with slight Excursions, and afterwards (having discover'd the Security and Careless Posture (a thing most destructive in Martial Affairs) of those that were set to Guard a certain Fort which they attempted) with their whole Strength to fall out upon them; not fearing to venture even upon the main Army; and so far did Fortune favour their bold Attempt, that being led on by the weak resistance they met with, to venture farther and farther, in a short while they utterly defeated them, with little loss on their own side, killing and taking prisoners very many: among whom, the chiefest of Note were, Sir Richard Butler of the town, Sir William Vaughan of the flint; and possessing themselves entirely of the whole Camp, abounding in very rich Booty and plenty of all things, the Marquess himself not without much danger and difficulty making his Escape. In like manner, and it such about the same time, was the Siege laid against London-Derry, in the Kings behalf, by Sir Robert Stuart, and Collonel Merwin, rais'd by a resolute Sally of Sir Charles Coote the Governour thereof; and that so much the more advantageously, as not long before the Town had been reliev'd by Omsal, and Collonel Monk. Immediately upon these Successes, not to give the Royal Party time to recover Strength, all Disturbances being quieted in England, and the Discontented Faction of the Army call'd Levellers utterly suppress'd, Oliver Cromwell, then Lieutenant-General of the Junos Army, is made choice of (happily through his own Contrivance or Procurement) to be sent into Ireland with four Regiments of Horse, seven of Foot, and one of Dragoons, and invested with the Title and Authority of Lord Governour, or Lieutenant of Ireland: The next in Power under him, was his Son-in-Law Major-General Ireton, who follow'd with 40 Sail of Ships for the Transportation of his Army. He, after a short stay at Dublin, march'd with great Expedition against Drogheda, for the regaining of that place; which thereupon was fortified by the Marquess of Ormond, with a Supply of 2500 Foot, and 300 Horse, of the choicest of his Forces, with divers resolute and stout Commanders, among whom Sir Arthur Aston, heretofore Governour of Reading for the late King, was made Governour: There wanted in the Defenders neither Courage nor Fidelity, for the keeping of the Town; but such was the Force and Fortune of the Assaultants, that after several furious and successful Onsets (which yet cost them dear enough) the Town was at length taken by Storm; and in Revenge of their resolute standing out, both Sir Arthur Aston the Governour, Sir Edmund Farnley, Collonel Warren, Tempest, Finglasse, with other eminent Commanders, and all the rest that were within the Town, whether Garrison Souldiers, or Inhabitants, without regard either to Age, Sex, or Condition, were by Cromwells Order, with a Cruelty far unbecoming the Zeal and Religion he pretended put all to the Sword, except some very few persons, who made a shift to hide themselves, till the Massacre was over, and the Edge of Destroying Fury abated.

The next place besieg'd being Wexford, having newly receiv'd Sir Edmund Butler for Governour, with a Supply of fifteen hundred men, was soon yielded (through the Treachery of one Strafford, suffering the Castle, of which he was Governour, to be surpriz'd) even in the very sight of the Marquess of Ormond coming to the Relief of it.

Then follow'd the taking of Koffe, though upon Honourable Terms, made by the Governour Luke Taffe, with Carrick; and not long after Kilkenny (being betray'd by the Townsmen), and so from time to time, the rest of the most important Towns and Castles in all Parts of Ireland; besides several Field-Fights successfully fought by the Lord Broghill, Sir Charles Coote, Zanchy, Reynolds, Henlow, and Venables: And no great wonder, since they were continually supply'd by their Masters in England, with all things requisite, to animate and support mens Courages, having a competent Number of Ships attending to that end upon all Occasions. On the other side, many Relolate Efforts were made by the Lord Lieutenant, the Marquess of Clarrickard, the Earl of Castlehaven, the Lords Inchequene, Taffe, Clarendon, Ards, Sir George Monro, Lieutenant-General Ferris, and other Maintainers of the Royal Interest: But so far from success, (through the growing short of Pay, and the increasing of Division; and the want of the Kings Presence among them; which as it was earnestly desir'd, and for one while daily expected, so some think it would have very much conduc'd to the upholding of his Interest in that Kingdom) not only great Numbers of their Men, but even whole Towns and Cities fell off to the well-paid, and therefore prevailing side, (as Prosperity ever engages more, than all other Considerations, though never so Sacred) the rest that were kept together by the prudent Conduct of their Leaders, must needs succeed, as men that fought with disheartned and deprest Spirits. So that in less than a year, all Ireland was in a manner totally subdued to the Power of the Republick: To whom nevertheless, the English Plantations in Virginia, and the Caribee-Islands, under the Government of the Lord Willoughby of Parham, refusing Subjection, publicly declar'd for the King as their lawful Sovereign: Whereupon they were interdicted all Traffique and Commerce, and thereby driven to great Straights; and soon after a Squadron of Ships was sent from hence against them, under the Command of Sir George Ayscough; whereby in a short time they were brought to a forc'd and unwilling Concomity.

The King's
Rupert having been driven out of the Kingdom.

As the Kings Fortune by Land, such was it also by Sea, improsperous and much to be deplor'd; for Prince Rupert having been Constituted Admiral of what Naval Force his Majesty had remaining, and for a while much infest'd the Coasts of England, and taken several rich Prizes, was at length block'd up in the Harbour of King'sale, by some of the Junos Ships; and upon the taking of the Town suddenly after by Cromwell, being forc'd to break through with he loss of three of his Ships left behind him, had enough to do, making all the Sail he could, to get clear off with the rest; which yet having at last obtain'd, he sail'd directly for Lisbon, the chief City and Port of the Kingdom of Portugal; where notwithstanding all the Dissuasion and Opposition of Englands Commonwealth, which proceeded for the time to open Hostility with that Kingdom, he was both receiv'd into Protection, and nobly entertain'd by King John of Portugal. Here the Prince tarried, till he had tir'd out the Junos Admirals, that lay a good while waiting before Lisbon, in expectation of his coming forth; and then steer'd his Course for Malaga, in which unhappy Voyage, meeting with ill Weather, and certain Dutch Men of War, he first lost his Brother Prince Maurice, who was cast away in the Vice-Admiral; and afterwards his whole Fleet, excepting two Ships, himself with much ado escaping, and recovering the Coast of France.

His Majesty having staid some time at St. Germain, without receiving the expected Message from the Scots, takes his leave of the Queen-Mother, and the French Court, and steers his Course for the Ile of Jersey, which was the Place judg'd at that time most commodious for the Reception of such as should be sent Envoy's or Commissioners to him from Scotland: And about the beginning of September, accompanied with his Brother the Duke of York, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen, his whole Retinue amounting in all to about 300 Persons, lands in the Island, having a little before his departure from St. Germain, Confer'd the Order of the Garter upon Prince Edward, and the Duke of Buckingham, the same Honour being design'd for the Marquess of Ormond. And on the same day, those illustrious Persons receiv'd the Garter the Honour of Knighthood upon Sir Richard Brown formerly Baronet, Gentleman of the Privy-Chamber, and Resident for his late Majesty in the Court of France, ever since the beginning of the late Troubles.

Upon his first Arrival he was Proclaimed King, and the Lord Jermyn, now Earl of St. Albans, made Governour of the Island, under whom Sir George Carteret was Constituted Deputy Governour: Guernsey being possess'd by the Parliaments Forces, all except Cornet Castle, a Declaration was thought fit to be sent thither, to invite the Governour and People of that Island, to submit to his Majesties Obedience: But neither did this Invitation any whit avail, nor those Opportunities, that were lookt for, succeed, for the gaining of Dartmouth, and other places in the West, by the help of certain Male-Contents of the Army, who were ready to have taken hold upon any occasion, to rise against the Power then Reigning, had they not been immediately suppress'd, and brought to nothing.

The Committee of Estates at St. Johnstons, spent a good portion of time in Consulting about the Letter to be sent to the King, and about a fit Person to be sent with it unto him; made choice at length of Mr. George Windram Laird of Libberton, who all the while shew'd much unwillingness to take that Employment upon him, and desired to have been excus'd: so that much Importunity was us'd to bring him to accept of it; nor had he been prevail'd with, but that they condescended to remit of the strictness of their Demands.

On the five and twentieth of September, Windram was dispatch'd away with his Message to the King; he first put in at Zealand, where he lay for some time, expecting a convenient Passage over to Jersey: After his Arrival, he waited for an Audience, till an Agent that had come from Ireland was dismiss'd; and then being admitted to the Kings Presence to deliver his Message, he presented him with the Desires and Offers of the States of Scotland, which were to this Effect:

Scots to the King.

I. That His Majesty would Sign the Solemn League and Covenant of the Three Kingdoms, and pass an Act for all Persons to take it through the Kingdom of Scotland, and Ratifie all that had been done there concerning the same.

Iii 2

II. That

1649.

I I. That he would pass divers Acts of the Parliament of Scotland, which were Ratified by their two last Sessions: As for his Approbation of their Disclaiming Duke Hamilton's Design; For the receiving of the severall Acts made by the English for the Militia; For the Kings of Scotland to have no Negative Voice in that Parliament.

I I I. That he would withdraw his Commissions to the Marquess of Montrose, for raising of Forces, to be sent over from any Parts beyond the Seas, into the Kingdom of Scotland; and that he would give present Order for the stopping thereof.

I V. That he would put away all Papists from about him, and let none be of his Council but known Protestants.

V. That he would appoint some Place about Holland, to Treat with Commissioners from the Estates of Scotland, who would then send a Splendid Deputation of Eminent Lords of Scotland to him, to Treat and Conclude there upon all Particulars; and that from that time that he should come into Holland, they would provide for him what should be necessary, to make him and his Train to reside there in a Regal Manner.

V I. That he would give a speedy Answer to their Desires.

These Propositions from the Scots having been receiv'd and read, a time of serious Deliberation was requir'd, ere a positive Answer to them could be agreed on; and some Protraction in the Business was necessary, in respect of the Resolves that were to be expected out of France, and other Parts, concerning them; his Majesty having so great Respect for the Queen his Mother, and so high an Opinion of her excellent Vertue, and prudent Fore-sight of Things, that he thought fit not to make an absolute Conclusion, in any Matters of Grand Importance, until he had first acquainted Her with them, and expected her Advice about them; (Montrose being also a Person so much concern'd, it was thought mainly expedient to send with all speed that might be, to acquaint him how Matters went.) Besides what Delay was occasion'd by the dividedness of Opinion, among the Lords of his Majesties Council at Jersey, about the Scots Message; some there were, who relying with much Confidence, upon the Success of Montrose's Designs, Countell'd the utter Rejection of these Propositions, as Dishonourable and Disadvantageous to his Majesties Affairs; but the greater part of those about him were of Opinion, That the safest way would be to accept of those Conditions that were offered, and to make a speedy Agreement with that Party of Scotland that was the most prevalent, and by whom he had far greater probability of obtaining the Crown, than by Montrose's Designs, which were full of Hazard and Uncertainty. To the same effect likewise came Letters from the Queen, urging, That if the Scots Propositions seem'd at present too severe and Insupportable, there might hereafter be offer'd Opportunity enough, as soon as he had obtained the Kingdome, to make them sensible of their mistaken and over-acted zeal, drawing them by degrees to a willing condescension from the excessive rigour of their Injunctions, and thereby to free himself, at least in some measure, from the Inconvenience of them; so that whatever his own Repentments were (as haply those Conditions were not very agreeable to his Mind and Inclination), the main of his Counsellors tended to this: That according to the Exigence of his present Condition, it was absolutely necessary to Comply and Agree with the Kirk of Scotland. And how little shew there was of Contradiction in Montrose himself, appears by his own Letter to the King, the Substance whereof was;

I. That his Majesty would hearken to the Scots Commissioners, so far, as if possible, to make an Agreement with them, so that he might be honourably, and with Safety, admitted into Scotland.

II. That he would not break off with the Kingdome of Scotland, but (so that himself might be safely restored to his Rights and Dignities) that he might give Consent to have him Banish'd the Kingdome of Scotland, that so himself might receive no prejudice by him.

To which the King returned this Answer;

That he had found him so faithfull all along, and to have perform'd such Eminent Services, both to his Father, and to himself, that he could not in Justice, or in Honour leave him; and therefore desired him to urge him no further to it.

Of

Of the Two contrary Disputes that were manag'd in the Kings Councell at Jersey, the one for the rejecting of the Treaty, alledging, That the Scots, how fairly sever they promis'd the King, would in all likelihood, when they had him in their power, be induc'd either out of Fear, or for hopes of Gain, to deliver him up to the English, as they had formerly done his Father. The other for entertaining it, Persuading his Majesty by all means not to break off with the Scots, but to make use of all Opportunities and Offers that presented themselves to him, to get Footing in Scotland. This last Advice being in all likelihood the most safe, and most Contentaneous to Reason, and being back'd by the great Sway and Power which the Queen had with the King her Son, was after long Consultation, and many Reasons urged on both sides, carried by the Suffrage of the Major, and the most predominant Party: yet several Occasions so interven'd, that the Laird of Liberton could not be dispatch'd homeward so soon as was expected, and therefore Sir William Flemming was sent as Agent before-hand to Edinburgh, from whence he was to give Advice of the State of Affairs in Scotland, that thereby the Council might the better know how to proceed in the framing of the Answer.

Besides these Transactions with the Scots, great hope there was still remaining, of raising a sufficient Force in England, among the Friends and Favourers of the Royal Interest there: Upon this Design several were sent from Jersey into the West of England, among whom, Two principall Men, Sir John Berkley, and Colonel Slingsby, who went up and down among their Correspondents, earnestly stirring them up to take Arms for their Prince, were accidentally discovered by a Country Fellow; and thereupon notice being given to the Committee of the Country, were enquired after, and apprehended at Sir Charles Terwinnion's House, by one Captain Kuck-wich, and sent Prisoners to Truro in Cornwall.

Sir John Berkley, and Col. Slingsby apprehended in England.

The King had at this time Ambassadors and Envoyes Residing in the Courts of sever I great Princes and States; as, the Emperour, the King of Spain, the Duke of Moscow, the State of Venice, the great Prince of Turkey, and others, to Solicite their Aid and Contribution for the recovery of his Father's Kingdoms. Many Complements, no doubt, they received, and many fair Pretences of their good Will to help him, as the Custome of the World is, as well among Princes, as those of lower degree, but for the most part little or nothing beside; so little regard was the Petition of a Person Depress'd in Fortune, though a Prince. The most Solemn Embassie; and which was thought most probable to take Effect, was that to the King of Spain; which how it succeeded, will appear by the Answer given to the Lord Cottington, and Sir Edward Hyde, his Majesties Ambassadors, to that King, when at length they were admitted to have Audience; The Substance of the Embassie was:

Ambassadors from the King resident in the Courts of several Princes.

I. That the Parliament of England having been in Arms against his Father, had prevail'd against him, and caused him to be put to Death.

II. That he being the Son and Heir of the said Charles late King of Great Britain, and Ireland, was kept out of his Kingdoms by the aforesaid Parliament.

III. That he desir'd his Neighbourly Assistance, and that he would afford him what Aid he could, to establish him into his Rights and Dignities in the Kingdoms.

The Lord Cottington's Embassie to the King of Spain.

To this the King of Spain made Answer;

I. That he was sorry for his Fathers ill Success, wishing that he had been more Prosperous.

II. That he Condol'd with him for his Fathers Death, and was much Affected with Sorrow, at the manner of it.

III. That concerning the Difference between him and the Parliament, and the Right, on the one or the other Side, they being Matters out of his Territories and Jurisdictions, he could not take Cognizance of them, nor should he meddle therein; But for any thing within his own Dominions, he should be ready to do him what lawful Favour he could.

The King of Spain's Answer.

It is in vain to sue for help to those, against whose Interest it is to afford it. This King, notwithstanding the Sorrow he profess'd for his late Majesties Death, thinking it to be most for his Profit to comply with the prevailing Party, was the first that own'd the Power of the English Commonwealth, and shew'd himself desirous to enter into a League with them.

As for the Dutch, though they shew'd themselves not very forward to afford the King any great matter of assistance, yet they manifested a kind of favour and good will to his Cause, by the disrespect they gave to the Junco's Agents, viz. Walter Strickland, and some that were sent afterwards in the nature of Ambassadors, and the affronts they suffer'd to be put upon them by the common people.

The Czar of Moscow did more than any other Monarch resent the Murder of the late King; for upon the first knowledg thereof, he commanded that all the English Merchants should depart from his City of Mosco, and in a while after he expell'd them his Dominions, and confiscated their Priviledges. This Generous proceeding made the King expect a good assistance from him in Money, for the distance of his Dominions made all other Aid too difficult; And this he did the rather, because the Father of this Czar was by King James supplied very largely in a time of as great Distress as the King was now in. Wherefore the Lord Cutpepper was sent in an Embassy thither, who when he arrived at Moscow, had but a very cold Reception: For the Chief Ministers of that Country were so jealous, that they suspected his Credentials, and open'd all his Pacquets: But after a while, when by an accidental arrival of an Envoy from Poland, they had certain Intelligence of the King's being in Scotland in the Exercise of his Authority, and the total Submission of that Kingdom to him, and his hopes of gaining England and his other Dominions: They, at last made up a Loan to the King in Furrs and Rye to the value of Ten Thousand Pounds, according to their Rates, which they over-valued at near Twenty per Cent, and were so strict, as not to deliver either the Furrs or the Corn, till the Embassadour had given Bond in the King's Name, to make repayment in Two years. And when this was done, he took his leave, least upon any advice of Alteration in the King's Affairs, their good humour might alter: Yet to Complement the Embassadour at his departure, the Czar told him, He would in a more effectual manner have assisted the King, towards the Recovery of his Kingdoms, had he not been engag'd at that time in a War with Poland.

Guernsey Island attempted by the King.

Guernsey Island being a place of Importance, and which would have much Conduct to the King's Advantage, some Endeavours were made for the Attacking of it, and the King's Friends within the Island, upon secret Intimation of some men to have been landed for that purpose, were ready to have Contributed their Assistance; But Colonel Russell who was Governour for the Parliament, having a fresh Supply sent him of about Five hundred Men, not only Secur'd the Island from all danger of an Assault, but gave a strong Alarm to Cornet-Castle, whereof Colonel Burgess was appointed Governour in the Room of Sir Baldwin Wake, who was Drowned: Nor was it thought safe to continue much longer in the Isle of Jersey, in regard therewas a strong Rumour of a Fleet of Ships ordered by the Parliament to be suddenly set out for the Reducing of that Island: So that Care was taken for the speedy dispatch of the Answer to the Committee of Estates of Scotland: To which end, the King and his Lords late every day close in Council about it, and though an absolute Resolve could not then be concluded touching every particular of the Scots Message, yet great Diligence was used to deal so effectually with the Laird Liberton, that at his Return he should so represent all things, and with such Advantage, that they might tend to a perfect Agreement, which already was brought to far, that a Treaty was desired to be shortly held at Breda, for the more ample discussing of all matters yet in Contraversie. The Answer being drawn up, together with a Letter directed to a Committee of the Kirk Assembly, the Laird Liberton took his leave, and departing from Jersey into France, took Shipping at Havre-de-grace, for Scotland. And now it was also judg'd high time for the King and his Attendants to leave Jersey, and betake themselves to some more secure Place of abode; To that purpose several Reasons were presented to him by the Lord Hopon, and others of his Council:

The Lord Liberton departs from Jersey to return for Scotland.

I. That whereas there was a Considerable Fleet of the Parliament of England, come already to Portsmouth, with store of Provisions; it was necessary to prevent the danger that might fall upon them, in case the said Ships should make an Attempt upon the Island, which was the more probable, because there were already Men Landed in Jersey.

II. That if they should lye under that Hazard, they knew not where to expect Relief, except all other Services should be neglected, and Prince Rupert and Montrois called thither, which would be the Ruine of their Designs.

III. That their Removal would give great Satisfaction to the Kingdom of Scotland, and be an Encouragement to their Friends in England.

IV. That thereby they should be the more free from Hazards and Dangers, both as to themselves and others that should make Addreses to them.

The King leaves Jersey, and returns into France.

These things being Maturely Considered, a speedy removal out of the Isle of Jersey was resolved upon, and from thence the King went back again into France, where he Resided with his Mother, the Queen of England, till the time appointed for the Treaty at Breda drew near.

Immediately after the Departure of Windram, a Letter was sent away to Montrois, to acquaint him with the Result of these Transactions at Jersey; which Letter was as followeth:

Most Dear and Well-beloved Cousin,

The King's Letter to Montrois.

WE E have received Letters from Our Kingdom of Scotland, of which you receive herewith a Copy, by which Our Subjects Demand of Us, That We would please to acknowledge, for lawful, their Parliament, and particularly the two last Sessions of that Assembly; which being obtained of Our Grace, they offer to send Us their Deputies, with full Commission to Treat with Us, of the means to re-establish Peace and Obedience in that Kingdom. We have made them an Answer, That We have made known to their Envoy the place where We desired their Deputies should come to Us with all diligence gence: And to the end you should not apprehend that by Our Letters, or by the Treaty, We had any Design to hinder the Affairs We had Committed to you; We have thought fit to let you know, That as We judge the Levies you have made for Our Service, to have been a powerfull Motive to Oblige them to send their Deputies, and to enter into Treaty with Us; So We also believe, that the Progress you shall make in your generous Designs, will dispose them to Treat with the more Moderation, to the end the whole Realm may again happily return under Our Obedience. We assure you, We have not the least thought to derogate from that ample Commission which We have given you, nor do diminish that Authority in which We have Invested you by Our Letters Patents: And We do promise you also, if it shall come to pass, that We shall enter into any good Intelligence with our Subjects, We shall have so much Care of your proper Interest, that all the World shall see how much We esteem your Person, and what Confidence We have in your Conduct and your Courage, whereof not only the late King Our Father, but Our Self also have receiv'd proofs, both by what you have done and suffered for Us: Mean time, you shall understand that We have qualified the Assembly of Our Subjects, with the Appellation of The Committee of Estates, which We have done only for this Treaty; which if it shall not succeed as We desire; as We know already this Qualification of the Privy Signet does not at all Authorise them to be such: So We shall then forthwith Declare for what We hold them, notwithstanding this Title which We have given them, both for their own proper satisfaction, and as also to make known to all the World, that We desire to bring back Our Subjects of the Kingdom of Scotland to their Duty, rather by wayes of sweetness and Amity, than by the Rigour of Our Arms, if their Obstinacy and the Injustice of their Demands should constrain Us to recover it by force. We therefore do hereby give you full Power to proceed Vigorously in your Enterprises, not doubting, but all Our Loyall Subjects of Scotland will join themselves with you, and by that means, all those who are otherwise disposed, will submit themselves to Reason in that Treaty which We now accept, or shall be forc'd thereto by Arms.

To this We permit you to publish these Presents, and to Communicate them to such as you shall judge fit. So We pray God to preserve you most Dear Cousin.

Written from Jersey, 30. of January, 1650.

The Laird Liberton being returned to Edenborough, great expectation there was of what Answer he brought from the King, to the Propositions that had been sent him, and what likelihood of his Compliance with them: To particular persons that enquired any thing of him, concerning the Result of his Negotiation, he answered with a Politick Reservedness, as not intending to impart the utmost that he knew; only in general terms he spoke as handsomely as he could in Favour and Advantage of the King, and of his Inclination to Correspond with them in all things which he thought just and reasonable. Moreover affirming, that he had Declared this to be his Resolution, To do for, and stand by the Kingdom of Scotland in an especiall manner. This gave occasion to people to pass their Centures upon the Laird Liberton, according to their severall Fancies; Some saying, That this Embassy of his had made him a Compleat Courtier; Others, That by his long Converse with the Royal Party, and the private Instructions of some of the Council at Jersey prevailing with him, he was himself become a Royalist.

The Laird Liberton arrives at Edenborough.

As soon as the Committee of Estates, and Assembly of the Kirk were met, he delivered his Message and Letters to them from the King, acquainting them also by Word of Mouth, how far he seem'd Inclined to Condescend to their Propositions, Namely,

He delivers his Message and Letters to the Committee of Estates and Assembly of the Kirk.

As to the Ratifying all that the Parliament of Scotland did in their Two last Sessions, so far as concern'd the Kingdom of Scotland, That there be a general Act of Oblivion: And that Montrois and the Duke Hamilton's Engagements bear no publick Office without Consent of Parliament. And for the Concluding of a perfect Agreement, if it were possible, with his Subjects of Scotland, he had willed and appointed a Solemn Treaty to be held at Breda, upon the Fifteenth of March next ensuing. The form of the Message to the Committee of Estates, was as followeth:

For 1649.

For the Committee of the Estates of Scotland,

CHARLES R.

The Kings Message to the Committee of Estates.

WE have received your Letters lately presented unto us, by Mr. Windram of Libertoun, and we accept Graciously all the Expressions of Affection and Fidelity therein contained towards us, with your tender Resentment of Our present Condition, and the just Indignation which you profess to have against the Execrable Murder of Our Father; And we believe that your Intentions are as full of Candor towards us, as we are and always really have been desirous to settle a clear and right Intelligence betwixt us and Our Subjects of Our Ancient Kingdom of Scotland, which may be an assured Foundation of their Happiness and Peace for the time to come, and an Effectual Means to root out all the Seeds of Animosity and Divisions caused by these late Troubles. And also to reunite the Hearts and Affections of Our Subjects one to another, and of them all to its their King and lawfull Sovereign; to the end that by their Obedience to Our Royall and just Authority, we may be put into a Condition to maintain them in Peace and Prosperity, and to protect them in their Religion and Liberty, as it appertains to us, according to our Charge and Office of a King. And as we have always resolved to contribute what ever is to be done by us to obtain these good Effects, and for the just Satisfaction of all Our Subjects in this Kingdom.

We have now thought fit upon the return of Mr. Windram, to Command and desire you to send unto us Commissioners sufficiently Authorized, to Treat and Agree with us, both in Relation to the Interest and just Satisfaction of Our Subjects there; as also concerning the Aid and Assistance which in all Reason we may expect from them, to bring and reduce the Murderers of Our late most dear Father of happy Memory, to Condign Punishment, and to recover Our just Rights in all Our Kingdoms. And we will that they attend us on the Fifteenth Day of the Month of March, at the Town of Breda, where we intend to be in Order thereunto: And in Confidence of a Treaty, as also to make known to you, and to all the World, that we sincerely desire to be agreed; we have resolved to Address these unto you, under the Name and Title of a Committee of Estates of Our Kingdom of Scotland; And will, and expect that you use this Grace no otherwise for any Advantage, to the prejudice of us, or Our Affairs, beyond what we have given this Qualification and Title for, Namely, only, For the Treaty, and in Order to it; Although we have Consideration sufficient, and very Important to Dissuade and Oblige us, to do nothing in this kind Antecedently at this time. Also we hope the Confidence which we Declare to have in your clear and Candid Intentions towards us, will furnish you with strong Arguments, to form in your selves a Mutuall Confidence in us, which by the blessing of God Almighty, by your just and prudent Moderation, and by that greatest desire that we have to Oblige all Our Subjects of that Kingdom, and by the Means of the Treaty which we attend and hope for, may be a good Foundation of a full and happy Peace, and an assured Security to this Nation for the time to come, which we assure you is wished of us with Passion, and which we shall endeavour by all means in Our Power to Effect.

Their Considerations about it.

To the same Effect also, was the Letter to the Committee of the Kirk, which as soon as they met, was delivered to them: The Message having been received and perused by the Committee of Estates, they choise out of themselves a Sub-Committee, consisting of Nine Lords and Burgesses, to consider what was most expedient to be done therein, and to present their Opinions to the whole Committee of Estates, which not long after Conven'd again for the receiving of the Reports from the Sub-Committee, and so to prepare and state the Matter, that it might be presented to the Parliament of Scotland, which was shortly to Assemble: And moreover, for the more speedy and effectual carrying on of the Business, there was afterwards Chosen a Joynt Committee, part of the Committee of Estates, and that of the Kirk, by common Consent, to consider what was to be done, about sending of Commissioners to the King, and to make Report, the One, to the Committee of Estates; The Other, to the Committee of the Kirk. Much Debate there was, and it is said, much Clashing betwixt those of the Committee of Estates, and those of the Kirk, in regard the last Sort being more Rigid and Jealous of the Kings Designs, would have had New Propositions drawn up, much higher by far than any thing that had been formerly presented; As, That if he came into Scotland, he should be altogether guided by them, and he should cast off Mentors, and all others of their Enemies.

1649.

Commissioners sent to Treat with the King at Breda.

A With other things of the like Nature; but those of the Committee of Estates were the more prevalent, and at length, the Matter was accorded between them, and Commissioners were joyntly Chosen by them to be sent to the King. Those sent from the Committee of Estates, were the Earl of Castles, the Lord Lothian, the Laird Bury, and the Laird Liberton, Sir John Smith, and Mr. Jeffries. Those from the Committee of the Kirk, were Mr. Broady, Mr. John Lawson or Levinston, and Mr. James Wood.

The Commissioners Arriving at Breda, before the King was come thither, went the next day to meet him on the Way, and at Berghen-ap-Zoom, they met, and came together to Breda, on the Sixteenth of March; on the Eighteenth they were Visited by the Earl of Lauderdale, Callender, and Dumfries, and the next day they were Conducted by the Lord Wentworth, Captain of his Majesties Guards, in the Kings Coach, which was sent to receive them, and brought unto the Presence Chamber, where the King sat ready to give them Audience, the Lords of his Council, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen being present; The Earl of Castles made his Address in the name of the rest of the Commissioners, and presenting the Message from the Committee of Estates, spake to this Effect:

That the Kingdom of Scotland upon his late Message, together with the Consideration of all former Overtures with him, have now again sent to him these Propositions, which they humbly tender to his Majesty; Not that they have thoughts to force him to a Compliance, through his Necessity, to his prejudice, or weary him by Importunities; but by making their Loyall Addresses to him, by this their humble Submission, in which, their Desires, they hope, will appear so reasonable and just, that he will soon condescend unto them: which they humbly beg at his hands. Assuring him, That by that means he will be most powerfull in the Advancing and Establishing his Throne; it being the Nature of his Loyall Subjects, and all truly Noble Minds, to be soonest overcome with such Allurements.

The Earl of Castles his Speech to the King.

That in these their humble Addresses, they did manifest to the World their Loyalty and Constancy to him, neither was it their purpose to Flatter, but to be Faithfull and Free. That if he would please to Condescend to what was propounded by the Kingdom of Scotland, it would make him happy, and give them some hopes to live at Peace, under the shadow of the Wings of his Government.

Then the Commissioners from the Kirk presenting themselves, one Mr. Levinston made a short Speech, in which, He prest his Majesty to hearken to the joynt Desires of the Estates and Kirk of Scotland, that so he might enjoy the Blessing of God, and be received by his People in Comfort and Peace, to promote the Work of the Lord, and make them happy.

Mr. Levinston's Address to him.

Afterwards their Commissions being demanded, they produced them, and at the same time delivered him the Propositions and Letters from the Estates and Kirk of Scotland: the Propositions were as followeth;

The Propositions of the Estates & Kirk of Scotland.

I. That all those who have been, and continue Excommunicate by the Kirk of Scotland, may be removed from having Access to the Court.

II. That he would be pleased to Declare, that he would by Solemn Oath, under his Hand and Seal, allow the Nationall Covenant of Scotland, and the Solemn League and Covenant of Scotland, England, and Ireland, and that he would prosecute the Ends thereof in his Royall Station.

III. That he would Ratifie and Approve all Acts of Parliaments, enjoying the Solemn League and Covenant, and Establishing Presbyterian Government, the Directory of worship, the Confession of Faith, and Catechisme, in the Kingdom of Scotland, as they are already approved by the Generall Assembly of the Kirk, and by the Parliament of that Kingdom. And that he would give his Royall Assent to the Acts of Parliament, enjoying the same in the rest of his Dominions; and that he would observe the same in his own Practice and Family, and never make Opposition therein, or endeavour any Change thereof.

IV. That he would Consent and Agree, that all Matters Civill might be Determined by the present and subsequent Parliaments of the Kingdom of Scotland, and all Matters Ecclesiasticall, by the ensuing Generall Assembly of the Kirk, as was formerly Condescended and Agreed to by his late Father.

After

1649.

The Kings Answer.

After the reading of these Propositions, and the Letters, the King returned Answer;

That he would take these things into Consideration, and doubted not to give them such a full Answer, as should give them and his Kingdoms of Scotland ample Satisfaction.

And so they were for that time dismiss.

In this Treaty at Breda, as formerly in those Overtures at Jersey, were many Demurs in regard of Montros's Interest, and thereupon it was further demanded of the Scotch Commissioners, by the King; whether these Papers they had delivered to him, contained all Particulars which they had to Propound or Desire: whether they had Power to Recede from any Particular proposed, or to be proposed? Also, what they had further to propound, for the carrying on of his Service against England?

To which they Answered, That they had acquainted him with the utmost of their Power and Instructions.

Then followed much Dispute and Arguing on both Sides, concerning the severall Heads of the Treaty: The main thing stuck at by the King, was, the Business of the Covenant; which was as mainly prest upon him by the Commissioners, who also gave a Solemn Visit to the Prince of Orange, desiring him to be a Mediatour betwixt them and the King; and it is said, that they endeavour'd to have Transfer'd the Treaty to the Hague, as hoping to find there more effectual ways for a Mediation: which Intention of theirs notwithstanding was soon altered. About the same time, the King withdrawing himself for a while from Breda, gave occasion to the generality of people to suspect that he had a Resolution to break off the Treaty; but by his quick Return thither again, it appear'd only to have been Intermitt'd, and not quite broken off, for then they renew'd their Consultations, and the rest of the Propositions were taken into Debate; as, That for the Confirming of all that had been done by the Parliaments of Scotland in some late Sessions. And, For the not admitting Montros, or any of his Adherents into that Kingdom.

There likewise came the Earl of Carnarvon, and Mr. Murry of the late Kings Bed-Chamber, from Scotland, with Letters containing further Instructions from the Committee of Estates, to the Commissioners at Breda.

While this Treaty at Breda was in agitation, Montros being, as it is probable, not altogether ignorant of Proceedings there, and fearing lest, if the Agreement between the Scots, and the King, should be absolutely made up, and that Article among the rest which concern'd him in particular, should be Sign'd before his Arrivall in Scotland, his Hopes and Endeavours for his Princes Service would thereby be utterly overthrown, and he himself, as he had formerly been forc'd to leave Scotland at the Command of the late King, and through the Instigation of the Scots, should now at the Command of the Son, the same Parties Instigating, be forc'd to keep away from thence, made therefore all possible speed into Scotland, notwithstanding the many discouraging and prosperous Accidents which befell him at his setting forward; As, the tardiness of Col. King in coming up with certain Horse that were promis'd from Sweden; his being deserted by Col. Ogleby, and Col. Cockrane, who being intrusted with certain Sums of Money for the raising of Men and Arms, the one in Poland, the other at Amsterdam, neglect their Commissions, and convert the Money to their own private use. And, which was a much worse disaster, the loss of half the number of his Ships, namely two of the four which were given him by the Duke of Brandenburg (some say the Duke of Holstein), cast away upon the Rocks on the Coast of Orkney, together with a third part of those 700 Men he had got together, Holfewers and Hamburgers for the most part, the rest given him by the King of Denmark, with the two Ships that were left him, and a small Frigate of 14 or 15 Guns (wherein he himself was Imbarqu'd) which together with about 1500 Arms, was bestow'd upon him by the Queen of Sweden, he Arrives about the middle of April 1650. among the Orkneys or Isles of Orkney, accompanied with the Lords Frendraught and Pittsfordler, Sir John Murry, George Drummond of Ballach, and severall other persons his Friends and Confederates; here he spent time in the raising of new Forces for the increasing of his Army, which he had the better opportunity to do, in regard those Isles were altogether clear and unpossess'd by any from the Estates that might give any opposition; so that as soon as he had compleated what Recruits he thought convenient of these Orkney Souldiers, such as they were, a fort of rude, raw, and undisciplin'd people, and far short of that Courage and Stoutness for which they have been fam'd in Ages past, he made a Shift to Transport over his Men into Scotland, leaving Colonel Johnston, and Henry Graham his natural Brother for the keeping of Kirk-wall in Pomona the chief of the Orkneys, and landed at the utmost Point of Land North-west, call'd the Point of Cabness, expecting the coming up of Pluscardy to his Aid with 2000 Men, to be rais'd out of the Earl of Seaforth's Territories; but his Expectations were much too slow in the fulfilling, for the small respite of time that was given him: for so speedily was the Parliament of Scotland Alarm'd Montros's lands with Forces in Scotland.

Alarm'd, and so vigorously bestir'd they themselves, that the News of his Arrivall was scarce sooner known, than a Compleat Army was upon their March to oppose him, under the Command (the Horse being 30 Troops) of David Lesley; the Foot (being 7000) of Major General Halber, besides which, Colonel Stranghan was sent before with a Party of Horse consisting of his own Troop, Colonel Montgomerie's, Col. Kerr's, and Lieutenant Colonel Hackitt's, in all about 300; and indeed there needed, as it hapned, no other Army, for all that Montros was able to do in that time towards the strengthening of himself, was little or nothing more than the taking of Dunblow House, which was soon Surrender'd to Col. Verry, upon Demand, the Lord thereof being fled before to Edinburgh: So soon a Remora was the Earl of Sunderland in his Way, who though he had not Force enough to encounter the Marquess, yet the Power and Sway he bore all those adjacent Parts about, where Montros had to do, both kept back the Countrey from coming in to him, and hindred severall of the Gentry from appearing, who otherwise were inclinable enough to have given their Assistance: So that Stranghan surprising the Montrossians with the speed and unexpectedness of his appearance, and finding them much disorder'd and tir'd with seeking to recover a certain Pass, which aiming at, they yet fail'd of obtaining, improv'd his advantage, and after some Repulse at first, redoubled with such fury upon them, that the unseason'd Orkney Men immediately yielded themselves, and in a short time (though not without much resolution shewn in their resistance) the Germans also. Thus was Montros's his Vigorous and Loyal Undertaking for his Sovereign's Service, the Labour of much Time, and carried on with Incredible Pains, Difficulty, and Danger, dissipated in a Moment by a Party far Inferiour in Number, and doubtless no whit Superiour in Skillfull and Valiant Leaders (not to mention Montros, who was accounted, and worthily, the greatest Captain of his Age): Such was the Misfortune of this at least bravely attempted Enterprize; probably in regard of the great disadvantage wherein Montros's his Men were set upon; their Necessities and despair of Succour and Supply's in a Countrey surrounded with Enemies; or perhaps a kind of Surprissall or Pannick fear among the generality of the common Souldiers, upon an Apprehension that Lesley's great Army had been come up against them: However it were, so great was the Defeat, that of the whole Body of the Montrossians who Engaged in this Battell, there Escaped not above an Hundred, from being either taken, or slain: Among the Prisoners, were, Sir John Verry, Major General of Montros's his Army, the Lord Fendraught, Sir Francis Hay of Dalgetie, Colonel Hay of Noughton, Colonel Gray, Lieutenant Colonel Stuart, with other considerable Officers: Montros himself made a Shift to escape for the present, by quitting his Horse, together with his Belt and his Coat with the Star, and shifting himself into an ordinary High-Lander's apparell. In this Fight, the Royall Standard was taken: upon which was Portraictted the Head of the late King lying a bleeding, and severed from the Body, and this following Motto, Judge and Revenge my Cause, O Lord. And the Lord Pittsfordler's Son who was Standard-Bearer, was slain: Colonel Stranghan received a Shor upon his Belly, but in regard it lighted upon the double of his Belt and Buff-Coat, he had no harm thereby.

So Welcome was the News of this Victory to the State and Kirk of Scotland, that they bestowed as a Reward upon Stranghan a Thousand pounds Sterling, and a Chain of Gold: Upon Lieutenant Colonel Hackitt a Thousand Mark Sterling. But that which Crown'd this Victory to them with the highest Joy and Satisfaction, was the getting of Montros's his Person into their Power: As indeed it was impossible for him to make his Escape, so narrowly was he Way-lay'd all the Countrey round, and so strict a Search and Inquiry was order'd to be sent after him, besides a large Reward promis'd to whomsoever should be his apprehender; Yet for the space of 3 or 4 daies, he made a Shift to keep himself undiscover'd, by wandring up and down in the open Fields with one Associate only in his misery, till being very near famish'd with hunger, it was his fortune in the end to fall into the hands of the Laird of Aston, a Person who had formerly adher'd to the Marquess, and been befriended by him, and of whom, upon that Consideration, he doubtless hop'd for the Favour of not being discover'd by him, if not of assistance towards his Concealment: But Aston, whether for fear of what he must have suffer'd if he had been known to have Conceal'd him, or for want of opportunity in regard of his Followers that attended him, or setting his thoughts upon the propos'd Reward, (as the regard of Gain for the most part outbalances that of Friendship) was not to be perfwaded or induc'd by any respect of old Friendship or Relation, to suffer him to Escape; so that being seiz'd and secur'd with a strong Guard, (and having in vain supplicated for death by the hands of those that took him) he was presently sent and deliver'd up to the Custody of David Lesley, and by him hurried away with all speed to Edinburgh, much insulted over in the severall Places he came through, only the People of Dundee (though none more endamag'd by his Souldiers in the former Warr) were very Civill to him, furnish'd him with all things necessary, and were so far from insulting, that they very much commiserated his condition: The chief Favour he obtain'd in his Journey, was the permission to call in, as he came along, at the House of his Father in law, the Earl of Southesk, to see two Children of his that were there. At Leith he was met by the Magistrates of Edinburgh in a kind of farall Pomp, and as it were to welcome him to the satisfaction of their revenge; he had the reproachfull honour, while the rest of the Prisoners went by him on foot, to be mounted on a Cart-Horse, (for the better advantage of exposing him to the Peoples gazing and revilement) till he came to the end of the Cannon-Gate Street, where the Executioner in his Livery Coat, and severall other Officers, attended with with a Cart, having a high Chair placed in it like a Sella Curulis, wherein (though himself the Captive fast bound and bare-headed, while the Executioner had his Bonnet on) he rode as in a triumphall Chariot; the Disgrace which his Enemies intended him, turning to his Honour, by representing the Heroick Magnanimity of his Nature, which could not choose but Triumph in the midst of Captivity. In this manner, reprosch't of many, (as it is usuall when men are in Adversity) pried of others, even some who were of the ingag'd in the general enmity against his Designs, whom yet the Majestie of his presence, and the undisturbed patience and constancy wherewith he deman'd himself, melted into a sensibility of the misery of his condition; He was convey'd to the Tolbooth the place of his Imprisonment, where the next day being Sunday, the 19th of May, he receiv'd new matter for the tryall of his patience; by the troublesome Visits of divers of the Ministry and the Parliament, who while they began to persecute him with their pretended Exhortations, which serv'd but to aggravate the fence of his affliction, he told them, That, whereas they thought they had affronted him the day before by carrying him in a Cart, He thought it the most honourable and joyfull Cavalcade that ever he made: God having all the while most comfortably manifested his Presence to him, and furnish'd him with resolution to overlook the reproaches of men, and to behold him for whose Cause he suffer'd. The next day being Summon'd to appear before the Lords, Barons, and Burgeses, Assembled in Parliament, he came into the House Apparell'd in a very rich Suit, thick over-layd with costly Lace, and over it a Scarlet Roker, a Beaver Hat with a very rich Hatband upon it, Carnation Silk Stockings, Garters, and Roses, with other Habilliments suitable, all which he had caused to be made for him, immediately upon his coming to Edinborough, as if he had been going rather about some Festivall than Tragical Affair: As soon as he was brought to the Barr of the House, the Lord Chancellor (who according to the Custome of that Kingdome is always Speaker) told him first, That he must kneel at the Bar. Whereunto he Answered, My Lord, I shall with all my heart observe any Posture you shall appoint me, to appear before you in, whereby I may manifest to you, that I freely submit to the Authority of Parliament, and to this present Parliament in a more especiall manner, because you have concluded so near a Conjunction with his present Majesty my Master in the late Treaty. Then the Chancellor made a Speech to him, the Substance whereof was this:

SIR,

The Lord
Chancellours
Speech to him.

I Am Commanded to mind you of the last Judgment of God befallen you, for your perfidious breaking of the Covenant, which might justly provoke God thus to divert your Counsell and Affairs, for having been so eminent an Author and Actor of Mischief against this Nation; You Abandoned the Covenant, and despised the Oath of God, and did invade your Native Country, and with most Inhumane and Barbarous Cruelty did burn and waste divers parts thereof, and have spilt much blood of his Majesties good Subjects, taking Advantage of that time, when the Prime Commanders and Forces thereof were Employ'd elsewhere. For these Crimes you were Excommunicated by the Church, and sore Faulted by the Parliament of this Kingdome, and yet still continued in the highest Contempt against God, under that fearfull Sentence of Excommunication: And to this day have you remained without the smallest shew of Repentance. And God by his Providence hath now justly brought you hither to receive the Sentence of your Condemnation.

Hereupon Montrose humbly desiring to know of his Lordship, Whether it were the Parliaments Pleasure that he might be permitted to speak what he had to say for himself; and humbly craving that Liberty from them, he was told by the Chancellor, That the Estates in Parliament did give him free liberty to speak what he could say for himself. Then Montrose;

My LORD, said he,

His Answer.

I Am glad that I may have Liberty to answer for my self, though I am here your Prisoner, yet my Cause is good; Nor is there any Breach of the Covenant on my part, in which I Swore to be true to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors. Concerning what I have done in relation to the wars and Affairs of this Kingdome, I had not only a Generall Commission, but particular Orders for what I have done, from his Majesty, which I was Engag'd to Obe by the said Covenant. And concerning my coming over now, I was Ascertain'd that you had profess'd to comply with his Majesty in the present Affairs in which he hath Employed me; and upon that Account it was that I have Aided. I desire to refer my self, and do submit unto this present Parliament, and the Authority thereof, to be my Judges in this Case, whom I own as a true Parliament, by Authority from his Majesty, and I shall be content, however it shall please God to deal with me. As for my life, if you you take it away by this Authority, it is well known unto the World that I regard it not: Death is a Debt which all owe, and must once be paid by every One: And I shall be willing and much rejoyce to go the same way which my Master pass'd before me; and it is the Joy of my Heart, not only to do, but also to suffer for Him.

Moreover, he added to this Effect, That he appear'd before them with so much the greater respect and reverence, by reason of the Agreement he heard they had made with his Majesty; That he never was ingag'd in the League and Covenant, and therefore was not justly to be condemn'd for opposing it, since he was sensible of how sad consequence it had prov'd to these distressed Kingdoms, and the Wellfare of his late Majesty, against whom those that rose up in Arms in England were plainly assist'd and upheld by a Faction of this Kingdome: That as he had never been the occasion of shedding blood but in battell, and by the necessity of War, so he had been ever carefull to prevent all disorders as much as could be, and to save as many lives as possibly lay in his power. That what ever he had aid'd formerly against them to make a diversion of those Forces that were going from thence against his late Majesty, was merely in Obedience and Zeal to his Majesties Service, at whose Command he as readily submitted to lay down his Arms and retreat, as he had before cheerfully taken them up in his Majesties defence. That as for his coming in at that time, it was in order to the accelerating of the Treaty betwixt his present Majesty and them, to the end that his Majesty being not driven to rely wholly upon their assistance, might be enabled to make the better Conditions with them. That since he had done nothing but what became a good Christian, a good Subject, and a good Neighbour, he desir'd them not to be rash or partial in their Judgment, but to judge him according to the Laws of God, of Nature, of Nations, and of the Land, as they would answer the contrary to the Righteous Judge of the world.

After he had been thus Examined and Tryed, and Commanded to withdraw, the Parliament were not very long Debating the Matter, ere they unanimously resolv'd to proceed to Sentence of Condemnation; which, he being called in again, was Denounced against him in this Form:

You are to be carried back to the Place from whence you came, and from thence you are to Morrow, being the One and twentieth of May, 1650. to be carried to Edinborough-Cross, and there to be Hanged upon a Gallows Thirty Foot high, for the space of Three Hours, and then to be taken down, and your Head to be cut off upon the Scaffold, and hanged on Edinborough Tolbooth, and your Legs and Arms to be hanged up in other publick Towns in this Kingdome, and your Body to be Buried at the place where you shall be Executed; except the Kirk shall take off your Excommunications; then your Body shall be Buried at the Common Place of Buriall.

The Sentence pronounced against him in Parliament.

After the Denouncing of the Sentence, at which he altered not his Countenance, or seem'd in the least manner to be moved, he was again guarded back to Prison, where being again haunted and importun'd by the Ministers, he express'd how much he was beholding to the Parliament for the Honour they had put upon him; for that he accounted it a greater Honour to have his Head stant upon the Prison Gate for this Quarrell, than to have his Picture in the Kings Bed-Chamber; and left his Loyalty should be forgotten, they had highly honour'd him in designing lasting Monuments to some of the chiefe Cities to bear up his Memoriall to all Posterity; wishing he had had £100 enough to have sent a Piece to every City in Christendome, to witness his Loyalty to his King and Country.

The next day being the One and twentieth of May, the day appoint ed for this Tragedy, he was led forth to his Execution, at which time, so winning was his Deportment, and his Speeches so powerfull, that they made a very great Impression upon the Spirits of the People, in so much, as some who observ'd the Passages of his Death, were of Opinion, that he had drawn away more from the Kirk-Party by his manner of dying, than he could have Vanquish'd in the Field by the Force of Arms.

Upon the Scaffold he deliver'd his Mind to the People in this following Speech:

I Am sorry if this manner of my death be scandalous to any good Christian. Doth it not often happen to the righteous according to the wayes of the wicked, and to the wicked according to the wayes of the righteous? Doth not sometimes a just man perish in his righteousness, and a wicked man prosper in his malice? They who know me, should not dis-esteem me for this; many greater than I have been dealt with in this kind: ye I must not say, but that all Gods Judgments are just; for my private sins, I acknowledg this to be just with God, I submit myself to him; but in regard of Man, I may say they are but Instruments: God forgive them, I forgive them; they have have oppressed the Poor, and violently perverted Judgment and Justice; but he that is higher than they will reward them. What I did in this Kingdom, was in obedience to the most just Commands of my Sovereign, for his defence in the day of his distress against those that rose up against him. I acknowledged nothing, but fear God, and honour the King, according to the Commandments of God, and the Law of Nature and Nations: and I have not sinned against man, but against God, and with him there is mercy, which is the ground of my drawing near to him. It is objected against me by many, even good people, that I am under the Censure of the Church, this is not my fault, since it is only for doing my duty, by obeying my Princes most just Commands; for Religion, his Person and Authority: yet am I sorry they did excommunicate me, and in that which is according to Gods Lawes, without wronging my Conscience or Allegiance, I desire to be relaxed; if they will not, I appeal to God who is the Righteous Judge of the world, and who must and will, I hope, be my Judge and Saviour. It is spoken of me, that I should blame the King: God forbid; for the late King, he lived a Saint; and dyed a Martyr; I pray God I may so end as he did: If ever I should wish my Soul in another man's stead, it should be in his. For his Majesty now living, never People, I believe, might be more happy in a King; his Commands to me were most just, in nothing that he promiseth will he fail, he dealt justly with all men, I pray God he be so dealt withall, that he be not betrayed under trust as his Father was. I desire not to be mistaken, as if my carriage to you at this time, in relation to your wayes, were stubborn; I do but follow the light of my own Conscience, which is seconded by the working of the good Spirit of God that is within me. I thank him, I go to Heavens Throne with joy, if he enable me against the fear of death, and furnish me with Courage and Confidence to embrace it, even in its most ugly shape, let God be glorified in my end, though it were in my condemnation; yet I say not this out of any fear or distrust, but out of my duty to God, and love to his people. I have no more to say, but that I desire your charity and prayers. I shall pray for you all, I leave my Soul to God, my Service to my Prince, my good will to my Friends, and my Name and Charity to you all. And thus briefly I have exonerated my Conscience.

Having concluded his Speech, and afterwards with closed eyes and lifted up hands, spent a good while in private, in pouring forth his Soul to God, and recommending his Spirit into his hands, who was pleas'd (as he said) to give him a full assurance of his Mercy in Jesus Christ. He receiv'd from the Executioner a certain Cord, by which hung his Declaration and History, to hang about his Neck, affirming, That he thought not himself more honour'd by the Garter, which honourable Order his present Majesty had been pleas'd to confer upon him, than by that Cord and Book, which he would embrace about his Neck, with as much Joy and Content as ever he did the Garter, or a Chain of Gold. Adding, that if they had any more Dishonour (as they conceiv'd it) to put upon him, he was ready to accept it. And then presently with a cheerful Resignation submitted himself to the Execution of the Sentence.

Thus was this Famous, but Unfortunate Man, Sacrificed to the Revenge of the Scotch Covenanters, after a most shameful and despicable manner, even at that very time when they were Treating with their King, whom they knew full well to have a very great Regard and Affection for him. Together with Montros, though not in so disgraceful a way, were Executed Sir John Urry Major General to Montros, and Colonel Spotswood Laird of Darcy, (who had both the Favour to be Beheaded) with some others of Note that came along with the Marquis into Scotland.

While these Transactions were in Scotland, the Treaty still went on at Breda, yet not without some Controversie and Demur, especially about the Business still of the Covenant: The King urging, That there was no reason why he should relinquish the Religion for which his Father had dyed a Martyr; and that whilst he was willing to permit to his Subjects Liberty of Conscience, it would be very inconsistent with their so earnestly pretended desires of Peace and Agreement, to deny him the same Priviledge which he was so ready to give them. That the Covenant by them tendered, is the Subjects Covenant to bind them to him, and not for him to take, to swear to himself, so that he thought it sufficient to passe an Act for his People to take it. As for the Militia, he offered to confirm it in the hands of the Estates for five years; Provided, That afterwards it might return to himself. He likewise offered to confirm the Presbyterian Government in Scotland: Provided, That he himself might have always three Chaplains with him of his own Election.

And some other particulars there were, which ere they were fully agreed on, news was brought of the Scots extreme Rigour and Cruelty towards Montros, upon which it was believ'd by many, that the King would have been so far Incens'd, as utterly to have broke off the Treaty; but it seems he judg'd it not Conveuable to his present Affairs, to take so much notice of it, as thereby to break off with his Subjects of Scotland, but rather to make the utmost Tryall of the Reality of their Intentions toward him; So that notwithstanding Montros his Death, a speedy Conclusion was put unto this Treaty: However, the King did not omit to express his ill Resentment of their Proceedings, by this ensuing Message sent them by Mr. Murry.

That

That he was very sorrowful and grieved, to hear a Report which came to him by Credible Persons, that notwithstanding those hopefull Overtures lately made between him and them, tending to their Peace: Yet that there hath been some Blood shed of late of his good Subjects of the Kingdom of Scotland, and that the manner and result thereof according to the Report he had heard of it, did very much trouble him; but that he might know the Particulars more certainly, he desired to understand the Business fully from themselves, of whom he requir'd an Account.

To which they return'd for Answer, this lame Excuse:

Having profess'd their Affections to him, and how much they Rejoyc'd at his Engagements to concur with them in a happy Agreement; They desire him not to stumble at some seeming Obstacles, as the Death of Montros, or their Reducing of his Forces; Assuring him, that there was nothing in what they did, but to Accomplish his Ends, and to serve his Interests to his best Advantage.

Notwithstanding the Conclusion of the Treaty at Breda, there were not wanting some endeavours, among those of the Parliament of Scotland that were of the disaffected Faction to his Majesties Person and Cause, to have made void the Treaty, and frustrated all that had been done, taking advantage of his not presently coming over, and of his ill Resentment of their Cruelty towards Montros; and so far they brought their business, that they prevail'd to have it put to the Vote, Whether any more Addresses should be made to the King? There were Thirty who gave their Negative Voyces, but by the Major Part it was carried in the Affirmative: And then upon another Message was resolv'd upon to be sent unto him; wherein they Invited him, To make all possible speed in coming to them, and Protested that they would Assist him with their Lives and Fortunes, to Establish him in his Throne. Yet withall (having belike intercepted some of the Kings Letters which did not well please them) they forbore not to signifie unto him their having some Testimonies to produce of his Acting contrary to his Promise to them at the Treaty at Breda; however, that they were willing to pass over what was past (Wonderful Clemency!) so that he would without delay, according to the Articles of Agreement, come over into Scotland, and Comply with his Parliament, and the Kirk.

And thenceforth there being a general Expectation of his Coming, great Preparations were made for his Reception, Two of the chief Houses in Edinburgh were Richly Furnish'd, (Though St. Johnstons happen'd to be the chief Place of his Reception, in regard Edinburgh lay too much expos'd to Cromwells Army, into whose possession also it suddenly fell,) the Parliament likewise took into Consideration the Nominating of Officers for his House, who were such onely as they thought fit to place about him, for he was not only not permitted to have those to wait upon him, whom he chiefly Favoured, and whom he thought were best Affected toward him; but besides this, severall great Scotch Lords, as Duke Hamilton, the Earls of Lauderdale, and Searforth, with many other Persons of Quality, who were with him all along in Jersey and Holland, were Prohibited by Proclamation from returning into Scotland.

About the beginning of June, the King took Shipping for Scotland, at Scheveling in Holland; He lands at and after a happy evasion of double danger that threatned him in his Voyage, (one from a suddain Storm which arose and cast him upon certain Danish Islands, yet without any losse or shipwrack, but on the other side, much respect and Civill usage from the Inhabitants; The other, from a Fleet of Parliament Vessels which were sent out under Popham to intercept his passage) Landed safe at a Place called the Spy, in the North of Scotland. The Estates in the mean time, and Parliament of Scotland, Employed their Consultations about the forming of an Army for the Service of the King, as they pretended, and an Act was publish'd for the Training of every Fourth Man through the Kingdom, who was capable to bear Arms, the Earl of Leven was made General of the Foot, and Holborn Major General; David Lesley Lieutenant General of the Horse, and Montgomery Major General, the Supream Command of the whole Army being reserved for the King himself, whom at his first Arrivall they Entertained with high Compliments, and much Acclamation, and seem'd to Congratulate his coming with great Demonstrations of Joy and Affection: And on the Fifteenth of July they again solemnly Proclaimed him King at Edinburgh Cross, and had Design'd (had not certain Obstacles come in the way) to have Crown'd him the following Month: But he had not been long among them, ere they began to discover their Native rigour, imperiously to take upon them according to their usuall manner of Kirk Authority and Discipline, and to obtrude upon his Majestic such curbing Conditions, as but very ill suited with Regall Dignity.

At Dundee new Propositions were by Commissioners from the Parliament and Kirk sent unto him to Sign: And not long after when the Town of Aberdeen presented him with 1500 pounds, the Committee of Estates sent to divers Places, enjoying them what ever Money or Plate they had to bestow, to bring it into the Publick Treasury appointed by that Committee; So that it seems the King must not be Master of any Money more than what they were pleas'd to Allow him. Then they began afresh to busie themselves about reforming his Retinue, and purging his House

The Republic of England thought it best by a seasonable prevention to invade them first, and thereupon resolved upon open War with Scotland, and the preparing of an Army to send against that Kingdom. They had at this time sufficient Forces to spare, and no great Matter to divert them; Ireland was in a fair way to be wholly subdued, and Cromwell leaving his Son-in-law Ireton, Deputy in his stead, and other well instructed Commanders to finish the Conquest there he had so successfully begun, return'd into England, just upon the Critical point of Time, when General Fairfax was upon laying down his Commission; either of himself declining to engage in a War against his Brethren of Scotland, or cunningly wrought thereunto by some of Cromwell's Instruments in the House of Commons and Army; however it were, Cromwell after many self-denying Compliments, was at length (full fore no doubt against his will, only out of tender care of the Publick Weal, for he, poor man, was no Alpirer or Self-seeker, and at the earnest importunity of those who were sufficiently assur'd of his Condescension) perswaded to take upon him the Supreme Command of the Army, with which he advanceth toward Scotland about the latter end of June, and being entered upon the Borders, sends from the Head-Quarters at Berwick a Declaration from the pretended Parliament of England, and another from the Army, to justify their Proceedings, and to shew the Grounds and Reasons of this their Advancing against them. As for the Scots, they seem'd to be much startled at this sudden Invasion, without any Warning given, and digested severall Papers to Sir Arthur Haslerigge, in which they expostulated the Matter, and urg'd the Solemn Covenant, and the former Union between the Two Nations: but neither what the one side declar'd, or what the other urg'd, could ought avail to allay the Hostility that was begun between them.

of those Malignants, as they call'd them, whom he had gotten into his Service, Interdicting them also all Employment both about his Person, and in the Army: As for himself, he had a strong Guard continually about him, to Attend him, and watch his Motions.

The Republic of England, having sufficient Intelligence of the Scots Proceedings in their Treaty with the King, and of their Engagement therein to Establish him in the Throne of England, thought it best by a seasonable prevention to invade them first, and thereupon resolved upon open War with Scotland, and the preparing of an Army to send against that Kingdom. They had at this time sufficient Forces to spare, and no great Matter to divert them; Ireland was in a fair way to be wholly subdued, and Cromwell leaving his Son-in-law Ireton, Deputy in his stead, and other well instructed Commanders to finish the Conquest there he had so successfully begun, return'd into England, just upon the Critical point of Time, when General Fairfax was upon laying down his Commission; either of himself declining to engage in a War against his Brethren of Scotland, or cunningly wrought thereunto by some of Cromwell's Instruments in the House of Commons and Army; however it were, Cromwell after many self-denying Compliments, was at length (full fore no doubt against his will, only out of tender care of the Publick Weal, for he, poor man, was no Alpirer or Self-seeker, and at the earnest importunity of those who were sufficiently assur'd of his Condescension) perswaded to take upon him the Supreme Command of the Army, with which he advanceth toward Scotland about the latter end of June, and being entered upon the Borders, sends from the Head-Quarters at Berwick a Declaration from the pretended Parliament of England, and another from the Army, to justify their Proceedings, and to shew the Grounds and Reasons of this their Advancing against them. As for the Scots, they seem'd to be much startled at this sudden Invasion, without any Warning given, and digested severall Papers to Sir Arthur Haslerigge, in which they expostulated the Matter, and urg'd the Solemn Covenant, and the former Union between the Two Nations: but neither what the one side declar'd, or what the other urg'd, could ought avail to allay the Hostility that was begun between them.

The English Army move forward again into the Scottish Country, and toward the latter end of July they came to Dunbar in the County of Lothian, from Dunbar to Haddington, whence Major General Lambert, and Col. Phaleys being sent with a Party of Horse toward Mulselborough, were set upon in the Rear; but after a sharp Dispute maintained for a good while, (in which Lambert himself was wounded, and had like to have been taken prisoner) the Scots in the end were repulsed with loss: The very next day they were again encountered by Major General D. Montgomery and Colonel Stranghan, in which Engagement the Scots not only fail'd of having the better, but were Routed and put to very notable Disorder and Confusion, being pursu'd so far, that their very Camp had been in danger of Surprizal, had not the King himself appearing unexpectedly among them, though much against the will of the Ministers and Grandees, oppos'd the hazard of his Person, and the authority of his Presence, against their precipitated flight and hurry. Upon this success, Cromwell marches on, and encamps within a little of the Scotch Army, endeavouring to draw them to a Battle; which when he saw he could not, he ascends Penland Hills, and takes Cullington House, and Readhall; in the last of which, the Lord Hamilton was taken prisoner, and divers others, besides the gaining of Store of Ammunition and Provisions.

The Commons in England at the same time, were no less Active in carrying on the Designs and Interests of their Common-wealth; in order to which, they proceeded with their wonted Rigour against severall Persons taken as Actors against their Government, and charg'd with receiving Commissions from his Majesty; upon which occasion, Dr. Levens is made an Example of their pretended Justice, and hang'd on the 13th of July over against the Royal-Exchange. And on the 22d. of August Colonel Eusebius Andrews, formerly Secretary to the Lord Capel, taken by the Treachery of the Bernards, heretofore his Major, having in vain alleg'd both Law and Equity in defence of his life, before the High Court of Justice so called, was Beheaded on Tower-Hill; his Man Captain Binstly also as an Accomplice with his Master in this pretended Treason, was Executed at Tyburn: And now even many of the Presbyterians being become as great Opposers of the Republick, as the Royalists themselves, Sir John Gell appears to be of that number, though heretofore a very great Champion of the Parliaments Cause, and about this very business was try'd for his life at the said High Court; but having the favour to be found guilty only of Misprision of Treason, he came off with the Sentence of perpetual Imprisonment, and Confiscation of Estate. Moreover, to obliterate and abolish as much as in them lay, all Memory of the late King, all Monuments and publick Memorials of him in all places, are order'd to be thrown down especially his Statue at the West-End of Pauls, and that among the Statues of the Kings his Predecessors in the Royal-Exchange, under the void Nich whereof, they caus'd to be written in Golden Letters, Exit Tyrannus Regum Ultime; as the Kings Arms had been eras'd in all publick Places to make room for the Harp and Cross, so that it was a kind of Petty Treason to own his Majesties Picture in publick, so much as in a Sign.

The Battle at Dunbar.

The Scotch and English Armies having for some space moved at a small distance one from the other on each side of a Bog which lay between them, without engaging, only saluting one another now and then with a few great Shot; Cromwell not being able, though very desirous, to force the Scots to an Engagement, and being reduc'd to great scarcity of Provisions, retires back to Penland Hills, from thence again to Mulselborough, and not long after to Dunbar, at which time, it is thought, he was meditating a secret Flight into England, by reason of the straits he was driven to by want of Victuals; and the Scotch Army pressing with advantage upon his Rear so far, far, that at last David Lesly having the Command of an high Hill, at the foot whereof he planted the Main of his Army, had to coop't up the English Army within a narrow Neck of Land, that there was a kind of universal Jubilee in the Scotch Camp, upon a confident assurance to have beaten the English at their pleasure; but they were then nearest to their overthrow, when they thought themselves already Conquerors: For Cromwell, whose unwearied vigilance, to give him his due, made him so never to be overcome, after the gaining of a Pass at a place call'd Cop-paspeh, between Edinburgh and Berwick, which the Scots had possess'd themselves of, to hinder the English from making their Escape homewards, not only winded his Army by degrees out of those Straights to which they were reduc'd, with wonderfull Secrecy and Resolution, but in the end making seasonable use of the Scots presumptuous Confidence and Security, made that Victory his own, which the Scots had so surely promis'd to themselves, and that so absolutely, that they could never recover that fatal blow; which opened a wide Gap to the intire Conquest of their Country. This Memorable Battle, wherein Cromwell was lifted up from the bottom of Despair, to the height of Triumph, was fought on Tuesday the third of September, the greatest part of the Foot were either slain or taken prisoners, all the Horse fled; most of the chief Officers, and among the rest, the Lieutenant General Sir James Lindsay, Sir William Douglas, the Lord Crawford, the Lord Libberton, the Scots Agent to the King at Jersey, who had receiv'd his Deaths Wound in the Fight, Adjutant General Bickerton, Scout-Master Campbell, were taken, with all their Ammunition and Artillery, a very great quantity of Arms, and 200 Colours, which were hung up for Trophies in Westminster-Hall. I have been told by some that were present in this Fight, That Lesly would have had a Way left Open, to have given free liberty to Cromwell's Army; but the Grandees of the Kirk, who it seems were more the General than he, would not permit it. Questionless, so stout and well provided an Army as the Scots had at that time, could not have been so easily discomfited, and that by an Enemy whom they had at so great a disadvantage, by down-right force of Arms; so that it is with probability enough believ'd by some, that as the Marshalling and ordering of the English Army, was chiefly the Work of another Person, who had the least share of the Credit of that Action; so Cromwell's chief part was a more close and mysterious way of operation; and whether the Silver or the Leadn Bullet did most execution as well in this as many other of his Conquests, I leave to common Conjecture. Immediately after this Victory, some Regiments were sent to take possession of Leith, and to fortifie it, as being a most Commodious Haven to receive Provisions out of England; Cromwell with the main Body of the Army entered into Edinburgh the Mother-City of Scotland, the Cattle holding out a strong Siege which presently after was laid to it.

This throw'd Defeat of the Scotch Army at Dunbar, though of fatal Consequence to his Friends of the Kirk, did not yet give occasion of so much trouble and grief to his Majesty, as did the loss of Two Persons most near to him in Relation and Friendship, namely his most virtuous Sister the Princess Elizabeth, who died on the 8th of September at Carisbrook Castle in the Isle of Wight, most probably through a lingering sorrow which had stuck to her heart ever since her Royal Father's Death; and (who died ere the end of the month following) his Brother in law the Prince of Orange, a most reall Friend and Assistant of his Majesty with the utmost of his Power upon all occasions; soon after whose death, his Lady the Princess Mary was brought to bed of a Posthume Son.

Now that which caus'd his Majesty to be the more indifferently affected with this Overthrow, was the consideration that the Covenanters by how much the more successful, so much the more Imperious would they have been towards him: And so ill did he already brook their hard Impositions, their earnestness to purge his House, and their Extorting a Declaration from him against his own Proceedings and best affected Party, that great Differences and Animosities daily encreased between him and them, inasmuch, that at length taking horse in his ordinary Habit, accompanied with three only of his most trusty Attendants, as if he intended onely to ride out a little way a Hawking, he departs secretly toward the North of Scotland, where he heard the Marquess of Montrose, the Earls of Athol, and Seaford, the Lords Ogleby, Newburgh, and Major General Middleton, with the Gordonians, and the men of Athol were ready to appear for him, with no contemptible Forces; however, he would not presently call himself upon them, till such time as he had sent to know for a certainty what capacity they were in of helping him, and how far he might trust to the Will and Power of their Undertakings, but went directly to my Lord Dedp's House in the North Confinnes of Fife, intending there to have remain'd private, till the return of their Answer, and accordingly either to have repair'd to them, or again betaken himself beyond Sea.

This sudden and secret Departure of the King, did very much trouble the Committee of Estates at St. Johnstone, especially for that their own Jealousies gave them to apprehend that he was going towards Middleton, and the Athol Men. Nor was indeed his Departure so secretly carried, but that upon Inquiry made, they soon had Information of his being at my Lord Dedp's House: Then was it much controverted and disputed according to the diversity of Opinions among them, what course they should take in reference to his Return: Some, that were of the more arrogant sort, were of the mind, That since he had thus deserted them, they ought not to trouble themselves any more about him, but to leave him to himself and his own ways: Others judg'd it more convenient, To send to him, to let him understand their Resentment of his going from them, and adhering to Malignants, Which last Opinion favouring far more of Indulgence and Moderation, was suddenly scrud up to a perfect condescension and compliance, through the Power and Influence of severall great Lords and leading Men even of the Presbyterians themselves, who sensible at length of what these Breaches and Divisions would produce, and of the necessity of uniting against the Common Enemy, began ferriously to close, in favour and advantage of his Majesty, with those of the Royalty who were by degrees crept into Play. So that it being concluded by the Major part (by much) of the Estates, That not any possible Expedient for the bringing back of the King unto them should be omitted, Major General Montgomery was Commanded with a Party of Horse to March immediately to my Lord Dundup's House, and to endeavour by earnest Supplications to bring his Majesty back to St. Johnstons along with him. Montgomery arriving at the place, and having found for certain that he was there, first Surrounded the House, and then sent in to the King to acquaint him, that he came thither, Employ'd by the Committee of Estates, to entreat his Majesty to return back. Whereupon being admitted to the Kings Presence, he fell at his Feet, and humbly besought his Majesty to forget whatever had been committed hitherto towards him of unbecoming or distastfull or derogatory to his Authority, and to assure himself, that upon his Return he should be observ'd with greater Duty and Respect for the future: and urg'd to him withall, the ill consequence of his deserting of those who had so eminently appear'd for him. In fine, the King, though ill digesting the remembrance of those Restraints and Neglects he had so lately induc'd among them; and at the same time being earnestly Solicited by the Condonists, and the Abol Men that rose for him in the North, to adhere totally to them, undertaking to secure him against the Kirk and all others that should oppose him, which caus'd a little delay for a while, and made some begin to doubt the Success of this Negotiation; yet being overcome at length by Montgomery's repeated Importunities, and the powerful persuasions of some other persons as Discreet as Loyal, who undertook to mediate in the business, he condescends to return with Montgomery to St. Johnstons, to the general Joy and Satisfaction of the Moderate of all Parties, as well Covenanters as Royalists; by the mutual accord and good correspondence of whom, things went on with a much more prosperous and smooth Career than formerly; yet not without some little disturbance, through the contumacious flaming out both of the one and the other extreme on each side. On the Kirk's part, a different Faction of Covenanters, that associated chiefly in the West, and some parts of the South of Scotland, more rigid and cross-grain'd than the rest, bandying into a distinct Sect, as men utterly dissatisfy'd with what was acted at St. Johnstons: On the Royall, the foresaid Confederates in the North, about the quieting of whom there had like to have been warm work, had not the matter been discreetly manag'd. As for those other Malecontents of the Kirk, they set forth a large Remonstrance to the Committee of Estates, wherein They Taxt themselves too much Hast and Precipitation in their Treaty with the King, of their Entertaining and Receiving him among them, before he had given any convincing Evidence of a real Change (as they call'd it); say, whereby divers actions (as they presum'd to alledg) he had manifestly the contrary. Moreover, They declar'd their utter dislike and disavowing of theirs, and the Kings Proceedings, taking upon them to pronounce, That his Profession of the Cause was merely Counterfeits, as they would have to appear, by his favouring and frequenting the wicked Company (to wit) of Scotch and English Malcontents; therefore that they absolutely refused to know him to his Power and Authority. They also Declar'd against their Intentions of leaving England for his sake, being a Nation not Subordinate to them, without consideration of the lawfulness, or the necessity thereof.

The most Eminent Men of this Faction, were Colonel Kerr, Colonel Stranghan, the Lord Warriston, and Sir John Cheffly: Nor were they without a Committee, or Synod of their own, called, The Synod of Glasgow, from whom there was also issued out a Declaration (to the same Effect, as the foren mentioned Remonstrance) which they sent by four of their Commissioners to those of the Kirk at St. Johnstons: But this Declaration of the Synod of Glasgow, as also the Remonstrance of the Western Association, were very much disguised by the chief Ruling Men, even of the Kirk Party themselves, who mainly endeavoured to bring off Kerr and Stranghan to a Conjunction with them; and to that end, they sent the Earl of Cassilis, the Lord Brody, Mr. Robert Douglas, and others, to Treat with them; but they still stood high upon their Terms, and peremptorily Declar'd as well against King and Lords on the one Side, as against Sectaries (for so they call'd the English Army) on the other, and resolv'd equally to oppose both.

These things however did not at present so much exercise the care of the Committee of Estates, as how to bring in Humble and Middleton, and the rest in the North, for they refused to submit (though the Kings Authority was made use of to Command their Coming in within Fifteen or Twenty dayes): And having taken Aberdeen, March'd directly up towards St. Johnstons, killing upon Sir John Browns Regiment, and routing it; By the Way they were Accosted with an Act of Indemnity which they sleighted; and would not thereby be drawn to a Submission, unless according to their further Demands, they might be received into Places of Trust; which with some other of their Propositions not being yielded to, they came with Two thousand Foot, and Nine hundred Horse, within a Mile of the Town; and David Lesly being at hand with a Thousand Five hundred Horse, it was thought the Business would have come to an Engagement, had not the King seasonably interpos'd, and caus'd this Quarrell to end in a Treaty, which otherwise might have prov'd a bloody Conflict. The Ministers at Stirling were so far from Consenting to this Treaty, that they put the Sentence of Excommunication upon Middleton; which Act very much displeas'd those at St. Johnstons, who now began to see a Necessity of taking in all Parties to oppose the Common Enemy: Arguile and Douglas were earnest for it, and Cassilis by degrees was brought to Comply; So that the Earl of Linlithgow, and others that were grand Actors in the year 1648, were declar'd capable of Trust by the Kirk, and the Estates having resolv'd upon a

A G and Convention held at St. Johnstons.

A general Meeting to be held at St. Johnstons, consisting of the King, Lords, Barons, Burgesses, and Assembly of Ministers, to Consult for the good and safety of the Kirk, King, and Kingdom; Summon'd the Commissioners of the Kirk at Stirling, to Adjourn their Sitting thither, and to appear among the rest at this Grand Convention: To this they of Stirling sent back an Excuse by their Messengers, alledging severall things against this Convention, and advising them to be at a greater distance from the King and his Council, and to think upon Stirling as a more Convenient place for their Meeting: To which the Estates return'd Answer; They held St. Johnstons the fitter Place, and that if they wou'd not joyn with their Meeting, they should look upon them accordingly, and Consult for their own Securities. Whereupon after much Debate, and many of them expressing their Dissent, it was at last carried in the Affirmative by the Major part of Voyces, for their going to the Grand Convention at St. Johnstons: but the Committee of War remained at Stirling; and now there seem'd to be an unanimous Agreement amongst the severall Factions against this Common Enemy, namely, The English Army; only in the High-Lands some Forces yet stood out and refus'd to submit, whereupon Middleton was Employed with a new Commission and Instructions from the King, Estates, and Kirk, to go and Treat with them; divers of the Scotch Lords that had been formerly in Disfavour with the Kirk, were now received in, as Duke Hamilton, the Lords Lauderdale, Leith, Buchheim, Dedop, Craford, and others who were design'd to have Commands in the Army, and some of them were admitted to Sit in Parliament.

Colonell Kerr in the West of Scotland was at length so far Induc'd to Comply with the Grati-dees of the Kirk, that he took Prisoner, Colonell Stranghan, who still stood out and inclin'd to Side with the English: But not long after, Kerr himself giving an On-set to the English Forces under Major General Lambert, was Rout'd, his Men put to Flight, and he himself with others of his Chief Commanders taken Prisoners.

As ill succeeded it with a Party of English in Norfolk, who about the same time gathering together in Arms against the Common-Wealth, declar'd for King Charles the Second, and the restoration of the Ancient Government of the Land; but upon the approach of some of the County Militia, and Two Troops from Lyn, they presently disperit themselves and fled; being pursued, severall of them were taken, and about 20 of them Executed by the Sentence of a High Court of Justice erected for that purpose at Norwich.

The Siege of Edenborough Castle having been strenuously carried on for the space of Three Months or thereabouts, many strong Batteries had been made, and Mines wrought against it; on the Twenty fourth of December it was Surrender'd; with all the Arms and Magazine that belonged to it, into the power of Cromwell, by the Governour Colonel William Dundas, Son in law to old General Leyen, besides other Castles and strong Houses that were taken by Surrender, as Newbit, Herbywick, and Roswell: So great indeed was their Success, that what ever they Attempted, succ'd or, last they Effect'd their Design.

The first Memorable Translation after the Agreement between the King and the Estates of Scotland, was the Solemnity of his Coronation at Scoon, the wonted place for the Coronation of the Kings of Scotland in former Ages, there having been Crown'd in this place 47 Kings besides his present Majesty; it was Celebrated with loud Acclamations, Bone-fires, shooting off of Guns, and with as much Pomp and Ceremony as the present State of Things would permit; The Nobility, Barons, and Burgesses went from St. Johnstons to Scoon in their Robes, bringing thither with them the Crown, Sword, and Scepter; the whole Scotch Army, which stood all the Way, as a Guard between those Two Places, making a Lane for them as they went along. In the Presence Chamber, where the Lord of Arguile attended as Lord Chamberlain for that day, was Plac'd a Chair of State, where the KING sat with all his Lords and Attendants about him: After a low Obeysance made to him by all the Company, the Marquess of Arguile made a Speech;

Wherein he declar'd the Affections of the Parliament, Assembly and People to him, and of their hopes of good from him, to make them happy in bringing England and all their Enemies in Subjection to Him and Them. Moreover he added, That the Parliament of Scotland were come to present his Majesty with the Crown, Sword, and Scepter.

Then he was attended by all his Train marching in Order before him to the Kirk of Scoon, where in the midst of a large Stage of 24 Foot square, another was erected with an ascent of two steps, and on the top thereof a Chair of State was plac'd for his Majesty to sit on; the State of Crimson Velvet, under which the King went, was supported by the Lords Drummond, Carnegie, Ramsey, Johnstons, Brechin and Teffer: His Train by four other Earls Sons, the Lords Erskine, Montgomerie, Newbottle, Macchlen; the Supporters of the Canopy being likewise supported by six others, the Sons of Noblemen: On the Kings right hand went the Lord Great Constable, on his left the Lord Great Marshall; the Honours were carried before him by the Chiefest of the Nobility: Immediately before his Majesty went the Earl of Arguile carrying the Crown; Next before him the Scepter was carried by the Earl of Crawford Lindsey, the Sword by the Earl of Keith, the Spurs by the Earl of Eglington: As soon as they were entred into the Kirk, and his Majesty

Col. Kerr de- tected and tak- en Prisoner by M. Gen. Lambert.

The King Solemnly Crowned.

1650.

Majestie Seated in his Throne, he took the usuall Oath which his Predecessours the Kings of Scotland were wont to take at their Coronation. One of each of the Three Estates of Scotland, namely, the Marquis of Argyll, (as being of the Nobles) one Baron, and one Burgess, holding the Crown among them, offered it to the King; then they delivered it to Three Ministers of the Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, who were appointed by the Estates in Parliament, to present it unto him. At the presentation of the Crown to the King by the Three Ministers, one of them made his Address in this Form:

SIR,

I do present unto you, King Charles, the Crown and Dignity of this Realm.

Then turning his Face towards the People, he said;

Are ye not willing to have him for your King, and to become Subject to him?

Whereupon the King turning himself to them, the People Cryed out with a loud Voyce, GOD SAVE KING CHARLES THE SECOND. Then after he had been Anointed by the Three Ministers, with the Regall Unction, the Crown was set upon his Head by the Marquis of Argyll; the Scepter was also given into his Hand by the Earl of Lindsey, and the Sword carried before him by the Earl of Rothes. As soon as the Crown was put upon his Head, he made this short Speech to the People:

I Do Esteem the Affections of my good People, more than the Crowns of many Kingdoms; and shall be ready, by Gods Assistance, to bestow my Life for your Defence, wishing to live no longer, then that I may see Religion and this Kingdome flourish in all Happiness.

Adding many other Expressions of his Love and Affection to the People; and afterwards Mr. Robert Douglas made an hortatory Oration, or Sermon to his Majesty.

The Ceremonies of the Coronation ended, and a plentiful Entertainment prepared, the King sat at one Table, and the Lords at another, there passing many Careless and Testimonies of Joy all Dinner time between them: After which, they all went back to St. Johnstons, in the same Order and Pomp they came from thence to Seque.

The next thing in preparation, was the raising of a Numerous Army, for which end, the King himself Designed to go Northward, and to set up his Standard at Aberdeen, intending to appear in the Head of the Army as Generalissimo, and under him Duke Hamilton was appointed Lieutenant General of the Army, and David Lesley Major General; Middleton was to be Lieutenant General of the Horse, and Major General Massey (a person very constant to the Service of his present Majesty, though formerly of the opposite side) to Command in Chief all the English Forces; Holburn was sent for away from his Government at Sterling, and Sir John Brown appointed Governor in his room: As for Siraraghan, he was proceeded against by Sentence of Excommunication, for Complying with the English Army, and declaring against the Proceedings of the Estates of Scotland.

The Parliament of Scotland having been Adjourn'd, sat again, about the beginning of March, and hard tickling there was for several Lords of the Royall Party to be admitted to their Seats in the House, as Duke Hamilton, the Marquis of Huntly, the Earl of Calder, the Earl of Crawford, Lindsey, and others, who had come in and submitted to the Kirk; and as they were Persons of Eminent Quality, they had much Favour and Indulgence shewn them at that form of Submission, called, The Stool of Repentance; for it was observ'd, that Hamilton did his Penance after a very stately and pompous manner, there being plac'd a Table for him covered with black Velvet, and a Cushion of the same: Upon that Day he also kept a great Feast, to which were invited divers Lords and other Eminent Persons, as well of the Presbytery as the Royalty.

At the beginning of this Session, there was appointed a Committee of Parliament, consisting of Duke Hamilton, the Marquis of Argyll, the Earls of Eglington, Glencairn, Dumfries, Warr, Callender, Chancellor Loudon, and the Lord Kirkcubright, to consider of the Affairs of State; and to examine and proceed against all men that obstructed or oppos'd the present Designs, inasmuch as divers had their Estates Sequestred, and some were tryed for their Lives, for holding Correspondence with the English Army; who on their parts also were not idle, but after the taking of the Castle of Edinburgh, set upon Hume and Timptall, Two very strong Castles, which had somewhat hindered the Passage between Edinburgh and Berwick; these places were not long Besieged before they were yielded up, the first to Colonel Fenwick, the other to Colonel Monk.

The Assemblies of the Presbyters at Sterling and Aberdeen, shew'd themselves Discontented at the New Levies, in regard that so many whom they counted Malignants; were to be admitted to Commands in the Army, as well as to have their Seats in Parliament; whereupon the Commissioners of the Kirk at St. Johnstons, endeavoured to remove their Scruples by a Declaration, and likewise likewise put them in mind of certain Acts, which commanded Silence in matters of this Nature, and forbid any one to speak against the publick Transactions of the State. And so it was Resolved by the leading Power, that the Levies went on with all possible speed: The King himself was very Active in giving out Orders, and providing all things Expedient for the raising of a great Army, and at a General Rendezvous, which was held at the East of Fife, he came into the Field, to encourage the Souldiers with his Personal Presence, and made a Speech to them, wherein he Exhorted them to be Valiant and Faithfull in his Cause, telling them moreover, That he would rather choose to die in the Field, than to be driven up into the Mountains. Afterwards he went to the Assembly at Aberdeen, to endeavour by his Presence and Authority to Compose the Differences among the Ministers there; and the better to improve his Interest, and maintain Correspondence abroad, he sent over the Earl of Dumfries Ambassadour to the States of Holland, (having had long before for his Resident at the Hague, one Mac-donnell, formerly Governour of Overysse.) At the same time the Lord Croft Negotiated for him as Ambassadour, at the Court of the King of Poland, besides those in Spain, and other Parts abovementioned; By all which Embassages he gained many Compliments and fair Promises, though little or no Advantage besides: but none of them all met with such hard Entertainment as Sir Henry Hyde, Lieger at Constantinople, who contending with Sir Thomas Bendish that lay there Ambassadour at the same time, from the Republick of England, was by the Visier Bassa (one that, like a right Politician as he was, favour'd the strongest Party) delivered up to the Disposall of Pendsib, and by him sent over into England, where being tryed for his Life, and Condemned by a High-Court of Justice, he was Beheaded over against the Royall Exchange at London. The same Fate too after (on the Twenty ninth of March, 1651,) befell Captain Brown Bushell, an expert Sea-man, and one who heretofore had been for the Parliament, but had of late behav'd himself stoutly for his Majesty by Sea.

In the Parliament of Scotland, sitting at St. Johnstons, Duke Hamilton and the Royall Influence seem'd at present to bear the greatest Sway; whereupon the Marquis of Argyll and other Lords of the more Covenanted Strain, began to be much discontented, as thinking themselves under a Cloud, and laid aside: the Earl of Loudon who had been ever of Customs Lord Chancellor, was removed from his Presidentship, and in his Room, the Lord Burleigh Substituted: As for the Earl of Sutherland, he absolutely refus'd to Concur with the present Transactions. Among the discontented Ministers, the chief were Mr. James Guthrie, who having been long since confin'd for his Clamouring against the Proceedings of the State, continued still under Restraint; Mr. Andrew Cant, who had long been Courted to a Neutrality at least, if not to an absolute Compliance, nevertheless he remained so far refractory, that he joyned with the Synod at Glasgow, in declaring against what was done at St. Johnstons; and Mr. Duram, who having been appointed by the Kirk to attend the King as his Chaplain, left the Court at length, and betook himself to Retirement: Mr. Patrick Galahy was also of the same Stamp, (yet he and some others at a Conference, with Cromwell, and Lambers, at Glasgow, maintained a zealous Dispute with them, against the Invasion of their Country by the English Army.) On the other side, Mr. Robert Douglas, and Mr. David Dicks, were so far Favourers of the Royall Affairs, that they inveigh'd vehemently against all such as went about to keep up the Name of Malignants, or to make Divisions among the Levies. Adding, That now they must all become one man's Beasts.

The Parliament at St. Johnstons not having as yet done any considerable Matter, only expected the Compleating of the Levies, Adjourned till the Seventeenth of April, and Devolved in the mean time the Civill Power into the hands of a Select Council, the Military Power into the hands of a Committee of War, consisting of Twenty Persons, out of each of the Three Estates.

Speciall Care was taken about Fortifying the Town of Sterling, the King himself going often thither to view the Works, and hasten the Compleating of them, intending that Place very suddenly for his chief Residence: he had obtained from the Parliament a little before their Adjournment, an Additional Act for Compleating the Levies up to Fifteen thousand Foot, besides the Horse, so that all things were busily preparing for sudden Action.

Nor were the English less diligent in pursuing Advantages, than the Scots in strengthening and re-inforcing themselves. Blackbush's strong Hold between Edinburgh and Sterling, being Attacked by Colonel Monk, was within a short while delivered up upon Articles of Agreement very Advantageous to the Besiegers; but a matter of much more trouble to the Kings Party, was the taking of the Earl of Eglington, and one of his Sons not long after by Captain Crook, at Dunbar: that Lord being a person of much Power and Consideration among them.

The Republick of England having made so large a progress in the Conquest of Ireland and Scotland, thought it a Business no less conducing to their Interest, to bring into their power those lesser Islands that as yet held out for the King: Guernsey they had already in their possession, all but Cornet Castle; the next they set upon was the Isle of Scilly, in which there were only Three Places of any great Importance, the Isles of Treves, Briers, and St. Maries: The two first were quickly taken by the means of Three hundred Sea-men that were Landed there by General Blake, joyning with certain Land-Forces that were also sent into the Island; but the last being a Place of a very strong and almost Impregnable Situation, could not be won in a short while, yet in the end that also was gained.

At the next meeting of the Parliament of Scotland, they sat very close in Consultation, about their Militia, and other weighty and pressing Matters of State: The Court at present was kept at Sterling, which was also the Head-Quarters, the whole Scottish Army being Quartered thereabouts. Middleton's Northern Levies amounted to near upon Eight thousand, and it was much controverted, Whether those Forces should make up a distinct Army by it self (as Middleton himself flood upon) or joyn with the Southern Army; however, to prevent Emulation and Discontent between Lesly and him, about the Supreme Command of the Army, the King resolved to take it upon himself: The Grand Business under Debate in this present sitting of the Parliament, was about a Message from the King, in which he desired,

The Kings
Message to the Parliament of Scotland.

I. That the Act about the Clases of Malignants might be Annul'd, and another Act B pass'd for the Repealing thereof.

II. That there might be no mention of the Name of Malignants any more amongst them.

III. That Duke Hamilton, the Earls of Seaforth, Callender, and others, might have full Command.

To the granting of these things, the Marquess of Argyle was a main Opposer, so that not without much difficulty and hard tugging it was, that after a long time the Business was effected.

The Kings
Birth-day celebrated by the Scots.

The Twenty ninth of May was Celebrated by the Scots with much Rejoycing and Festivity, as being the Kings Birth-day, in order to the Observation whereof, the Parliament Adjourn'd that day, and his Majesty and most of the Nobility Dined together at a great Feast. There was also a Solemn Appearance and Training of the Souldiery, and at Night all the Streets Blaz'd with Bonfires, and the Canons play'd from Sterling, Brunt Island, and the rest of the Scots Garrisons, but not any one Town shew'd their Affection in so particular a manner to his Majesty as the Town of Dundee, from which a very large Contribution was gathered toward his Assistance, the Citizens also presented him with a rich and stately Tent, together with Six Pieces of Ordnance, and set out a Regiment of Horse at their own Charges.

The Parliament of Scotland ends.

About the beginning of June, the Parliament of Scotland ended, having before their Dissolution, given large Commissions and Instructions for the Pressing of Men in all the parts of Scotland, beyond Fife, and in the Western Parts, to hasten their new Levy, which was to consist of Fifteen thousand Foot besides Horse. It concluded in a very calm and peacefull manner, which tended to an uniting of all Interests, and the Composing of all Controversies and Differences among them, and an unanimous Consent for the repressing of Cromwell, and his English Myrmidons: For the Ratifying of this Union, they had pass'd the Two Grand Acts so long contented for; the Act of Indemnity, and that for Repealing the Clases of Malignants.

Battel to the Scots.

The English Army waiting greedily for an Opportunity to bring the Scots to a Field Engagement, made their Approaches as near to them as they could, and while the Scottish Forces lay encamped in Sterling Park, and toward Torwood, they Quarter'd about Lithgow, and still watch'd for Advantages to set upon them; the Scots on the other side kept themselves close in their Trenches, and declin'd coming to a Battell, thinking it better to stay till the full Number of their Army were made up by those Levies, which were still expected to come out of the West and some other Parts; for the Expediency of which, Argyle, Huntley, and Seaforth, were dispatch'd away to their severall Territories, besides the additionall Forces which Middleton expected out of the North, to make up his Levies complete. Massey's Instruction was to have sail'd into England with a Body of English Horse and Foot, and together with the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Wilmot, to have joyn'd with a Party in Lancashire, that had design'd to rise for the King, and to that end had a correspondence not only in Scotland, but also at London, where the Plot was chiefly contriv'd and promoted; but upon the taking of a Ship at Ayre in Scotland, which had been bound for the Isle of Man, and the seizing of Mr. Brickhead, an Agent in the Business, the whole Confederacy was discovered, and thereupon were apprehended about it, Mr. Thomas Cook of Gray's Inn, and Mr. Gibbons, together with Mr. Love, Mr. Jenkins, Doctor Drake, and several other Presbyterian Ministers (once inveterate Enemies to that Cause for which they now Conspire) who were brought before a High-Court of Justice, and tryed for their Lives; and a little before the Scottish Army enter'd England, two of them, namely Mr. Love, and Mr. Gibbons, were beheaded at Tower-Hill; so that by reason of this discovery, Massey was for the time frustrated of his intended Expedition. However, suddain Action was resolv'd on, in regard the English press'd so close upon the Scottish Army, that they were in election either to be speedily forc'd to a Battell, or else to be streighned in their Quarters, and reduc'd to a scarcity of Provisions: Now the Consultation was, Whether it would be more convenient to fly and fight the English Army in Scotland, or to give them the Go-by and slip into England? Many there were that gave their Opinions Pro & Con; but the King absolutely declar'd his Sentiment to be for an Incurision into England, as hoping still, notwithstanding the late discovery, that he had a sufficient power of Friends left,

that

A that would readily joyn with him upon his coming in: nor was it long ere this Design was put in Execution.

In the mean time, the English Army having offer'd Battell to the Scots at Torwood, and not being received by them, made it their next work to land some of their Forces on Fife side; and to that end, Colonel Overton was sent with Sixteen hundred Foot, and Four Troops of Horse, who at a place called Queens-Ferry, forc'd his Landing with small ado, and very little loss. Cromwell at the same time marching with his whole Army close up to the Scots, with an intent to have fall upon their Rear, in case they should have mov'd that way, and have attempted to disturb the Emarch against them under the Command of Sir John Brown: To oppose whom, and assist and reinforce that Party of the English already landed in Fife, Major General Lambert, and Colonel Okey, with Two Regiments of Horse, and Two of Foot, were Transported over the water, and joyning Battell with Sir John Brown, gave him a most sad overthrow, took himself, Colonel Buchanan, and Fourteen hundred more, and slew about Two thousand; by which Victory, the English gain'd to firm a Footing in Fife, that they were not easily to be repell'd: and soon after, Brunt now the King and his Army were driven out of pure necessity to take that course which long since had been designed for their greater advantage and convenience, which was to march away directly for England; for General Cromwell, that he might make himself Master of the Pass at Sterling, saw it necessary first to set upon Sir Johnstons, which after one dayes Siege was gained: Next, Intelligence that that place was quit by the Scots and Royall Forces, who as soon as they heard Sir Johnstons was delivered, immediately began their March Southward. The main of Cromwell's Army came back again over the Firth, making what expedition they could to overtake them; but the Scots were some dayes march before them in their way to England: Major General Harrison with about Three thousand Horse and Dragoons being advanced the nearest of any part of the English Army, was ready to attend this Motion; also Major General Lambert with about as many more, was ordered by a Council of War to speed after them, and endeavour to fall upon their Rear: General Cromwell began his March from Leith towards England with a Thousand Horse and Foot; the same day the Royall Army enter'd upon English ground by the way of Carlisle, which was on the sixth of August. Upon the expectation of their coming into England, a Party in Wales began to rise, intending to have joyn'd with the Earl of Derby from the Isle of Man; but this Design undertaken, as it was, precipitately, and managed without order, soon vanish'd to nothing: By that time the King was come with his Army as far as Lancashire, he was somewhat hard beset by the Forces that follow'd him out of Scotland, besides those that in a short time were rais'd in England: he had in his Rear General Cromwell, who had left Monk with a sufficient Power to carry on the Work in Scotland: On his Van were the two Major Generals, Lambert and Harrison, unto whom there came up Two thousand of the Country Militia out of Staffordshire, and Four thousand under the Command of Colonel Birch out of Lancashire, Cheshire, and other parts: and to flank him, the Lord Fairfax in Yorkshire appear'd in the field with a Formidable Body: Moreover, the City of London pow'd out her Numerous Militia upon him, and the adjacent Counties were by strict Order of the Junto enjoin'd to set out Men and Horse at their own Charges: nor was of about 5000 Men, which were dropt away by degrees, there remaining not complete, as was generally suppos'd, by that time they came into England, above Eleven or Twelve thousand Men. That which was the Kings grand Expectation also fail'd him, namely, the general coming in of the Country; for the most considerable Supply that came in to him, was only one Troop of Horse Commanded by the Lord Howard of Estrich his Son: nor is it much to be wonder'd at, since the Junto's Forces had so powerfully overspread the Country, that none could well have opportunity to stir in behalf of the Royall Affairs; so that before the deciding Blow was given, they might well have been judg'd to be in a very lost and hopeles posture: yet, that there was not wanting a great portion of Courage and Confidence among the Joviall Cavaliers even to the very last, may appear by certain passages of the Noble Earl of Lauderdale's intercepted Letters, the one to his Lady, the other to the Lord Beloevis:

Never Men (saith he in one of them) were more hearty, for all their Toil, and seriously you would not know this Army; a natural Purge is wholesome, (speaking of those that withdrew themselves) and I hope ours is so, since the ill Humours are gone: the Country is kind, and we might have Men enough; his Majesty received the Lord Howards Son graciously, and Knighted him; he is the first, but I have no reason to believe he will be the last that will return to his Duty.

And in the other he hath to this Effect;

His Majesty is advanced into England as far as Perith, with a very good Army, able by the blessing of God to do his Business: they are, I dare say, near double the number of those those with which the King of Sweden enter'd Germany: Never was any Army so Regular as we have been, since we came into England; I dare say we have not taken the worth of six pence, and what you hear of our Misfortune in Fife, or what ever our Enemies Print or Write, trust me, this is the best Scots Army that ever I saw, and I hope shall prove best. All those that were unwilling to hazard all in this Cause with their Kings, have upon a specious pretence most of them left us. This is a naturall Purge, and will do us much good.

And the Lord Wentworth in his Letter to my Lord Crofts, thus:

BR Gods grace we are come as far as Perith in Cumberland, with a good Army of Fourteen or Fifteen thousand Foot, and Six thousand Horse, all absolutely at the Kings Command, as much as any Army that ever I saw under the Command of his Father.

But others there were of them that seem'd more sensible of the badness of their Condition, inasmuch as Duke Hamilton to my Lord Crofts, writ thus:

Duke Hamilton's to my Lord Crofts.

WE are now laughing all at the ridiculousness of our present state: We have quit Scotland, being scarce able to maintain it; and yet we grasp at all, and nothing but all will satisfy us, or to lose all. I confess, I cannot tell you whether our Hopes or Fears are greatest, but we have one stout Argument, Despair; for we must now either stoutly fight, or die: all the Rogues have left us, I shall not say, whether for fear or disloyalty; but all now with his Majesty are such as will not dispute his Commands.

The King proclaimed at the head of the Army. The Fight at Warrington Bridge. The King comes to Worcester.

The King at his first Entrance upon English ground, was proclaimed King of Great Britain at the head of the Army, with great Acclamations and shooting of the Cannon then at Perith in Cumberland, and so afterwards at every Market Town through which he marcht. Having made his way over Warrington Bridge, notwithstanding Lamberts endeavour to stop that passage, and both Parties engaging near Knotsford Heath, though with some little loss on the Kings side: He came on the Twenty second of August to Worcester, where after one or two Repulses by the Forces that kept that City, he quickly entred, through the ready assistance of the Inhabitants, who not only not oppos'd his entrance, but also helpt to beat the Parliaments Soldiers out. It was for some while much in dispute among the chief Officers of his Army, Whether it were most convenient to take up their Quarters at Worcester, and there to Fortifie themselves; or to make a resolute venture and to march with all speed up to the City of London: but in consideration of the long and tedious marches they had lately had, and of the sick and weary estate of the Army, it was at length resolv'd on as a thing most agreeable to their present condition, to stay where they were, and to make good some Passes that were thereabouts. On the Twenty seventh day they kept a Solemn Fast, and the next day had a general Rendezvous, at which the Country came in far more considerably than at any time before, since their arrivall in England. The King as he was in his march to Worcester, dispatcht away Messages and Invitations unto severall Governours of Towns and Castles, to deliver up unto his use those places which they had in their possession, and principally to Sir Thomas Middleton Governour of Chirk Castle in Shropshire, and to Colonel Mackworth Governour of Shrewsbury: To the first, the Earl of Derby also writ, and the Letters were sent by one Simkis, whom Sir Thomas caus'd to be seiz'd and sent to Wrexham. To the Governour of Shrewsbury were formally sent and delivered by a Trumpeter both a Letter and a Summons, which I thought remarkable enough to be here inserted, together with Mackworths Answer: The Letter ran thus:

His Letter and Summons to Col. Mackworth Governour of Shrewsbury.

Colonel Mackworth, Having sent you herewith a Summons, to Render into my hands my Town, with the Castle of Shrewsbury, I cannot but perswade my self you will do it, when I consider you a Gentleman of an Ancient House, and of very different Principles (as I am inform'd) from those with whom your Employment ranks you at present: If you shall peaceably deliver them unto me, I will not only pardon you what is past, and protect you and yours in your persons, and all that belongs to you, but reward so eminent and seasonable a Testimony of your Loyalty with future Trust and Favour, and do leave it to your self to propose the Particular, being upon that condition ready to grant you presently any thing you shall reasonably desire, and to approve myself your Friend,

Together with this Letter was sent this following Summons:

Colonel Mackworth,

BEing desirous to attempt all fair ways for recovering Our own, before we proceed to Force and Extremity, and (where the Controversie is with Subjects) accounting that a double Victory which is obtained without effusion of blood, and where the hearts that of right belong to us, are gained as well as their strengths. We do hereby Summon you to Surrender unto Us Our Town, with the Castle of Shrewsbury, as in Duty and Allegiance by the Laws of God and the Land you are bound to do, thereby not only preventing the mischief which you may otherwise draw upon your self and that place, but also opening the first Door to Peace and Quietness, and the enjoyment of every one both King and People, that which pertains to them, under certain and known Laws, the end for which we are come. Given at Our Camp at Tong Norton, this 20th of August.

Unto this Letter and Summons the Governour of Shrewsbury returned this Answer:

For the Commander in Chief of the Scottish Army.

SIR,

By your Trumpet I received two Papers, the one containing a Proposition, the other a direct Summons for the Rendition of the Town and Castle of Shrewsbury, the Custody whereof I have received by Authority of Parliament; and if you believe me a Gentleman (as you say you do), you may believe I will be faithfull to my Trust; to the Violation whereof, neither Allurements can perswade me, nor Threatnings of Forces especially when I but Paper ones, compell me: What Principles I am judg'd to be of, I know not; but I hope they are such as shall ever declare me honest, and no way differing herein (as I know) from those engaged in the same Employment with me; who should they desert that Cause they are Imbarqued in, I resolve to be found, as I am unremovable, the faithfull Servant of the Commonwealth of England,

Colonel Mackworth's Answer

H. Mackworth.

About two or three dayes before the Kings Arrivall at Worcester, the Earl of Derby having landed at Weymouth in Lancashire, came to him with Two hundred and fifty Foot, and sixty Horse, which he brought with him out of the Isle of Man, and immediately returning back into Lancashire to raise a more considerable Force, he soon got together by the influence he had in those Parts; a Body of Fifteen hundred, with which he was halting toward Manchester, where he was assured of five hundred more that intended to have joyn'd with him, and was likely in a short while to have encreast to a very great number; whereupon Colonel Robert Lilburn with his own Regiment, and three Companies, and a few Horse out of Cheshire, endeavour'd with all speed to joyn with Cromwells Regiment of Foot which lay about Preston, and so to set upon him. To prevent which Conjunction, the Earl of Derby prest upon Lilburns men, and forc'd them to an Engagement, just as they were about to have drawn off and marcht in the flank of him to meet the Regiment at Preston; the Dispute was very sharp and doubtfull for the space of an hour, but in conclusion the Earl of Derby's men, being but new Levied, and therefore for the most part raw and undisciplin'd Country people, were put to a general confusion and flight; the Earl himself was wounded, and was very near being taken Prisoner, which yet he escap'd, and having conceal'd himself for some time at Boscobell House, where his Majestie afterwards was shelter'd, got safe at length to Worcester. There were taken Prisoners of Quality of his Party, the Lord Warrington, Sir Thomas Tilsley, Major General Sir William Throgmorton, Colonel Matthew Bainton, Colonel Rich. Legg, Col. Ratcliff Gervet, Major Trollop, and others (who were persons of sufficient Gallantry and Conduct themselves, had their men been answerable), together with divers inferiour Officers, and a number of private Soldiers.

The Earl of Derby raiseth Forces for the King.

The Earl of Derby routed by Col. Lilburn.

It was not above a day or two after this Victory, ere General Cromwell came before Worcester with an Army of Seventeen thousand Horse and Foot, besides those that were commanded apart by Lambert and Harrison, and other Supplies that came from other parts. On the West-side of the City over Severn lay the main of the Scotch Army in the compas of two miles; they within the City made severall Resolute Sallies, but the Belaguers being so numerous and potent, they were beaten in with some loss: The second day of Cromwells approach, Fifteen hundred Horse and Foot sallied out at Sidney Gate, with intent to have set upon a House about two miles from the City, Mann'd by Two hundred Miqueeters, wherewith the Junios Army taking Alarm, the Scots were forc'd to retreat with the loss of Fifteen of their men slain; however, all possible diligence gence was used for the well Fortifying themselves within the City, and making good the Mount at the South-East end.

The next Re-encounter was at the Pass at Upton, which Major General Massey kept for the King; hither Lambert came from Evesham, with a Party of Horse and Dragoons, who though a great part of the Bridge had been broken down upon news of their coming, made a shift to get over, fir'd into the Town upon the Scots, and got possession of the Church, which Massey's men in vain sought to recover, and at the appearance of the Horse they fled, and were for a little way pursued; Massey himself was wounded, and had much ado to escape with his Freedom, having his horse killed under him: presently after this Dispute, came up Fleetwood with his whole Brigade to help to maintain this Pass.

The Third of September (the same day in which a Twelve month past, was fought that Famous Battle of Dunbar, so unfortunate to the Scots) was that fatal Day which gave the deciding blow to that Controversie which had so long been disputed by Arms between the Royall and the Republick Party; to which last, the fortune of this day also (like as continually before in a long Series of Successes) fell, and being the last Battell of any Note that was disputed between these two Interests, gave for a time the full possession of Three Nations, to those that fought for pretended Liberty and a Common-wealth, against Regal Government.

Lieutenant Gen. Fleetwood having left a force sufficient to keep the Pass at Upton, made it his next care to come to a Conjunction with the rest of the Army, and so that end he took order for the making of two Bridges, the one over Severn, and the other over Tame, at a point where those two Rivers meet; to the Assistance of Fleetwood, and to oppose those Horse and Foot which were drawn out to hinder his passage, Cromwell himself led on Col. Hacker's Regiment of Horse, and the two Foot Regiments of Col. Fairfax and Ingoldsbys, and together with Major General Deans and Colonel Goff's Regiments which scour'd the Hedges, forc'd the Scots to retreat to Powick Bridge, where they re-enforc'd themselves, and for a while sustain'd a very sharp Encounter, but in the end gave ground and fled back to the City.

At the same time that this Conflict was maintain'd, they sallied out on the other side of the City, and gave a notable desperate Charge to that part of the Common-wealths Army that lay that way, the Fight continued for the space of three or four hours eager and fierce, and was prosecuted with much Gallantry and Resolution on the Kings Side, till at length the Besiegers overpowering the others in number, bore them down before them with such irresistible Force, that they put them to utter disorder and flight, and pursuing them to the very Gates, rush'd in pell-mell among them; and in a short while possess'd themselves of the Royall Fort and the City; and thus the Victory was gain'd before one half of Cromwell's Forces (so numerous they were with the Auxiliaries) came up to engage their Enemy, who seeing all lost on their party, and that Victory had absolutely abandon'd them, began then to think of nothing but how to shift every one for themselves; As they fled confusedly through the City, the general Cry among them was, O save the King, save the King. Nor was the King himself unmindful, as soon as he perceiv'd which way the Victory inclin'd, to provide in time for his escape, having in the Fight perform'd all the Offices both of a Valiant Person and Vigilant Commander, riding continually about to encourage his Souldiers; and when he perceiv'd them begin to fail, he was heard to use this Patheticall Expression, Rather shoot me, then let me live to see the sad Consequence of this Fatal Day. Many Parties of Horse were sent out through all Coasts after the flying Troops, few of the Infantry eluding the Field alive, but about Three thousand Horse, whereof a thousand were taken about Bendish by Colonel Barton more by others in other places: many by rising parties of the Country people were taken or knock'd on the head: So incident it is to men in extremity adversity, to have all the Will their Enemies.

In the main Fight, the number of the slain were judg'd to be Three thousand, and of the taken, Ten thousand, whereof the chief Persons of Note were Duke Hamilton, Robert Earl of Cambridge, Alexander Earl of Kelly, John Lord Snytlare, Sir John Packington, Major General Admonsgerry, Major General Pichard, Mr. Richard Fanshawe the Kings Secretary, the General of the Ordnance, the Adjutant General of the Foot, the Marshal General, six Colonels of Horse, (one whereof was Colonel Graves) thirteen of Foot, nine Lieutenant Colonels of Horse, eight of Foot, six Majors of Horse, thirteen of Foot, thirty seven Captains of Horse, seventy two of Foot, with a number of other inferior Officers, an hundred and fifty eight Colours, the Kings Standard, his Collar of S.S. Coach and Horses, and other things of great value: Major General Massey though he had made his escape out of the Field, yet by reason of his Wounds, he was disabled from getting clear away, and brought to so weak a condition, that he surrender'd himself to the Mercy and Civility of the Countess of Stamford, whose Son, nevertheless, the Lord Gray of Groby secur'd him as a Prisoner, to be sent up to the Juno, as soon as he should be recovered of his Wounds.

And as if Success had been now entail'd upon the English Common-wealth, this grand Victory was attended on by divers others of a less magnitude, though considerable enough, which were gain'd in Scotland by Monk and the Forces left there, and as it were trod upon the heels of one another.

At the same time that Cromwell with his Army march'd for England, Sterling Castle was besieg'd, which after a short Siege, was delivered upon Articles, with all the Warlike Ammunition which was in it, being a very large quantity, Five thousand Arms, and forty Pieces of Ordnance, all the the Records of Scotland, the Chair and Cloth of State, the Sword and other rich Furniture of the Kings, the Earl of Marr's Parliament-Robes, Coronet, and Stirrups of Gold: over the Door of the Chappel that belong'd to the Castle, this Motto was observed: F. C. R. Nobis hæc invicta miserum Centum sex proavit, 1617. which shews, that this place when King James came to the Crown, had remain'd unconquer'd for the space of One hundred and six Kings Reigns; and so it also remain'd all his time; and his Sons, but not his Grandchildren.

As soon as Sterling Castle was taken, the next place that Monk set upon was Dundee, during the siege of which, there met together at Ellis in the County of Perth, divers Scotch Lords, Gentlemen, Ministers, and others, to the number of about Three hundred: the principal of whom were old General Lesley Earl of Leven, the Lords Ogilby, Craford, and Lindsey, upon a design to have levied a great power of men for the King, with intention in the first place to have rais'd the siege of Dundee: how secretly soever this was thought to be carried, notice was quickly brought to the Lieutenant General, from whom Colonel Alured being dispatch'd away with Six hundred Horse, and four Troops of Dragoons, surpris'd them on a sudden, overthrew them with ease, slew many, and took General Lesley Earl Marshall, Craford, the Lord of Leith, and all the chief of them Prisoners. About the same time, certain Horse and Dragoons fell upon Five hundred Scots at Dumfries in Galloway, and either killed or took all of them: Among the taken were Sir Philip Musgrave Mayor of St. Johnstons, who had a Commission to be Major General of all the Forces to be rais'd for the King in the four Northern Counties, and with him divers Lords and Gentlemen of Quality: Upon Summons sent to Major General Lumsdaine Governour of that Town, he sent this Answer:

WE E received yours, for Answer whereunto, we do by these acquaint you, That we are Commanded by the Kings Majesty, to desire you and all Officers and Souldiers, and Ships that are at present in Arms against the Kings Authority, to lay down your Arms, and to come in and joyn with his Majesties Forces in this Kingdom, and to conform and give Obedience to the Kings Majesties Declaration sent you herewith, which if you will obey, we shall continue;

Your faithful Friend and Servant in the old manner,

Robert Lumsdaine.

Notwithstanding this Resolute Answer, it was but a very little while ere the Town was taken by Storm, and in it the Governour himself and some more slain; soon after follow'd the Rendition of St. Andrews and Arbroath, with other Towns, Castles, and strong Places; which either voluntarily came in, or rendred upon Summons.

The King after the Fight at Worcester, was he of all the rest most narrowly searcht for, and strictly pursued, and for whose sake the greater diligence was used to follow, way-lay, and intercept all the several parties of the routed Scots that fled, in regard he was the principal cause of whatever had given check to the Junos proceedings; he was the prime Wheel upon which all the lesser Motions depended: But notwithstanding all the Search and Inquiry that was made for him, no news could be heard, or any one certainly tell what was become of him, which gave occasion to many to conjecture, some one thing, some another, according to what their Fancies diversly suggested to them; Some were of Opinion, that he was gone Northward; some, Westward rather; others, that he made choyce of London for his safest place of Retreat: the Truth is, As soon as the Enemy had forc'd their Entrance into the City, all the care then was to secure his Majesty's Person, and to that end the Earl of Cleveland, Sir James Hamilton, Colonel Williams Charles, Col. Wogan, Captain Ashley, Kemble, and other stout Persons made all the force they could to keep them engag'd in Sudbury Street, while his Majesty impurs'd took his way with a Body of Horse, through St. Martins Gate about six of the Clock in the Evening; and at Barbons Bridge, which was about half a mile from the Town, he made a Halt, to advise with those few Nobles and Gentlemen that were with him, (namely, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Derby and Lauderdale, the Lords Talbot, Levison, and Wilmore, Col. Edw. Rofsarock, Colonel Th. Blayue, Mr. Marmaduke Darcy, Mr. William Armorer, Mr. Hugh May, and some others) what course were best to be taken, and the Resolve was, that since there was no possibility of rallying again; (as his Majesty was desirous to have attempted, and to have try'd his fortune in the Field once more) they should make with all speed toward Scotland; and hereupon one Walker formerly a Scout-Master in the Kings Army, was made choyce of for a Guide, but the fast coming on of a very dark night, whereby Walker became unable to guide any farther, put them to another stand about Kniver Heath near Kidderminster; and then the chief Consultation was, how with safety they might obtain a little repose for that night, especially in regard of his Majesty, whom much tole and pains taken in that day's Engagement had render'd, as well as the rest of his Company, exceeding weary: In this case, the Earl of Derby by his own experience, had the advantage of giving the best Advice, he therefore recommended Boscomb House, where he had found a most secure Harbour for himself, after the misfortune of his late Defeat at Wigan, as the fittest place for his Majesty to take Sanctuary in, till some better convenience could be found out for his clear Escape, the Keeper of that House, and his Relations, having, though poor, yet approv'd themselves persons of most incorruptible Fidelity: This Motion pleasing, and Mr. Charles Giffard, with his Man Francis Yates, being made choice of for the Guides of the way, they arriv'd by break of day at a house a little on this side Boscomb, and in the keeping likewise of one of the Penderells (of that name were five Brethren of the above-mentioned persons); this house (now belonging to the Giffards) was in former times a Monastery of Cistercian Nuns, from the white Habits they wore, call'd White-Ladies; which denomination notwithstanding the abolishment of the Order, hath yet remain'd adhering to the house: here his Majestie was committed to the care and fidelity of George Penderell and his Brothers, who were each of them presently sent for; the rest of the Company after a very short stay, took their Leaves of the King, and departed together (all but the Lord Wilnot) to shift for their Safeties elsewhere, (in regard to great a company could not conveniently lye conceal'd in one place) leaving his Majestie in a handsome disguised posture for Concealment, he having chang'd Garments with Richard Penderell, and had his hair thorn after the most rustical Cutt that could be devis'd, (in which office the Lord Wilnot is reported to have play'd the Barber) and sullied his Hands and Face, into the semblance of the coarsest kind of Complexion; and that this place might only be concern'd in his Majestie's Safety, my Lord Wilnot also took his leave, with a resolution to have gone for London, John Penderell, another of the Brothers, undertaking to Conduct him as far as his knowledge, through the safest and most commodious Way; and the place was appointed where the King and my Lord should have met, in case they had both got safe to London, namely, the Sign of the Green Dragon in the Vinty in Thames-Street. In the mean while, his Majestie thus transform'd as you have heard, arriv'd in Richard's Leathern Doublet and green Kendal Breeches, with a Wood-Bill in his hand, assuming the person of a Wood-Cutter, and the name of William Jones, was led through a back way into a Wood called Spring-Coppice, belonging to Boscomb house, and about half a mile from White-Ladies by Richard, who attended the King to accompany and wait upon the King, in readiness to whatever service of his he might stand in need of, while the three other Brothers Coasted about the Confiners of the Wood, to make Discoveries and give Intelligence if occasion were. And in a lucky time it was that his Majestie had betaken himself to his Wooddy shelter, which though it could not defend him from the R in which fell in great abundance that day, yet it secur'd him from a worse Storm; for within a very little while after his Majesty had left the House, there came a Party of Horse of Col. Alexander's Troop, quarter'd at Cosfall about 3. miles from thence, to search the house for him; wherefore in respect of the strictness of the Search, it was thought the safest course for the King to remain in the Wood, which all that day he did, with his Attendant Richard, being much incommodated by the Wetness of the weather; which nevertheless to render the more tolerable, a Blinck was brought him into the Wood by the Wife of Francis Yates afore-mention'd, as also a Dish of such Country fare as her Cottage afforded. However, the King was a little surpris'd at the sight of a strange face, till demanding of the Good Woman, If she could be faithfull to a Distressed Cavalier? Yes Sir, answered she, I will die ere I will betray you. Which Answer gave his Majestie very good satisfaction. At night he was brought to Hobbs Grange, the habitation of Richard Penderell, where the Mother of the Five, expressing great joy, that it should fall to the lot of her Sons to be the Instruments of his Majesties safety, heartily entertain'd him in a cleanly but such a homely fashion, that none of the rest of the Family should suspect who he was. Here his Majestie stay'd not, but immediately after Supper departed thence with Richard his Guide (whom he could not have been able to have follow'd, so dark was the Night, but for the crackling sound of his Leathern Breeches) 5. miles further toward Wales, to the house of one Mr. Wolfe at Madely, (equally frightening and being frighted by the Miller at Evelin Bridge, who likewise had several Cavaliers of Quality in his Mill for safeguard) intending from thence to have pass'd the Severn, and so to have try'd his Fortune in Wales; but upon Information that all the Passages over Severn were strictly guarded, and all the Ferry-Boats stopp'd, his Majestie with his faithful Guide having remain'd in Mr. Woolph's Barn (where a good wholesome Hay-Mow was their Bed) till Friday night, and then venturing into the house, where he stay'd a little while, and was entertain'd with all the Respect that danger would permit, return'd somewhat late in the Night toward Boscomb; thither also Colonel Carles, whom we left stoutly fighting in Sadbury Street, was by this time come for refuge and relief, being well acquainted both with the house and house-keeper, William Penderell, as having been born and bred not far off; as soon as ever he understood that the King was without in the Wood, he went with all Joy and Dutifull Respect to present himself to his Majesty; then repairing together into the house for a little while to refresh themselves, they retire again into the Wood, and leighting upon a large Oake, whose wide and well branch'd top afforded them a very private and commodious Coverture, (from which it hath ever since merited the name of the ROYAL OAK) they ascend up into the Tree, and with the help of Cushions, made a tolerable abode there till Night, the King taking some repose, by leaning his head upon the Colonel's Lap; at night they betake themselves again into the house, to which his Majesty thought fit thenceforward to trust himself while he stay'd there, without keeping any more abroad; and the rather for that he was much pleas'd with a secret Corner which William shew'd him, where the Earl of Derby lay; it was probably the Dormitory in times past of some of the old Fryers: So his Majestie remain'd secure in the house from Saturday Night till Monday, having spent the Sunday, for the most part, in Reading and Meditation, in a little Summer house at the end of the Garden. All this while the Lord Wilnot had been not a little put to it to keep himself out of harms way; his Journey to London he found obstructed by Multitudes of Souldiers continually hurrying to and fro in all parts along the Roads and High-Ways, inasmuch that he was once driven to commit himself and his horse to the hospitality of a good convenient Marlepit; at length good fortune brings him to one Mr. Whitgrave at Mosely, to whom, as also to Mr. Huddleston, Tutor to 3. of his Children, making no difficulty to discover himself, he finds there both Welcome and Security, from thence he is safely convey'd to Colonel Lanes at Bentley, a place about 5. miles farther, having before-hand dispatch'd away John Penderell to Boscomb, with Instructions to inquire diligently after the King, and to acquaint him, in case he found him, how matters stood: John finds the King at Boscomb, acquaints him how my Lord had sped; is immediately remanded to his Lordship, whom he found at Bentley, to give him notice of his Majestie's Intention to meet him forthwith where he should appoint, and then returns with all speed back to the King to conduct him to Mosely, for thither my Lord had concluded to come back to wait upon his Majestie. On Monday the King prepares for his Journey, but not being able to go any further on foot, in respect of the hardship and weariness he had already endur'd in his late foot-Journey, he was accommodated with a horse of Humphry the Miller, another of the Five Brothers, and who also went hand in hand with the rest in Loyalty and Fidelity, having not long before had occasion to make tryall thereof, when going to Sheshall to pay his share of the Monthly Tax, he was hard beset at the house of one Captain Broadway, to whom he came to pay the Money, by a Colonel of the Times, who coming thither to inquire after the Search at Whiteladies, and understanding that Humphry liv'd thereabouts, took him to strict examination; and when he had try'd what menages could do to draw out a confession, he began to tempt him with the ensnaring Bait of Lucre and Reward, by telling him of the Thousand pound, which was the price set upon his Majestie's Person, Imagining, that one of his mean condition would not have power to withstand to gainfull an Offer; and this Supposition of the Colonels, together with Humphry's discreet framing of his answers, render'd his dissembled ignorance the more unsuspected; so he left him posselt with an opinion of his knowing no more than was generally known. Colonel Carles (whom for his Faithfull Services the King rewarded with an honourable Coat of Arms by Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England by the name of William Carles;) having Friends and Relations in these Parts, with whom for a while he intended to remain conceal'd, took here, with hearty prayers for his future preservation, his leave of his Majestie, who mounted on this [now] Siege of Honnor] set forth from Boscomb on Monday towards Evening, attended with 4. of the Penderells, and their Brother-in-law Francis Yates, guarding him on foot at equall intervals one from the other, arm'd with Bills and Pike-staves, and such like weapons, Humphry leading the horse by the Bridle through thick and thin, making a Witty Apology for the Beast, by telling the King, It was no wonder he went so slow, since he carry'd the Value of Three Kingdoms on his back. In this Equipage he arriv'd by night at the appointed place, where Mr. Whitgrave and Mr. Mosely were waiting his coming: Here the Faithfull Brethren his Guides and Attendants were dismissed, with Thanks for their honest Services, and assurance of not being forgotten, when ever it should please God his Majesty should recover his Own. After which, the King was by the foresaid Gentlemen conducted to my Lord Wilnot, the Joy of which Meeting was very great on both sides, and their Entertainment season'd with various discourse, especially the Story of their Adventures since they last parted; which ended, his Majestie was brought for his repose to a Lodging prepared for him in a secret corner of the house convenient for the purpose: The very next day while the King was yet remaining in the house, certain Souldiers came thither to search, and that so much the rather, for that Mr. Whitgrave was known to have been formerly engag'd in the Kings Service; nevertheless, they were so well satisfied with the plain freedom of Mr. Whitgrave's Carriage, his seeming readiness to have let them enter, setting his Doors wide open, and the advantageous Testimony his Neighbours gave of him, that they went away without troubling him any further than by a bare Inquiry; besides, so well contriv'd for secrecy was the Kings Lodging-place, that they might have search'd the house very narrowly, and yet have miss'd him: Whiteladies was also search'd again in the same day very diligently upon the Information of a certain busie Ensign-Bearer, and the House-keeper with a Musket set to his Breast strictly question'd about the King; but he pretending, that though a great company had been there, and almost eat him out of house and home, he could not tell whether the King had been there or no, not knowing him from another man; and no such person being then to be found, the Searchers storming that they had troubled themselves so in vain, paid the Ensign for his double diligence with blows and contempt. The following Night his Majestie courteously acknowledging the faithfull Civility of his Entertainment, and giving advice to Mr. Whitgrave and Huddleston, what course they should take in case his having been there should any way come to be discover'd, went with my Lord Wilnot to Colonel Lane's house at Bentley, where a very commodious Opportunity was offer'd for the safe Conveyance of his Majestie to Bristol, with hopes of soon meeting with a convenience there of taking Shipping for France: and the Journey was thus order'd; Mistress Jane Lane, Sister to the Colonel, easily procures a Pass for her self and one Servant, together with a Kinman of hers and his Wife, to go to see a Sister of hers (as she pretended) who was near the time of her Delivery, the Wife of Mr. George Norton, whose House was within two or three miles of Bristol: In this Journey the King taking upon him to be the Serving-Man of Mrs. Lane, rode before her, and in their company rode Colonel Lassells the Kinman afore said, with his Wife behind him, my Lord Wilnot with a Hawk on his fist accompany'd them as one who meeting them accidentally upon the Road, had occasion of travelling the same way, intending as soon as he came near Bristol, to turn aside toward the House of Sir John Winter. In their first dayes Journey, they met with two remarkable Rencontres, the first was at Bromsgrove, where there hapning to be occasion of making use of a Smith for the shoeing of one of the Horses, and the News of the Times hapning to be the Argument of Discourse, especially concerning the Fight at Worcester, and the King's Escape; and thereupon, among several other Conjectures, his Majesty himself being pleas'd to deliver for his Opinion, That the King was fled to Scotland, and lay somewhere there conceal'd. I rather think, answered the Smith, that he remains conceal'd somewhere in England; and how joyful should I be, if I knew where, since for the reward of my Discovery, I should be the gainer of the Thousand pounds allotted for his apprehension. Such difference there is of Faith and Honesty among men. The other was at Stratford upon Avon, where it was their fortune to light into the very jaws of a Troop of Horse, whom having discover'd a far off, they were in Consultation how to avoid; but their fear ended when the Souldiers pass'd by without giving any other trouble than a transient Salute; their Lodging that night was at the Crown at Cirencester, (so call'd as it were Corinthi Castrum) the next at Marston; at a Kinswoman's house of Mrs. Jane Lane's, the third day they arriv'd at Mr. George Norton's house at Leigh, about two miles from Bristol, where the King (whom Mrs. Lane gave out to be a Tenants Son of her Fathers) upon pretence of being suddenly taken with a Fever, keeps his bed, and hath one Dr. Gorge assign'd him for his Physicians, by whom being question'd about News, and the Kings Escape, and answering as one that did not care to be troubled with questions of that nature, is told by the Doctor, He did not believe but he was a sinner with the Round-heads (such was the Nick-name heretofore given to the Parliamentary followers), but that suspicion was soon wash'd away with a glass of Wine in the Bactery; he had not been here many days, but he was observ'd and known by the Butler of the house, who was call'd John Pope, one that formerly serv'd his Royall Father in Wales, and upon protection of firm Secrecy and Loyalty (for he was not like the Smith of Bromsgrove) was trusted by his Majesty, and employ'd in several Services that import'd his Safety; and in the fifth place he was sent to look after a conveyance of safe Transportation, yet fail'd of his endeavour, for no Ship could be met with that was fit for their turn; so that upon Consultation with my Lord Wilmot, who came from Col. Winters to Leigh, and was by John Pope privately conducted to the King, it was concluded that my Lord should immediately repair to Colonel Francis Windham, to know if his Majesty could have a secure reception at his house for a while, till farther order could be taken about his Transportation: The Colonel rejoiceth at the occasion to serve his Majesty, and undertakes for the Fidelity of his whole Family. Hereupon, Mr. Norton's Wife being by this time brought to bed, Mrs. Lane pretending to have receiv'd a Letter from her Father, intimating his being newly fallen sick, and requiring her speedy return home, prepares with all speed for her Journey, taking along with her Mr. Lassells her Kinsman (whose Wife was left behind to accompany Mr. Norton), and her Royal Servitour; Thus they came handsomely off from Mr. Norton, and by the Guidance of one Henry Rogers, whom my Lord Wilmot had made use of to guide him from Colonel Winters to Leigh, having lodg'd one night by the Way at Mr. Edward Kirton's at Castle-Cary, arriv'd the next day at Colonel Windham's house at Trent in Dorsetshire, taking upon them to be some of Col. Windham's Kindred, who had been a long Journey; and to give him a Visit, took his house in their way homeward. The next day Mrs. Jane Lane, and Mr. Lassells, with their hearty Prayers for his Majesties Safety and future Prosperity, took their Leaves and went home, the King and the Lord Wilmot remaining behind at Colonel Windham's house for the space of about 19 days; during which time, many wayes were consult'd on for gaining the convenience of a safe Passage, none of which took effect: At last, the Colonel bethinks himself of one Elden, formerly a Captain in his late Majesties Army, at that time following Merchandize at Lime, and goes to him with hopes of using his assistance effectually in this Affair, the rather for that he remember'd, that this man had us'd his endeavours for my Lord Berkley upon the like occasion with good Success; Elden readily undertakes the Business, brings the Colonel to a Master of a Ship of his acquaintance at Chayermouth, a little Sea-Town hard by Lime, and relying upon his Fidelity, bargains with him for his Ship, for the Transporting of my Lord Wilmot and another Noble-man, that had escap'd from the Fight of Worcester, beyond Sea: The man embraces the Motion, the price is agreed on, and all things seem'd in a fair way toward the making of a Prosperous Voyage: And for the better colour of their lying at Chayermouth, till such time as the Ship could be made ready, and all things fitted for the Voyage, Henry Peters, a Servant of the Colonel, made privy to the business, deals with a certain Hostess at Chayermouth, telling her, That a young Noble-man whom he serv'd, having gain'd the love of an Heiress, whose Parents were deceas'd, and having Robb'd her from her Guardian upon his being deny'd her in Marriage, wanted some secure place of abode to bring his Lady to for a short time, till he could provide for the disposal of her elsewhere, and therefore desir'd her that she would be so charitable to the Young Couple, and so much a Friend to her self, (for besides some money in hand, he spar'd not the promise of a greater Reward) as to give entertainment to them: The Woman what with her own sensibility of the case, and the inducement of Profit, soon consented to receive them. These things thus order'd, the King with Julian Conisby behind him, (so nam'd was the Maid that personated the supposed Heiress) set forth toward Chayermouth, accompany'd with the Lord Wilmot, Col. Windham, and Henry Peters, meeting Captain Elden by the way, who after some Conference with the King and the rest, his Majesty being pleas'd to discover himself to him, rode presently away to Lime to take care about the Ship; while the King and the rest of his company remain at their

A their bespoken Lodging, Henry Peters carries at the Port to wait the coming of the Ship, and to give speedy notice when it was come; but after he had carry'd all night, he brings word that he could hear no tidings of their Ship; which News troubles them much, and puts them to a great Dilemma what course to take: however, it was soon concluded, that there was no tarrying for them where they were; without great danger; whereupon the King with his supposed Heiress, and Colonel Windham resolve for Bridport, leaving the Lord Wilmot behind at their Lodging at Chayermouth, (pretending necessity of having his horse new shod) and with Instructions where to meet them, while Henry Peters was sent away to Lime, to Inquire the reason of their strange dis-appointment. At Bridport, there was a great Muster of Souldiers that were marching toward the Isle of Jersey under Colonel Haines; Inasmuch, that Col. Windham would have avoided the place; but the King not induring to think of failing the Lord Wilmot whom he appointed to meet there, and desirous to repose himself a while in regard of his weariness with his last Nights sitting up in Expectation of the Ship, resolv'd to venture into the Town: As soon as they were come to their Inne, while the Colonel went to look after a Chamber and other necessities for their refreshment, the King went into the Stable to take care of the horses, where the Hostler having look'd attentively upon him, began to take acquaintance with him, not as knowing who he was, but as remembering that he had seen him at Exeter (as indeed during the heat of the late War, his Majesty hapned to reside there for a good while together) The King, who was not at all sorry that the Fellow had no more particular a knowledge of him, and thinking it expedient to give him as little advantage as might be, by continuing discourse or converse with him, of making a more perfect discovery, seem'd to acknowledg and congratulate the ground of their Acquaintance, taking upon him to have been a Servant of one Mr. Peritt in that City, and told him, That since they could not conveniently drink together at that time, (for I see, said he, you are busily employ'd) he should be glad to have further discourse of their old Friends at Exeter, in his return that way from London. In the mean time, Captain Elden very much wonder'd, when Henry Peters came to him and told him of the Kings being disappointed of his Ship at Chayermouth, not imagining but that the Ship had long since set sail and almost finish'd half the Voyage; nor could he conjecture what should be the reason of the Masters failing, unless that there being a Fair kept that day at Lime, he had met with Company, and in the midst of his Cups forgot his Promise: Though the true Reason was, as afterwards appear'd, That the Master being at his house for the making ready of some things that were necessary for his Voyage, and a Proclamation being made at the same time for the apprehension of his Majesty, whither on the one side the foremention'd Reward was promis'd to the discoverer; on the other side, pain of death denounc'd to the Concealer of him, the Ship-Masters Wife being by her husband made acquainted with his design, and at the hearing of that scaring Edict being struck with a sudden apprehension of the danger, never left till with Intreaties, Tears, Clamours, and a kind of mixture of Force and Importunity, she got the upper hand so far, that at last he suffer'd himself to be lock'd up by her in a Room a good while beyond the time prefixed for his setting out: And in a seasonable hour it was that his Majesty left Chayermouth, since the unfortunate occasion of the Ships failing, had like to have proceeded to a worse effect; as my Lord Wilmot in staying behind had found to his cost, had he not made use of his utmost dexterity in shifting for himself: For a discourse arising between the Hostler and the Smith that came to shooe my Lords horses, (a Fellow perhaps of the same stamp with him of Bromsgrove) who, and whence, those Gallants should be that lay there that night; and the Smith affirming, That he knew by the manner of the nailing, that my Lords horse had been last shod somewhere Northward; they presently from thence, (in regard my Lord was known to be one of the Company) and from some other circumstances, made conjecture, That they were some Noblemen fled from Worcester Fight, and thrown upon that Coast by various accidents, and that one of them probably enough was the King: Hereupon, the Hostler stung with the consideration of so great gain, hasts away to the Parson of the place, (a man zealous for the Cause) to give him Information; but the Parson's morning Devotions lasting longer than the Hostler's Patience, he returns home for fear of losing his Guests Benevolence: The Parson at length having finish'd his long Prayer, alarm'd with the Rumour the wicked Smith had rais'd in the Town, taking Ayd along with him, runs to the Inne, and strictly inquires what persons were there that night, whence they came, what they did, and whither they directed their course: The Answers that were made to each Particular still increasing the Suspicion, Mr. Bulwer the next Justice of Peace is sent to for his Warrant, to raise the Country in search of the King; he refusing, one Captain Massey, that lay with his Troop thereabout, having rid in Quest of him towards London as far as Dorchester, returns as wife as he went; Moreover, the Neighbouring parishes all about are narrowly look'd into, especially the house of Sir Hugh Windham, Uncle to the foresaid Colonel Windham, no corner whereof was left unpeep'd into, no Servant of the Family unexamined; and lest his Majesty should lie conceal'd there in womans apparel, more especial notice is had of a very proper and handsome young Maid, who being taken into Custody, could not be dismiss'd till after a privy search she was discover'd by an infallible testimony not to be the King. Before all this Pudding in Chayermouth arriv'd to the height, my Lord Wilmot by good fortune was got safe out of the Town, and being come to Bridport, as soon as he perceiv'd the King and the Colonel at the place appointed, watching his going by according to agreement, he without seeming to take any notice rides on towards London, and they having their horses ready saddle'd, mount and immediately overtake him: And for their better security in respect of the multitude of Passengers that fill'd that Road, among whom, one they discern'd discern'd who had been a Servant of his late Majesty's, they took another Way a little on the left hand, and somewhat late in the night, gain'd sight of a little Town; which they, it was call'd, whither it led, and what convenience of Lodging it afforded, my Lord Wilmut, riding before, to enquire, lighted by chance upon an Inn whose Keeper knew him, as having been formerly his Servant and a Soldier in his late Majesty's Army. So that they had met here with a very commodious diversion, had they not been on a sudden molested and frighten'd for Room, by the arrival of a Kennell of Souldiers (whom in their passage to Jersey the Constable had brought thither to his Quarter'd) & disquieted in the middle of the night by the child-bearing out-cry of a certain female. Property that belong'd to the Camp. The next morning after the Souldiers which their noise were pack'd away, it being consult'd what course from Broad-Windser (so the place was call'd) was next to be fear'd. The Resolve was, That his Majesty should return with Colonel Phinham to Trent, while my Lord Wilmut, together with Henry Peters went to Salisbury to Mr. John Coventry (Son to the late Lord Keeper) to advise with him, what course might yet be taken for his Majesty's safe Transportation: Mr. Coventry brings them to the house of Miss Hides, a Widow, living at Heal, a little Village about a mile from Salisbury, where one, Colonel Robert Phillips that had Commanded in the late King's Army, is happily met; and being thought fit to be acquainted with the business, speeds away, etc. my Lord Wilmut return'd to his Majesty, to Spunhampton, about the hiring of a Ship, and brings word, that he had found one willing to undertake the Voyage, ready furnish'd with all things necessary; my Lord forthwith returns to carry this News to the King, and to conduct him to Heal; but ere his arrivall it fell out, that this Ship was hir'd by the Republicans, for the carrying over of Souldiers to Jersey; upon which Colonel Phillips meeting with a Friend of his, one Colonel Gunter, whom he knew to be Loyal, acquaints him with the whole Story, and intreats him to try the success of his Endeavours; Colonel Gunter promises to do his utmost, and it hardly goes about it; in which interim, the King comes to Heal, and sups at the Widow's, with divers of his Friends, (who took notice of him only as an accidental Guest) among whom was Dr. Hutchinson, (afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, now of London) and after Supper, having understood that the forementioned Undertaking had failed, discover'd himself to the Widow, already not ignorant who he was, (however she seem'd not to know him) by having only once seen him pass by several years since; who being made one of the Council for the King's Safety, judg'd it expedient that he should remain conceal'd in a certain place in her house, which was built in the time of the War for the lodging of Goods, till such time as a conveyance were provided for his Transportation, it being a place very private, and undiscoversable: And for the more secret management of the Design, his Majesty, by her advice, early the next morning made shew of taking leave to go for London, while all her Domesticks were dismiss'd, with leave to go to a Fair which was kept that day at Salisbury, and so having only Colonel Phillips with him, he rode as far as Stonehenge, and taking a little compass about, return'd to the house at an appointed hour, and remain'd in the private place, till word was brought, that by the diligence of Colonel Gunter, a Ship was hir'd at Brighthelmsted, a Port-Town in Sussex, and ready provided for a Voyage; upon which his Majesty immediately prepar'd to be gone from Heal, and pretty late in the night accompany'd with Colonel Phillips and the Widows pray'rs, he took his course to the house of one Mr. Simmons near Portsmouth, and the following Evening arriv'd at Brighthelmsted, where the Lord Wilmut and Colonel Gunter met him, (Colonel Phillips having taken his leave, and return'd home) as also Mr. Mansell the Merchant, whom Colonel Gunter dealt with for the procuring of the Ship, and Teterhall the Master of the said Ship, who having discern'd as they sat at Supper, that one of those he was to carry, however meanly clad, and taking upon him the person of a Servant, was indeed the King, (for he remembered him from an occasion he once had to prove his clemency in a Suit he made to him) took Mr. Mansell aside, and tax'd him of Injury, for not dealing plainly with him, concerning the true Quality of the Persons he had undertaken to Transport, since he could not be ignorant of the danger and penalty of the late Proclamation concerning the King: This discovery of the Ship-Masters, and apprehension of the danger of his Enterprize, might probably have render'd the hopes of this Voyage as Effectless as the former, had not the King and the Lord Wilmut understanding from Mansell the Masters demur, and the reason of it, and well assur'd that it rather proceeded from fear of danger, than want of Integrity, strongly set upon him both with Arguments of the safety of the undertaking, and promises of certain Reward, not omitting an Earnest of present Bounty: By all which he was so effectually wrought upon, that he resolv'd to go on with all fidelity and resolution; to which purpose he without delay upon a colourable pretext he made, sends away the Mariners instantly to the Ship which half laden with Sea-Coal, lay about 4. miles off at a place call'd Shoram, bidding them prepare all things in readiness for a Voyage that night, for that he himself was about following them with all speed. This hurrying away in such extraordinary haste, caus'd the Masters Wife (whom, somewhat unwilling at that late time of the night, and without admitting her desir'd put off till morning, he sent to buy some few things that were necessary for his Voyage) to guess that some unusual accident was the occasion of all this sudden preparation; and so far did the sagacity of her conjecture proceed, or else she concluded from some circumstance or other, she observ'd, that she told her husband, she suspected by the hast and secrecy of his setting forth, he was employ'd in the Transporting of some great Person, and she believ'd it was the King himself; But, said she, (so much more honest was she, and more magnanimous, than the Woman at Chayrmonth, that kept her husband lock'd up in a Room when he should have gone upon the same occasion) if by so, God grant you may prove an effectually Instrument of his Safety; and so it succeed according to my pray'r, added she, though I and my Children suffer for it even to the begging of our bread all our days, it shall never grieve me. Moreover, the Inn-keeper, at whose house the King and his company diverted, a good honest Merry Fellow, and perhaps at that time a little Por-Confident, came to his Majesty just as he was coming away, and taking his hand and kissing it, I know not, said he, who you are, whence you come, or whether you are going; but my mind gives me, I shall one day come to be an Earl, and my Wife a Countess. And several others there were, that gave intimation as if they knew him, though openly they took not the least notice of him for fear of discovery; so that he had not long been gone, ere it was generally whisper'd thereabout, That the King had been there. As soon as all things were in a readiness, the King and my Lord Wilmut took horse and rode with the Master to Shoram, where after so many Disappointments, they at length imbarqu'd on the 15th of October, passing for two Isle-of-Wight Merchants who had bought the remainder of the Coals, and therefore at first making as if they intended for the Isle of Wight, till my Lord Wilmut who at that time took upon him the principal Person, seem'd to alter his purpose, and as it were upon a new Contract with the Master of the Vessell, orders him to steer his Course for France; so with a Prosperous Gale (as how could the Winds not be obsequious to the Vessell, which carried Neptune's Copartner in the Empire of the Sea) they in a short time, the King helping to steer the Ship with more Skill and Dexterity than the Pilot himself, landed at Pecam, a small Port-Town of Normandy near Havre de Grace; where his Majesty in the first place giving thanks to God for his happy Deliverance from the many Imminent hazards he had run through, dismiss'd the Collier well satisfied with the noble offers made him for his security, and those bountifull promises since made good to him in his advancement to the Captainship of a fair Frigot; and choosing rather to return home to his Family and Employment, though to the hazard of his being call'd to question for what he had done, (which yet he had the good hap to avoid) than to stay in a Foreign Country, though for his greater advantage and security, From Pecam his Majesty went to Roan, and was there visited by Dr. Earl now Bishop of Worcester, by whom his happy Escape out of England, and his safe Arrival in that City, was most joyfully Congratulated; as also by two honest Merchants residing there, Mr. Sanbourn, and Mr. Parker, by whose assistance he throwing off his Disguise, put himself into a more becoming Equipage, and on the 30th of October he is met in his Journey to Paris by his Mother the Queen Dowager of Great Britain, his Brother the Duke of York, the Duke of Orleans, and others of the greatest Peers and Nobles of France, with a great Retinue on horseback, both of French and English Gentlemen, and conducted into the City with great Joy and Triumph, being honourably entertain'd at the Royall Palace of the Louvre by the King of France, for the most part, during his abode in that Kingdom.

Thus was his Majesty by Gods Providence happily deliver'd from that blatant Monster that with loud Clamours hunted for him up and down in so many places, I mean the Junto's Politick Edict, and that after a very miraculous manner, as we may well avouch, considering to how many persons of all sorts and conditions He was necessitated to trust himself, and wholly to commit the care of his Safety; by how many that saw him accidentally, he was taken notice of and known; How oft he was in the very midst of those whose office it was to apprehend him; How oft in the house (or but newly departed thence) where Search has been made for him; How oft among the Indigent and people of mean condition, whom either hope of Gain might have tempted, or denouncement of Penalty terrified to a betraying of him; But that he was reserv'd to more glorious Purposes, than only to be made a Lamented Spectacle of humane Misery in the Flower of his Age, and the height of all his Hopes.

And now having seen his Majesty, after so many hazards and environing dangers, safely arriv'd at Paris, we shall take leave of him awhile, and looking back into his Kingdoms of England and Scotland, see how matters were carry'd there after the Fight at Worcester; And in the first place, it is high time to inquire what became of those Nobles and Gentlemen, who leaving his Majesty safe at Whiteladies, made it their next adventure to shift for themselves; they made up, as we have already mention'd, a Troop of about 40 horse, and took their way Northward, hoping to have overtaken David Lesley, who with the main Body of the Scotch horse had benided his course with all possible speed toward Scotland: But if Lesley's whole Cavalry could not defend themselves from a torall disposition, being peck't and hurried to pieces by degrees, by several Parties of the Enemy assisted by the Country people about Cheshire, Lancashire, and those parts, Lesley himself being taken prisoner, as hath been above related; Much less could a small Troop of 40, though as gallant and resolute as ever men were, be able to cope with those more powerful Bodies of the State Forces, which scouring up and down all the Roads, would be sure to meet them what way soever they took; which they quickly found: for having a little before stoutly rescued the Lord Levison from a Party that pursued him, they were not far from Newport (set upon themselves both Front and Rear; in the Front by some of Col. Lilburn's Troops (Fatal to the Earl of Derby); in the Rear, by some others, against whom, weary and over-number'd as they were, it is not to be imagin'd that they could long stand out: So that in this Encounter there were taken the Earl of Leicester, the Earl of Derby, Mr. Charles Giffard, (the last of whom got away from an Inn at Banbury, where for a while they were kept Prisoners) and many others of his party: The Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Levison, Colonel Blagus, Mr. Hugh May, and Mr.

Mr. Marmaduke Darcy, by timely shifting for themselves, and quitting both the Road and their Horses, avoided being taken; the Duke having deliver'd his George to Mr. May, and putting himself into disguise, was privately convey'd from Mr. George Barlow's at Bloomsbury in Staffordshire, to Mr. Hawley's at Bilbrop in Nottinghamshire, thence to my Lady Villiers at Brookley in Leicestershire; thence he crept by degrees, through several difficulties and dangers, to London, and there found means of passage into France to his Majesty. Mr. May is said to have ly'n 21 days in a Hay-Mow at one John Bolds at Soudley, and afterwards by a tedious Foot-Journey to have come in disguise to London. The Lord Leviston and Mr. Darcy through many various adventures and hardships, made a shift at last to wind themselves out of danger; Colonel Blague (to whom the King had deliver'd his George) thinking himself safe at the house of Mr. Barlow above mention'd, was nevertheless discover'd, and sent Prisoner to Stafford, and from thence afterwards to the Tower of London; out of which it was not long ere he had the good Fortune to make his Escape, the Kings George in the mean time being with great care preserv'd, was secretly convey'd to him while he was in the Tower; and afterwards by him deliver'd safe into his Majesties hands. The Lord Talbot having by a seasonable flight recover'd his Fathers house at Longford, lay hid in a secret place in one of the Out-houses, while the house was search'd for him several times in vain. Together with Lesley in Lancashire were taken Lieutenant General Middleton, (who afterwards made his Escape out of the Tower, the like did Major General Massey by changing habit with a Porter) the Earl of Kennmore, and the Lord Westworth; also the stout Earl of Clarendon was found out at Mrs. Brington's house at Woodcot in Shropshire, and there seiz'd on; the Earl of Landradale was sent to the Tower, as also the Earls of Rothes and Kelly, (who had been taken in the Fight at Worcester) and from thence were remov'd to Windfar Castle, where they had honour to suffer for his Majesty by a long and tedious Imprisonment, till the very time of his Majesties Restauration. Yet more harshly and cruelly was it proceeded against the unfortunate Earl of Derby, for he being try'd at West-Chester by a Court-Martiall, as a person charg'd with the breach of a certain Act (as they call'd it) of the Junto's, Prohibiting all persons to hold any manner of correspondence with, or any way aid, assist or abett Charles Stuart. (such was the mannerly Appellation they bestow'd upon their King) upon perill of suffering the pains and penalties of High Treason: Having pleaded the Quarter given him by Captain Edge that took him, with as little effect as had been done by several in the like case, was according to the Sentence of the said Court (whereof the foremention'd Hamphry Mackworth Governour of Shrewsbury was President) beheaded on the 15th of October, (the same day the King took Shipping for France) at Bolton in Lancashire. For the same Cause, by the same sort of Justice, and try'd by the same Court, there suffer'd Captain Symkins the Beate of the Kings Letter of Invitation to Sir Thomas Middleton; Sir Timothy Featherstonhaugh beheaded about the same time at West-Chester, and Captain Benbow shot to death at Shrewsbury.

By a long Series of Successes, the English Common-wealth was now mainly confirmed and advanced: Cromwell their General after his triumphall entrance into London from the Battel at Worcester, was never after call'd forth upon any Expedition, there never happening any occasion so important as to require his person; what remain'd uncompleted of the Conquest of Wales and Ireland, he left to be performed by his Lieutenants there, and daily there came news of some Party defeated, some Fortresses or other won in these Two Nations, besides the compleat gaining of the lesser Islands. The Isle of Sailly being lately reduc'd, the next Attempt was made upon the Isle of Jersey, by Colonel Hains, (whose Men were shipt at Weymouth the Fourteenth of October) and General Blake from Sea; after the taking of Mount Ogreil, which was yielded upon good Conditions by Sir Philip Carteret, and other Forts, Elizabeth Castle was surrendered by Sir George Carteret Governour there for the King, and so by consequence the whole Island came into the power of the Common-wealth; also Castle Peel, and Castle Rye in the Isle of Man (the only places that were kept for the King in that Island,) attack'd by Colonel Duckensfield, and Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell, were delivered to them upon Articles by the Countess of Derby, on the twenty sixth of October; and lastly, Cornet Castle, the only place that held out in the Isle of Guernsey, was not long after taken by the Junto's Forces, having stood out a long time, as being a place of great and almost impregnable Strength by nature.

And not only these adjacent Islands, but even what ever was part of the Kings Dominions, though at the other end of the World, (as if Successes had conspir'd at this Period of Time, in favour of the High and Mighty States at Westminster) came into their Jurisdiction; as did about this time the Barbadoes, which under the Government of the Lord Willoughby of Parham had so long so resolutely stood out in defiance of them, and in a firm resignation to the Kings true Right and Authority; till at length the Islanders were by Sir George Ayscough, after he had made prize of 14 Hollanders that lay in the Road, and forc'd his Landing with 700 Men, driven up into their Fort, and soon after brought (special'y by the means of one Colonel Maddisford, a powerful man in the Island, whom Sir George had first gain'd to compliance) to Conditions of Agreement sufficiently honourable and advantageous for the Surrenderers, and for the Governour the Lord Willoughby, to whom was granted Liberty of returning into England, with Indempnity for Life and Estate. Hereupon, Mevius, and Sir Christopher Islands thought it in vain to stand out, inasmuch that Major General Pointz, Governour there of late for the King, departed thence for Virginia.

It was about this time, that Two eminent Commanders of the Parliaments side were taken away

The death of Popham and Irton.

A way by death, viz. General Popham, one of the Admirals at Sea; and not long after him, Irton, Son-in-law to Cromwell, and in his room made Deputy of Ireland; he dyed, (some say, of the Plague, at Limerick), a noted Town of the Province of Munster, which after a long Siege he had newly taken, together with Clare-Castle, (the last by the help of Sir Charles Coote, who had routed a Body of Fitz-Patrick's, and Odwyers men, upon their recovery of Meleck Island from Col. Axtell) his Corps was brought up to London, and buried in Henry the Seventh's Chappell, with as high Funeral Pomp and Princely State, as it hath been since (together with the Carcasses of Oliver and others of that Faction) remov'd with disgraceful reproach to a place of utmost Ignominy: he was no doubt, a man of much dispatch, of dextrous and able parts, had they been employ'd in honest designs; and was thought to have been a great Contriver and Prompter in the chiefest of his Father-in-law's Stratagems. For a time after his decease, Lieut. Gen. Edmund Ludlow executed his Office, till Colonel Charles Fleetwood who had succeeded him in his Wife, was thereby prefer'd to succeed him in the Deputyship of Ireland.

The English Common-wealth having in some measure quieted things at home, and thinking themselves in a fair way to a calm of Peace and Tranquillity, took upon them now to give Laws to their subjected Dominions, as also to make Acts of Grace to encourage their Subjects quietly to submit to them: The first business related to Scotland, which being in a short time totally brought under, (for besides the gaining of Dunbarton Castle, which was delivered up by Sir Charles Erskin, and Dunnet Castle which was taken by Colonel Morgan, the Isles of Orkney, the Ferries, and even Sketland, which is thought by some to be the same that the Ancients call'd Ultima Thule, could not scape their Conquest, which was the Work of Col. Overton;) they tak'd into Consideration a Project, which however it being attempted in former times, could be brought to no effect, they resolve to go through with; namely, a Union of England and Scotland, an Incorporating of both Nations into one Common-wealth: This was mainly oppos'd and remonstrated against by the Scotch Kirk, though in vain; for the Junto had resolv'd upon an Act for the Union of Scotland, and the Abolishing of Kingly Government in that Nation; intending that the Shires or Burghs should choose their Deputies or Burgesses to represent them in Parliament, in such a proportionable number as the Parliament should think fit. And Commissioners were sent from hence in behalf of the Common-wealth of England, to Treat concerning this Union with the Natives, whom they found but very cold entertainers of their Proffer, besides the tough opposition of the Clergy. These Commissioners were Oliver St. Johns, Sir Henry Vane, Major Gen. Dean, Major Salway, Col. Fennick, Alderman Titchburn: And not long after were sent down as Itinerant Judges to hear, determine, and make inspection into all things belonging to the Government of that Nation; George Smith, John Murch, Edward Mosely, and William Lockhart a Scotchman: But these Commissioners or Judges were several times alter'd at pleasure. There came in likewise and submitted to them divers of the Scotch Nobility, as the Marquess of Huntly, the Earls of Wicams, Angus, and Calander; and the Lord Belcarrie; but of all that came in of the Nobility, the Marquess of Argyle was he that most comply'd and adher'd to the Common-wealth Interest, notwithstanding all the professions and shew he made when the King was in Scotland; and of the Lords that acted among us, the chief were Stewart and Warreston.

The next Knack was their Act of Oblivion, wherein, though themselves were generally esteem'd the greatest Delinquents; they were pleas'd to publish it to be their gracious Intention to forgive all Injuries, and Pardon all Hostilities hitherto committed against them, upon condition of taking an Engagement which they impos'd upon all people, wherein they were to promise to be true and faithful to the Common-wealth of England &c. out of which nevertheless were excepted the Lord Goring and his Sons, Sir John Webster of Amsterdam, the Executors of the Bishop of Canterbury, and the Flyers of Dorsetians and Ascham.

Scarce were these and some other little Transactions finish'd at home, when there began to be in preparation new matter of Work for the exercise of their Arms abroad, in respect of a secret Church which had ly'n a pretty while smothering between them and their Brother States of Holland, which was probably in a great part occasion'd through the slight and indifferent reck'ning the Dutch a while ago made of their proffer'd strict Amity and Alliance both by their Agent Doristans (whose Assassination they thought perhaps not sufficiently inquir'd into;) and afterwards by their Embassadors Oliver St. Johns, and Walter Strickland, who being affronted by the common people in Holland, thought themselves not sufficiently vindicated by the States, nor respected according to the dignity of their Masters, and therefore came away in discontent; and though the States sent hither afterwards as their Agent Myn Heer Joachim with several Complements and Excuses, and Commission to Treat about a fair Correspondence and Commerce with England; yet our States at Westminster were now resolv'd they should not have their Friendship on such easie Terms as before they offer'd it, since they then made no more account of it: So that they dismiss'd Joachim after a prefixt time, beyond which he was not to stay, and then proceeded to an Act entitul'd, For the Encouragement of Navigation; Wherein they prohibited the Importing of any Foreign Commodities except upon English Bottoms, or such as were of the Country whence the Commodities came; beginning withall to stand high upon the Claim of Dues and Reparations for the prejudice done us in our Trading: upon which, occasion was taken oftentimes to search their Ships, and sometimes to make prize of them. To complain of these Damages, but more especially, if it were possible, to obtain a suppression of the said Act so prejudicial to their English, they sent with post-hast over into England their Embassadors Myn heeren Catz, Van de Peere, Sharp, and and Newport; These Men however coming as most zealous Advocates for a speedy Pacification, and relying much upon the Favourable Reception they should meet with here, were nevertheless at their very first Audience Accosted with such high Demands about the Herring-Fishing, the Bushness of Amboyna, a Free Trade in the Schelde from Middleburg to Antwerp, that they were able to give but a cold account to their Masters in the Affair they came about: And though some Messages, for a while, pass'd to and fro for the Vindication, each side, of themselves and their Actions, the Dutch all the while making great Protestations of their sincere and real intentions toward this Common-wealth; yet still preparations for War went strenuously on on both sides, till in conclusion they fell to it in good earnest.

A much different Success did the Embassy from Christina Queen of Sweden meet with in the Negotiation of, first, Monfieur Sparving, and (after his decease during his Residence here) Monfieur Appleboom; upon which follow'd an Embassy from hence, which tended to a very firm League and Correspondence between our Masters here, and that Queen and her Successour in Sweden.

We shall conclude this Year with the Sentence of Banishment pronounc'd against John Lilburn, for consorting with Sir Arthur Haslerigg, in the behalf of one Josiah Primus, in a long and tedious Tryall before the Committee at Haberdashers Hall, about a Cole-Pit, which being in the possession of the said Sir Arthur, was claim'd by the said Josiah Primus: The Crime alleg'd against him, was Sedition; for so, probably, was interpreted his taxing of those Commissioners of Corruption and Injustice.

The first Act of Hostility was on the Nineteenth of May, in the year 1652. when Vanrumpe C the Admiral of the Dutch Fleet coming with Two and forty Sail toward Dover Road, refus'd to strike Sail, hung out his red Flag, the usual signal of Defiance, and gave a Broad-side to Blake the English Admiral, which occasioned some hours sharp dispute between them, wherein the Dutch had the worst, losing in this Fight two Ships, and an hundred and fifty Men; but of this Action, the States of Holland would not in any wise own themselves Countenancers and Approvers; and to excuse the matter, as done without their Consent, and to endeavour to renew the Treaty with this Common-wealth, a fresh Embassy is sent, and many deep Protestations made; however, this Treaty ended in an absolute breach between the Two Common-wealths, and now open War was denounc'd and publicly proclaim'd on both sides.

In July Sir George Ayscough being returned from the Barbadoes, and set to Guard the narrow Seas with a Squadron of Ships, met with Thirty Sail of Hollanders between Dover and Calice, and took, or burnt to the number of Ten, the rest ran ashore upon the Coast of France; and the next month there hapned another Encounter not far off Plymouth, between Sir George and the Dutch Fleet, consisting of Sixty Men of War, and Thirty Merchant, part of the English Fleet coming up to Sir George Ayscough's assistance: This Engagement continued fierce till night parted them, and nor without some loss to the English, but more to the Dutch: And about the latter end of September they were lamentably defeated by General Blake, on the back-side of Goodwin Sands, at a place called, the Kentish Knock. But in the Levant Seas, a small Fleet of the English conveying certain Merchant-men from Scanderoon, were set upon by eleven Sail of Dutch, who overpowring them in number, took and blew up five English Ships; and about the beginning of December, General Blake himself engaging with the whole Fleet of the Dutch, came off with the worst, losing the Garland and Bonaventure, with some other Ships. And again in the Levant, Captain Badiley coming from Portolongone to the Relief of Capt. Appleton, Blockt up in the Mole of Legorn, was set upon by the Dutch, in which Encounter he lost three or four stout Ships. The same year the Two Fleets again joyning Battel between Portland and the Isle of Wight, about the Twentieth of February, the Dutch were overthrown, with a fore and terrible loss both of their Ships and Men: But all these Fights put not yet a Period to the War, which was not ended till the year following, and that chiefly by the Counsels and Power of the now chief Ruler Cromwell, who, having by the long continued Success of his Forces obtained a long Respite and Vacation from Military Action, had leisure enough to forecath with himself how he might not only confirm his present Greatness, but also advance himself to a higher pitch; and to this end he set himself by all manner of fair pretences to engage unto a Compliance with his Actions and Interests, the chief Officers of the Army: nor did he neglect to pry narrowly into the Actions and Councils of that Junto, having of his own Creatures among them to give him continual Intelligence from time to time of what was done in the Parliament-House. Thus embolden'd with his former Successes, and his present high Authority in the Common wealth, supported with Friends and Correspondents, and backt with a powerful Army, He resolves to make way for his own Sovereignty, by putting a Period to the remnant of that Long Parliament, which being call'd in the Year 1640, by his late Majesty, had now sat above 12 years, and had run through many bold and unheeded designs, introducing such an alteration in Government, as gave wonder and astonishment to all the World: And to this End, entering on the 20th of April 1653. fortified with the Principall Officers of his Army, and delivering his Mind to them in a Speech, How that he had taken into his Weighty Consideration the necessity of dissolving them as a matter much conducing to the publick good and welfare of the Nation, and which the present juncture of things required, considering the Corruptions and Miscarriages were likely to arise from their perpetuated Sitting, which seem'd to be the thing they aynd at; With other Particulars to that effect; Without expecting their Answer, he desires them to quit the House: Nor was he disobey'd, all yielding, some quietly, others with murmuring, (restit Cromwell Dissolves the remnant of the Long Parliament.

(restit none durst) to necessity and their Master's Pleasure. To justify this great Act, and give a form of satisfaction to the World, a Declaration is fram'd by him and his Council of Officers, alleging the dissolved Parliaments Corruption and dilatory proceedings, if not total neglect of redressing the Grievances, and reforming the Abuses of the Common-wealth, the carrying on of particular Interests; their despoiling to perpetuate their own authority, rather than seriously intending the Common Good; their not answering the desires of the honest people of the Nation, or accomplishing those Ends which they expected from them: And many other Misdemeanours which he laid to their Charge.

And that the seeming face of Law and Judicature might not be disturb'd by the turning out of those late Senators, a Convention is next design'd by Cromwell and his Officers of such persons as he himself pick'd and call'd out as fittest for his purpose from all parts of the Nation, and therefore not chosen by the People, but summon'd by his own Warrants to appear personally at the Council-Chamber at White-Hall; In the mean time, he and his Council of Officers assembling in the nature of a Council of State, to administrate the Government. When the appointed time was come, his Ministers of State meet, and, after his Speech, wherein he layes down his Reasons, &c. receive their Instructions from him in a certain Instrument fram'd for the purpose, whereby their Sitting was limited to the 3d. of November, 1654. Three months before which time, they were to nominate their Successors; and they to do in like manner, and so forward to a perpetual Succession. It was long ere they could agree among themselves, what Name or Title to take upon them; but at length they conclude to be call'd a Parliament, and so enter and take their Seats in the Parliament-House, making choice of Francis Rouse of Devonshire for their Speaker.

Four Months had this Convention or Parliamentary Assembly sat, when at length, certain Divisions and Controversies arising among them (and that chiefly about the taking away of Tythes, which came under Consultation) it was mov'd by some among them, That their longer Sitting would not be for the Peace of the Nation; thereupon they attended his Generalship at White-Hall, (all but a certain refractory Faction of them led by M. Gen. Harrison and Arthur Squib, who tarry'd so long in the House, till they were fetch'd out by L. Col. White), and whether voluntarily or by appointment, resigned their Power into his hands; who thenceforth, though seeming unwilling, and excusing his Inability for to great a Weight and Burthen, yet importun'd by those about him, as likewise by the City, (suborned (no doubt) therunto, assum'd unto himself the Supreme Rule and Sovereign Authority of the Three Nations, with the Title of Lord Protector of the Common wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; being Install'd with much Formality and Ceremony in the Chancery Court at Westminster, in presence of the Judges, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the City, and the chief Officers of the Army; and had a Council assigned him, consisting of One and twenty Persons, most of them Officers of the Army, with whose assistance he carried all things in the Intervals of Parliament: It being the Principal of the 42 Articles in the Instrument of Government, that he should call one every 3. years. All publick Writings change their Title from that of the Keepers of Englands Liberties, to that of Oliver Lord Protector, &c. And now he was arriv'd to that height of Power and Dignity, that there wanted only the Name and Title to make him absolute King.

Nor did this Convention of Senators sit so short a time, but that they left behind them something to be talk'd of, and this was an Act for the Registering of Marriages, &c. wherein among other things, those that were design'd for Matrimony, were oblig'd to go before a Justice of Peace, as if they were going to be bound to their good Behaviour: which strange way of marrying to frighten People, that to enjoy the benefit of the old way before the prefix time of this Act being in force, multitudes run themselves headlong into the noose, as if there had been no such thing in nature as Consideration; and that with flying Colours, for it was openly proclaim'd what they were going about, by the extraordinary number of Bridall Garters that appear'd glistering in Hats in every part of the Town.

These things thus Transacted in England, the King nor having any further means left him at present for the attempting the recovery of his Kingdoms, was constrain'd to take up his peaceful Residence in the Court of France, where he was Treated with all the Honour and Obedervance befitting Regal Dignity, though in a Person eclips'd in Fortune, and dejected of his Native Right; yet besides his own Misfortunes, he was not excus'd from participating, in some measure, in the Troubles that were at that time begun in the Kingdom of France, which by reason of the haughty Spirits and Discontents of some of the chief Princes of the Blood, the chief whereof were the Princes of Conde and Conti, and the Duke of Orleans, (which last seem'd to bear a particular Respect to his Majesty, and between whose Daughter Madamijelle d'Orleans and him, the being Sovereign Dutchess of Monpensier, beside her other great Wealth, a March is said to have been propos'd; as likewise between the Duke of Tork and Madamijelle de Longueville) finding fault with fever 1 grand Miscarriages in the State, and imputing them to the inordinate Power of Cardinal Mazarini, grew to an absolute Civill Warr for the time: The people generally murmuring against the Cardinal, and inclining to take part with the Princes, and the Parliaments also of Paris and Bordeaux adhering to them, and the Duke of Lorraine then in the Service of the Spaniards, being call'd in to the assistance of the Princes; having an Army to that purpose in a readines; and these things hapned when young Lewis the Fourteenth, was newly declared Major (i.e.) arriv'd to the Age that render'd him capable of Governing, and exempted him from the Tutition of the Queen Regent.

To compose and end these Differences, our King offered himself as an earnest Mediatour between tween both Parties; and so far he prevail'd in the Business, that Deputies from the Princes were admitted to a Conference with the French King to declare their Grievances; and debate of those things that were in difference: The first Conference taking no effect, others were also procured at the Suite of our King, who also himself went in Person to and fro between both Sides, to mediate a Reconciliation, using his own Condition as an Argument to move the French King, advising him rather to condescend to a great part, at least, of their Demands, than to drive on to extremity: The King of France and his Council return'd him many thanks for his Friendly Advice, and it was chiefly at his request that the Deputies had been admitted to Treat; yet all endeavours at present proved ineffectual, the said King persisting in his resolution not to give way to the banishment of the Cardinal, who, he said, had approved himself a most faithful Servant and able Minister of State; and the Princes on the other side, notwithstanding all the Arguments our King us'd to appease them, and all the Inconveniences of a Civill War he laid before them, standing peremptorily upon the height and rigour of their Demands. Hereupon the Warlike Preparations proceeded on both sides; and had the Duke of Lorraine, as was expected, come on with his Army, and joyned with the Princes, the Scales of Success had been in great danger of turning, the Princes promising to themselves by this expected Conjunction, the recovery of that Loss and Overthrow which was given at Esampes to their Forces under the Command of the Duke of Nemours, by the Marshall de Turenne General of the French King's Army (in which Conflict the Duke of York won himself that credit and reputation, which render'd him very considerable with the Marshall and the King of France himself, and which afterwards he made good in several other eminent Services); but the Duke of Lorraine, with whom at that present our King was, at his Camp at Dampmartin, having many tempting Offers made him by the King of France for the drawing off his Army, and declining conjunction with the Princes Forces, was so wrought upon, that when the Duke of Beaufort came to him in the name of the rest of the Princes, and earnestly perswaded him to come on with his Forces, and joyn with them in order to a speedy engagement, he discover'd so much backwardness and coldness in the business, as made it easily perceiv'd he had no such intention. At this strange prevarication of the Duke of Lorraine, and flying off from his Promise, Beaufort much wondring, and inwardly enrag'd, and having found his Majesty in private Conference with him, which his coming in brake off, (probably in reference to an old Treaty that had been between them long in agitation, though through one obstruction or other never brought to effect, about the sending his Army over into Ireland, for the Conquest of that Kingdom) concluded presently that it was by the King of England's Negotiation with Lorraine, in favour of the Cardinal and the Court-Interest, that he had thus deserted them, and drawn off his Forces: And this suspicion not only prejudic'd his Majesty in the Opinion of the Princes, but also contricted him much ill-will and murmuring discontent from the common people of Paris, springing rather from the precipitate heat of Popular Jealousie, than grounded upon any foundation of Reason; for at the same time he had the hard thoughts of the Cardinal's Faction, as being judg'd to have counsel'd his banishment, because he advis'd the French King rather to compose things on any terms, than to Imbroil his Kingdom in War; the Cardinal himself, ever after, bearing him, as it is thought, and may be conjectur'd from some Circumstances, no very great good will: Whereas it was evident enough, that what ever his Majesty asked or advis'd on either side, was from a sincere intention and desire of peace-making and reconciliation between all Parties: And if he were an Agent in taking off the Duke of Lorraine from joyning with the Princes, it was for the Peace of the Kingdom, and so it prov'd; for the Princes thereby frustrate of the hopes they rely'd upon to enable them to oppose the King of France his power, were glad to accept of offer'd terms of Accommodation; and hereupon, instead of a long intestine War which the expected Conjunction might have produc'd, a generall Peace ensu'd; the Cardinal having retir'd himself to Brussels, a Castle belonging to the Elefcur of Colen, and long since recall'd home, is re-instated in all his former Power and Greatness, the King of France is receiv'd with Triumph into his City of Paris; and thither also our King, as soon as the Parisians were return'd to themselves, and all misunderstandings clear'd, return'd from St. Germain, whither he had chosen rather to withdraw himself, till the Fit of their Passion were over, than to live among them the unwelcome Object of their dislike.

Before his Majesty left the Court of France, which hapned to be not long after his Return from St. Germain to the Louvre, his youngest Brother the Duke of Gloucester having remain'd all this while under the Custody of the Keepers of England's Liberties, little better than a Prisoner, at Carisbrook Castle in the Isle of Wight, had the good Fortune, whether out of their bounty, or their willingness to be rid of him, to be set at Liberty, and let loose among his Friends beyond Sea, his Keeper Sir Henry Mildmay having brought him to Dunkirk, he was there met by better Friends, and by them conducted first to Brussels, thence to Brada to his Sister the Princess of Orange, from whence he was attended by the Lord Langdale, the Lord Inchequene, and Sir Richard Greenville, into France, and conducted to the King his Brother at the Louvre, by whom, as likewise by the Duke of York, and the Queen-Mother, he was joyfully receiv'd, and very Civilly Treated by the French King and all his Court.

After that Cromwell had invested himself with the Supream Authority, the War yet lasted for a while with the Dutch, and Two terrible Naval Fights were fought; wherein General Monk (who by his Great and Prudent Conduct in many Battels, had approv'd himself one of the Greatest Land-Captains of this Age) did shew he was no less Capable of making himself Successful at Sea: For the first of these, after the first Encounter, wherein General Dean was slain, was chiefly manag'd by Him; and the latter, which was the most Important and Cruell of the two, was under his sole Conduct. But because they were both of them of so extraordinary Advantage to the Reputation of the English Nation, we shall be a little more than usually particular in the Relation of them, but yet with just and impartial respect to the truth of the whole Action. The first Fight was upon the 2d. day of June, 1653. The English Fleet was Commanded by the Generals Monk and Dean both together in one Ship, Pen was Vice-Admiral, and Lawson Rear-Admirall: The Dutch Fleet was Commanded by Van-Trump in Chief, whose principal Commanders under him were the two Eversons, De Witt, and Rutier, all of them very stout and expert Sea-men: The Dutch were far more in Number than the English, who expected an Accession of Ships by General Blake, but he could not get up timely enough to them. The Battail began very early in the morning, and at the first shot made by the Dutch, General Dean was slain. At ten of the Clock it began to be very sharp; And chiefly betwixt the two Squadrons Commanded by Lawson and de Rutier; Van-Trump came in to relieve the last, and General Monk with the Grosse of the Fleet which came on in Excellent order, engag'd him. The Fight continued very hot till 3. in the afternoon; and Lawson sunk a Ship of Holme of 42 Guns, who had in her 148 Men, and many other were slain and wounded, and much more execution had been done, but that the Wind blew very grosse to the English, and so favour'd the Dutch, that they bore away before it, but were follow'd by some of the best Sailors of the English, who gave them chase whilst there was any light. The next morning very early General Monk found himself near them, but the Wind was so slack, it was Noon before the Fleets engag'd, which was continued with so much more vigour than at any time before, and lasted till ten at Night: Ninety of the Dutch Fleet at the heat of the Engagement were in so great Confusion, and so unwilling to stand to the Fight, that Van-Trump fired upon them, and sent his own Boat to Command them to come up to him; Nevertheless, he could not get above twenty of them to return: The rest steer'd away East and by South; but the Wind being very fresh Westwardly, Monk press'd so hard upon them, that he sunk Six of their best Ships, and two of the others were blown up amongst their own Fleet; Eleven Ships were taken, and two Hoyes, and 1350 Prisoners, whereof Six were Captains of good Note: And if they had not got upon the Flats by Dunkirk and Calice, whereby our Great Ships could not get up to them, most of their Fleet had been ruin'd or taken; Van-Trump got off

The two last Sea-Fights between the English and the Dutch.

65. Sail of Ships. The English had not one Ship either lost or disabled; And, except General Dean, but one Captain slain, and about 150 Common men; and 24 hurt.

After this Defeat, the Dutch were very desirous to regain their Reputation, and in order thereunto they Equipp'd a very great Fleet to the number of 125 Sail, with so much Confidence of Success, that they posted Van-Trump out with 95, before the rest were ready, which were to be brought to him by De Witt from the Texell: It was upon the 29th of July in the morning, when the English Fleet consisting of about 100 Ships, discry'd the Dutch, They had time to draw together, but the English were all a stern and could not get up till Six of the Clock to come to any Engagement, and then it was begun but with a few of the nimblest Frigates, which were afterwards re-inforc'd to the number of Thirty, who continued the Battel till th: Night parted them, though the rest of the Fleet could not get up to joyn with them. The Dutch by the darkness of the Night sent away many of their main'd disabled Ships, and got by the English Fleet, to joyn with the 25 Ships that De Witt brought to them, which much encouraged the rest to renew the Fight, in hopes to be reveng'd of their late affront; And now both Fleets met in the most fierce and Cruel Fight that ever was fought, (General Monk observing this War to be very burdenson to the Nation, thought the best way of ending it, to be in the sharpness of it, and therefore gave orders to all his Captains, neither to give nor take Quarter; for he had found by experience, That the taking of Ships oblig'd him always to send other Ships off with them, and so the Fleet became weakened,) The Air was quickly fill'd with scatter'd Limbs of men blown up; The Sea was died with the blood that flow'd from the Veins of the Slain and Wounded; De Witt and De Rutier did bestir themselves, and often attempted to Board the Ship in which the General himself was; Cornelius Everson's Ship was sunk; and the Famous Van-Trump himself standing upon the Poop of his ship with his drawn Sword encouraging his men, was slain with a Musket Bullet; whereby the rest of the Fleet was so discouraged, that they hoys'd out all the Sail they could, to hatter away towards the Tevell: The English pursued little, (having bought the Victory at a dear rate) but tack'd about to Sole-Bay, there to repair the shattered Ships, and dispose of their Prisoners, which were about 1200 men, taken out of Boats and swimming in the Sea; 33. Sail of Ships out of which they were by the mercy of the English saved, were sunk to the bottom of the Sea: In regard that these Prisoners were belonging to so many lost Ships, by this means the number of them was known; but it is supposed some were sunk out of which no men were saved. The English lost 400 Common men, and Eight Captains, Graves, Peacock, Taylor, Crispe, Newman, Cox, Owen, and Chapman, Men of great resolution; and had about 700 Wounded, whereof five were Commanders; but they lost but one Ship, which was call'd the Oake. Van-Trump was a Man of so great Courage and Experience in Maritime Affairs, that he justly merited the Fame of being the most Renownd Sea-Captain of this Age, and perhaps there were few better at any time before. He was a Person of much Vertue, Honour, and Fidelity, and a great Lover of his Country, which made him bear a grateful Respect to the House of Orange, by whom the Foundation was laid of that (High and Mighty) greatness they now assume and enjoy; And by whose Prudence and Courage their Liberties were rescued, and preserv'd against one of the most Potent Princes of Europe. Out of his great sense of Honour, he had much Commiseration for the Sufferings of Our Royal Family, and did endeavour to persuade his Masters to Espouse the Kings Interest, as that to which they were in Justice and Conscience oblig'd to adhere: And though he was without Success in that Undertaking, he omitted not on all Occasions to testify his Affection to his Majestie.

During this War with the Hollander, there hapned a kind of troublesome bickering between the Commonwealth of England, and the King of Denmark, about certain Merchant-Men which coming from the East, and not daring to venture through the Sound by reason of the Dutch Men of War that lay there, but tarrying for a Convoy out of England, were in the mean time shut up in the Booms at Copenhagen, and not only the Convoy was forc'd to return without them, but also when one Bradshaw was sent over as an Agent from this State to demand the restitution of those Ships, they were notwithstanding both detained by the Kings Order, and the Goods sold: This for the time bred a great Controverisie between this State and the Danish King; however, it was at last taken up, and ended at least in a seeming Correspondence.

Also a French Fleet of seven Sail, under the Command of the Duke of Vendosme, going to the Relief of Dunkirk then besieg'd by the Spaniards, was set upon by General Blake, and most of the Ships taken; by which means, the French Relief was hindered, and the Town won by the Spaniards: This moved the French King to hasten over his Ambassador to sollicite for a Peace with England; which afterward was effected. And about the same time comes over a new Embassy from Portugal, to make an end of that which had been solicited by a former Embassy; manag'd by Don Suarez de Gimeraines, with Mr. Adles an English Merchant, his Interpreter, ever since December, 1650, and in some measure vouchsaf'd after a long time of attendance by our High and Mighty's, as to Damages sustain'd by that Kingdom in the losse of their Sugar-Fleet intercepted by Gen. Blake in the Quarrell between King John and our States, about the harbouring of Prince Rupert; for which, though at first he thought to bring them to Terms by seizing the English Merchants Goods in Lisbon, yet he was glad at last to submit and sue to those at Westminster both for Peace and Restitution; wherein not receiving to full an answer as he wish'd, he sent over upon the Change of Government to our new Lord and Master Cromwell, for the finishing of that Affair, the Conde del Sa, Lord Chamberlain of the Kingdom of Portugal, who was dismiss'd, though with the losse of his Brother, yet with pretty good satisfaction as to the matter of his Embassy; however, the Peace was not fully ratified till the coming over of another Embassy, Don Francisco de Melo.

John Liburn who had been banisht by the Commonwealth, hearing of the change of Government, and presuming upon the Protectors Clemency, thought he might now venture without danger to return into England, and about the Tenth of June he came over without permission granted, whereupon he was turn'd over to the Common-Law, and try'd for his life at the City Sessions; and through the many quirks and devices he found out in the Law, and the cunning boldness of his Defence, spinning out his Tryall into a long time of hearing, brought in by the Jury, Not Guilty: yet was he by Cromwell's Order committed back to New-Gate, and afterwards removed from thence to the Tower; so great a stir there was with this petty Incendiary, this Enemy to whatsoever Power was uppermost.

A Treaty of Peace began now to be in agitation with the Dutch, for Cromwell having now obtain'd the Supream Power, and having, as appears afterwards, some other Design in hand took the first Advantage of their Application for Peace, as doubtless they were brought to such Terms by this War, as made them forward enough to sue for it; and to that end, there came over Ambassadors, the Lords Newport, Youngsall, Bevering, and Vanderperre, which died last during the Embassy at London) fully Impowred from them for the concluding of a firm League and good Correspondence between the Two States; So that on the Fifth of April, 1654. the Articles of Peace were signed, and on the Twenty sixth Proclaimed in London; and a day or two after were proclaimed the Articles of Alliance between England and Sweden, Balthasar Whitlock, one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal, having been sent over Ambassador to Queen Christina a little before her Renunciation of her Crown to her Cousin Carolus Gustavus, by whom they were also Ratified.

In the following Month of May, upon an Accusation of an intended attempt upon his Protectorships life, (for that began now to be the chief thing apprehended in all the Plots they henceforth discover) and for the seizing of the City and Tower, and Proclaiming Charles Stuart, as they were pleas'd to stile his Majestie, there were taken and sent to Prison Sir Gilbert Gerrard, and his two Brothers Colonel John, and Mr. Charles Gerrard, Mr. Somerses Foxe, Mr. Sidney Fotherby, Mr. Powell a School-Master of Iflington, Mr. Tindor a Chirurgeon, Mr. Ashburnham, Mr. Philip Parker, with some others, and at a High-Court of Justice erected for the purpose, on the first of July, try'd for their Lives as high Traitors against Oliver; however, Three only were condemn'd, namely, Colonel John Gerrard, Peter Powell, and Somerses Foxe; this last was reviev'd for his ample Confession: of the other Two, Gerrard was Beheaded on Tower-Hill. Powell hang'd at Charing-Cross: On the same day with Colonel Gerard, Viz. The Tenth of July, though upon a different account, was likewise beheaded Don Pontalao Sa, Brother to the Portugal Ambassador, who having not many Months before been engag'd in a Quarrell upon the New Exchange, with this Gerard, wherein he came off with the worst, was so far stirr'd up to Revenge, that coming the the next Night into the Exchange with an armed Train of his Followers, he was the occasion of the Murder of one Mr. Greenway, a Gentleman, no way concern'd in the Quarrel: For this Riot being try'd for his life, and condemn'd at the Upper-Bench, (as it was then call'd) he was brought to end at once both his Life and Controverisie upon the same Scaffold with his Adversary.

Our King had remain'd in the Court of France between 2 and 3 years, with an Expectation sometimes flowing, and sometimes ebbing, of gaining at length some opportunity to recover his Kingdoms; some hopes he had of his assistance from several Princes of the Empire, as the Dukes of Brandenburg, Lunenburg, Brunswick, &c. as also the Emperour himself, to whom was sent in receiv'd with much Civility and Respect. Moreover, the Dutch (whom to incline to a free and ready Concession, both his Sister the Princess of Aurangeim, by her utmost Power and Influence with them; and his Majesty himself, to oblige to him the more, appear'd an Active and Industrious Promoter of the League, which Myr her Boreel was sent to negotiate with the Crown of France) seem'd very inclinable to answer the desire which his Majesty had exprest to them in a Letter sent them by my Lord Gerard, for the owning and adopting his Intrest in their War with England, and Prince Rupert was design'd to have had the Command in his Majesties Name, of a Squadron of their Ships; yet so little speed was made in putting this Overture into act, and so suddenly was the Peace made up between this Nation and them, that whatever was hop'd for, and expected from them, quickly vanish'd and came to nothing: His next and more probable expectation was from the hop'd, with the probable, Success of those earnest Endeavours that were made by the Pope & other Catholick Princes, for a Reconciliation between the Two Crowns of France and Spain, in which Affair he also interpos'd himself a most zealous Solicitor, as no doubting but that from the united Forces of two such Powerful Monarchs, he should receive considerable Assistance: And Matters were once in a fair way to a peaceful Conclusion, had not the Politick Reasons of State, as it was thought, of Cardinal Mazarini put a stop to this Grand Work. But that which went nearest to him, was the great preparation in the French Court, for the sending over an Ambassador into England, to Treat about a Peace with this Commonwealth: To divert this Embassy, both He and the Queen his Mother us'd all the Power and Intereit they had in that Court, though all in vain; for it was long ere Mr. Bourdeaux Neufville was dispatch'd upon the foresaid Embassy: Hereupon the King foreseeing by a necessary Consequence what would become of his Intereit in France, if this Address, as it was likely, should terminate in a League, thought it better to leave that Kingdom voluntarily before-hand, than to stay till he were ceremoniously forc'd out; so that having taking his leave of the King of France (and the other great Ones) from whom he receiv'd many Complements and Apologies, no doubt pretending the necessity of his Affairs, He went accompanied with his Brother the Duke of York, his Cousins Prince Rupert and Prince Edward Palatine, to Chailion, a House belonging to the Prince of Conde, where they stay'd a while to determine how most commodiously each of them to dispose of themselves: The King, with Prince Rupert, resolved for Germany, the Earl of Rochester being at that time with the Emperour at Regensburg, to sollicite in his behalf; and the rather, because about that time a Journey to Bourbon, and the Duke of York remain'd in France, till a good while after the conclusion of the Peace with England, being Lieu. Gen. of the French Kings Army, Commanded in Chief by Marshal Turain. Prince Rupert having parted from the King to go to Heidelberg, the chief Seat of his Brother Frederick Prince Palatine, and thence to the Imperial Court at Vienna, the King took his Journey by the way of Cambray and Liege to the Spaw, which he made his first place of Residence in Germany: Here his Sister the Princess Royal met him, and after a few Months stay in this place, accompanied him to Colen, where they were receiv'd with great Honour and Magnificence; as they made their Entrance into the Town, the great and small Guns were discharged, and the Deputies of the City came in a solemn manner to Complement them: The Duke of Newburgh also entertain'd them very splendidly at his House at Dusseldorp, from whence the Princess of Aurange returning into Holland, the King her Brother brought her onward of her Way as far as Bedingen.

From the time we left Ireland in so declining a condition, and so almost lost to his Majesties hopes, and the Lord Lieutenants Endeavours, the most considerable Force that was left was the dead) (succeeded him as General in those Parts, besides the united Forces of Clanrickard and Castlehaven & some few small Parties that now and then sall'd forth from their Fastnesses: these for a while gave Check to the Republicans and Cromwells Substitutes; till in the end the said Sir Charles Coor, and Col. Fennick; the Lord Muskerry by the Lord Broghil; the Marquess of Clanrickard, soon after a Defeat he receiv'd at Enagh, forc'd to lay down Arms in the Isle of Carrick, the Remnant of the Ulster Forces Commanded by the Lord Muskerry, Col. O'Reilly, and the Macmahons, Relations of the foresaid Bishop, yielding upon Articles; as likewise did Mortogh O'Brian, having all of them stood it out to the last Extremity: The remaining Towns, Castles, and Forts which held out as Limrick, Athlone, Galloway, Ballisawoon, Ballinote, the Isles of Arran and Ennabassen, and other places, all constrain'd to surrender themselves to the Conquerors power; the Marquess of Ormond, and the Lord Inchiquin, having in time provided for their Sivities, when they saw things in a desperate Condition, and still growing worse and worse, by imbarcking for France, nothing was left but to dispossess and extirpate the vanquish'd, and take possession in their room: Some they remov'd out of the World by an Itinerant High-Court of Justice, which went in Circuit from one place to another, the President whereof, was one Justice Donellan an Irish-man, and Cook (notorious by his officiating in another High-Court) his assistant: Others out of the Land by the Articles of Transportation, which the Marquess of Clanrickard and others upon their laying down Arms had concluded with them; namely, to have free Liberty to go beyond Sea to serve the King of Spain, or some Foreign Prince in his Wars: Those that remain'd (as both of the Transported and Transplanted there were vast multitudes) and escap'd the High-Court, we penn'd like Sheep in a Fold within the Province of Connaught, so that there was a large Extent of Territorie left for the Adventurers and Purchasers of Irish Lands: The main pretence of this foresaid Court which sat at Kilkenny, thence remov'd to Waterford, Dublin, Ulster, and other places, was for the Tryal of those that were judg'd guilty of the Irish Rebellion in 1641. The chief of Quality that suffer'd, (for there were a number of less note) were Col. Mac Hugh, Col. Tool, and Col. Walter Bagnall, and who was of all the most eminent as in Quality, so in Crime, (had he been judg'd by a Lawful Authority; as having been one of the Principal Leading Men in that Insurrection, and likewise one of the chief obstructors of the Union, endeavour'd by the Lord Lieutenant in advantage of his Majesties Service; (Sir Philip O'neal, who being taken near Charlemount, try'd and condemn'd, was hang'd and quarter'd near my Lord Canfield's House, at the place where he had caus'd his Father to be murder'd. Thus was Ireland become insubjected to the English Usurpation: And so likewise was Scotland thought to have been at this time, when on the sudden a new Hostility springs up in the Highlands, headed by divers of the Scotch Nobility, who had the most powerful Influence in those Parts, the Earls of Glencarn, Athol, Seaforth, Kinross, the Lord Kenmore, the Lairds Mac-Ronalds, and Mac-Clood, Col. Montgomery, Sir Mungo Murray, and Sir Arthur Forbes; these having each of them got together their several Parties, were endeavouring to unite into a Body, and so trusted to have been able with a Force not altogether contemptible, to have taken the Field against the main Power of the English that were then in Scotland: and 'tis like enough they had speedily effected what they intended, had not the Chief Body of them, amounting in all to about 4000, under Glencarn, and Kenmore, been encountered on the sudden, ill arm'd, ill provided, and in disorder, by Col. Morgan at Cromarty; Glencarn's Army in this Conflict, being very much put to the Rout and dispers'd, and himself missing but little of being taken, the rest in little stragling Parties were many times met with to their loss: Yet were they not for all this so out of heart, but that they again made a shift in some sort to re-embolden, and that so much the more confidently, upon expectation of Middleton's coming over with Supplies out of Holland; though upon his arrivall not long after with Commission to be General, Sir George Munro, (who together with the Lord Napier, and M. Gen. Dalry, landed with Middleton at Inver Ferry) having also Commission to be Lieutenant General, the High-land Levies instead of being re-inforc'd by these additional Forces and Supplies, were rather weakened and overthrow by the Animositie of some of the Scotch Nobility, especially Glencarn stoaching the preference of Middleton and Munro, to the Command of the Army above him, and thereupon departed in discontent, and laying down Arms. Upon the neck of which Breaches and Defections among them, Lieut. Gen. Monk, the Dutch War being ended, having no more Work to do at Sea, is sent Commander in Chief into Scotland, and coming upon Middleton at Lougherry, on the twentieth of July, gives him an utter Defeat, and thereby puts a period to these High-land Agitations, and all farther Attempts in Scotland, to the disturbance of the then regnant Authority in England. And the Kirk of Scotland also her self at this time had the Wings of her Religious Empire very much clip'd, if not quite taken away by the dissolution of her General Assembly, which was done by Col. Morgan, the fore-going year at Aberdeen where they were Assembled, Mr. Andrew Cant and the rest of them, in vain Protesting against the Action: The like Disturbance they had afterwards at Edinburgh, from Lieut. Col. Cotterell.

The Marquiss of Argyle to keep up his Reputation with the Church of Scotland, seem'd much troubled in his mind at this proceeding against the Assemblies, and interceded with the Protector for the liberty of the Church, wherein he had very good success: For Oliver considering that his declining the Kings interest, facilitated the total subjection of Scotland to his Authority, was willing enough to oblige him, by seeming to do that at his Request, he determin'd to do before for the quieting the minds of the people: The Church of Scotland was therefore indulg'd with the exercise of Religion, and a great part of their Jurisdiction and Discipline: they were restrain'd in little more than the power of keeping general Assemblies (their Presbyteries being permitt'd to convene) and the rigor of Excommunication: For, whereas before persons excommunicated were not excluded from the Communion of the Kirk, but had all their Estates confiscated till their Reconciliation. This latter part was not now to be executed: But to please the Ministers for the restraint of their power, the maintenance of Scholars in Universities of Scotland was increas'd, and many Priviledges granted to them.

The Government and security of the Kingdom of Ireland, was the next care of the Protector. Major Gen. Lambert was formerly appointed for that Government, and had provided all his Equipage to go thither; but Cromwell was jealous, least his ambition should excite him to gain a party there to establish himself against him: And therefore he Artificially contrived to hinder him from going, upon pretence of greater advancement here, and he made him next to himself, Commander in Chief of all the Armies, with an Entertainment of ten pounds a day; This done, Glencarn and Middleton Defeated in the High-land.

The General Assembly dissolved by Col. Morgan.

The Marquiss of Argyle interceded for the Liberty of the Church of Scotland.

he confiscated his own Son in Law Fleetwood to be Deputy of Ireland, assisted with 6 Counsellors (that is to say) Steel, who was after made Chancellor, Pepys, one of the Barons of the Exchequer in England, appointed to be Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, M. Robert Goodwin of Suffolk, Miles Corbet, and the Colonels Robert Hammond, and Mathew Thomlinson.

The King was yet at Calen, when he receiv'd the disconsolate News of the Distalters in Scotland and Ireland, supported chiefly by that brave and undanted Fortitude, which never fail'd him in the greatest of his Adversity. The Princes of Germany were very kind to him, which made his stay in those Parts the more agreeable; and, to increase his comfort, he sent the Marquess of Ormond to Paris, to wait on his Brother the Duke of Gloucester to him, whom he the more earnestly desir'd to have near him, least his Youth might be prevail'd upon, by the Subtily of Arguments, and Temptation of Riches and Promotion, to change his Religion; for the King was ever most zealous in the Profession of the Protestant Religion in himself and Family, and on all occasions, to promote it, to his power, in others.

According to the late Instrument of Government, wherein in the first place it was Articled, That a Parliament should be called every Three years, and that the first should begin on the 3d of September, 1654. A Parliament was summoned by Oliver's Writs, (for though he were call'd but Protector, yet in all things he took upon him to act a King) chosen after the wonted manner of Election by the Peoples Voice, and Assembled at the prefixed time above mentioned, making choice for their Speaker of William Lenthall, Speaker in the Long Parliament: Their beginning seems to have bin somewhat bold, considering the totteringness of their Estate; for at their very first sitting, they began to question the lawfulness of the Power by which they were call'd, whereupon they were enjoyn'd to sign a Recognition of the Government, as it was settled in a Single Person, and a Parliament, before they could be re-admitted to their Seats in the House: This all of them that sign'd (for some refus'd) had liberty again to take their Places; but so little did their Proceedings please his Protectorship, that they had scarcely sat full 5 Mon ths (and so long they were to sit by one of the Articles of the Instrument) when he came and dissolved them. A day or two after which, were apprehended of the Lillburnian or Levelling Faction, Maj. Wildman, (for the Cavaliers were not the onely Conspirers against Cromwell's Greatness, though upon a far different Intention) with a Declaration proving the lawfulness and necessity of taking up Arms against Cromwell: Of the Royalty, Sir John Packington, Sir Henry Littleton, and some others, about a new Conspiracy, which Oliver told the Members of his Parliament, at the time of his dismissing them, he knew to whom he could name. And the truth is, there was the Foundation laid, by a Combination of the most courageously affected toward their Prince's Service throughout the Kingdom, authoriz'd by Commission from his Majesty, of a general Rising for him in every County; Which had not so quickly and so easily bin suppress'd, had no: Cromwell, sparing for no cost to maintain his Instruments of Deceit, had his Spies ready hir'd not only here in all Corners, such as counterfeiting themselves zealous Royalists, insinuated into their Councils, and betray'd them, (of which number, Sir Richard Willis at last became shrewdly suspected to be one) but even about the Kings Person, as appear'd by the defection of one Manning, prefer'd in consideration of his Fathers Merits (his Father was Col. Manning, slain in his late Majesties Service) to be one of the Kings Secretaries of Clerks, whom Col. Samuel Luke, adding this to the number of his many other Fidelities, forcing open his Chamber-Door, took in the very act of holding Correspondence with Thurloe, Oliver's Secretary, from whom having newly receiv'd a Pacquet, and set himself busily to the returning of Answers, to prevent discovery, he was hastily chewing Papers in his mouth just as the Col. enter'd. Thus for a long time had he made it his weekly practice to send Intelligence to the Usurper, of all that was transacted in the Kings Court, and had a large Pension punctually assign'd him for his pains; till at length thus fortunately found out, he had the Reward of his Treachery paid him in a more deserved manner, being by the Kings Command, the whole Court beseeching his Majesty to make a publick Example of him, shot to death in one of the Duke of Newburgh's Castles. This Combination, though it were probably to the very bottom discover'd, before the apprehending of the above-named Persons; yet so far the Design, being generally hid, had taken effect, that in several Counties some small Armed Parties began to gather into a Body; in Shropshire on Wales, some endeavour'd to have taken Shrewsbury, and Chirk Castle, by Surprise, but were both prevented, and of those that attempted Shrewsbury, Sir Tho. Harris, who was the chief, was taken prisoner, and sent up to London.

Upon Sunday the 11th of March, a party of about 200 entered Salisbury about Midnight, and having seiz'd upon Houses, and taken away the Commissions of the Judges that were upon their Circuit, bend'd their course towards Cornwall; of which Captain Union Crook having timely Intelligence pursued them with his own Troop, and at a place call'd Southmolton in Devonshire, overtook them, and after 4 hours sharp Conflict, tir'd, as they were, drowsie, faint for want of sustenance, dishearten'd with the dropping away of many, and the failing to come in of others according to expectation, upon notice of the Design being discover'd, drove them to a necessity of yielding; yet Penruddock, bravely stood it out, till Articles were gran'd for the Indempnity of him and his Company, which Crook is said to have afterwards perfidiously deny'd, and left them wholly over to the Courtesie of their Judges: Besides 50 common prisoners there were taken of the chief Leaders 3 Captains, Penruddock, Jones, and Grove, only Sir Joseph Wagstaff made a Shift to escape away. Other Risings there were in Northumberland, and at the Forest of Sherwood in Yorkshire, Penndock and Grove beheaded about the Western Rising.

At Salisbury, Exeter, and Chard in Somersetshire, many of the West Riders were tried by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, and executed, and particularly at Exeter; Penndock and Grove were beheaded, Captain Jones was Reprieved; besides those who were put to death of the chief Leaders, many Prisoners in the West were fill'd with a number of the common sort of Prisoners, till within a little while after that they emptied themselves in Foreign Plantations.

And there hapned about this time an Adventure which serv'd very opportunely for the ridding of Prisons of their surcharging numbers, and the employing of a multitude of loose and vagrant people, there having been ever since the Peace with the Dutch, great Preparations made for the Equipping forth of a great and powerful Fleet, upon an Expedition which was kept very secret, and not made known even to those that went upon it, unless to the Supreme Commanders, till the very last; only it was given out, that the Voyage would be very profitable, and to a place where there was much Gold and store of Riches: In this Service we may well think there would not be wanting enow that would greedily engage themselves; hither all sorts of people flock'd, especially those of low and bankrupt Fortunes, and upon hopes of enriching themselves, tun headlong most of them to their ruine; a Fate that commonly attends precipitate Ambition and Covetousness. This Navy setting Sail from Portsmouth on the 27. of Decemb, put in at the Barbadoes on the 28. of Jan. Venables commanding the Land-Forces, and Pen being General at Sea.

The Marq. of Leda comes Ambassadour from Spain and speedily returns.

The Fleet fleets towards Hispaniola.

Philip the Fourth King of Spain, whether to Cologue with the Protector, whom he saw to be a man of a growing Fortune, or to divert some secret Design which he foresaw was brewing against him (nor did he fail much of his Conjecture) sent over into England an extraordinary Ambassadour, the Marquess of Leda, who arrived the 22 of May, 1655. and was received with the usual Complements and Ceremonies, but had not that cordial Entertainment which he expected; for at the same time he was here endeavouring to confirm the League, there was a Design in agitation, which tended to the dissolution of it, so that the Ambassadour quickly finding which way things went, took his leave after a short stay, and returned homeward.

In the mean time, the Fleet setting Sail from the Barbadoes on the 30. of March, steered its course towards Hispaniola, one of the fairest and richest Islands belonging to the American Dominions of the King of Spain; so that it was by this time apparent enough which way this Expedition tended: And whereas it was admired by many, that at that time when no Hostility was declared between this Nation and the Kingdom of Spain, or any defiance bid on either side, we should with so high a hand carry War into his Territories, without any provocation by him first offer'd; here it was alleg'd, That the Conditions of Peace extended not beyond the Line. This Apology, though it serv'd to stop the mouths of some, yet it could not satisfy the Spaniards, who look'd upon it as an absolute breach of the Peace: However it were, whether this Expedition were just or not; whether it were undertaken to a pious end, as was pretended, to curb the excessive pride, and ambitious usurpation of the Spaniard, styling himself Universal Monarch, and to bring Freedom and purity of Religion to those Indians under his Yoke; or, as many are apt to believe, to partake with the Spaniard of some of his Indian Gold, thinking it too much for one Potentate to ingross so much Treasure to himself, I shall not undertake to determine. This is most certain, That at the beginning of this Enterprize, it met with a very remarkable Check, (however the War with the Spaniard proved afterwards successful enough) for Gen. Venables, when as he might have landed his men within a very little of Santo Domingo, the principal Town and Fortrefs of the Island, and which was in a manner deserted by the Garrison Soldiers, upon sight of the English Fleet; nevertheless, led by I know not what Policy and Interest of his own, and (it is more than suspected) over-ruled by the Counsels of his Wife, sent them ashore Ten Leagues Westward of Domingo; whereupon the Spaniards foreseeing well enough what would be the issue of this business, according as it was order'd, immediately gather'd fresh Courage, and betook themselves presently again to the defence of Santo Domingo which they had abandon'd: The English landing without opposition, and seeing no Enemy near them, thought themselves safe enough, and were in their minds absolute Lords of the Indies, sharing the Golden Mines among them; when contrary to their expectation, the General causing it to be Proclaim'd in the Head of the Army, That none upon pain of death, should plunder any Gold, Plate, or Jewels, or kill any Cattel, This sudden frustration of their Hopes, and the Climates excessive Heat, proved the one such a damping to their Spirits, the other such a weakening to their Bodies, that by that time they had march'd a most tedious and disconsolate March through thick Woods, in deep scalding Sands, ready to perish with miserable Drought and Thirst for want of Water, of which they met not with a drop in many miles, they were brought to such a condition, that they needed not an Enemy to kill them, being already most dead with faintness and weakness; so that the Spaniards, Negroes, and Molatto's, falling upon them, kill'd, with little or no resistance, till they were weary of killing; and those that could make a shift to fly away, found it a sufficient Achievement, for that time, to bring themselves back again safe unto their Ships.

The English land in the Island of Hispaniola.

They are cruelly vanquish'd by the Spaniards and Natives, and driven out of the Island.

A In this Conflict Major Gen. Haines acted the part of a very valiant Soldier, who being shamefully deserted by his own men, and over-powred by his Enemies, was slain stoutly fighting: there fell above 600 in the Fight, or rather Massacre, besides what were cut off in stragling Parties near as many more; and all this Execution was done by not above sixty of the Enemy. The Remnant of this Naval Army, that they might not be thought to have undertaken so long a Voyage, and of such expectation altogether in vain, posselt themselves with little or no opposition of another Island called Jamaica; which however not so plentiful and rich a place as that which they at first aimed at, yet with much Industry, and the Supplies that were sent them out of England they made a shift to make a Habitation of it tolerable enough to abide in, planting themselves at Orifano, the chief if not only Town thereof, and have kept it ever since.

They possess themselves of Jamaica.

B The first Adviser to this Undertaking, was one Gage a Minister (formerly a Remish Priest) who also undertook to be the chief Guide in this Expedition, as one who by his long time of Travel in those Parts (of which there is a handsome Relation of his extant) was well acquainted with them; and there he ended his days not long after his re-arrival, reaping little fruit of this his famous Project.

While these things were thus transacted not so happily in these Western Islands, with better success Gen. Blake before Tunis, demanding Reparation for the Losses sustain'd from the Turkish Pyrates; and being answer'd with scorn by the Dye of Tunis, ventured upon a gallant resolute Attempt, and (notwithstanding the Bravado of the Dye, in bidding him behold his Castles of Galtea and Ferino) came boldly to Anchor with the Admiral, Vice-Admiral, and Rear-Admiral, within Musket shot of the Cattle (the Shore being also planted with great Guns) and never left till he had fired Nine fair Ships in Porto Ferino, all that were in the Port; and at length came off with much Glory and Renewal, and little loss of his own side.

Gen. Blake's notable Attempt and success before Tunis.

Notwithstanding the ill success of the late several Combinations, which for many suffer'd for, it was not much above a Month ere the Earl of Lindsey, the Lords Willoughby of Parham, Newport, Maynard, Faulkland, Lucas, Peire, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir Jossey Palmers, Sir Richard Wingfield, with divers others, were committed to the Tower, upon suspicion of pretended High-Treason against his Majesty; which yet, it seems, went no further then bare suspicion, for they were never brought to a publick Tryal.

The Earl Willoughby, by Sir Parham, the Lord Newport, and others, committed to the Tower.

About the beginning of July, Major Sedgewick went with a Squadron of Twelve Ships, among which was Col. Humphryes with his Regiment, to the supply of those in Jamaica; from whence, in the following Month of August, General Pen return'd for England, with a part of the Fleet, the greatest part yet staying behind: and not long after him came over General Venables, leaving in their steads Colonel Fortescue to command the Land Forces, Vice-Admiral Goodson the Navy. Venables not long after his Arrival, was for his ill management of Affairs in Hispaniola, sent to the Tower; from whence, haply being judg'd to have fail'd rather through rash Imprudence, then any sinister Intention, he was at length released.

Major Sedgewick, and Col. Humphryes sent with a supply to Jamaica. Gen. Pen and Gen. Venables return into England.

The Duke of Gloucester willingly obeying the Order of the King his Brother, was come away with the Marquess of Ormond from Paris, and having stay'd for some time with his Sister the Princess Royal, at the Hague, was at last accompanied by her to the King their Brother at Colen, where she her self also stay'd with them till after the Fair at Frankford; to which place, they all of them together made a Progress of State and Pleasure, attended by the Marquess of Ormond, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Newburgh, the Lady Stanop, and Monsieur Hemstee her Husband, they went by Coach a little beyond Bome the Arch-Bishops Electoral Seat: the rest of the Journey they went by Water in a Gondelay, or Pleasure-Boat: through every Princes Country which they pass'd, they had the chief Officers of State sent to Complement them, and were saluted by the great Guns from all their Towns and Castles, more especially the Prince Elector of Mentz sent his grand Marshal to invite them to his Court: whereupon the Lord Newburgh was sent back with the Grand Marshal, to desire the Elector to excuse them at present, promising to wait upon him at their return: Being arrived at Frankford, and hearing that Queen Christina of Sweden was coming that way in her Journey into Italy, the King sent one of his Lords to her, expressing his desire to wait upon her, at whatever place her Majesty should be pleas'd to nominate; the place then appointed for this Interview was Coningstein, a Village near Frankford, in the Electorate of Mentz, where he had first particular Discourse with her himself for half an hour, which pass'd with many Complements, and Ceremonies of Civility: next the Duke of Gloucester was admitted, and then the Lords that attended the King: As these Princes came back from Frankford, the Elector of Mentz renewing his Civilities, provided all manner of Accommodation for them, as they pass'd through his Territories; and meeting them himself a great part of the way, he brought them to one of his Palaces, where he entertained them in a very sumptuous and splendid manner, for the space of two or three dayes; after which they returned to Colen: Four Burgomasters being appointed by the Magistrate of the City to wait upon them, and welcome them home.

During the Kings abode at Colen, the Bishop of Avignon is said to have sent a Scheme drawn by one Onale, a great Mathematician, then residing in France; wherein was positively foretold, that in the Year, 1660, he should be admitted with all Joy and Tryumph imaginable into his Kingdom of England.

jects in the Vallies of Piedmont, upon occasion of some high displeasure taken against them, and the Souldiers left to their own unbridled Licence, having committed many cruel Outrages and Massacres upon the poor miserable People; Cromwell, whether out of a true Sense and Consideration of their afflicted Condition, and to make a kind of small recompence by one act of Charity, for the many of Violence he had been the Author of; or taking this Opportunity to ingratiate himself with the Protestants abroad, affecting haply to be thought the chief Patron and Protector of those of the Reformation in all Parts, (as if three large Kingdoms, another Man's Right, had not been enough to exercise his Protectorship in.) Concern'd and bestir'd himself indeed very vigorously for their Relief; he appointed a solemn day of Humiliation to be kept; caus'd a large Contribution to be gather'd for them throughout the Nation; sent his Agents abroad, to mediate for them, Mr. Pell to the Protestant Cantons of the Switzers; Mr. Samuel Moorland, and Mr. George Downing to Thurin to the Court of the Duke of Savoy, by whom his Message being lighted, he took another course to deal with him, namely, by the Mediation of the King of France, his now great Allie; by whose Power and Authority with that Duke, a Pacification was shortly concluded: Though of the large Collection that was made, so scanty a share came to them, (for some they had) that it may be very well suspected, whether Self-Charity for the getting of money, were not as well aim'd at, as Charity ad extra for the bestowing it.

However it far'd with the Protestants abroad, these at home, viz. the Cavaliers, because they would not become Oliver's obedient Subjects, are not only not fav'd from Persecution, but persecuted themselves; not only not collected for, but largely collected from; while, besides other displeasures both toward the Clergy who were prohibited from teaching School, and from having any Benefices, or officiating as Chaplains; and toward the Laity, who were by Proclamation confin'd (such as had ever been in Arms) not to come within twenty miles of London, and disabled from electing or being elected in Parliament; there comes out a two-handed Invention of Cromwell's, which serv'd him at the same time to acquire money to his own Coffers, and to bring low and diminish in their power the Royalty; this was an Order for the Decimation, or making bold with the tenth part of the Estates of all such as had ever been in Arms either for his late or present Majesty; a thing so much the more unjust on Oliver's part, (not to mention the Old Junio's Act of Oblivion) for that having long since left off Preaching, he should now go about to take Tythes: For the better executing this Project of Decimation, under colour of Securing the Peace of the Commonwealth, for which Orders were set forth toward the latter end of October, by Oliver and his Council, is set up the Knack of Major Generals Civil; these were certain of Cromwell's Engines, appointed in the nature of Presidents or Governours of Provinces, to Curb, Watch and keep in awe the Cavaliers, and if it were possible to pull down their high Stomachs; they were Eleven in number, namely, Kelsey, Goff, Desborough, Fleetwood, Skippon, Whaley, Butler, Barry, Worley, Lambert, and Baxter, which last was also Lieutenant of the Tower; each of them having his several Counties allotted to his Government in the nature of Provinces: In which their Principalities, they reign'd like so many petty Kings, domineering over the Gentry and Nobility much after the manner of Masaniello, whom they resembled as well in the impotent Management of their upstart power, wherewith like him they were intoxicated, as in the soon expiring thereof; for Cromwell either thinking to do a speciall act of grace by taking off his Mallices, or jealous of what their power in time might come to, easily gives way to his next Parliament to unhorse whom he himself had so lately mounted.

A debate held at White-Hall about the admission of the Jews.

An Imbargo upon the Goods of English Merchants in Spain. Open War with England proclaim'd by the Spaniards at Dunkirk. Articles of Peace between England and France ratified and proclaim'd.

Upon the tendering of certain Proposals to the Protector, by Manassah ben Israel, a Jewish Merchant, in the behalf of his Hebrew Nation, for their free admission to Trade, and exercise their Religion in England; a Conference was held about it several days at White-Hall, by the Members of the Council, and certain Divines of the most eminent then in esteem: and many Arguments being urg'd, some for, others against their Admission; those against it so far prevail'd, that the Proposals took no effect.

The Spanish King thinking it in vain to hope for a Conservation of the League on this side the Line, from those whom he judg'd to have so apparently broke it on the other side, by invading his Island of Hispaniola, began not obscurely to make preparations for War; and to shew that he had entertain'd Thoughts of Hostility, a general Imbargo was made in Spain, of all English Merchants Goods, and many of their persons secured; hereupon the like was done in England, and there suddenly follow'd on both sides a denunciation of open War, which by the Spaniards was not long after solemnly proclaim'd at Dunkirk.

The dissolution of the Peace with Spain, was the Product of a Peace with France; for there having been long since an Address made to that end from France, to the State of England, no sooner did the breach begin between England and Spain, but the French King sends to Monseur Bourdeaux his Ambassadour here, to press his Embassy; which he did with so good success, that in a short while after the Articles of Peace between us and France were concluded, ratify'd by both Parties, and on the Twenty eighth of November the Peace was proclaim'd at London, and at Paris much about the same time.

Whereupon soon after Cromwell not to be behind-hand in State, and to provide for the diligent Management of all matters concluded in this Treaty, sends over in the Quality of his Lord Embassadour extraordinary to the French King, Colonel Lockhart, sometime one of the Itinerant Judges in Scotland, and since advanc'd to this Dignity by the marriage of a Niece of his pretended Highness: And at the same time there being a strict League of Amity between his Highness and and Caroline Gustavus the then King of Sweden Embassies of friendly Correspondence are on each side interchang'd; from hence went Mr. Rolt, one of Oliver's Bed-Chamber, (for he begins now to have all his Officers of State about him) from thence arriv'd here the Lord Christian Boud, and was entertain'd here with more than ordinary respect; for of all the Amities that were between Cromwell and Foreign Princes and State, his most particular and intimate seems to have been with the Swedish King, whom a while after he under-hand aided with men in his War against the Dane, while at the same time he makes shew of endeavouring an accommodation between those two Kings.

One principal Condition of the Treaty with France, was the exclusion of his Majesty, and all his Relations and Adherents out of the King of France's Dominions; he himself upon foresight of what this Treaty would come to, had long since betaken himself to Germany, and there remain'd (for the most part at Colen, as hath been already mentioned) untill such time as the Spaniards invited him into Flanders: His Brother, the Duke of York, notwithstanding the great Command Interest comes in place) was, by the same reason of State, advertis'd to depart that Kingdom with all his Retinue, by a prefixed time, not without some Compliments and Apologies for this Dismission: also his departure was requisit for some space, in which he was visited, and honourably Treated by the Marshall Turcin, and others of the French Grandees; as likewise by the Duke of Modena (who at that time was come into France about some important Affairs); at length he took his leave of the King and Court of France, and attended by the Lord St. Albans, and other English Lords, took his Journey toward Flanders, where at that time the King his Brother resid'd at the Invitation of Don John of Austria, who then Governour of the Low-Countries for the King of Spain, (the Arch-Duke Leopoldus having lately quitted the Government, and return'd into Germany.) sent the Count of Fuenfajlagne, to offer him in the name of the Spanish King all possible Service and Assistance.

The Close of this Year puts on Mourning in like manner as the last; the last Year ended with the Learned Selden; this, with that most Pious and Reverend Prelate, James Usher Archbishop of Armagh, and once Primate of Ireland, whose Judicious Writings are sufficiently famous in the Common-wealth of Learning throughout Christendome; his Buriall, though he died on the 21. of March, was deferr'd till the 17th of April, and then performed with all decent Pomp, and by most of the Nobility in London attended to Westminster Abbey, where his Funeral Oration was deliver'd by the Lord Almoner to Cromwell's Highness, (for so Dr. Bernard, once Preacher to the Society of Gray's-Inn, had then the honour, forsooth, to be entitl'd); Moreover, this said Highness himself, though the Countess of Peterborough, at whose House at Rygate the Bishop dyed, was ready to have defray'd all things befitting his Interment, would needs be so bountifull, either out of Policy to be thought a great favourer of Piety and Literature, or from some spark of grace that hapned to be in him, as to bestow 200 l. toward the Solemnizing thereof. Yet were his Coffers not so well furnish'd as he desir'd, And therefore notwithstanding his no success in his last Parliament, he finds a necessity of calling one again, whereupon he sends forth Writs in July for the summoning of another Parliament to meet on the Seventeenth of September.

In the mean while, a part of the English Navy Commanded by Blake and Monntague, lying to intercept the Spanish Plate coming from the West-Indies, namely, the Rear-Admirall and six other Ships under Captain Richard Stainer, set upon a Fleet of Eight Spaniards, within four Leagues of the Bay of Cadix; The Admiral Ship in which was General Don Marco del Porto, with Six hundred thousand pieces of Eight, run ashore in the Bay, the Vice-Admiral a Gallion, Commanded by Don Francisco de Esquevell, and having in her 1200000 pieces of Eight, and another Ship Commanded by John Rodriguez Calderon were taken, and afterwards fir'd (one wilfully by the Spaniards in it, the other by accident): Two others were taken and kept in possession, the Rear-Admiral a Gallion, Commanded by Don Francisco del Haya, and having in her Two Millions of some value, with a Portugall Prize, and a small Vessel of Advice from the Vice-Roy of Mexico, escap'd to Gibraltar. In the Vice-Admiral which was set on fire by the Spaniards themselves, to prevent being taken Prisoners, was the Marquess of Baydex with his whole Family: there perish'd in this Combustion besides a number of less Note, the Marquess himself, with his Wife and his eldest Daughter, who was going into Spain to be married to the Duke of Medina Celi; there were saved from this fire, the Marquess his eldest Son Don Francisco de Lopez, a younger Son Don Joseph de Smeaga, and two Daughters Donna Josepha, and Catilina, with about Ninety others. In the Rear-Admiral was also taken Prisoner Don Diego de Villa Alva, Governour of the Havana, brought up to London, and there for a while detained Prisoner, That the Cities of Lima and Calao in Peru, were about five Months before destroyed by an Earthquake and fire raining from Heaven, in which Ruine there perished above 11000 Spaniards, but of Indians not above 100: Also that the Mountains of Potosi being laid level, the Gold and Silver Mines were thereby utterly destroyed. This Enterprize at Cadix purchas'd no less Profit than Honour to the Performers thereof, and to the chief in Power. As for the Spanish young Nobles that were taken, the Protector, to give him his due, dealt very nobly by them, and after no very long time of detention, dismiss them home without any Ransom.

the French into the sole possession of Major General Morgan, and the English, who presently fell to Fortifying it, and in a short while made it to Impregnable, that when the Spaniard sensible how much it imported to the keeping of Dunkirk, to regain this Fort, sent a strong Power of men; (among whom were two thousand Scotch and Irish Reformadoes, assign'd by our King to that Service, and commanded by his Brother the Duke of York) to set upon its Recovery by a desperate Storm; they were after a very gallant and resolute Effort upon the Place, which continued for the space of six hours, repell'd in the end with the loss of many men.
